THE

PREFACE.

THERE is a natural deſire implanted in every human heart to know its own origin, and to trace the vital blood that flows through it to the fountain-head.

Hence individuals, willing to preſerve the memory of their progenitors tranſactions, have tranſmitted to poſterity an account of many important events; and, ſedulous for their own anceſtors, have furniſhed the world with a variety of intereſting anecdotes concerning thoſe of others.

At length, the annals of particular families were blended together, and national hiſtories formed; theſe were no ſooner known than admired, a ſenſe of their utility ſucceeded, and their real importance ſhortly procured them univerſal eſteem.

A celebrated writer juſtly obſerves, that " Wandering people muſt have been the laſt who wrote,
" having leſs means of procuring and preſerving archives, having few wants, few laws, few events;
" being occupied by nothing but the method of procuring a precarious ſubſiſtance, and being ſatisfied
" with oral tradition. A Hamlet had never any hiſtory; a wandering people ſtill leſs; and
" a ſingle city very rarely. The Hiſtory of a Nation cannot be written till very late; it is begun
" by ſome ſummary regiſters which are preſerved as far as can be in a temple or citadel. An unhappy
" war often deſtroys theſe annals; and the people muſt renew their labours twenty times;
" like ants, whoſe habitations are trampled upon. Many ages muſt elapſe before a Hiſtory any " way circumſtantial can ſucceed to this indigeſted regiſter."

Thus originated the hiſtories of different nations, when the hand of improvement methodized the various relations, aſcertained dates by concurrent teſtimonies, compared facts with each other, and placed events in ſuch a light as to reduce the whole to a ſyſtem.

At preſent no polite people are without their national hiſtory. Societies, deficient in this reſpect, are juſtly ranked as barbarous; and thoſe individuals in poliſhed countries, who are unacquainted with their own annals, may, with equal juſtice, be deemed ſtupidly illiterate.

If the members of arbitrary governments think it inexcuſable to be ignorant of their own chronicles, how much more aſſiduous ought a Britiſh individual to be in making himſelf acquainted with the hiſtory of his country? The former but ſeeks, as a matter of curioſity, to know when, where, and how, his chains were forged, and at what period he became enſlaved; but it is incumbent on the latter, as a matter of neceſſity, to inform himſelf at what time his conſtitutional liberty was obtained; how tyrants were prevented from enſlaving this nation; and by whom our rights and franchiſes were handed down to us inviolate. The one amuſes himſelf in tracing how he became a vaſſal; the other may find equal entertainment in exploring how he became free.

The

PREFACE.

The buſineſs of an hiſtorian is to be faithful—impartial—perſpicuous—inſtructive—amuſing—and exact. Theſe relative duties we have endeavoured to perform by giving a faithful narrative of events; an impartial account of actions; a perſpicuous detail of occurrences; an inſtructive diſplay of characters; an amuſing relation of things; and an exact recital of facts. To be faithful, we have compared authorities; to be impartial, we have diveſted ourſelves of prejudice; to be perſpicuous, we have aimed at conciſeneſs; to be inſtructive, we have omitted nothing eſſential; to be amuſing, we have inſerted nothing unneceſſary; and to be exact, we have ſtrictly attended to dates. In fine, our end is improvement; our means, entertainment; and our guide, TRUTH.

When duſt ſhall eat her braſs, when time's ſtrong hand
No more ſhall ſuffer palaces to ſtand;
When ſumptuous temples, lofty towers decay,
And mould'ring pillars piece-meal fall away;
Still, ſtill ſhall live th' Hiſtorian's uſeful page,
The faithful mirror of each various age;
While Britain's annals to ſucceeding times
Shall praiſe our virtues, or reproach our crimes;
And as we pry into events of yore,
Our own tranſactions others ſhall explore.
Then o'er Britannia's head may cloudleſs ſkies,
And white-rob'd peace in brightning proſpects riſe;
That our ſucceſſors may not bluſh for ſhame,
And children mourn, their fathers were to blame.

HISTORY OF

BOOK I.

From the earlieſt Period of Authentic Information, to the Conqueſt of Britain by the Romans.

IN tracing the Engliſh Annals, a vaſt field opens to the imagination, and a prodigious fund of important intelligence is procured. That curioſity, inherent in every enquiring ſoul, is gratified by a variety of objects worthy of the utmoſt attention; the moſt rational information is acquired, while the mind is agreeably entertained; we receive leſſons from the wiſeſt legiſlators; are inſtructed in the duty we owe to ourſelves and our country, by the braveſt heroes, and even learn to correct our faults by the erroneous conduct of Kings.

We are, in the courſe of our inveſtigation, led to conſider the various degrees by which a powerful nation hath been gradually poliſhed from a ſtate of profound ignorance and barbariſm, to an amazing degree of literary and political refinement. No country having undergone greater changes, none can afford more ſatisfaction to the curious; for ſince the revolutions have been many, the examples muſt be numerous; and as the occurrences were important, the leſſons they afford are, of courſe, intereſting.

This iſland was ſcarce known at the time the Roman empire was in its utmoſt ſplendor; but ſince that period it has increaſed ſo exceedingly in power and opulence, as to extend its conqueſts farther, and to acquire more territory than that ſtate could ever claim, when its poſſeſſions were the moſt extenſive. Even in the time of the emperor Auguſtus, the Britons were deemed a people detached from the reſt of mankind, and of ſuch inhoſpitable manners, that it was thought a kind of baniſhment to be ſent among them.

——" Some to far Oaxis ſhall be ſold,
" Or try the Lybian heat, or Scythian cold;
" The reſt among the BRITONS be confin'd,
" A race of men from all the world disjoin'd.
VIRGIL."

Yet the inhabitants of theſe iſlands, at ſubſequent periods, penetrated regions which the Romans had no idea could exiſt; made themſelves maſters of tracts of country which lay in climates, deemed by thoſe people, uninhabitable, and boldly explored an immenſity of ocean, though their priſtine conquerors never dared venture to loſe ſight of land.

The antients deemed Great Britain the largeſt iſland in the univerſe. Modern diſcoveries have, however, evinced the error of that idea; but if it is not the moſt extenſive, it is certainly the moſt conſiderable in every other reſpect. The excellency of its ſituation; the fertility of its ſoil; the courage and ingenuity of its inhabitants; its internal opulence, extenſive commerce and naval ſtrength, place it at the head of European ſtates, and ſeat it in the firſt rank of eſtimation in the eye of the world.

We cannot forbear here inſerting the beautiful epithets with which the inimitable Shakeſpear, one of its nobleſt ornaments, diſtinguiſhes it.

" This royal throne of kings, this ſcepter'd iſle,
" This earth of majeſty, this ſeat of Mars,
" This other Eden, demi-paradiſe,
" This fortreſs built by nature for herſelf,
" Againſt infection, and the hand of war.
" This happy breed of men, this little world,
" This precious ſtone ſet in the ſilver ſea
" Which ſerves it in the office of a wall;
" Or as a moat defenſive to a houſe
" Againſt the envy of leſs happier lands."

It has been ſuppoſed that England was firſt termed ALBION, and afterwards BRITAIN; but this opinion is erroneous, as the names are equally antient, the whole cluſter of iſlands being called Britain, and England only known by the appellation of Albion.

The antient hiſtory of all nations, and the derivation of the names peculiar to them, have been generally inveloped in obſcurity, and diſguiſed by fables. The annals of Britain, like others, met this common fate, and previous to the invaſion of Julius Cæſar, every hiſtorical occurrence is interwoven with romance; ſo that it is extremely difficult to ſeparate fact from fiction. We ſhall, however, endeavour to preſerve what is authentic; ſeclude the fabulous parts from our writings; and maintain that candour and veracity, ſo eſſential to the character of the hiſtorian.

The word Albion is derived, by the moſt judicious hiſtorians, from the Greek word ALPHON, which ſignifies white; this is countenanced from the whiteneſs of the chalky cliffs which ſurround the whole iſland, and authoriſed by the writings of the antient Britiſh bards themſelves, who call England INIS-WEN, or WHITE-ISLAND. The epithet Britain, according to the moſt authentic accounts, is derived from the word BRITH, which, in the Britiſh language, ſignifies painted, and was peculiarly characteriſtic of the natives, though ſome affirm that it originates from the Phœnician word BARTANAC, or LAND of TIN, a name which thoſe people who traded to Britain for this commodity, might naturally be ſuppoſed to beſtow upon the country itſelf. With reſpect to the modern appellative England, it is derived from an Anglo-Saxon province called Anglen, from whence our Saxon anceſtors principally came.

The iſland of Great Britain is commodiouſly ſituated in the Atlantic Ocean, being bounded on the north by the Deucaledonian, or Northern Ocean; on the ſouth by the Britiſh Channel; on the weſt by the Iriſh Sea, or St. George's Channel; and on the eaſt by the German Ocean.

The aſtronomical length from north to ſouth is 540 miles; that is, accounting ſixty miles to a degree; but in Engliſh ſtatute meaſure it is exactly 622 miles, and four furlongs in length, and 285 miles in breadth in the broadeſt part, which muſt be taken from the Land's-end in Cornwall, to the ſouth Fore-land, in Kent. The form is triangular, the whole circumference, including the windings of the coaſt 1830 miles, the longitude is from 9 deg. 45 min. to 17 deg. 15 min. and the latitude from 50 to 59 deg. north.

From its peculiar ſituation, Great Britain enjoys many advantages unknown to any other country under the ſame parallel of latitude, and is indeed ſuperior in ſome circumſtances to the reſt of Europe. Being ſurrounded by ſome of the fineſt ſeas in the Univerſe, the coldneſs of winter is mitagated by the ſalt vapours; and the heat of ſummer corrected by the refreſhing breezes which proceed from them; ſo that the former is never intenſe, nor the latter intolerable. An almoſt perpetual vendure overſpreads the face of the country, and is at once the admiration, and envy of neighbouring nations. The air, though thick is not unhealthy, as the inhabitants are celebrated for their longevity. The frequent rains meliorate, and the hazy fogs fatten the earth to ſo great a degree, that the paſtures are the moſt verdant and rich, and the cattle ſome of the largeſt and fineſt in the world. Thunder, lightning, earthquakes, and hurricanes are neither ſo common in their viſits, or ſo terrible in their effects, as throughout the reſt of Europe. The ſurrounding ſeas, interſecting ſtreams, and fertile plains, furniſh Britain with all the neceſſaries that nature can crave, and moſt of the delicacies that luxury can wiſh, while every deficiency that the imagination of variety, or the calls of epicuriſm may require, is profuſely ſupplied by commercial means. Scarcity is ſo little known, that above three centuries have been unacquainted with famine, and conſtraint is ſo incompatible with the conſtitution, that the meaneſt ſubject has the ſame freedom of enjoying the fruits of his induſtry, as the moſt exalted peer can claim to revel in the produce of his poſſeſſions; well may each individual exclaim with Doctor Liſle:

" The ſlow aſcending hill, the lofty wood
" That mantles o'er its brow, the ſilver flood
" Wand'ring in mazes thro' the flow'ry mead,
" The herds that in the plenteous paſtures feed,
" And ev'ry object, every ſcene excites
" Freſh wonder in my ſoul and fills with new delights,
" Dwells chearful plenty there, and learned eaſe,
" And art with nature ſeems at ſtrife to pleaſe.
" There liberty, delightful goddeſs reigns,
" Gladdens each heart, and gilds the fertile plains;
" There firmly ſeated may ſhe ever ſmile,
" And ſhower her bleſſings on her favourite iſle."

Concerning the firſt peopling of this iſland, very little can be ſaid with certainty; all that has been written upon the ſubject is merely conjectural, and even thoſe conjectures are founded upon tradition only. The moſt early account which is deemed authentic, informs us that Teutat, king of the Celts, firſt ſent a colony of his ſubjects here, in order to extend the commerce of his own dominions. Theſe having ſucceeded in making a ſettlement, others were induced to follow their example; and thus, in proceſs of time, not only the ſea coaſts, but the interior parts of the iſland became inhabited; for many, not having a genius for commerce, quitted the maritime provinces, and ſeeking that ſatisfaction in a ſolitary, which they could not find in a buſy life, reſigned themſelves up to unreſtrained indolence, and abſolute freedom, in the woody receſſes of the in-land parts of the kingdom.

The Belgæ afterwards becoming too numerous on the continent, and conſequently impoveriſhing each other, a great number of them determined to emigrate to Britain. Theſe ſpringing originally from the ſame ſtock, uſing the ſame language, and having the ſame manners and cuſtoms as the Celts, were hoſpitably received by the deſcendants of the firſt ſettler, and incorporating together, byinter-marriages, their progeny deemed themſelves but one people. Hence the ancient inhabitants of Britain became populous and powerful, and the Phœnicians and Grecians carried on a commercial intercourſe with them long before they were known to the Romans. With reſpect to their characters, they were exquiſitely tenacious of liberty, rudely generous, and roughly brave. They reſembled their neighbours the Gauls in every thing, except being leſs poliſhed, and more ferocious. Tacitus ſays, that the vigour of their bodies, and the faculties of their minds were ſuperior; and Diodorus affirms, that they poſſeſſed much greater integrity than even the Romans. Like the principal part of the univerſe at that time, they were groſs idolators, their worſhip being as rude, as their manners were ſimple. The men were tall, ſtrong, and active; the women fair, well featured; and finely ſhaped; and both ſexes had either red, or cheſnut-coloured hair. Robuſt by conſtitution, and hardy through cuſtom, as they felt not the neceſſity, they ſcarce knew the conveniency of dreſs, or fixed dwelling places; many went intirely naked, and thoſe who were clad, wore only the ſkin of ſome animal thrown negligently over them. Their houſes were but huts built of boughs and covered with reeds, and theſe they removed at pleaſure; their towns were ſhady woods, in which they erected thoſe temporary dwellings, and their fortifications were large ditches or trees cut down, and laid acroſs the winding woody paths, to impede the paſſages to their habitations. It is ſingular that they uſed exactly the ſame expedient to render themſelves agreeable and terrible; for by ſtaining their bodies all over with Wood, they imagined that they became at once captivating to thoſe whom they wiſhed to pleaſe, and dreadful to ſuch as they wanted to terrify. That herb gave them a ſky-coloured tinge, which being conſidered as a proper ground, was overſpread by a variety of other tints, independent of which they were ornamented with many different figures artificially cut into the ſkin. The latter cuſtom is ſtill in uſe in many parts of the world, as the late diſcoveries in the South Seas evince, where the practice of tatowing, or ſcoring and cutting the ſkin by way of ornament, is almoſt general.

Far from wanting foreign aſſiſtance to furniſh out their meals, they deemed many articles of the produce of their own country ſuperfluous, and did not uſe the half of that abundance with which nature preſented them. The fleſh of animals killed in hunting, fruit, milk, and water, were all the luxuries of their frugal tables. This abſtemiouſneſs was not the effect of natural temperance alone; but in ſome meaſure took its riſe from religious principles, as they were ſtrictly forbade eating fowl, hare, gooſe, or fiſh; they bred up the three former, as domeſtic animals, but never attempted to take the latter, becauſe they imagined that the waters were the habitation of the gods, and that all which they contained was of courſe conſecrated to their uſe. It is, however, affirmed, that the Belgæ, upon their ſettlement in Britain, introduced ſome little knowledge of agriculture, ſo that bread made of rye and barley mixed became common; and upon particular ſolemnities they uſed a fermented liquor, compoſed of honey, barley, and apples, which upon thoſe occaſions only they drank to exceſs, and conſequently became intoxicated.

The inhabitants of the maritime were more civilized than thoſe of the inland parts of the kingdom on account of their intercourſe with ſtrangers. The principal commodities which they exported were hides and tin; commerce was chiefly carried on by barter, as their coin conſiſted only of iron and braſs rings, which being made to a certain weight paſt among themſelves as current. The imports were gold, ſilver, ivory, and pearl; theſe they at firſt conſidered as matters of curioſity, afterwards they became means of diſtinction, by being converted into ornaments to adorn their principal people; and finally, they grew objects of their ingenuity, for they, in proceſs of time, learned to manufacture them into chains, bits, bracelets, collars, wreaths, &c. to ſuch perfection, that they were re-exported at a conſiderable advantage. Their marine was extremely trifling, conſiſting only of boats made of light wood, cover'd with ſkins; and as they invariably obſerved a religious maxim enjoined them, never to eat upon the water, it is evident, that their voyages could not be long. It is to be obſerved, in honour of the antient Britons, that they were exceeding hoſpitable to ſtrangers, and ſcrupulouſly humane to thoſe caſt by ſtreſs of weather, or ſhip-wreck upon their coaſt, whoſe perſons and effects they deemed ſacred.——We wiſh that truth would permit us to include the modern Britons in this eulogium.

The civil government of the Britons greatly reſembled that of the Gauls; the whole country was divided into ſeveral petty ſtates; whether the ſovereigns of theſe principalities were hereditary or elective, is not at preſent known; but it is certain, that upon particular emergencies, delegates were ſent from all theſe ſtates to a full aſſembly of the nation, in order to appoint ſome reſpectable individual to the office of Generaliſſimo. The authority of this officer was temporary, as it depended on public expediency, and his power limited, ſince he was amenable to the cenſure of the general aſſembly by whom he was elected.

Of theſe petty ſtates there were ſeventeen previous to the Roman invaſion, viz.

An able writer ſays, that the abovementioned practice of the antient Britons and Gauls, in electing their generals and other principal people was, "A polity "the moſt natural to mankind, in which the wiſeſt, "the braveſt, and the ſtrongeſt, being elevated by "theſe natural advantages above the reſt, challenged "the pre-eminence of conducting the people in time "of war, and governing them in peace; this was the "civil œconomy into which mankind fell of courſe, "when they found the abſolute neceſſity of having "ſome ſort of government to avoid the inconve"niencies in a ſtate of nature."

In each of theſe petty ſtates the principal power was lodged in the Druids; a body of men, who, though generally conſidered as prieſts, acted in a civil as well as eccleſiaſtical capacity. The reaſon of their becoming poſſeſſed of the ſecular as well as the clerical authority, was owing to a notion being prevalent among the people, that none ought to ſubmit to puniſhment for any crime whatever, but by divine authority; which authority was delegated to, and lodged in, the prieſthood only. Hence the Druids had an uncontrouled power over the minds and perſons of the laity; exempted from taxes, excuſed from military ſervices, arbitrators in civil concerns, judges in criminal matters, and public oracles of the community, it muſt be imagined that their ſentences were without appeal; indeed, few dared to diſpute their infallibility; but if by chance an individual had ſo much temerity, he was puniſhed by an excommunication ſo dreadful, as to be deemed more terrible than the cruelleſt death. From that moment he was looked upon as a perſon abandoned by God and men; univerſally ha ed and contemned, none would communicate with him; but he was ſuffered to drag through a miſerable exiſtence, till penury or ſorrow ſnatched him from a world, in which he could find neither pity or relief.

The Druids were under no apprehenſion that their influence could ever decline; being ſolely intruſted with the education of youth, they from infancy ſecured the reſpect of the people, and implanted that awe in their juvenile breaſts, which increaſed with their years, and at length ripened into the moſt permanent and profound veneration.

The Druids were of three claſſes, viz. Druids, properly ſo called, Bards, and Eubates, or Vates.

The firſt claſs preſided over, and regulated all public affairs, both in ſpirituals and temporals; their deciſions were final over life and effects, and a principal part of their buſineſs was to direct and adjuſt all public ſacrifices and religious ceremonies. They were under the direction of a principal elected by themſelves, and ſtiled Arch-Druid, whoſe authority extended ſo far as to call to account, and depoſe the ſecular prince whenever he thought proper.

The ſecond claſs, or Bards, were the national preceptors, having the care of educating the children of both ſexes and all ranks. It was likewiſe their buſineſs to compoſe verſes in commemoration of their heroes and other eminent people, and to furniſh ſongs upon all public occaſions, which they ſung to the ſound of harps.

The third claſs, or Eubates, were ſkilled in phyſic, natural philoſophy, aſtronomy, magic, divination, augury, &c.

Hence it appears that the Druids in general poſſeſſed, not only all the power and learning, but the principal archives, and places of truſtin the nation, for they were the only prieſts, magiſtrates, preceptors, poets, muſicians, phyſicians, philoſophers, orators, aſtronomers, magicians, &c. in the kingdom. It is not therefore ſurprizing, that the principal people ſhould be ambitious to get their children and relations admitted into ſome of their claſſes; and that the vulgar ſhould regard them with as much veneration as they did their deities, whoſe immediate agents they imagined they were.

If any diſturbance ever happened among the Druids, it was upon the death of their Primate, when ſuch earneſt endeavours were made to get appointed to that honourable, and powerful office, that the freedom of election was frequently diſturbed by appeals to the ſword. Upon all other occaſions they acted with great juſtice, moderation, diſintereſtedneſs, and temperance, which at once ſecured and increaſed that reſpect the people naturally entertained for them.

Their adoration, and religious ceremonies were performed in groves, conſecrated to their deities. Theſe groves were compoſed of, ſurrounded by, and fenced in, with lofty oak trees; as they held ſacred that towering monarch of the Britiſh plains. Though the reaſon of ſuch prepoſſeſſion in favour of this tree in particular is now unknown, yet it is remarkable, that the antient ruſtic natives of this iſland ſhould adore that tree as a ſacred production of the earth, which the more refined modern inhabitants ought to revere as their principal bulwark on the main.

In moſt of their various ceremonies, the Druids took occaſion to uſe ſome of the members of this tree. Their altars were covered with its branches, their victims adorned with the ſmaller boughs, and all who were concerned in the ſacrifices, decorated themſelves with garlands made of its leaves. The miſletoe, which nature hath taught to grow on, and embrace the ſturdy oak, came in for a ſhare of their veneration. They deemed it the peculiar gift of Providence, and held its virtues univerſal in medicine. It was yearly ſought for in the ſpring, on the firſt day of a new moon, when a proper branch being ſelected, a principal Druid mounted the tree to which it clung, cut it with a pruning knife, and carefully wrapped it up in his garments, amidſt the joyous acclamations of the enraptured multitude, who deemed it the happy omen of a proſperous year.

The religious tenets which the Druids taught the people, teemed with the groſſeſt ſuperſtitions, and enjoined human ſacrifices as oblations to their deities. The firſt part they had in common with the Celts and Gauls, the latter they learned from the Phœnicians. Their deities were Jupiter, Apollo, Mars, Mercury, Andates, their goddeſs of victory, and others of a ſubordinate claſs; to them, after the Roman invaſion, they added Minerva, Diana, and Hercules. Their worſhip conſiſted in human and other ſacrifices, expiatory oblations, invocations and thankſgivings. They had in common, with other idolatrous people, both ancient and modern, the cuſtom of making their idols hideouſly ugly, which evinces, that idolatry in general always was, and ſtill is formed more on fear than love; as the figures which image worſhippers are univerſally pleaſed to give their deities, ſeem rather calculated to excite horror or ridicule than to inſpire reverence or reſpect. Unacquainted with the awful and amiable attributes of the true Deity, ignorant and barbarous nations, in all ages, have formed their religious opinions more on apprehenſion than admiration, and being incapable of conceiving the nature of univerſal benevolence, have ſought a remedy for their fears in the deprecation of partial wrath.

All Druidical ceremonies, and literary precepts were performed and delivered by rote, as they never ſuffered either their maxims or their ſciences to be committed to writing. This reſtriction was founded on two motives, the one, that the vulgar ſhould not become acquainted with their myſterious learning by means of any manuſcripts, which might accidentally fall into their hands; and the other, that the retentive faculties of their pupils might be invigorated by continual exerciſe.

Though the idolatry of the Druids was abominable, and their human ſacrifices execrable, yet this moral philoſophy hath been the admiration of after ages, and many of their maxims which ſtand in record have met with the eulogiums of the moſt celebrated and poliſhed writers. We are happy to have it in our power to gratify the public with ſome of their principal tenets, which we have extracted from a valuable and curious manuſcript in verſe, now in the poſſeſſion of a diſtinguiſhed nobleman, who at preſent adorns, and reflects a luſtre on the Britiſh court; and to whom we return our thanks for his obliging condeſcenſion in permitting us to tranſcribe them.

* It is evident that the Druids acknowledged a ſupreme godhead, but like many other nations they unhappily fell into idolatry by dividing his perfections, and making his various attributes ſo many imaginary deities.

† Theſe ſentiments evince, that the Druids had a notion of the creation, according to the Moſaical accounts.

‡ The doctrine of the immortality of the ſoul was one of the favourite druidical maxims; as being at once grateful to the human mind, and affording the Druids opportunities of inſpiring the common people with the utmoſt degree of courage, by exploding the idea of an abſolute diſſolution, and encouragingthem to expect future rewards for dying nobly in the ſervice of their country.

For frail exiſtence no vain efforts make,
Nor fear to loſe what he wants power to take.
If awful vengeance ever ſhall be hurl'd
By nature's God againſt a ſinful world;
In dreadful deluges we muſt expire,
Or elſe conſume in rapid flames of fire.
[*] In theſe tremendous elements alone,
Mankind ſhall periſh, and their ſins atone
Another world is ready to receive
Immortal ſouls, that earthly bodies leave;
To duſt the periſhable parts return,
But at the grave eternal ſpirits ſpurn.
[†] And if in virtue's paths they trod below,
In heav'nly manſions 'tis their fate to glow;
But if by vice enſlav'd, their doom's to roam
Without a heav'nly, or an earthly home.
On your young offspring ſpend your utmoſt care,
And of the early ſeeds of vice beware;
This noble taſk you can't commence too ſoon,
Expand their virtues, and their follies prune;
Their youthful minds, like melted wax impreſs,
And heav'n's fair image in their ſouls expreſs.

II. Political.

Children muſt from their parents be remov'd,
Tho' fondly priz'd, and tenderly belov'd;
[‡] Till fourteen times the ſun with radiant rays,
Shall round the world in annual circuit blaze;
Leſt blind partiality in youth ſhould wrong
Thoſe riſing minds that to the ſtate belong.
[§] 'Tis juſt, upon emergencies of ſtate,
To yield an individual up to fate;
Better a part ſhould periſh than the whole,
A body's forfeit cannot hurt the ſoul:
The ſacrific'd, by feeling earthly pain,
May greater bliſs in future life obtain.
Blind diſobedience to the ſtate's decree,
Shall always excommunicated be;
And interdicted thus, the wretch ſhall roam,
Secluded from ſociety and home:
Devoid of truſt in the moſt trifling cauſe,
And unprotected by the injur'd laws.
[||] When danger calls, and delegates ſhould meet,
Let not the ſenate wait for tardy feet;
For in the criſis of our country's fate,
He merits death who gives advice too late.

III. Miſcellaneous.

Thoſe who lend money to the wretch decay'd,
In the next life will be again repaid.
If by one newly dead you want to ſend
[] A note, to any long departed friend:
Compoſe your letter in a ſolemn ſtile,
And ſlowly caſt it on the fun'ral pile.
Then know the ſentiments therein expreſs'd,
Will be deliver'd to the hand addreſs'd.
Each maſter of a family, we deem
In his own habitation, Lord ſupreme,
O'er life and property his pow'r extends,
If the ſtate ratifies, what he intends.
[††] Priſoners of war are doom'd by fate to die,
Then ſacrifice them to ſome deity;
Upon the altars let them ſoon expire,
Or clos'd in wicker feed the ſacred fire.
Be arts inſtill'd—be uſeful ſcience ſhewn,
And wiſdom taught in ſacred groves alone;
There, and there only, ſhall the mind improve
In needful knowledge, and in ſocial love;
But let no leſſon be in writing given,
Truſt all to memory—that great gift of heaven:
[‡‡] When ſtrong diſeaſes, the weak frame enthrall,
The moon's the ſovereign remedy of all.
Let [§§] miſletoe with reverent awe be ſought,
Since as a boon, from heav'n itſelf 'tis brought;
The ſacred oak aſcend, and then with ſkill,
Cut the wiſh'd branches with a golden bill.

The chief ſeat of the Druids was in the iſle of Angleſey, where they held an annual aſſembly of the ſtates, and had their principal ſeminary of learning, which, it muſt be admitted, was the firſt univerſity in Britain. Hither the children of the princes and nobility were ſent for education; and ſuch was the reputation of this early ſeat of the muſes, that the principal people in Gaul were placed here on the ſame account.

The Britons were of a fierce and warlike temper, and conſequently had frequent conteſts among themſelves; which want of union, as Tacitus obſerves, greatly facilitated their conqueſt by the Romans. Their arms were ſmall ſhields, and very large ſwords, which, ſays a certain author, was expreſſive of "a "more eager deſire of wounding their enemies than "defending themſelves." The ſpears, or javelins which they carried were of a moderate length, and had a braſs ball faſtened to the lower end, with which they made a rattling noiſe upon an attack, to intimidate their enemies. Their daggers were very ſhort, and their war chariots greatly reſembled thoſe uſed by the Grecian heroes during the Trojan war, as the Roman writers deſcription of the former perfectly agree with Homer's account of the latter. To the nave of the wheels, iron ſcythes were faſtened, which did great miſchief as they drove through the ranks of the enemy. In the management of their chariots they were ſingularly ſkilful, being able to drive on the ſide of a hill, or edge of a precipice at full ſpeed, ſtop ſuddenly, turn ſhort, and perform many other acts of the moſt admirable dexterity. In the commencement of an engagement they ſcoured the plains in their chariots, threw their darts with great addreſs, and began the attack with the utmoſt intrepidity. During the fight they would quit theſe machines, form themſelves into compleat bodies on foot, and do great execution with their heavy ſwords; while their chariot-drivers withdrew from the battle, and placed themſelves in order at a ſuitable diſtance, that their maſters, if weary or overpowed, might eaſily retreat to them, and remount. Thus they maintained at once the ſpeed of cavalry, and the ſteadineſs of infantry. Their horſes were ſmall, but vigorous and ſwift, and the troopers were exceeding ſkilful in the management of them. With reſpect to enduring fatigue, no troops could be more hardy and robuſt; they could, without any inconvenience, live a conſiderable time upon roots or the barks of trees only, and ſleep many nights ſucceſſively in damp bogs, and marſhes covered with water. Such were the Britons at the time of Julius Cæſar's invaſion; when, notwithſtanding their ſkill and courage, the Romans found means to ſubdue them by greater unanimity, better diſcipline, more perſevering fortitude, and ſuperior addreſs.

[*] Here the Moſaic account of the flood, and the promiſe that God would never again deſtroy the world by water are blended together, and referred to a future day. The idea that the world ſhall be deſtroyed by the powerful element of fire or water, and that man ſhall at the ſame time be purged from ſin, by the purifying effects of the former, and the cleanſing qualities of the latter, is extremely beautiful, and ſhews that the mythology of the Britons was in ſome reſpect ſuperior to that of the Romans.

[†] It is a great pity that ſuch ſublime principles ſhould have been diſgraced by an intermixture of idolatrous notions, and inhuman ceremonies.

[‡] This was an admirable political maxim to intruſt the education of children to perſons properly qualified, and publickly appointed till the age of fourteen years, when reaſon uſually begins to take poſſeſſion of her throne. By which means it prevented their being ſpoiled in their infancy by the indiſcrete indulgence, or abſurd partiality of their parents.

[§] The principle contained in the firſt four lines of this maxim is reaſonable in itſelf, and juſt with reſpect to ſociety; yet the words were perverted from their true ſenſe to the moſt cruel purpoſes; for on the authority of this tenet, human ſacrifices were made, and the ſentiment contained in the two ſubſequent lines, was intended as a ſalvo, both to excuſe the cruelty of the practice, and to comfort the poor victim amidſt the horrors of death.

[||] If this maxim was ſtill in force as a law, many modern ſenators would frequently be in danger.

[] This cuſtom ſtill prevails in Georgia and Mingrelia, where, as Sir John Chardin informs us, the people ſend letters by the dead to their friends in the other world; in particular, a complimentary card from the prieſt to St. Peter is placed on the breaſt of the dufunct, to inform that ſaint that the funeral fees are paid; and intreat his permiſſion for the ſoul of the deceaſed to paſs into Paradiſe. From this maxim, we likewiſe underſtand that the Britons, like the Greeks and Romans, burnt their dead upon funeral piles.

[††] Theſe inhuman practices, the Britons, as well as many other nations, learned from the Phœnicians, who were the moſt bloody people in the univerſe, with reſpect to human ſacrifices. The mode of burning priſoners in wicker was practiſed likewiſe by the Saxons.

[‡‡] The Druids fancied that the moon had ſuch an abſolute influence on the human body, that by obſerving her aſpects, and applying remedies accordingly, they could cure any diſeaſe. This explains the meaning of the above druidical tenet.

[§§] Miſletoe was held in great eſteem by the antients for many medicinal virtues; but it hath decreaſed greatly in its reputation among modern phyſicians. Dr. Brookes ſays, it purges both upwards and downwards with uncommon violence, and is therefore improper to be taken inwardly

BOOK II.

From the Conqueſt of the Britons by the Romans, to the Introduction of the Saxons.

SECTION I.

Of Julius Cæſar's two Expeditions into Britain.

AT the time of Cæſar's conceiving the idea of invading Britain, the Romans were in the meridian of their military glory. They had ſubjugated the whole weſtern world, yet their deſire of conqueſt was unſatisfied. This thirſt of unbounded dominion was univerſal, and pervaded all ranks of people. Each individual, from the laurel'd hero, to the low Plebeian, ardently burned ſtill farther to enlarge the territories of the republic, and extend the Roman name. This general paſſion had already laid waſte the continent, and ſeas of blood were ſhed to gratify the Roman vanity; but wild ambition is never ſatisfied, the ocean muſt now be croſſed in the purſuit of a fallacious glory, and realms be joined by conqueſt, which were ſeperated by nature.

> " From thirſt of rule, what dire diſaſters flow,
> " How flames that guilt ambition taught to glow;
> " Wiſh gains on wiſh, deſire ſurmounts deſire;
> " Hope fans the breeze, and envy feeds the fire.
> " From crime to crime aſpires the mad'ning ſoul,
> " Nor laws, nor oaths, nor fears its rage controul;
> " 'Till heav'n at length awakes ſupremely juſt,
> " And levels all its tow'ring ſchemes in duſt.

Various have been the conjectures concerning Cæſar's motives for this invaſion. Some inſiſt that envy ſtimulated him to the enterprize; for Pompey, of whom he was perpetually jealous, having conquered a great part of Africa, and carried his arms through many Aſiatic regions, had filled the world with his renown. Hence Cæſar could not bear to remain inactive in Gaul, but glowed to do ſomething which might immortalize his own name, and eclipſe the glory of his rival. Others affirm, that avarice induced him to engage in the undertaking; and of this opinion is Suetonius, who ſays, that Cæſar was ſo captivated by the Britiſh[*] pearls, which he would frequently poize in his hands with great ſatisfaction, that he at length determined to invade the country; and Cicero inſinuates, that the ſilver mines of Britain were his ſtrongeſt motives for invading it. This ſuppoſition is, however, rejected by the generality of writers, on account of the acknowledged generoſity of Cæſar's diſpoſition; but ſuch as reaſon in this manner ſhew, that they have taken but a ſuperficial view of human nature; for the generous heart pants after riches as much as that of an avaricious caſt, with this difference; the former would poſſeſs wealth, that he may liberally diſtribute it, and the latter, that he may ſordidly conceal it. The miſer is not conſtituted by wiſhing to acquire money, but by not having ſpirit to uſe it when acquired. And finally, a third claſs of thoſe who have diſcuſſed this ſubject, make Cæſar's unbounded ambition the ſole cauſe of the Britiſh invaſion.

But without limiting our ideas, might not all theſe motives co-operate in the mind of Cæſar, together with the one which he himſelf mentions; but which theſe critical gentlemen have injudiciouſly omitted? for he tells us, that, " although the ſummer was nearly " ſpent, he reſolved to make a voyage to Britain, " becauſe he had been informed in all the wars of " Gaul, the enemies had received conſiderable ſup" plies from thence." Is it ſtrange that the active ſpirit of Cæſar ſhould undertake a difficult enterprize, when ambition, envy, intereſt, and reſentment united in urging him to it? The Romans had previouſly been concerned in many ſea engagements in ſight of land; but had never entertained the idea of undertaking a naval expedition to any country ſeparated by the ocean from the continent. This enterprize was reſerved for Cæſar, whoſe martial genius ſeemed calculated to ſurmount all difficulties.

Cæſar's firſt expedition ſeems, by his own account, to have been rather intended as a preparatory, than a deciſive one, for he ſays, (ſpeaking of himſelf in the third perſon) " Though the time of the year would " not permit him to finiſh the war, yet he thought " it would be worth his while to make an expedition " thither only to view the iſland, to learn the nature of " the inhabitants, to be acquainted with their coaſts, " their ports and creeks, which the Gauls were almoſt " ſtrangers to; for they were ſeldom viſited by any " but merchants, who were unacquainted with all the " country, except the coaſts and thoſe parts which " were oppoſite to Gaul. Accordingly, having ſummoned a council of merchants[†] from all parts, he " could neither be informed of the extent of the iſland, what nation, and how powerful the inhabitants were, how well they underſtood the art of war, what cuſtoms they were governed by, nor how conſiderable a navy their parts were capable of receiving.”

[*] Cæſar was groſly miſtaken in fancying thoſe pearls Britiſh, as the Britons had them by commercial means, from the Phœnician merchants.

[†] The beſt Roman writers affirm, that the merchants pretended to be much more ignorant concerning Britain than they really were, in order to deter Cæſar from his expedition, which they naturally feared would deprive them of the beneficial trade that they carried on with the Britons. And this conjecture ſeems the more probable, as they took care immediately to apprize thoſe people of their danger, that they might have time to make preparations for oppoſing the Roman forces.

Not diſcouraged by this want of proper intelligence, Cæſar diſpatched C. Voluſenus, a Tribune of his army in a galley, to reconnoitre the Britiſh coaſts, and make ſuch obſervations as might be of ſervice to the expedition, who, after a five days cruize, returned and made a report of what he had ſeen to his commander.

Some of the Britiſh ſtates being informed of Cæſar's great preparations to invade them, and dreading the inpending danger, ſent ambaſſadors to him into Gaul, offering to ſubmit to the Romans, and to give hoſtages for their fidelity. Theſe envoys were graciouſly received, hoſpitably entertained, and ſent back in company with Comius as deputy from Cæſar to the different Britiſh ſtates. Comius, a Briton by birth, but much in Cæſar's favour, was, however, imprudently ſeized upon the moment he landed, and impriſoned by his countrymen, who were exaſperated at his attachment to a foreigner and an enemy.

Cæſar having drawn together his forces, embarked his infantry in eighty, and his cavalry in eighteen tranſport ſhips, and ſet ſail from Morini, or Picardy, about one in the morning, on the 26th day of Auguſt, in the year of the world, 3947, and fifty-five years before Chriſt.

About ten o'clock the ſame morning, the ſhips, with the infantry, arrived off Dover; when Cæſar found the cliffs lined with armed Britons, who, from the nature of the place, could oppoſe his landing with advantage; he therefore ordered the ſhips to caſt anchor, called a council of war, gave proper directions to his officers, and at about four o'clock in the afternoon again weighed anchor, in order to find a more plain and eaſy ſhore; which, after having ſailed about eight miles to the northward, he diſcovered at the place now called Deal. The Britons, gueſſing his intent, diſpatched their chariots and horſemen firſt, and followed with the reſt of the army, as expeditiouſly as poſſible, in order to oppoſe the landing of the Romans; which, ſays Cæſar, “We found it very difficult to effect for many reaſons; becauſe our ſhips being tall, required a conſiderable depth of water, and our ſoldiers, while their hands were employed, and loaded with heavy armour, were at the ſame time to encounter the waves and the enemy in a place they were not acquainted with; whereas the Britons, either ſtanding upon dry land, or ſallying a little way into the water in thoſe places they knew to be ſhallow, having the free uſe of all their limbs, could boldly caſt their darts, and ſpur their horſes forward, who were inured to that kind of combat; which diſadvantage ſo diſcouraged the Romans, who were ſtrangers to this way of fighting, that they did not appear ſo chearful and eager to engage the enemy as in their former conflicts on dry land. Which Cæſar perceiving, gave orders, that the gallies, (a nimble ſort of ſhipping the enemy had never ſeen,) ſhould advance a little before the reſt of the navy, and row along with their broadſides towards the ſhore, that they might more conveniently force the Britons to retire from the water-ſide by their ſlings, engines, and arrows, which did the Romans conſiderable ſervice; for the Britons, being ſurprized at the make of our gallies, the motion of our oars and engines, began to give ground. But the ſtandard bearer of the tenth legion, perceiving our men were unwilling to venture into the ſea, having firſt invoked the gods for ſucceſs, cried out aloud,—My fellow ſoldiers, unleſs you will forſake your eagle and ſuffer it to fall into the hands of the enemy, advance: for my part I am reſolved to perform my duty to the commonwealth, and my general. Having ſaid this, he immediately leaped overboard, and advanced the eagle toward the Britons; whereupon the ſoldiers, encouraging each other to prevent ſo ſignal a diſgrace, followed his example, which thoſe in the next ſhips perceiving, did the like and preſſed forward to the enemy. The conflict was ſharply maintained on both ſides, though the Romans not being able to keep their ranks, obtain firm footing, or follow their particular ſtandards, leaping out of ſeveral ſhips, and joining the firſt enſign they met with, were in great confuſion. But the Britons, who were well acquainted with the ſhallows, where they ſaw us deſcend in ſmall numbers from our ſhips, ſpurred their horſes into the water, ſat upon our men, incumbered and unprepared to receive them, and ſome ſurrounded us with their numbers in one place, whilſt others flanked us where we lay moſt open in another;—which Cæſar obſerving, he cauſed the long boats and ſmaller veſſels to be manned, and where occaſion required, ſent them to aſſiſt their fellows; thus our foremoſt ranks, having gained dry footing, were followed by the reſt of the army, and charging the enemy briſkly, put them to flight, but were not able to purſue, or take the iſland at that time, becauſe we had no cavalry; which was the only thing wanting to compleat Cæſar's wonted ſucceſs.

“The enemy being defeated, ſo ſoon as they had eſcaped beyond the reach of danger, ſent ambaſſadors to Cæſar to deſire a peace; promiſing to deliver hoſtages for their entire ſubmiſſion, and with theſe ambaſſadors came Comius of Arras, whom Cæſar had ſent into Britain, where he was impriſoned ſo ſoon as he landed with his general's commands; but ſet at liberty again after the battle. They endeavoured to excuſe what they had done, by laying the blame upon the mob, and entreating him to forgive a fault of ignorance, but not of malice; Cæſar at firſt reprimanded them for their breach of faith, that after they had vouluntarily ſent ambaſſadors to him into Gaul to deſire a peace, and delivered hoſtages of their own accord, they ſhould, without any reaſon make war upon him; he imputed it, he ſaid, to their ignorance, and forgave them; then demanded hoſtages for their future carriage, part whereof they delivered immediately, and with the reſt who lived at ſome diſtance, they promiſed to return in a few days after. In the mean time, having diſbanded their men, and diſperſed them into their ſeveral counties, the princes from all parts came to deliver up themſelves, and their eſtates to Cæſar's diſpoſal.” *

Affairs did not long remain in this amicable ſituation, for a violent ſtorm diſperſed the eighteen tranſports, appointed to bring the Roman cavalry, and did conſiderable damage to Cæſar's fleet in the Downs; the firſt were forced back again to Gaul, and the latter rendered totally unfit for ſervice. The intelligence of theſe accidents threw the Roman army into the utmoſt conſternation, and inſpirited the Britons to revolt. The aſſembly of the ſtates exhorted the people to ſeize upon this opportunity of regaining their liberty, and by a total extermination of their enemies to deter others from the idea of invading their country. And the Druids took care to obſerve, that as the heavens intereſted themſelves in their favour, it would be impious not to join the elements in their own deliverance.

Cæſar,

* It is to be obſerved, that in mentioning general matters, Cæſar ſpeaks in the firſt perſon; but in relating any thing immediately reſpecting himſelf, he always modeſtly makes uſe of the third perſon.

Cæſar, in the mean time, did all that a great general, and a prudent man could effect upon ſuch an emergency. He fortified his camp with great precaution, aſſiduouſly furniſhed it with as much corn as could be procured, and induſtriouſly repaired the ſhips that had received the leaſt damage with the timber of twelve that were the moſt ſhattered.

Hoſtilities, however, ſoon commenced, for the ſeventh legion being ſent out to forage, was ſuddenly ſurrounded by the Britons, while the men were unſuſpicious of, and unprepared for, an attack. The conteſt was ſharp and bloody, and the Romans would have been infallibly deſtroyed, had not Cæſar came ſeaſonably to their relief, and with his whole force interpoſed to ſave them from deſtruction. Encouraged by this ſucceſs, and by the difficulties to which they were ſenſible the Romans were driven, they ſurrounded Cæſar's camp, and attacked it with great impetuoſity; but after a bloody conflict were repulſed with conſiderable loſs; when Cæſar thought proper to lay waſte the country for ſeveral miles round. This induced them to ſend a third embaſſy to Cæſar again, to apologize for their conduct, and ſue for peace. Cæſar ſeverely reprimanded the deputies, and then granted their deſires, only inſiſting to have the number of hoſtages doubled, and ſent after him to Gaul, whither he returned with all his troops, on the twentieth of September. But the Britons were no ſooner freed from ſuch diſagreeable company, than moſt of them forgot their promiſes, as we find that only two ſtates thought proper to ſend the hoſtages ſtipulated for in the treaty.

Thus ended Cæſar's firſt expedition to Britain, which, though gloſſed over by the Roman ſelf-flattering hiſtorians, was inglorious to their army, and not of the leaſt ſolid advantage to the ſtate. Cæſar, however, had ſufficient addreſs to repreſent it of ſuch vaſt importance, that the re-public decreed him a triumph of twenty days upon the occaſion.

During the winter, Cæſar made vaſt preparations for a more ſucceſsful expedition in the enſuing ſummer. Every thing at length being ready, he ſet ſail from Portus Itius, now Boulogne, in the beginning of Auguſt, with a fleet of upwards of 300 ſail, and a formidable force on board. He landed without oppoſition in the ſame place he had done the preceeding ſummer, the Britons having retired up the country. Cæſar having left ten cohorts, and three hundred horſe to guard the ſhips, penetrated the ſame night twelve miles from the ſea, and diſcovered the Britons near the river Stour in Kent. An engagement enſued, when the Britons being routed by the Roman cavalry, retreated to a fortified wood, "where," (ſays Cæſar) "they were poſſeſſed of a poſt extremely well fortified both by art and nature, which had been built, in all probability, during the times of their own civil wars; all the paſſages to it being blocked up by heaps of trees cut down for that purpoſe. They never ventured out of this place but in ſmall parties, and always hindered the Romans from entering it; but the ſoldiers of the ſeventh legion having caſt themſelves into a teſtudo, and thrown up a mount againſt their works, took the place, and drove them from the woods."

The next morning Cæſar divided his army into three parts, in order to purſue the Britons, but was diverted from this deſign by receiving the melancholy intelligence that his fleet was almoſt deſtroyed by a ſtorm. He immediately repaired to the ſea coaſt, gave orders to repair ſome of the ſhips with the wrecks of the others, wrote to Gaul for more, and then reſolved upon putting into execution one of the moſt aſtoniſhing expedients that ever entered the mind of man, which was no other than drawing his navy upon dry land, and ſurrounding it with a fortification. This was effected by incredible labour, and indefatigable induſtry. Cæſar then returned to the place where he had laſt defeated the enemy, when "he found far greater numbers of the Britons aſſembled, than he left when he went to viſit the fleet. By general conſent, the whole management of this war was committed to the care of Caſſivellaunus, whoſe territories were divided by the river Thames from the ſea coaſts, and extended fourſcore miles into the iſland; for though he had formerly made war on the reſt of his countrymen, yet upon our arrival they all united, and pitched upon him as the fitteſt perſon to direct them at ſo important a juncture."

The Britons attacked the Romans in their march, a ſharp conflict enſued, and the Britons were repulſed; but they ſoon after made an attempt upon the camp, and broke through two of the beſt cohorts. Cæſar, in relating this affair, is under the neceſſity of confeſſing, that he had rather the diſadvantage. His words are, "This engagement happening in the view of the whole army, every one perceived that the legionary ſoldiers were not a fit match for ſuch an enemy, becauſe the weight of their armour would not permit them to purſue, nor durſt they go too far from their colours, neither could the cavalry encounter them; becauſe the Britons often pretended a retreat, and having drawn them from the legions, would forſake their chariots and fight on foot to a great advantage; and when they were mounted, they were equally fatal to our horſe, whether we purſued or fled. Another diſadvantage was, that the enemy never fought in a cloſe battalion, but in ſmall parties at a great diſtance from one another, each of them having their particular part allotted, from whence they received ſupplies, and the weary were relieved by the freſh."

The next day the Britons attacked three legions that were foraging, but were repulſed with conſiderable loſs; upon this ill ſucceſs, the auxiliaries forſook Caſſivellaunus, who was never after able to bring any formidable force into the field.

Not being able to make head againſt the Romans, the unfortunate Britiſh chief retreated to his own territories, and fortified the Thames, where fordable. The Romans, however, forced a paſſage at Coway, in Middleſex, and proceeded on their march, when they were met by deputies from the magiſtrates of the chief city of the Trinobantes, who ignobly offered ſubjection, and traiterouſly joined the Romans; at the ſame time, requeſting that Mandubrace, one of Cæſar's attendants, whoſe father was killed by Caſſivellaunus, might be permitted to rule them. Cæſar aſſented, but at the ſame time demanded forty hoſtages, and proviſions ſufficient for his whole army. Theſe conditions were complied with, and the defection of theſe people not only weakened the common cauſe, but induced ſeveral other ſtates to follow their example. Among thoſe who joined Cæſar, ſome were baſe enough to let him know what ſtrength Caſſivellaunus had ſtill remaining, and where he had retreated to. Upon this information, Cæſar immediately proceeded to the city of Verulam, now St. Alban's, and beſieged that unfortunate chief in his capital. The place was tolerably well fortified with woods and moraſſes; but the Romans took it by ſtorm, and put a prodigious number of the unhappy Britons to the ſword. Caſſivellaunus, however, eſcaped, and as his laſt reſource perſuaded four petty kings of Kent, viz. Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulas, and Segonax, to attack the Roman camp where the ſhips were ſecured, and try to deſtroy the navy. The project was put in execution, but failed of ſucceſs; for the Britons were defeated, and Cingetorix taken priſoner. This ill ſucceſs, the deſolation of his country, and the revolt of his allies, induced Caſſivellaunus at length to ſue for peace. His requeſt was granted immediately by Cæſar, who pretended to have a great reſpect for Caſſivellaunus on account of his perſonal courage; but the real reaſon of his granting him conditions tolerably favourable was, his deſire to return to Gaul, where the public affairs rendered his immediate preſence neceſſary. Previous to his departure, he impoſed a yearly tribute upon the Britons, included his ally Mandubrace in the treaty, and tried to ſecure the allegiance of the different ſtates, by taking with him a great number of hoſtages. Thus concludes Cæſar's ſecond expedition, wherein Tacitus obſerves, he had rather ſhewn Britain to the Romans, than given them poſſeſſion of it, ſuppoſing it glory ſufficient to have attempted a thing at once ſo novel, ſingular, and difficult. When he returned to Rome, the Britiſh captives, from their remarkable attire and peculiarity of manners, afforded matter of admiration to the people, and Cæſar offered a breaſt plate, embroidered with pearls, found in Britain, to Venus as a trophy of the ſpoils of the ocean.

The ſubjugation of Britain was the very laſt triumph of the Romans, who had conquered ſo many nations in Europe, Aſia, and Africa, for the purpoſe of extending their territories. Cæſar himſelf placed it among the greateſt of his atchievements, boaſting that he had diſcovered and penetrated into a new world. The Romans in general were of the ſame opinion, for Ovid, in the ſucceeding reign, in deſcribing the deification of Julius Cæſar, mentions it as the firſt and principal of that Hero's actions in the following lines.

“ ————————————————
“ In his own city, Cæſar we adore,
“ Him arms and arts, alike renown'd beheld,

SECT. II.

From the departure of Julius Cæſar, to the conqueſt of Britain, by the Emperor Claudius.

THE account we have of the affairs of Britain for near one hundred years after the departure of Julius Cæſar, is very trifling and vague. By their intercourſe with the Romans, the inhabitants grew more poliſhed, but at the ſame time were leſs regarded. The emperor Auguſtus, Cæſar's immediate ſucceſſor, greatly neglected this iſland for ſeveral years; at length he determined to make an expedition into Britain, but was diverted from his purpoſe by a revolt in Panonia. About ſeven years after he renewed his deſign; but the diſtracted ſtate of Gaul, and the arrival of ſome ambaſſadors from Britain to ſue for peace, a ſecond time cauſed him to change his reſolution. The enſuing year he again reaſſumed his intention, and was again diſappointed by commotions in other parts. Thus all his plans of making an expedition to Britain proved abortive; Tiberius ſucceeded Auguſtus, and, like his predeceſſor, paid but little regard to Britain.

On the death of Tiberius, the empire devolved to Caligula, a moſt conceited, whimſical, inconſiſtent, and cruel tyrant. In his reign Adminius, the ſon of Cunobelin, a Britiſh king, raiſed an unnatural rebellion againſt his father; but not ſucceeding according to his wiſh, he fled to Caligula, who being of a baſe diſpoſition himſelf, received the traitor with open arms. The treacherous Briton, finding the encouragement given to his crimes, and perceiving the weakneſs of the emperor, perſuaded him to invade not only his father's dominions, but thoſe of all the other Britiſh princes, repreſenting, that the conqueſt would be very important from the riches it would bring; extremely glorious from its importance; and mighty eaſy from the terrors of his name: for the Britons, ſaid he, will throw down their arms, the moment they hear you are coming in perſon againſt them.

Theſe arguments exactly ſuited the avarice, pride, and cowardice of the emperor; who thought that an opportunity to gain wealth and fame without danger, was not to be neglected. He accordingly drew together an army of two hundred thouſand men to invade Britain, and proceeded to the coaſt of Belgic Gaul. He was here informed, to his great ſurprize, that the Britons were under arms on the oppoſite ſhore, with a determined reſolution to oppoſe his intended deſcent. This he could hardly believe at firſt, but being at length convinced that his name was not ſo terrible as he imagined, his fears induced him to deſiſt, for he reſolved not to engage in any enterprize, in which there might be the leaſt perſonal hazard. But that it ſhould not be ſaid he was afraid to ſee his enemies, he embarked on board a galley, ſailed within a league of the Britiſh coaſt, took a peep at the Britons, whoſe formidable appearance he did not at all like, and then haſted back again with as much oſtentation, as if he had atchieved ſome great action. To make himſelf ſtill more ridiculous, he ordered the army to be drawn up in battle array as ſoon as he landed, and having made a curious harangue to the ſoldiers, to their utter aſtoniſhment, gave directions that they ſhould diſperſe themſelves about the ſea coaſt, to gather up all the ſhells they could find; the troops naturally thought the emperor's head was turned, but at the ſame time obeyed him. A prodigious quantity of ſhells being collected, Caligula commanded that they ſhould be carefully packed up, and to compleat the farce, ſent them with the moſt pompous parade to Rome, as the ſpoils of the Britiſh ocean; demanding, at the ſame time, that the ſenate ſhould decree him a triumph for the important ſervices he had done the empire. Abſurd as his requeſt may appear, the ſenate was civil enough to comply with it; and put themſelves to immenſe expence to render the emperor magnificently ridiculous in the face of the whole world.

Thus from the continual failure of intended expeditions, the Britons remained unſubdued by the Romans till the reign of Claudius; and then rather fell victims to their own inteſtine broils than to the power of that empire. Jealouſy did what their enemies ſwords could not effect; and while ſome ſtates had the virtue to oppoſe the Romans, others joined them, and were ſolicitous for their own deſtruction. Beric, a diſcontented Britiſh Prince, was the chief enemy to his own country, and the principal perſon who perſuaded the Emperor to undertake the expedition. Plautius, the Prætor, was placed at the head of the army, and ordered to paſs into Britain. But the troops mutinied, and declared, “ They would “ not make war out of the compaſs of the world;” for the common people thought that all places beyond the ocean were out of the limits of the world to which they belonged. At length, threats, preſents, and promiſes prevailed; harmony was reſtored; and the troops reconciled to the expedition. Plautius took advantage of this favourable diſpoſition, and embarked his whole force at three ports, that the failure of one embarkation might not prevent the ſucceſs of the enterprize. They were, however, all driven back by contrary winds, and much diſheartened; but the appearance of an aurora borealis recalled their ſpirits, for the Romans imagining this meteor to be a happy omen, again ſet ſail, and landed in Britain without oppoſition. Their not meeting with the reſiſtance they expected, was owing to the Britons having been informed by ſome merchants, that the Roman troops had mutinied, and the expedition was laid aſide. This fatal intelligence ſoothed them into ſecurity, and occaſioned them to diſband their forces, when there was more occaſion than ever to employ them.

Plautius penetrated as far as Oxfordſhire, without any oppoſition, except being a little haraſſed by ſmall ſkirmiſhing parties. He now advanced toward the principal forces that the Britons had been able to collect, which were very impolitically divided into two bodies; the one commanded by Caractacus, and the other by Togodumnus, his brother. Plautius attacked them ſeperately, and defeated both parties: this double misfortune threw the Britons into great conſternation, and at the ſame time determined Plautius to make every advantage of his ſucceſs; leaving a ſufficient body of troops to ſecure the country already conquered, he proceeded to the Iſis. As this river was not fordable, they imagined that it would have ſtopped the career of the Romans. Their miſtake was, however, ſoon evident; for Plautius ordered the German Auxiliaries to plunge into the ſtream and ſwim over, which they eaſily effected, though encumbered by their armour; for theſe people were trained from their youth to ſwim acroſs deep and rapid ſtreams, while incommoded with heavy weights. The Germans no ſooner gained the oppoſite ſhore, than, according to the order of their General, they aimed their arrows and darts at the horſes of the enemy; and by the ſlaughter of thoſe animals, rendered the chariots effectually uſeleſs. The Romans, animated by the example of the Germans, ſoon croſſed the river to their ſupport, when the Britons, unequal to the conflict, fled. The next day, however, they recovered their ſpirits, and attacked the Romans with ſuch impetuoſity, that a victory would have been the conſequence, had not Sideus Geta, after having been taken priſoner, freed himſelf, and thoſe who were with him, and charged the Britons in the rear. This unexpected attack threw them into great conſternation, and a rout enſued. Geta was deemed the cauſe of the victory, and a triumph was afterwards decreed him upon that account, though he had never paſſed the Conſular dignity.

The Britons then marched expeditiouſly along the banks of the Thames, and forded it at places with which they were well acquainted; while the Romans, who followed them were frequently bemired in bogs and marſhes. At length diſcovering a ford, the latter paſſed over, and again defeated the former; when many Britons, among whom was Prince Togodumnus, were ſlain.

Plautius found that his own army was conſiderably diminiſhed by theſe repeated engagements; and that the Britons, not diſcouraged by their ill ſucceſſes, were ſtill determined to ſtruggle for their liberties. Dubious of his own ſecurity, he ſent to the continent for reinforcements, and ſtrongly ſolicited the Emperor to come in perſon in order to complete the conqueſt.

Claudius accordingly landed in Britain in the month of Auguſt, A. D. 43, with a powerful army, and immediately marched to join Plautius, whoſe troops were encamped on the ſouth ſide of the Thames. The forces by their junction formed a more conſiderable army than the Romans had ever before brought into the iſland. Claudius took the ſole command upon himſelf, marched expeditiouſly up to the Britons, and before they had time to reflect, brought them to a general engagement; in which the Britons received a total overthrow. This laſt fatal defeat, and the powerful army of the Romans, quite diſpirited the Britons, who thought more of making their peace than retrieving their affairs, and determined to court the confidence inſtead of oppoſing the progreſs of the conqueror. They accordingly, in general, threw down their arms; and deputies from the different ſtates flocked daily to the Roman camp to make their ſubmiſſion. It is therefore at this period that we ought properly to date the reduction of the Britons by the Romans, for the previous expeditions tended rather to diſturb than ſubjugate the country. Claudius then took Camulodunum, now Malden, in Eſſex, which he made a military colony; a great part of the country was reduced to a Roman province, and having conciliated the affections of the Britons by his moderation, he returned to the continent. At Rome he was received by the people with the moſt rapturous demonſtrations of joy; a triumph was decreed him, and Britanicus was added to his name. Plautius, who was left to manage the new conqueſt, after the departure of the Emperor, found that a diſcontent, and a deſire of liberty ſtill prevailed among the Britons, which obliged him frequently to detach Flavius Veſpaſian, on a variety of expeditions, according as exigencies required, or the commotions grew dangerous. In his ſeveral excurſions, Veſpaſian fought thirty battles with the revolted and remote Britons; took twenty towns; ſubdued the Iſle of Wight, and even added the Orkney iſlands to the imperial territories. As a reward for which, he afterwards obtained a triumph, two ſacerdotal dignities, and a conſulſhip. Plautius being honorably recalled from Britain, and cordially received by the Emperor, P. Oſtorius Scapula was appointed to ſucceed him as Proprætor.

SECT. III.

From the Proprætorſhip of P. Oſtorius Scapula, to the Evacuation of Britain by the Romans.

THE Britons took advantage of the interval between the departure of Plautius, and the arrival of Oſtorius, to aſſemble under the command of Caractacus; ſo that Oſtorius found the public affairs of Britain in a much worſe ſituation than he had expected. As he did not land till the latter end of October, the Britons ſuppoſed that he would not attempt to attack them till the enſuing ſpring. But Oſtorius, ſenſible of the danger of ſuch a delay, determined to begin his operations immediately. He accordingly took the field, defeated ſeveral parties who ventured to oppoſe him, diſarmed the Britons wherever he came, and erected a chain of forts along the banks of the Avon and the Severn, which effectually ſubjugated the ſouthern parts of the iſland. He then added to the fortifications of Malden, in Eſſex, and built London; or at leaſt augmented its buildings ſo much, that from a poor village, it became a mart of trade. As Oſtorius determined to penetrate farther into the kingdom, he thought it prudent to leave no enemy behind. Cogidnmnis, king of the Dobuni, was therefore made a Denizen of Rome; and beſides his own dominions, had ſome other provinces guaranteed to him to ſecure him in the Roman intereſt; this policy prevailed, for he was ever after a powerful and faithful ally, and proved of great ſervice to the Romans upon a variety of occaſions. Oſtorius then marched againſt the Iceni, whom he defeated: this ſtroke induced others, who had then remained undetermined, to ſubmit to the conqueror. The Roman general afterwards proceeded to reduce the Cangi, and his endeavours, after a brave oppoſition proved ſucceſsful; waſting the country as he went, he reached the Iriſh Sea, but was recalled by an inſurrection of the Brigantes, againſt whom he immediately turned his arms. Theſe were no ſooner ſubdued, but the Silures prepared to oppoſe him; and being not only numerous and brave, but under the conduct of Caractacus, their endeavours appeared more formidable to Oſtorius than any of the former. Caractacus politically removed the ſeat of war from the country of the Silures, or South Wales, to the country of the Ordovices, or North Wales; as he knew the craggy rocks and high mountains there would prove natural fortifications, and enable him to annoy the enemy with great advantage to himſelf. On the approach of the Romans, Caractacus addreſſed his troops in a ſpirited manner, and told them the impending engagement would eſtabliſh their ineſtimable liberty, or confirm their perpetual ſervitude; that they ought to remember the courage of their anceſtors, who had driven Julius Cæſar from Britain, and by whoſe valour they were happily delivered from oppreſſion and tyranny.---The Britons, animated by this ſpeech, gave a ſhout of general joy, and declared, that they would ſeek life in Liberty; or in Death, court eternal Freedom. The nature of the country, and the reſolute behaviour of the enemy, in ſome meaſure ſtaggered Oſtorius; he, however, determined to rely on the courage and diſcipline of the Roman legions, and not to deſpair of the continuance of fortune's ſmiles to a people whom ſhe had ſo long favoured. The Romans attacked the intrenchments with great ſpirit; the Britons defended them with the utmoſt intrepidity. The conflict was long and bloody; fortune ſeemed at firſt to incline to the Britons; but at length the legionary diſcipline prevailed, and the Romans routed their enemies with great ſlaughter. The wife and daughter of Caractacus were taken priſoners; his brothers ſoon after ſurrendered themſelves up; and that unhappy General took the fatal reſolution of flying to Cartiſmandua, Queen of the Brigantes, though he knew ſhe was his enemy. Hence we may perceive, that common prudence frequently forſakes the greateſt ſouls in the hour of diſtreſs, and indiſcretion finiſhes what accident began.

Cartiſmandua was not only well affected to the Romans, but bore an inveterate hatred to Caractacus, for ſiding with her huſband Venutius, with whom ſhe had been a long time at variance. Happy, therefore, to have the object of her malice in her power, and to be able at once to oblige the Romans, and gratify her own revenge, ſhe loaded that brave general with chains, and ſent him to the conquerors.

The name of Caractacus had long been terrible to the Romans; he had for nine years bravely ſupported that formidable confederacy, begun by Caſſivellaunus, and was deemed the moſt experienced of the Britiſh leaders. It is not, therefore, ſurpriſing that his defeat ſhould be conſidered at Rome in an important light, and that his captivity filled the people with joy. It was the univerſal wiſh, to ſee a general of the Barbarians (as the Romans were pleaſed to term the Britons) who had rendered himſelf ſo conſpicuous, and whoſe military talents were at once dreaded and admired. All the captives were therefore ſent to Rome, to become a pubic ſpectacle. On the day appointed for gratifying the general curioſity, the emperor and empreſs prepared to receive the unhappy captives in great ſtate, each being ſeated on a magnificent throne, and adorned with the moſt ſuperb military trophies. The grandees ſurrounded the monarch, the imperial guards were drawn up in order, and all the eyes of Rome were intent on the proceſſion. The vaſſals and dependants of Caractacus came firſt, the warlike ſpoils ſucceeded, that brave general's family followed, and himſelf brought up the rear. In the preſence of the emperor, the behaviour of Caracticus was collected and firm, and advancing to the imperial throne, he boldly addreſſed himſelf to Claudius, in the following words, as they are particularly recorded by Tacitus, the celebrated Roman hiſtorian.

“Had my moderation in proſperity been adequate to my noble birth and ample fortune, I ſhould not this day have appeared as a captive, but as a powerful ally of Rome; nor wouldeſt thou, O Cæſar! have diſdained the alliance of a prince, deſcended of illuſtrious progenitors, and the commander of many nations. My preſent fortune is to me low, and diſhonourable; but to you glorious and triumphant—I once poſſeſſed horſes, and arms, warriors, and chariots of war; power and riches—Is it ſurpriſing then that I ſhould be ſo ſollicitous to keep, and arduous to defend them—If fate hath decreed univerſal empire to Rome, our ſubjection was inevitable; but had I tamely ſubmitted without oppoſition, neither my fame nor your glory would have been conſpicuous, and oblivion muſt have followed my ſhame—Deprive me of exiſtence, the ſenſe of my loſſes will die with me—Reſtore me to my family, and raiſe a perpetual monument to your own clemency.”

Claudius, who was naturally humane, could not hear this manly addreſs without being ſenſibly affected. He ſympathized with the captive hero, and melting into generoſity, gave liberty to him and his family. It is difficult to determine, whether the greater merit belongs to the imperial Roman, or ſpirited Briton, but both have certainly a claim to the admiration of poſterity.

This victory was placed among the moſt ſhining occurrences that formed the Roman glory; and Oſtorius, though abſent, was honoured with a triumph. But as his reputation grew ſplendid, his proſperity declined; lulled into ſecurity by ſucceſs, the Romans became indolent and careleſs, while the Britons, taught by dear-bought experience, grew more expert in the art of war, and ſtudied with care that diſcipline, their enemies knowledge of which had coſt them ſo much blood—Stimulated to revenge, by their own wrongs and the captivity of their beloved hero; cautious from former failures; and better trained, by being fatally ſenſible, that regularity was the ſoul of military enterprize, they appeared to the Romans more formidable than ever. Their cautious intrepidity was ſucceſsful, for ſurpriſing the legionary cohorts, who were left to erect forts in the country of the Silures, they defeated them. The principal officer of this detachment, eight captains, and a great number of private men were ſlain, nor would any have eſcaped, had not ſpeedy aſſiſtance been ſent from the neighbouring garriſons. Soon after they routed the Roman foragers, and by their ſucceſſes, greatly diſpirited the imperial troops. Oſtorius, fearing that the ſplendor of his triumph would be ſullied by theſe ſubſequent misfortunes, fell a martyr to the anxiety of his mind, and died through grief for not being able gloriouſly to terminate a war ſo proſperouſly began. The demiſe of this able general gave the Britons new ſpirits, and determined them to hazard a general battle with their enemies. Manlius Valens took the command of the Roman army, till the arrival of Aulus Didius, who was appointed by the emperor to ſucceed Oſtorius. The two armies coming to an engagement, the Romans were defeated, and the Britons ſo fluſhed with ſucceſs that they penetrated into the Roman provinces, included under the name of Britannia Prima, while the legionary troops were greatly diſpirited, and their auxiliaries in the utmoſt conſternation.

Didius, on his firſt arrival, found affairs in a much worſe condition than he had expected, and perceived abundant cauſe, ſeverely to reprehend the conduct of Manlius. This fine opportunity, however, of recovering their liberty, was loſt by the Britons, through their own inteſtine broils, and diſcord gave what their enemies could not take. The difference between Cartiſmandua, queen of the Brigantes, and her huſband Venutius was now come to an open rupture. This infamous queen, relying upon the protection of the Romans, not only rejected her huſband, and occaſioned his brother and kinſman to be put to death; but took a menial ſervant for whom ſhe had long entertained a criminal paſſion to ſhare her throne and bed.

Theſe things rendered her extremely odious, and rouſed the neighbouring ſtates againſt her. Thus were the Britons plunged into a civil war, by a wicked woman, at the very period that ſeemed favourable to their deliverance. For while their own ſucceſs gave them confidence and hope, the Romans were diſpirited, the emperor Claudius died, and was ſucceed by Nero, an effeminate, baſe minded prince; and Didius found that he ſhould have ſufficient employment in defending the Roman military provinces, without being able to make any additional conqueſt. Thus were affairs ſituated, when the legionary troops fought an obſtinate battle in the defence of Cartiſmandua, whom they had great difficulty to ſave from falling into the hands of her huſband—Venutius, however, ſeized upon her dominions; and being exaſperated at the protection given her by the Romans, joined the Britiſh Confederacy, and determined, if poſſible, either to expel, or exterminate thoſe abhorred intruders. Didius, who was very old and infirm, quitted this life about the ſame time, and was ſucceeded by Varanius, who boaſted much, and did nothing, as death overtook him before he could carry any of his projects into execution. The celebrated Paulinus Suetonius was then nominated to the government of Britain; from whoſe military talents the Romans had the moſt flattering expectations; nor were they deceived, as he ſoon reduced the brave Ordovices, and turbulent Silures, and then turned his attention to the conqueſt of the iſle of Angleſey, the chief ſeat of the Britiſh Druids, and the common retreat for fugitives who were enemies to Rome. Hence it became not only populous, but formidable, on which account Suetonius thought it a ſubduction abſolutely neceſſary. As this iſland is ſeparated from the land only by a very narrow channel which flows from the ſea, the cavalry eaſily forded it, and the infantry paſſed over in flat bottomed boats. The Romans on their landing, found the people drawn up in order of battle, near the ſhore; the women running up and down the ranks with diſhevelled hair, torches in their hands, and making diſmal lamentations; while the Druids lifted up their hands to heaven, and made the air reſound with the moſt dreadful imprecations. This unuſual ſight, and the hideous yellings with which it was accompanied, ſtruck the Roman troops with ſurpriſe and horror; and during their conſternation, a flight of arrows from the enemy did great execution. At length, animated by their general, and abaſhed at being thrown into confuſion by women and prieſts, they impetuouſly attacked, and ſpeedily routed the Britons. After the defeat, Suetonius found a great number of fires in the conſecrated groves; being informed that they were intended for the ſacrifice of the Roman priſoners who ſhould be taken in the battle (for the Druids had aſſured the people of victory) he was ſo exaſperated at the deſigned cruelty of thoſe prieſts, that he ordered all the Druids that could be ſeized, to be thrown into the fires they had prepared, that they might ſuffer the death they intended for others. He then overturned their altars, demoliſhed their magical woods, deſtroyed their myſterious groves, and put an effectual ſtop to Druidiſm. After this ordered forts to be erected, and appointed a force ſufficient to ſecure this new conqueſt.

While Suetonius was thus ſucceſsful in the remoter parts of the kingdom, an affair of the utmoſt importance called him to the interior provinces. A general revolt ſeemed impending, to which the Britons, beſides their natural love of liberty, had been excited by various reaſons, of which the following are the moſt material: Praſutagus, the rich king of the Iceni, on his demiſe, made Nero coheir with his two daughters, thinking by that means to ſecure a powerful protection to his family; but the avaritious diſpoſition of Nero prevailed over juſtice, gratitude, and humanity. Not content with the ſhare ſo generouſly bequeathed him, his officers ſeized the whole kingdom, pillaged the palace, ordered the defunct monarch's conſort, Boadicea, to be ſhamefully ſcourged, and baſely commanded the common ſoldiers to violate the chaſtity of his daughters.

Calus, the Procurator, renewed the confiſcation of goods, which before was remitted by the moderation of Claudius.

Seneca, one of Nero's counſellors, having obliged the Britons to borrow money upon loan, previous to the ſpecified time of re-payment, ſuddenly recalled the ſums he had lent with the moſt exorbitant intereſt; the impoſſibility of complying with his demands gave him a pretence to ſeize and diſtrain their poſſeſſions.

The colony at Camulodunum, either diſpoſſeſſed the Britiſh inhabitants of that place of their houſes, or treated them as their ſlaves, by obliging them to perform their menial drudgery; and the prieſts of Claudius, under pretence of demanding their religious dues, made the moſt grievous exactions on the people.

Theſe, and many other cruel and flagrant acts of injuſtice, ſtired up a general ſpirit of reſentment in the breaſts of the Britons. An inſurrection immediately took place among the Iceni and Trinobantes, at the head of whom Boadicea appeared, and blending her own private with the public wrongs, inſpired the people with ſentiments of revenge.

The Britons, under the conduct of Boadicea and Venutius, began their operations by an attack upon the Roman colony at Camulodunum. This place was taken by ſtorm, the garriſon put to the ſword, and a dreadful ſlaughter throughout the whole province enſued. Fluſhed with this ſucceſs, they ſoon after attacked the Ninth Legion, under the command of Petelius Cerealis. After an obſtinate conflict, the Roman infantry was cut to pieces, and the horſe only eſcaped. Suetonius, who was informed of all theſe proceedings, made the greateſt expedition to reach London; which, though not a Roman colony, was much frequented by merchants, and generally ſtocked with proviſions. In a council of war, London not being tenable, he withdrew to the Surry ſide, while the Britons entered London, and deſtroyed both town and inhabitants with fire and ſword. The city of Verulam met the ſame fate: in fine, the Britons, with the moſt ſavage cruelty, put to death above 80,000 perſons, ſparing neither age, ſex, or condition.

To put a ſtop to theſe depredations, Suetonius determined to hazard a general battle. His army conſiſted of only ten thouſand men; but their being veterans, and admirably diſciplined, ſeemed to make up for their inferiority in point of numbers. He choſe an advantageous ſituation, with a narrow entrance leading to an open plain in his front, and a wood for the defence of his rear. The Britons now appeared in ſuch numbers as to aſtoniſh the Romans, and at the ſame time ſeemed ſo confident of victory, that they had brought their wives with them, and placed them in carts at the extremity of the plain, that they might be witneſs of their triumph over the general army.

Boadicea, previous to the engagement, addreſſed herſelf to the army with all the powers of female eloquence, and informed them, "That it had been uſual "for the Britons to fight under the conduct of women,---but ſhe now appeared in a capacity different from her anceſtors, being not to fight for a "kingdom, but as a perſon rob'd and diſgrac'd, to "revenge the injuries ſhe and her family had received. On which account ſhe was determined to "obtain either Liberty or Death."

Suetonius, who was deemed the beſt general then living, did not fail to exhort his troops to act with their uſual intrepidity, and without conſidering the numbers of the enemy, to depend, that as ſoon as their firſt ranks were broken, the rout would become general, as the reſt were only a confuſed rabble without order or diſcipline.

The engagement was begun by the Britons with a furious diſcharge of darts, which were no ſooner ſpent than the Romans ſallied from the defile, and charged the enemy in the open plain with ſuch impetuoſity, that their ranks were ſoon broken, and the Britons put to the rout with incredible ſlaughter, as above 80,000 of them were ſlain. The Romans had not above 400 killed, and as many wounded; but it is to be conſidered, that the carnage of the Britons was more general by their having ſurrounded the field with a chain of carriages, which, after the defeat, impeded their flight, and ſo fatally retarded their retreat, that many were ſacrificed to the reſentment of the Romans, who might have otherwiſe made their eſcape. The unfortunate Boadicea finding her hopes fruſtrated, and her revenge diſappointed, deſtroyed herſelf and her daughters by poiſon, that neither ſhould fall into the hands of the conqueror.

Suetonius took every advantage of his ſucceſs, and deſtroyed the countries of thoſe who had appeared as enemies with fire and ſword. He deprived the Britons of their cattle wherever he came; and unfortunately for themſelves they had no corn; for Boadicea, in order to render her army more formidable, had perſuaded them, that it was unneceſſary to ſave any, as the Roman granaries would ſoon be in their poſſeſſion. Improvidently confident of ſucceſs, they had neglected the duties of agriculture, and thus by their own remiſſneſs, the horrors of famine ſucceeded thoſe of war.

Theſe accumulated diſtreſſes were encreaſed by the ſeverities of Suetonius, whoſe rigour prevented the Britons from laying down their arms. This occaſioned the procurator Julius Claſſicianus, to write to Rome for his recall, as the only method of terminating the war. Polycletus was accordingly ſent to enquire into the ſtate of affairs in Britain. His report was greatly in favour of Suetonius, nevertheleſs, as that general had rendered himſelf particularly obnoxious to the Britons, on account of his deſtroying the Druids, it was deemed politically prudent to recall him.

Petronius Turpilianius, the ſucceſſor of Suetonius, arrived in Britain at the beginning of the year ſixty-two, and by moderation accompliſhed what the military ſeverities of his predeceſſor could not effect; though ſome of the Roman writers have affirmed, that his affable behaviour was founded on indolence, and that a kind of apathy, natural to his diſpoſition, prevented his being either cruel or rapacious. But whatever envy might promulge to his diſadvantage, it is certain, that he gave eſſential ſatisfaction, both to the Britons and the court of Rome; by which he had triumphal honours decreed him. Returning home in the year 65, he was ſucceeded by Trebellius Maximus, who wanted both experience and courage, two things eſſentially neceſſary in the character of a governor and a general. Avarice being joined to the above deficiencies, his ruin was the conſequence, for the legions revolted, gave the command to Roſcius Cælius, and obliged Trebellius to fly the kingdom.

About this time, that monſter of nature, Nero, put an end to his own deteſted life; and during the reigns of the two ſucceeding emperors, Galba and Otho, Briton continued in tranquillity. Vetellius, coming to the empire, deputed Vectius Bolanus to the government of Britain. This officer was negligent and inactive, but affable and obliging; ſo that he gained the affections of the troops, without preſerving the authority of the general.

On the demiſe of Vitellius, his ſucceſſor Veſpaſian reinforced the army in Britain, and ſent Petelius Cerealis to command it. This brave general conquered the Brigantes; and Julius Frontinus, who ſucceeded him, ſubdued the Silures. But Julius Agricola being appointed governor of Britain, towards the latter end of Veſpaſian's reign, by far ſurpaſſed the fame of any of his predeceſſors. The tranſactions of this general are ſuccinctly related by his ſon-in-law, Tacitus, one of the moſt elegant writers, and without exception the beſt hiſtorian that any age or nation ever produced. His authority, therefore, we ſhall follow, as it is ſuperior to all others.

A ſhort time, previous to the arrival of Agricola, the Ordovices, or inhabitants of North Wales, had cut off ſome of the Romans, and began another revolt. This general marched with the utmoſt expedition to ſuppreſs an inſurrection, which portended ſuch dangerous conſequences. Their rocks and mountains were of no effectual uſe againſt a commander of ſuch conſummate abilities; he routed them on plains, drove them from precipices, and purſued them through places hitherto deemed inacceſſible. Finding that neither the obſtructions raiſed by art, or perſonal courage, could avail againſt the ſuperior ſkill of the Roman commander, they ſubmitted themſelves to his clemency, and embraced the conditions held out by his humanity.

The Ordovices being ſubjugated, Agricola determined to compleat the conqueſt of the iſle of Angleſey, which had before been prevented by the ſudden recall of Suetonius. This he effected with great reputation to himſelf, and then returning to the ſouthern provinces, employed the winter in conciliating the affections of the Britons. Prudent by the errors of his predeceſſors, he made it his chief ſtudy to avoid the rocks on which they had ſeverally ſplit. He was moderate without relaxing in the diſtribution of Juſtice, liberal without profuſion, and though affable to all, his dignity was never loſt to any; ſenſible that to extirpate the idea of revolt, it was neceſſary to render the people perfectly eaſy, he determined on a thorough reform throughout the kingdom. To give no offence, he began with the regulation of his own family, then proceeded to enquire into the abuſes which had crept into the army, and concluded by new modelling the adminiſtration of public affairs in ſuch a manner, as to give the leaſt diſſatisfaction to the people in general. This equitable procedure rendered him beloved, both by Britons and Romans, and made him the favourite object of all parties; ſo that on the demiſe of the emperor Veſpaſian, which happened, A. D. 81. his ſon Titus who ſucceeded him, confirmed Agricola in the government of Britain.

During the enſuing campaign, this able commander proceeded to ſubjugate the remaining unſubdued provinces, by the political mode of extending the ſword with one hand, and the olive branch with the other; at once menacing the Britons with all the horrors of war, and courting them to partake of the bleſſings of peace. This conduct, equally prudent and artful, could not fail of ſucceſs; and when the ſhutting in of the winter put an end to military operations, Agricola was ſtill unremitting in his endeavours to rivet by gentle means thoſe fetters which he had put on with ſo much cunning. To effect this he introduced a taſte for architecture, erected public academies for the inſtruction of the Britons in the liberal arts, and promoted the ſtudy of the Roman language. Stately edifices aſſumed the places of huts, ſimplicity gave way to ſtudied refinements, and frankneſs of ſpeech was ſacrificed to the elegancies of diction. The deluded Britons were civilized into ſubjection; their rough ideas of freedom were poliſhed into abject ſubmiſſion; and the laſt ſpark of liberty was extinguiſhed by the luxurious graces.

In the third year of his adminiſtration, Agricola, having ſettled every thing to his ſatisfaction in South Britain, reſolved to enter upon new diſcoveries, and to explore the northern parts of the iſland. In conſequence of which determination, he this campaign penetrated to the Frith of the river Tay in Scotland, conquering all the countries as he went, and building forts to ſecure his conqueſts. The fourth year of his government he ſpent in reviewing and ſecuring his new acquiſitions, to which end he erected a chain of fortreſſes on the neck of land, between the friths of Glota, and Bodotia, now Dunbritton, and Edinburgh.

The emperor Titus dying, was ſucceeded by his brother Domitian, who confirmed Agricola in his government. In his fifth expedition, this great commander extended his conqueſts ſtill farther north; erected forts, placed garriſons in the weſtern iſles, and built a powerful fleet to aſſiſt the operations of the army. The Caledonians, ſurpriſed at theſe proceedings, took up arms in deſpair, and determined to ſacrifice their lives for the recovery of their freedom. Agricola, underſtanding that they intended to haraſs him in ſeparate parties, divided his army into three battalions, in order to fruſtrate their deſigns. This new diſpoſition induced the Caledonians to change their original intention; they accordingly united their whole force into one body, attacked the ninth legion, while detached from the reſt of the army, and even broke into the camp with great ſlaughter. Agricola being informed of the tranſaction came to the aſſiſtance of his troops juſt time enough to ſave them from deſtruction. The Caledonians were routed with much carnage, and purſued to their woods and bogs by the horſe and light armed infantry.

The Romans had hitherto imagined that Britain was an iſland. Julius Cæſar by conjecture expreſly calls it ſo; yet it was not till about this time that the fact was really aſcertained. But the following occurrence put the matter beyond a doubt: a cohort of Germans having ſlain a centurion and other Roman officers in a mutiny, fled on board three light gallies with a deſign to eſcape the puniſhment due to their demerits. In order to ſupport themſelves they frequently landed for plunder, and in this piratical manner ſailed entirely round Britain. At length, being driven by a ſtorm on the coaſt of Frieſland, they were ſeized on and made ſlaves. Being frequently bought and ſold, in the courſe of their traffic, they at laſt returned into the hands of their old maſters, to whom they confirmed the general opinion of Britain's being entirely ſurrounded by the ocean, and received a free pardon on account of their diſcoveries, adventures, and ſufferings.

Agricola, determined to penetrate to the extremity of the iſland, took the field early in the ſpring. The fleet ſeconded the operations of the army, by alarming the coaſts; and the troops on board frequently landed, in order to divide the attention and diſtract the councils of the enemy. The Caledonians, in the mean time, formed a powerful union, and aſſembled near the Grampian mountains to the number of 30,000 effective men, under the command of Galgacus, a perſon of elevated rank, eminent abilities, and diſtinguiſhed perſonal bravery. On being informed that the Roman forces were near him, he addreſſed his troops in theſe words. "When I conſider the cauſe of this war, and the preſent criſis, I have reaſon to preſume that the future happineſs and freedom of the whole iſland will date their birth from this important day—for we are the moſt valiant remains of the Britons, ſeated in the remoteſt regions beyond the ken of thoſe nations enſlaved by the enemy, ſo that our eyes are yet unpolluted, and free from the contagion of foreign tyranny; and this ſecret receſs, unknown to fame, has hitherto preſerved us in all the bleſſings of liberty — Beyond us is no nation, nothing but waves and rocks, and on that ſide, nothing but the bondage and ſlavery which is to be expected from the Romans, a people, inſatiable in their luſts, and unbounded in their ambition. Thoſe robbers of the world, and ravagers of the univerſe, now the exhauſted continent can no more furniſh their rapines, endeavour to rifle the wide ſeas and ocean. Where they meet with opulent enemies, their cruelty proceeds from avarice, when with poor it riſes from ambition. The eaſt and weſt, vaſt as they are, cannot ſatiate their voracious minds—They, and they alone with equal greedineſs, graſp at the riches and poverty of all nations; devaſtations, murders, and extirpations paſs with them, under the falſe names of empire and government; and they boaſt of eſtabliſhing peace in thoſe provinces they have rendered deſolate—Our goods are their tribute, our corn their proviſions, and our bodies their tools for all kinds of drudgery; and if the modeſty of our wives and daughters has preſerved them from open violence when they were enemies, it cannot ſecure them from their laſcivious friendſhips now they are gueſts. Other ſlaves, whom nature and fortune have deſtined to ſervitude, are nouriſhed by their maſters; but the Britons alone purchaſe their own bondage, and maintain and ſupport their oppreſſors. Were our enemies courage in war equal to their debaucheries in peace, we might juſtly dread their arms, but their glory is all owing to our diſſenſions. Our union will diſperſe their forces that are gathered out of many nations, ſo that one miſcarriage of theirs will diſſolve their whole power—In fine, there you ſee tribute and ſlavery, here death, or liberty. Therefore let us conſider the glory of our anceſtors, and the fate of our poſterity."

This ſpeech animated Galgacus's army to a degree of enthuſiaſm, nor did Agricola forget to inſpirit his troops with all the energetic powers of Roman eloquence.

Both ſides being eager to engage, the battle began with great fury, and was obſtinately maintained for ſome time with dubious ſucceſs. At length the Roman diſcipline prevailed, and the Caledonians were defeated with a dreadful ſlaughter, 10,000 being ſlain in the fight and purſuit, while only 340 Romans loſt their lives. The diſtreſs of the unhappy fugitives is ſcarce conceivable; driven by deſpair to the moſt ſanguinary phrenzy, they butchered their wives and children that they might not fall into the hands of the Romans; then burning their habitations, and deſolating the country in their retreat, they hid themſelves in ſolitary cliffs, and diſmal caves, and in thoſe unſocial receſſes bewailed their accumulated calamities.

Thus was Britain and the circumjacent iſles entirely reduced to a Roman province. But the ſucceſs of Agricola proved as fatal to himſelf as to the North Britons; for the tyrant Domitian, being jealous of his great reputation, firſt recalled him from Britain, and afterwards diſpatched him by poiſon. From this period to the arrival of the emperor Adrian, a profound ſilence is obſerved by hiſtorians, reſpecting the affairs of Britain—At leaſt the ſupine acquieſcence of the Britons in ſlavery, rendered the occurrences of the times ſo ſcarce and trifling, that the Roman writers have not thought them deſerving of mention.

The expedition of the emperor Adrian was occaſioned by a revolt of the Caledonians.—That monarch, on his arrival, marched into Scotland, drove the people up into the highlands or northern mountains, and to prevent their future incurſions, in the year A. D. 121, erected a prodigious wall with wood and earth, which extended from the mouth of the Tyne, to the Solway Frith, running eighty miles from eaſt to weſt. Then returning to Rome, his flattering courtiers and ſycophants, complimented him with the title of reſtorer of Britain, which was added to the names of his other dignities, and ſtamped upon his coins.

In the late inſurrection, the Caledonians had ſhewn no more mercy to the Britons of the Southern provinces, than to the Romans themſelves, but treated both with indiſcriminate cruelty. This impolitic barbarity hurt the public cauſe; as the South Britons, inſtead of uniting with the North Britons, in a general ſtruggle for the recovery of their liberties, found themſelves under the neceſſity of purſuing coercive meaſures againſt the latter for their own perſonal ſafety: and at length not only conſented to conform themſelves to the Roman laws, both civil and military, but alſo requeſted to be taught the diſcipline of the legionary troops, which requeſt was complied with by Priſcus Licinius the Pro-prætor.

Antoninus Pius ſucceeded the emperor Adrian, when Lollius Urbicus, his lieutenant in Britain, defeated the Brigantes, and afterwards built another wall in Scotland, from the Frith of Dunbritton, to that of Edinburgh.

From this period nothing material occured till the reign of the emperor Commodus, when the North Britons became more formidable than ever. Hearing that the emperor was a puſillanimous coward, and the Roman army ſunk in indolence and luxury, they judged it an admirable opportunity to undertake ſome capital enterprize. Having aſſembled a conſiderable force, they broke through the laſt made wall, attacked the neareſt fortreſs, put the Roman garriſon to the ſword, and carried deſolation wherever they went. Terrified at the intelligence of this, the emperor, with all poſſible expedition, ſent over Ulpius Marcellus to command in Britain. This experienced and active commander began his operations with ſucceſs, and finiſhed them with judgment. He puniſhed the revolters, reduced affairs to their former channel, and revived the diſcipline of the Roman army. The prudent adminiſtration of Marcellus, and the applauſe which it procured him, excited the envy, and raiſed the jealouſy of the emperor. Poſſeſſing no virtues himſelf, he could not bear them in others, as they ſeemed tacit reflections on his own vices. His ingratitude therefore prompted him to a deſign upon his general's life, in return for the ſervices he had rendered him; but being perſuaded that ſuch a ſtep would prove prejudicial to himſelf, he conſented at length only to deprive him of his government.

On the departure of Marcellus, a mutiny broke out among the Roman troops, who openly renounced their allegiance to Commodus. To quell this dangerous commotion, the emperor imprudently ſent his favorite Perennes to Britain, who, inſtead of appeaſing, purſued the very methods moſt likely to increaſe the general diſcontent. He began his adminiſtration by removing the veteran officers, placing his own creatures in their ſtead, and treating the whole army with the moſt unexampled ſeverity. Theſe proceedings diverted the reſentment of the troops from the emperor to himſelf, and induced them unanimouſly to accuſe him of high treaſon. Commodus believed, or pretended to believe the allegation; and happy to find the ſtorm turned another way, delivered his favorite up to the diſcretion of the enraged ſoldiery, who immediately ſacrificed him to their revenge.

Pertinax being appointed to the government of Britain, with great difficulty, and at the hazard of his life, put an end to the ſeditions of the troops. Being recalled at his own deſire, he was ſucceeded by Clodius Albinus, who, upon a falſe report of the Emperor's death, declared himſelf for the ſenatorial, in preference to the imperial, power. Theſe ſentiments ſo unpleaſing to a deſpotic court being known, he was haſtily recalled, and Junius Severus appointed in his room. The tyrant Commodus was murdered A. D. 193, when Pertinax ſucceeded to the imperial dignity. Albinus was re-appointed to the government of Britain, in which office he continued during the ſhort reigns of Pertinax and Julian his ſucceſſor, and had ſo far gained upon the affections of the troops, that on the death of the latter, they offered him the imperial crown. Septimus Severus, however, pretended to the ſame dignity, and received the ſanction of the ſenate. Albinus, therefore, paſſed over with his legion into Gaul, that they might in the field confirm to him the title with which they had complimented him. He was, however, diſappointed in his aim, for engaging Severus near the city of Lyons, his troops were defeated, and himſelf ſlain.

Severus being ſecurely ſeated on the throne, determined to alter the adminiſtration of public affairs in Britain, by dividing that government into two parts: the ſouthern department he committed to Heraclitus, and the northern to Virius Lupus. The latter, however, was ſo haraſſed by the Caledonians, that he at laſt determined to purchaſe his repoſe with money, and ſacrifice his purſe to his peace. This reſolve was extremely impolitic, as the conſequence proved; for the Caledonians finding that they could be well paid not to be troubleſome, took the reſolution to be more troubleſome than ever, that they might be the oftner bribed. Lupus now too late perceived, that he had thrown out a bait for inſurrections; and that a payment to deſiſt from hoſtilities was but earneſt money to engage them to repeated attacks.

The emperor being informed of theſe things, reſolved on an expedition into Britain, though he was then above ſixty years of age, and ſorely afflicted with the gout.—Severus accordingly arrived in Britain A. D. 208. attended by his two ſons Caracalla and Geta. The North-Britons, terrified at this intelligence, ſent ambaſſadors to ſue for peace: theſe Severus detained under various pretexts, till he was ready for the expedition, and then diſmiſſed them with an equivocal anſwer. Leaving his ſon Geta in the ſouthern parts, he proceeded northwards, accompanied by Caracalla. In Scotland, by hewing down woods, draining bogs, and building bridges, by ambuſcades, ſkirmiſhes, ſickneſs, &c. &c. he loſt more than 50,000 men. But perſevering to the laſt, he overcame all difficulties, obliged the North Britons to ſubmiſſion, and made them reſign moſt of their country, and all their arms. Then, to ſecure their obedience, he built a new, or rather repaired the old, wall erected by Adrian, making it twelve feet high, and eight feet thick. On which account he took upon him the title of Britannicus Maximus, which was afterwards ſtamped upon his own and ſons coins. Leaving the command of the army to Caracalla, the emperor retired to Eboricum, or York, to enjoy a little reſt. His ſon in the mean time permitting the ſoldiers to commit great outrages, the Caledonians again flew to arms. The emperor being informed of the inſurrection, but not of the cauſe, was ſo exaſperated, that he ordered a general maſſacre, when great numbers of both ſexes, and all ages, indiſcriminately fell victims to the weakneſs of an infirm ſuperannuated prince, and the miſrepreſentations of intereſted ſycophants. Soon after the emperor, depreſſed by diſeaſe and age, died at York; ſaying, juſt before he expired, "I have been all that man "can be, but that is uſeleſs to me now."

Severus left the empire to his two ſons; but Caracalla's ambition prompted him to procure his brother's aſſaſſination, when he aſcended the throne alone, in A. D. 211; from which period we have no account of the affairs of Britain, till the reign of the emperor Diocleſian.

Diocleſian began his reign, A. D. 284, and immediately made Carauſius admiral of a fleet, with orders to prevent the piracies of the Franks and Saxons on the coaſts of Britain and Gaul.---But this commander, converting whatever he could poſſeſs himſelf of to his own uſe, the emperor deſigned to puniſh him for his avarice and perfidy with death. Being apprized of this, he ſeized upon Britain, bribed the army, got himſelf proclaimed Emperor, and augmented his fleet. Maximinian was ordered to march againſt him; but not being able to encounter ſo formidable a foe, he was glad to enter into a negociation; in which it was concluded, that Carauſius ſhould remain governor of Britain, in ſubordination to the emperor. This dignity Carauſius held during ſeven years, when he was treacherouſly ſlain by Alectus, his prime miniſter, and pretended boſom friend, who immediately took the reins of government upon himſelf. Conſtantius being diſpatched from Rome againſt him, Alectus was defeated and ſlain, when the mercenary Franks, and other barbarians, whom he had employed in his army, fled to London, and plundered it, thinking to get away to ſea, with their booty.---But being met by a part of the Roman fleet, they loſt all their plunder, and many of them their lives. Soon after Diocleſian reſigned the imperial diadem; when the government of the weſtern provinces, including Britain, fell to [*] Conſtantius, who, in A. D. 307 died at York, univerſally regretted, and left all his poſſeſſions and dignities to his ſon, who afterwards became celebrated in hiſtory by the title of Conſtantine the Great.

This monarch, who received the appellation of Great, not from having deſolated many provinces, or ſpilt oceans of blood, but for his ſingular humanity, and exemplary juſtice, made a new partition of the Roman Empire: namely, he divided the whole into four great military governments, viz. Italy, Gaul, Illyria, and the Eaſt. Theſe were called Præfectures, and the officers who governed them Præfects. Each of theſe was ſubdivided into fourteen provinces, ſo that Britain was one of the provinces belonging to the Prefect of Gaul, who governed it by deputy. Conſtantine died A. D. 345, and left the empire to his three ſons. Britain, with France and Spain, fell to the eldeſt, named Conſtantine, who, not contented with what was aſſigned him, invaded his brother Conſtans's territories, but was ſlain, after having reigned about three years. Conſtans now ſeized the whole of the weſtern empire, kept poſſeſſion of it nine years, and then fell by the treaſon of Magnentius. Conſtantius, the ſurviving brother, who reigned in the Eaſt, directed his whole force againſt Magnentius, and by giving him a total defeat in A. D. 340, became ſole poſſeſſor of the Eaſtern and Weſtern Empires [†].

Martinus was now ſent into Britain as deputy Prefect. On his arrival he was highly incenſed at the conduct of Paulus Catena, the Notary, whoſe cruelties and extortions had greatly oppreſſed the people. This perſon being employed to ſequeſter the eſtates and effects of thoſe who had favoured the treaſon of Magnentius, took that opportunity to enrich himſelf by confiſcating the fortunes of many innocent people. Martinus not having it in his power to diſplace Paulus, who was protected by the emperor, thought it neceſſary to expoſtulate with him. This excited Paulus to accuſe the deputy Prefect of high treaſon, who was ſo much exaſperated at his audacity that he attempted to kill Paulus, but miſſing his aim he ſlew himſelf. From the death of Conſtantius to the reign of Valentinian the firſt, nothing ſtands on record relative to Britain that is worth preſervation. But during that emperor's reign the Britons were in a deplorable ſituation, invaded from abroad by the Franks and Saxons, and ravaged at home by the Scots and Picts; the ſea-coaſts and interior parts of the country were equally diſtreſſed. The emperor having in vain diſpatched Severus and Jovinus at once to ſuppreſs the inſurgents and repel the invaders, he at length ſent over Theodoſius, father to the firſt emperor of that name. This able commander, at the head of a body of ſelect troops, reinforced by ſeveral Herulian and Batavian bands, ſoon put a ſtop to the diſorders complained of. He routed both foreign and domeſtic enemies, retook the plunder and priſoners, reſtored their effects to the ſeveral owners, reſerving only a ſmall proportionate part to reward his troops, and then entered London in triumph, in the year 366. To ſettle affairs upon the moſt amicable foundation, he afterwards publiſhed a general amneſty, which induced many to ſubmit.

Commotions, however, ſtill ſubſiſted in the north, which cauſed Theodoſius to ſend for Dulcitius and Civilis, the former celebrated for his great military talents, and the latter for his prudence and integrity. Being both arrived, he made the firſt duke of Britain and guardian of the ſea coaſts, and the laſt vicar of the iſland. By this prudent arrangement, foreign invaſions and domeſtic inſurrections were prevented, the fortreſſes rebuilt, the garriſons better regulated, and the Roman boundaries to the northward enlarged. The country newly taken in, he called [‡] Valentia in honour of the emperor, and the city of London he ordered to be called Auguſta. At length, Theodoſius returned to Rome, beloved by the Britons, applauded by the Romans, admired by neutral nations, and even revered by his enemies.

At the death of Valentinian, the empire of the weſt fell to his eldeſt ſon Gratian, who choſe Theodoſius the younger to be his aſſociate. This preference ſo greatly exaſperated Maximus the governor of Britain, who himſelf aſpired to that honour, that he aſſumed the purple, and having corrupted the troops, was ſaluted emperor. To compleat his ambitious views, he drew the Roman forces from Britain, and beſides theſe engaged the flower of the Britiſh youths to join his army and paſs with him to the continent. The iſland being thus left defenceleſs, the Scots and Picts did not fail to take an advantage of ſo favourable an opportunity, but entered the Roman provinces with fire and ſword, plundering wherever they came, and committing the moſt horrid depredations. In the mean time, Maximus defeated Gratian, and then advanced towards Theodoſius, who was marching to the aſſiſtance of the emperor. But his good fortune now forſook him, for he was routed and put to death by Theodoſius. The Britons, who accompanied him to Gaul, did not return to their own country, but retreated to Armorica, now Bretagne in France; and the inhabitants of that province, from theſe and ſome others of their countrymen, who ſince ſettled there, are to this day called Britons.

This formidable revolt being thus ſuppreſſed, Chryſanthus, the ſon of Marcian, biſhop of Conſtantinople, was made vicar of Britain, by Theodoſius, who now reigned as emperor. This officer diſcharged his duty with great reputation to himſelf, and, in a principal meaſure, ſuppreſſed the northern inſurrections.

[*] Some hiſtorians affirm, that the emperor Conſtantius, who came to Britain in 289, married Helena daughter to Coilus, duke of Colcheſter and ſoon after that ſhe bore him a ſon, afterwards Conſtantine the Great, who was born in London, which city that empreſs firſt walled round.

[†] Britain itſelf was divided by this emperor into three parts, viz. 1. Britannia Prima, or all the country on the ſouth ſide of the Thames. 2. Britannia Secunda, or all the country weſt of the Severn to the Iriſh Sea, and, 3. Maxima Cæſarienſis, or all the country eaſt of the Severn, and north of the Thames.

[‡] It is to be obſerved that Britain now conſiſted of five diſtinct Roman provinces, viz. Britannia Prima, to the ſouth. Britannia Secunda, to the weſt. Flavia Cæſarienſis, to the eaſt. Maxima Cæſarienſis, to the north. Valentia, beyond the wall of Severus.

In 393 Theodoſius died, and the empire was divided between his two ſons. The weſtern department was governed by Stilicho, during the minority of the young emperor Honorius; and Victorius, a man of a tyrannic, but enterpriſing ſpirit, was made vicar of Britain.

We now come to the period, when the Roman empire began rapidly to decline, by the prodigious irruptions of the Vandals into Spain, the Alans into Portugal, and the Goths into Italy. The Roman forces being recalled from the remoter provinces to defend the center of the empire, Britain was again left defenceleſs, and their northern neighbours, as uſual, took the advantage of ſuch a favourable criſis, by making inroads into the ſouthern provinces. This they could do with impunity, as the Britons had been for ſome time ſunk into luxury and ſloth, drained of the flower of thoſe who were able to bear arms to reinforce the Roman army, and loſt to the noble ſpirit of liberty, by long ſervitude. The Britons dreaded their barbarous neighbours more than their late maſters the Romans, and therefore implored the latter to ſend them ſome aſſiſtance in their diſtreſs. A legion was accordingly ſent to their relief, A. D. 420, and another in 421, when the Romans having driven the Scots and Picts, as uſual, into the highlands of Scotland, their commander Gallio informed the Britons that he could now only recommend them to the protection of providence, as he was obliged to withdraw the troops from Britain, to defend Rome itſelf againſt the vaſt inundations of northern barbarians that threatened that miſtreſs of the world with deſtruction. Having exhorted them to act with unanimity, and defend their lives and properties with ſpirit, he paſſed over to Gaul with all his forces. And thus was Britain evacuated, and totally abandoned by the Romans, in the year 447, about 463 years from their firſt invading it under the conduct of Julius Cæſar, 367 after they got poſſeſſion of it under Claudius, and 326 after the full conqueſt of it by Agricola, in the reign of Domitian.

SECT. IV.

The State of Britain under the Romans.

FROM the Notitia of the Roman empire, which was publiſhed about the year 410, the following particulars are obtained.

Britain, one of the dioceſes appertaining to the diſtrict of the Præfectus Prætoria of Gaul, was under the juriſdiction of a governor, or vicar. The enſigns of this officer were a book of mandates, ſhut, covered with green, and marked on the back with five caſtles, repreſenting the five Britiſh provinces, with their names ſeverally inſcribed.

According to the number of provinces, he had five magiſtrates under his command, two being conſulars, and three preſidents. The conſulars, as officers ſubordinate to the vicar or governor general, ruled Valentia and Maxima Cæſarienſis, and the preſidents preſided over Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, and Flavia Cæſarienſis. Subordinate to theſe five great officers were many of inferior rank, to aſſiſt them in the adminiſtration of the civil government.

The military government of Britain was under the ſuperintendance of three principal officers, the Comes Britanniarum, the Comes Littoris Saxonici, and the Dux Britanniarum. The firſt had the command of the troops and garriſons in the interior parts of the iſland, and the two latter of the eaſtern and northern coaſts. The chief of the three was the Comes or Count of Britain, who had under his command 3000 foot and 600 horſe; the Comes or Count of the Saxon ſhore acted as admiral of the coaſt, and had nine maritime garriſons under his command, which together formed a body of 2200 foot, and 200 horſe. The Dux or Duke of Britain commanded in the north, and had fourteen garriſons to ſuperintend, which contained a body of 6000 foot, 300 horſe, and 23 military ſtations on the Picts wall, man'd by 8000 foot, and 600 horſe; ſo that the eſtabliſhed military force of the Romans in Britain was 19200 infantry, and 1700 cavalry.

All the forces in Britain were either diſpoſed of in garriſons on the ſea coaſts, or northern frontiers, as above mentioned, or encamped in the interior parts of the kingdoms, at Gogmagog Hills in Cambrigeſhire, and other places.

To facilitate the communication of the troops in the different parts of the kingdom, and render the intercourſe of the people more eaſy and agreeable, the ſoldiers were employed in peaceable times in forming public highways. Theſe were extenſive and grand, as well as uſeful, and their remains are ſtill the ſubject of admiration to the curious. By the Romans they were called the conſular, prætorian, regal and military ways; and afterwards by the Saxons, ſtradas, or ſtreets. They were many in number, but the four principal ones had the names of Via Vetelingiana, or Watling Street, Via Icenorium, or Ikenield Street, Erming Street, and Foſs-way. Two of theſe extended the whole length of the kingdom, and the other two the breadth from ſea to ſea. Theſe grand ways had various privileges and conveniencies appertaining to them, ſuch as places of refuge from arreſts and other dangers, manſions of reſt for the repoſe of the weary, inns for the entertainment of travellers, and ſtationary houſes for the change of horſes and travelling chariots. Beſides the above, the Romans had erected twenty-eight noble cities, and a great number of caſtles, forts, towers, walls, locks, &c.

That chriſtianity was introduced into Britain in the time of the Romans is indiſputable, but the preciſe time has not been ſatisfactorily aſcertained. Not to enter into a ſcrutiny of the fabulous tales and ridiculous legends of the monkiſh writers, we can only ſay that their abſurd accounts have been juſtly exploded. Though the introducer and time of introduction are dubious, certain it is that chriſtianity had been ſucceſsfully propagated in Britain, previous to the reign of Dioceleſian, as the Britiſh chriſtians were included in the perſecutions ſet on foot by that emperor, and many of them ſuffered martyrdom upon that account, the principal of whom was St. Alban.

In 314 three Britiſh biſhops attended the council of Arles in France.---In 325 the ſame number attended the council of Nice, and in 359 three more attended the council of Ariminium. The ſtory of the converſion of king Lucius is replete with ſo many monkiſh abſurdities, that very little credit can be given to any part of it, and the whole has been doubted by the beſt hiſtorians, and moſt learned divines. We can, however affirm, that chriſtianity was very early planted in this iſland, and that the chriſtian church in Britain was originally independent of the church of Rome.

BOOK III.

From the Introduction of the Saxons, to the Firſt Foundation of the Engliſh Monarchy.

SECTION I.

From the Arrival of the Saxons in Britain, to the Eſtabliſhment of the Heptarchy.

THE ſouthern parts of Britain being in the weak and defenceleſs ſtate already deſcribed, the northern barbarians attacked the wall, A. D. 447, and met but little oppoſition from the few troops who were appointed to defend it. Theſe having been depreſſed by ſervitude, and now loſing the laſt gleam of hope in the moſt pungent ſorrow for their lamentable ſituation, ſuffered their ſpirits to ſink within them, and in the hour of exigence gave that time to deſpondency which ſhould have been employed in defence. A breach was made, the Barbarians entered, the Britons fled, and a dreadful ſlaughter enſued. The fugitives made the beſt of their way ſouthward, while the Picts and Scots followed, and ſpread deſolation around as they went, marking their paths with blood, and leaving every where behind them veſtiges of the moſt dreadful devaſtations.

This inundation of ſavage enemies was not the only thing that diſtreſſed the Britons---a famine raged and added to their accumulated miſeries. The horrors of inſatiate hunger kept pace with the dreadful ravages of war, and both contributed to render their ſorrows as excruciating as they were unavailing. The fugitive Britons plunged in deſpair, and preſſed by the calls of hunger, attempted to take by force from the inhabitants of the ſouthern provinces, what their own neceſſities, occaſioned by the prevailing dearth, rendered them unwilling to give; equally unſocial from the experience of want, and dread of want, they became enemies to each other, and the moſt horrid domeſtic broils enſued at the time there was the greateſt call for mutual harmony. Inſtead of uniting to repel the invaders, they aſſailed each other, and ſpent that ſpirit in revenge, which might have been uſeful in their defence.

At length ſome of the Britons, wiſer than the reſt, perſuaded many of their countrymen to ſuffer quarrels to ſubſide for the benefit of the community, and prevailed upon a great number to conciliate their minds for the public ſafety. Though policy more than affection might cement their friendſhip upon this occaſion, yet their union was eſſentially ſerviceable, which evinces that unanimity is the guardian angel of ſtates as well as private families. The confederated Britons were concealed by the woods from their enemies, and made excurſions as opportunity offered. The Picts and Scots being greatly haraſſed by theſe ſallies at a time they little expected them, thought proper to retreat again to the north, and for ſome time did not chuſe to make any depredations upon the Britons, except near the borders.

During theſe troubles in the ſtate, ſome dangerous diviſions happened in the church. Theſe were occaſioned by Agricola, a diſciple of Pelagius, who induſtriouſly propagated the errors of Pelagianiſm; but Germanicus, biſhop of Auxerre, and Lupus, biſhop of Triers, in Gaul, being called in, a diſputation was held at Verulam, now St. Albans, and the pernicious doctrines of that monk being pointed out, the people were convinced of their folly, in giving ear to him, and returned again to the doctrines of the Britiſh church.

The Britons, being freed from their enemies, applied themſelves to the cultivation of the land, till famine fled before induſtry, and agriculture repleniſhed the exhauſted granaries; bleſſed by the bounties of returning plenty, and cheared by the ſmiles of long loſt freedom, the Britons had now the faireſt opportunity of becoming at once happy and formidable; but emerging from the moſt abject ſtate of miſery, they were not capable of bearing proſperity with temper. The public good was ſacrificed to private gratifications, and the intemperance of individuals proved eſſentially injurious to the ſtate. In proportion as they loſt their fears, the people grew fond of pleaſures, and becoming the ſlaves of luxury, were incapacitated from every noble exertion. Their vices were in proportion to their diſſipation, till, ſays Gildas, “evil was called good, and good evil. To be lewd, was honourable; to be virtuous, diſgraceful; being blind themſelves, they became haters of the light, and the meaſures of their actions were what was moſt pleaſing to their inclinations. All things were tranſacted directly contrary to the public welfare and ſafety, not only of the laity, but alſo the clergy, and thoſe who ſhould have been examples of virtue, often proved the ringleaders of vice.” After enumerating many of their vices, he continues, “Thus wretchedly qualified, both prieſts and people reſolved to chuſe ſeveral kings of their own; but kings were anointed, not according to divine approbation, but by the voices and ſuffrages of ſuch as were more cruel than others, and again, as ſuddenly depoſed and murdered by their electors, in order to ſet up others more fierce and tyrannical; but if any of their princes appeared milder, and more inclinable to good council, the hatred of all men was levelled againſt him, as the ſubverter of his country.”

During theſe domeſtic diſtractions, Pelagianiſm again revived; the aſſiſtance of Germanicus was once more ſolicited, who, coming into Britain, reſtored tranquillity as before, and was inſtrumental in repreſſing many vices that were too prevalent, to the great detriment of ſociety. But this worthy prelate was no ſooner departed than the Britons relapſed again into their immoralities, and became as notoriouſly vicious as ever.

The country had been greatly thinned by the ſword and famine, but now another calamity threatened its total depopulation. This was a dreadful plague, which raged ſo furiouſly, and ſwept away ſuch multitudes, that the living were ſcarce ſufficient to bury the dead. The peſtilence had no ſooner ſubſided, than the Scots and Picts, gueſſing at the weakneſs of the nation from the reports they had received of the ravages, occaſioned by the diſorder, made an irruption into South Britain, and penetrated as far as Stamford, in Lincolnſhire.

At this time the Britons thought proper to place the command ſolely in the hands of one of their princes, when Vortigern, king of Devonſhire and Cornwall, being the moſt potent, was choſen generaliſſimo. This prince had neither wiſdom in council, nor experience in war; he was haughty, inſolent, and a perfect ſlave to his paſſions; in ſuch an improper perſon did the unhappy Britons put their confidence, at a time when the moſt conſummate wiſdom, and intrepid conduct were neceſſary to ſave them from deſtruction. Vortigern, not having ſpirit ſufficient to march againſt the foe with the confederated forces under his command, made the propoſal in a convention of the Britiſh princes, to invite the Saxons to their aſſiſtance. This fatal propoſition was ſeconded by the creatures of Vortigern, aſſented to by the delegates of the people, and at length generally embraced. Solicitous for their own ruin, the infatuated Britons ſent am embaſſy to the Saxons, and gave a friendly invitation to the very people who were deſtined to drive them from their habitations, and poſſeſs themſelves of the moſt deſirable parts of this devoted land.

The [*] Saxons gladly accepted this invitation, and about 1500 of their troops being ſelected by lot, ſet ſail under the conduct of Hengiſt and Horſa, two brothers, and ſoon arrived in the iſle of Thanet, in Kent. This iſland, which is about ten miles long, and ſeven broad, was aſſigned them for their habitation by Vortigern, and conſequently was the firſt piece of land the Saxons ever poſſeſſed in Britain. Vortigern met them there, when it was ſtipulated, that they ſhould defend the Britons from the incurſions of their enemies, for which, beſides the portion of land aſſigned, they were to be bountifully fed, and liberally paid. Thus did the deluded Britons, in the year 449, introduce into, and entail part of, their country upon a number of warlike ſtrangers.

With his own forces and theſe new auxiliaries, Vortigern marched againſt the invaders, who were defeated in repeated engagements, by the valour and diſcipline of the Saxons. Theſe frequent checks ſo diſpirited the Scots and Picts, that they dreaded the very name of the Saxons, and by the year 452 were entirely expelled from South Britain, and even driven up to the mountains in the northern boundaries of Scotland.

But the Saxons becoming pretty well acquainted with the country from their expeditions to its different parts, and their various marches through it, they beheld its beauty, verdure and fertility, with an eye of deſire; and obſerving at the ſame time, that the Britons were enervated by luxury, ſunk in vice, and loſt to thoſe noble ſentiments which alone can inſpire courage, their ambition was awakened to the idea of ruling thoſe they came to defend, and enſlaving a people they had been employed to protect.

Fraught with theſe views, Hengiſt artfully perſuaded the weak and infatuated Vortigern to make a more general invitation to his countrymen, that the land might be better cultivated. To give the greater force to this propoſition, he pretended that the Saxons were particularly ſkilled in huſbandry, and, conſequently, that the ſoil would be conſiderably improved, and the Britons initiated in a ſuperior kind of agriculture at the ſame time. The king conſented to every thing that was deſired; a ſecond invitation was ſent to Saxony, and a fleet of ſeventeen ſail brought over a prodigious number of Saxons, Jutes, and Angles. And with theſe came Rowena, the daughter of Hengiſt, a lady of incomparable beauty, who was afterwards eſſentially ſerviceable to the Saxons in their political deſigns.

The crafty leader of the Saxons now invited Vortigern to a ſumptuous entertainment, at which he took care that his daughter ſhould wait upon the king. Vortigern no ſooner beheld the luſtre of her charms, than he became the ſlave of their attractions, and though he already had a conſort, demanded her in marriage. Hengiſt artfully pretended to confeſs the inferiority of his daughter, and to decline ſo great an honour. The king, inflamed by a repulſe, became frantic with deſire, and appeared willing to ſacrifice every thing to the gratification of his paſſions. Hengiſt, taking advantage of this diſpoſition, ſtipulated that the whole county of Kent ſhould be ceded to him, and that the king ſhould divorce his queen, and make Rowena his ſole conſort. The infatuated Vortigern conſented to all that was demanded, Kent was given up without heſitation, his princeſs was cruelly divorced, though ſhe had borne him many children, and he attached himſelf entirely to his new conſort, who ſoon gained ſuch an aſcendency over him, that he could refuſe her nothing.

Having ſucceeded thus far, Hengiſt eaſily perceived, that by his daughter's influence, he could make Vortigern his tool whenever he thought proper. Determined, therefore, to ſtrike his ultimate ſtroke of policy, he propoſed that another body of his countrymen ſhould be ſent for, who by inhabiting Northumberland, and the adjacent parts, would be a local defence to the northern borders. To this Vortigern, as uſual, conſented, without giving himſelf the leaſt trouble to reflect on the conſequences. A third embarkation took place; forty ſail of ſhips ſoon appeared on the Britiſh coaſts, and the northern countries began to ſwarm with ſtrangers, as the ſouthern parts had for ſome time already done.

The Saxons now thought proper to throw off the maſk, and avow their intentions. They began by the demand of a larger ſum of money, and a greater quantity of proviſions than what they were entitled to by the original ſtipulations, that thoſe who came recently might be as well provided for as their brethren who firſt landed. This unreaſonable requeſt was of courſe refuſed by the Britons in general. The refuſal was what the Saxons expected, and indeed wiſhed for, as it gave them the ſhadow of a pretence to commence hoſtilities, by pretending to pay themſelves, and take by force what they affirmed was unjuſtly withheld from them.

The unhappy Britons now clearly perceived their own folly, and the deſigns of the Saxons, and determined, when it was too late, to take up arms in their defence; a convention was accordingly ſummoned, and the conduct of Vortigern ſeverely reprehended. The infatuated monarch, not being deemed capable of truſt, was made only the nominal commander, while his ſon Vortimer, under the ſanction of an aſſociate, received the inveſtiture of the ſole power. Many engagements were fought with various ſucceſs, but the times when, the places where, and the event of each, are ſo differently related, and intermixed with ſo many dubious and fabulous articles, that we ſhall omit a circumſtantial detail of ſuch uncertain occurrences. In this, however, all authors agree, that the Saxons were in general ſucceſsful, and affairs at length terminated in their favour, by the total ſubjugation of that part of Britain, now called England, which they divided into ſeven kingdoms.—A diviſion mentioned by all writers under the name of the SAXON HEPTARCHY.

[*] The Saxons were a fierce, barbarous people, who pouring down from the north, under the direction of a famous leader, named Woden, had poſſeſſed themſelves of the principal countries on the borders of the Baltic. They employed themſelves principally at firſt, in committing piracies on the ſea coaſts of Germany, between the Rhine and the Elbe, and on the coaſts of the Cimbrian Cherſoneſa, now Denmark; but at length extending their plan, they carried their depredations to the coaſts of Gaul, Britain, &c. The name of Saxons they received from the Gothic word SEAX, a word that implies a ſhort, crooked, or hooked ſword, which they wore as their principal weapon, and for the dexterous uſe of which they were celebrated.

The Saxon Heptarchy.

THE Saxons having over-run all that part of the iſland called South Britain, formed themſelves into ſeven diſtinct kingdoms at different periods, the Britons being either driven up into the mountains of Wales, obliged to fly to the continent, or compelled to ſubmit to the conquerors. 1. The Kingdom of KENT.

THE Britons made various attempts to drive the Saxons from Kent, and at length, in the year 457, came to a deciſive engagement at Crecanford. The battle was bloody, and obſtinately fought, but victory declared againſt the Britons, who were totally defeated with the loſs of 4000 men. From the date of this victory, hiſtorians conſider Kent as a kingdom, Hengiſt being prompted by his ſucceſs to aſſume the title of king. This occurrence took place eight years after his arrival in the iſland, and he reigned thirty-one years ſubſequent to his aſſumption of the regal authority. Hengiſt now determined, if poſſible, to poſſeſs himſelf of the perſon of Vortigern, which deſign he effected by the following ſtratagem. Ambaſſadors were ſent by the treacherous Saxons to negotiate a peace, and make propoſals for the renewal of the former amity, which ſubſiſted between them and the Britons. Theſe ſpecious advances were cordially received by Vortigern, who readily agreed to compromiſe matters at a public entertainment,* to which he was weak enough to go with his nobility unarmed, and conſequently unprepared againſt any danger which might occur. The Saxons had concealed their weapons beneath their garments, and at a certain ſignal, ſuddenly fell upon the unarmed Britons, maſſacred three hundred of them, and took Vortigern priſoner. To purchaſe the releaſe of the unhappy monarch, the Britons were obliged to give up Eſſex, Middleſex, and Suſſex. This acceſſion of territory rendered Hengiſt extremely formidable, confirmed him in his new kingdom of Kent, and gave the Saxons ſuch a firm eſtabliſhment in the iſland, that the Britons were never after able to expel them.

After the death of Hengiſt, the kingdom of Kent declined under his three immediate ſucceſſors, Eſk, Otta, and Immeric; but Ethelbert coming to the crown, reſtored its ſplendor and encreaſed its extent.

† Ethelbert was on his acceſſion to the the throne, informed that Ceaulin, king of the Weſt Saxons pretended to a regal ſuperiority, and affected to claim the honour of being the principal monarch in England; this dignity, as it originally belonged to Kent, he determined to diſpute with the Weſt Saxon king by force of arms. To effect his purpoſe, he had art enough to perſuade the other Saxon kings to join in a league againſt Ceaulin, by inſinuating that he aimed at univerſal monarchy. Being made general of the confederacy, he attacked Ceaulin, when that monarch was defeated and ſlain. Fluſhed with this ſucceſs, he did not attempt to diſguiſe his ſentiments, but gave the confederate kings to underſtand, that his own views were preciſely the ſame as thoſe with which he had taxed the deceaſed Weſt Saxon monarch. To ſtrengthen his intereſt, he made an alliance with the king of Paris, married his daughter Bertha, and then ſeized on all the provinces north of the Humber, Northumbria excepted; he was the firſt Engliſh king who framed a regular body of laws, and having reigned fifty-two years, he died in 616, when the crown devolved to his ſon Eadbald.

This prince was a profligate at the commencement, a tyrant in the courſe, and a penitent at the concluſion of his reign. He died A. D. 640, and was ſucceeded by Ercombert, who mounted the throne to the excluſion of his elder brother. On his death, which happened four years after his eldeſt ſon, Egbert ſucceeded him. This prince put to death all his male couſins, leſt they ſhould claim the crown, and then gave their ſiſter an eſtate in the iſle of Thanet, that ſhe might erect a monaſtery thereon, where prayers were to be continually ſaid for the repoſe of her brothers ſouls, and for the expiation of their murderer's crime. But as he had excluded his uncle's children from their right, his own, on his deceaſe, ſuffered the ſame injuſtice from their uncle; for his brother Lothaire ſeized the crown in prejudice to the iſſue of Egbert, to whom he had been left guardian.

Lothaire began his reign, A. D. 673, and thought to entail the ſucceſſion on his own family, by aſſociating his ſon Richard in the government with himſelf. Edric his nephew, however, took refuge among the South Saxons, and perſuaded their monarch to aſſiſt him againſt the uſurper. In conſequence of which Lothaire was defeated and ſlain, and Edric mounted the throne; but dying two years afterwards without iſſue, his brother Withred ſucceeded him. This prince made Swabert, (the head of a faction againſt him) copartner with him in the throne, by which prudent method he converted a foe into a friend, and put an end to a dangerous inſurrection without bloodſhed. Swabert ruled in conjunction with Withred for the ſpace of four years, when dying, the ſole authority again devolved on the latter, who governed the kingdom twelve years after, with great reputation to himſelf. On his demiſe, which happened A. D. 725, he was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon Edbert, who reigned in tranquillity twenty years. Ethelbert, and his ſon Ardulph followed; and Aldric, who ſucceeded, was the laſt prince lineally deſcended from Hengiſt the firſt founder of the monarchy. The kingdom of Kent now became tributary to the kings of Mercia, and ſo remained till it was conquered by Egbert the Great.

* This entertainment was held on Saliſbury Plain, and that pile of ſtones, called Stonehenge, is ſuppoſed by ſome to have been erected by Aurelius Ambroſius, in commemoration of that tranſaction.

† Ethelbert built the old cathedral church of St. Paul, London, on a ſpot where a temple dedicated to Diana once ſtood, and Melitus was its firſt biſhop.

2. The Kingdom of the SOUTH SAXONS.

THIS kingdom was the leaſt conſiderable of any of the Heptarchy; the city of Chicheſter, built by Ciſſa, was the only place of any importance in it. Ella, who founded this kingdom in A. D. 491, reigned twenty three years, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Ciſſa, who was remarkable only for his great age, reigning 76 years, and being 116 when he died. But not leaving any children behind him the kingdom was ſeized by Ceaulin king of the Weſt Saxons.

3. The Kingdom of the WEST SAXONS.

THIS kingdom was founded by Cerdic, who arrived in England in the year 495. Cerdic was certainly a man of conſiderable abilities, and a very able warrior. The brave Britiſh king Arthur oppoſed him in vain, he ſurmounted all oppoſition, and eſtabliſhed the kingdom of the South Saxons in 519. After the death of Arthur, he reigned in tranquillity till the year 534, when he died and was ſucceeded by his ſon Cynric, who reigned only four years. The crown then devolved to Ceaulin, the ſon of Cynric, who was defeated and ſlain by Ethelbert, king of Kent. The conqueror placed Ceolric, the nephew of Ceaulin, upon the throne, whoſe reign was only remarkable for his paſſive acquieſcence in all the meaſures of Ethelbert. He died in 598, when his couſin Ceolwulf mounted the throne. This martial monarch defeated the South Saxons who had revolted, gave a check to the Picts and Scots, and ſupported his dignity with great glory till his death, which happened A. D. 611. His nephew Cinigils, who ſucceeded him, divided the kingdom with his brother Quincelm, and gave a great overthrow to the Britons in A. D. 614. Quincelm departed this life eight years before his brother, who died in the year 643, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Cenwall. This prince was exceeding vicious, and ſo unſteady in his temper, that he changed his religion, and repudiated his queen without the leaſt cauſe, and afterwards again embraced the former, and took back the latter through the meer inſtability of his diſpoſition. After having been expelled his kingdom, and again reſtored to it by the Mercian monarch, he died A. D. 672, and left the crown to his queen. Concerning this lady the relations of hiſtorians are very uncertain, ſo that it is impoſſible to aſcertain where or when ſhe died, or whether ſhe was expelled the kingdom by her ſubjects. A revolution, however, happened about this time, which laſted for ten years, and ended in a partition of the kingdom between three noblemen, viz. Cenſus, Eſcwin and Centwin. The latter reigned alone after the deceaſe of the two former, and on his demiſe the kingdom was ſeized by Ceadwalla. This prince, who was a man of a very enterprizing genius, defeated the South Saxons, plundered the kingdom of Kent, and conquered the iſland of Angleſea. Then making a journey to Rome in order to be chriſtened by the Pontiff himſelf, he was accordingly baptized by Pope Sergius II, and received the name of Peter. On his death he was ſucceeded by his kinſman Ina, a prince of the greateſt abilities, and moſt amiable character imaginable. In the firſt year of his reign the kingdom of the Eaſt Angles becoming vacant, thoſe people voluntarily offered him the crown, and ſolicited him to rule over them; an inconteſtible proof of the general eſteem in which his character was held. Being firmly eſtabliſhed in his extenſive dominions, he turned his whole attention to the formation of a code of ſalutary laws, which appear as ſupplementary to thoſe of Ethelbert, and the groundwork of thoſe afterwards inſtituted by Alfred the Great. He then defeated the Britons, ſubdued the Mercians, and made a conqueſt of the country of the South Saxons. Having arrived to the ſummit of glory, his queen and himſelf both determined to quit a ſplendid for a recluſe life. Accordingly, A. D. 727, he quitted his crown for a cloiſter, by turning monk, and his royal conſort retired to the monaſtery of Barking, where ſhe ended her days. It was Ina that eſtabliſhed the celebrated tax known by the name of Peter's Pence. This ſubſidy was originally intended as a fund of charity to maintain Engliſh ſtudents at Rome; but in proceſs of time the Popes thought proper to demand it as a matter of right for the enrichment of their own coffers.

After the abdication of Ina, the crown was placed on the head of his kinſman Ethelhard, on whoſe death A. D. 743, Cuthred ſucceeded to the regal authority. This prince was victorious over the Mercians, and annexed part of Cornwall to his dominions. His death happened A. D. 754, when his nephew Sigebert mounted the throne. This monarch was depoſed by Kenewulf, and afterwards ſlain by a ſwine herd. But Cunehard, the brother of the depoſed monarch, way-laid and ſlew the uſurper near Merton in Surry, where he uſed to viſit a lady privately. But the friends of Kenewulf revenged his death by diſpatching the murderer and all his accomplices.

Brithric, the ſon of Kenewulf, A. D. 754, was elected to the throne by the unanimous voice of the people. This monarch was extremely jealous of Egbert, a prince of the blood royal, whoſe abilities and popularity filled him with continual apprehenſions; while on the other hand Egbert, not thinking himſelf ſafe in the dominions of a profeſſed enemy, withdrew to France, where he firſt projected the grand deſign which he afterwards ſucceſsfully executed, viz. the uniting the kingdoms of the Heptarchy into one monarchy.

In 787 the Danes made their firſt deſcent upon the coaſt of Britain, landing a body of men from three ſhips at Portland, but they were defeated with great ſlaughter by the country people, and obliged to retreat to their veſſels with the utmoſt precipitation. Brithric reigned in peace till A. D. 799, when he was poiſoned by his queen Edburga, who fled to France, whither the judgement of Heaven purſued her, as ſhe wandered about in diſtreſs, and afterwards periſhed through mere want.

4. The Kingdom of the EAST SAXONS.

ERKENWIN, who traced his deſcent from Woden, founded this kingdom in A. D. 527. It is ſingular, that though this prince reigned above ſixty years, yet nothing remarkable occured in his reign. The reign of his ſon Sledda, who ſucceeded him in A. D. 587, was equally barren of events. *Sebert mounted the throne after the death of his father Sledda, A. D. 596, and embraced the chriſtian religion gion ſoon after at the inſtigation of his uncle Ethelbert. On his deceaſe his three ſons, Saxred, Siward, and Sigebert, reigned in conjunction. They renounced chriſtianity, and were all three ſlain in a battle againſt the Weſt Saxons. Sigebert the Little reigned after them, and was himſelf ſucceeded by Sigebert the Good, who again reſtored the chriſtian religion throughout his dominions. He was, however, murdered in A. D. 622.

Nothing remarkable occurred in this kingdom during the reigns of the few ſucceeding princes, till it was ſeized by Egbert the Great, which happened in the reign of its laſt king Swithred.

5. The Kingdom of NORTHUMBERLAND.

IDA founded this kingdom A. D. 547, and his two ſons Adda and Alla divided it between them after his death, the former reigning over that part called Bernicia, and the latter over that which went by the name of Deira. Of the five kings who ſucceſſively mounted the throne after Adda and Alla, nothing remarkable is recorded. At length Ethelfrid, a man of an enterprizing genius, uſurped the throne. He was ſucceſsful in many engagements againſt the Picts and Scots, but rather unfortunate in an expedition he undertook againſt the Britons, and at length was defeated and ſlain by the Eaſt Angles.

Edwin who ſucceeded to the throne, obliged the Britons to pay a tribute to him, and afterwards aimed at univerſal monarchy by attempting the diſſolution of the Heptarchy. This ambitious deſign rouzed the jealouſy of the other kings, who formed a powerful confederacy againſt him, and were even joined by the Britons. Edwin engaged their united forces at Hatfield in the Weſt Riding of Yorkſhire, but was defeated and ſlain on the 12th of October, A. D. 633. The Northumbrians made ſome brave attempts to free themſelves from the cruelty and oppreſſion of the conquerors, without ſucceſs; at length they were repelled in 634 by Oſwald the ſon of Ethelfrid, who thereupon aſſumed the regal authority. But in 642 Oſwald was defeated and ſlain by the Mercians. And from this time the kingdom of Northumberland was in continual anarchy and confuſion, till Egbert the Great reduced it with the other kingdoms of the Heptarchy.

6. The Kingdom of the EAST ANGLES.

THE Angles, who came to England under the conduct of twelve leaders, having eſtabliſhed themſelves in the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridgeſhire, with the iſle of Ely, at length formed themſelves into a diſtinct kingdom in 575; and Uffa took upon himſelf the regal title and authority. But dying three years after his ſon Tityſt ſucceeded him. On the demiſe of Tityſt the kingdom devolved to Redwald king of Northumberland. Erpwald his ſon ſucceeded him in the kingdom of Eaſt Anglia only; but being a very weak and wicked prince, he was deſpiſed by his ſubjects, and reigned only as a kind of ſubſtitute to Edwin, king of Northumberland. Erpwald embracing the chriſtian religion, was aſſaſſinated by Rubbert, a furious pagan zealot, who uſurped the throne, and during his ſhort reign of three years extirpated chriſtianity from the kingdom; but his ſucceſſor Sigebert, who began his reign in 636, reſtored it again, and by the aſſiſtance of Furceus an Iriſh Monk, and Felix a prieſt of Burgundy propagated it to the utmoſt extent of his power. Having made eccleſiaſtical appointments, erected public ſchools, and eſtabliſhed tranquillity throughout his dominions, he with great humility reſigned his crown to Egric his kinſman, and entered into a monaſtery, in order to paſs the remainder of his days in religious retirement. Penda, king of the Mercians, attacking the territories of the Eaſt Angles, Sigebert was ſtrongly ſolicited to emerge from the convent, in order to take upon him the command of the army. He yielded to the preſſing inſtances of his ſubjects with reluctance, and left his peaceful ſolitude with regret. Putting himſelf at the head of the troops he engaged the Mercians, but after an obſtinate conteſt was defeated and ſlain, together with his kinſman Egric.

Annas, a prince of the blood royal, who ſucceeded Egric, received a great overthrow, and loſt his life in another battle with the Mercians.

Ethelbert, the brother to the laſt monarch, mounted the throne, A. D. 654, and being a very weak and timid prince, made a ſcandalous alliance with the bloody enemy of his country, Penda, king of Mercia. Joining his forces with thoſe of Penda, they agreed in conjunction to invade the kingdom of Northumberland, but they were both defeated and ſlain by the Northumbrians.

No particulars worthy of recital are mentioned by hiſtorians, concerning the reigns of the ſucceeding kings of the Eaſt Angles, except of Ethelbert, the laſt monarch of this country. They were named Ethelwald, Eardulph, Ealphwald, Bearna, Ethelred, and Ethelbert. The latter began this reign in 749, and gained the reſpect and love of his ſubjects, by his piety, learning, and juſtice. He was, however, treacherouſly aſſaſſinated by Offa, king of the Mercians, who annexed the dominions of the murdered monarch to his own.

7. The Kingdom of the MERCIANS.

CRidda, who likewiſe could trace his deſcent from Woden, founded this kingdom A. D. 582, but died in the ſecond year of his reign, when Ethelbert, king of Kent, ſeized it in the right of conſanguinity, and placed Webba, the ſon of Cridda upon the throne as his vaſſal. Webba reigned nineteen years, and bequeathed the crown to his ſon Penda; but Ethelbert thought proper to prevent him from mounting the throne, by ſeating his own couſin Cheorl upon it A. D. 614. At the expiration of ten years Cheorl died, and Penda was at length ſuffered peaceably to aſſume the reins of government. He was an inveterate enemy to the chriſtians, but loſing his life in a battle againſt the Northumbrians A. D. 655, his ſon Peada, who was a chriſtian in his heart, ſucceeded to ſome of his dominions; for Oſwy, the conquering monarch of Northumberland, had ſeized a part, and on the death of Peada, in 657, took poſſeſſion of the whole.

Wulpha, the ſon of Penda, however, drove the uſurper from his dominions, and aſſumed the reins of government. This prince poſſeſſed great abilities, but being of a reſtleſs and ambitious temper, was perpetually quarrelling with his neighbours. Dying A. D. 675, his ſon Kenred ſucceeded him, but was ſoon after depoſed by Ethelred his uncle. The latter in A. D. 676 made war upon the king of Kent with ſucceſs; but in 679 was defeated by the Northumbrians.

In A. D. 697 the kingdom of Mercia was divided into five provinces, viz. Hereford, Leiceſter, Lindſay, Litchfield, and Worceſter, and the ſame year the queen was murdered by a faction, of which execrable deed Ethelred took ſo little notice, that he was univerſally deemed the principal in that bloody tranſaction.

In the year 704, Ethelred being ſeized with ſome qualms of conſcience, turned Monk, and having firſt reſtored the kingdom to his nephew Kenred, from whom he had unjuſtly taken it, retired to a monaſtery in order to have ſufficient leiſure to atone by a life of penitence for the crimes of uſurpation and murder.

Kendred, after having been depoſed by one uncle, was ſo little qualified for a public, and ſo enamoured of a private life, that in a ſhort time he voluntarily reſigned his crown to another uncle named Ceolred. This prince was the very contraſt of his nephew, and being of an active and enterprizing ſpirit, he maintained a bloody but undeciſive war, againſt the Weſt Saxons. But A. D. 716, he fell a ſacrifice to the malice of ſome Monks, who took him off by poiſon, for having always been an inveterate enemy to their order.

Ethelbald, who ſucceeded him, ſpent his whole life in contriving to quarrel with his neighbours: he was ſeverely puniſhed for his unſocial diſpoſition, firſt in ſuffering a defeat by Cuthred king of Weſſex; and finally in being murdered A. D. 755, by his own rebellious ſubjects.

Beornred, the principal inſurgent, mounted the throne, but the nobles ſoon deprived him of his ill acquired dignity, and ſeated the celebrated Offa, nephew to the murdered monarch in his place. This prince poſſeſſed an inſatiable thirſt for conqueſt, and centered all his happineſs in the glories which reſult from military atchievements. Stimulated by this diſpoſition, he ravaged the kingdom of Kent; ſlew its monarch with his own hand; ſubdued a people called the Haſtings; over-run the territories of the Weſt Saxon king, and rendered the Northumbrians tributary to him. By the interpoſition of Charlemagne, who had been ſolicited for that purpoſe, he made peace with the other Saxon kings; but to avoid inactivity, turned his arms againſt the Britons, and ſeized upon all the countries between the Severn and the Wye; then, as a check upon the Britons, he built the celebrated wall or fence, known by the name of Offa's Dyke.*

Offa now made his ſon Egfrid coadjutor with him in the government, gave his daughter Ethburga in marriage to the Weſt Saxon king Brithric, and repulſed the Danes who had invaded the kingdom with great ſlaughter. But though the ſplendor of his actions gave him a reputation ſuperior to what any of the kings of the Heptarchy had ever acquired, yet the murder of Ethelbert, king of the Eaſt Angles, eclipſed all the glories of his reign, and will ever brand his name with infamy. This crime hung ſo heavy upon his conſcience, that, agreeable to the ſuperſtition of the times, he made a pilgrimage to Rome, in order to get abſolution of the Pope. Here he again merited the reprobation of his people, for beſides confirming the payment of Peter's Pence, by changing it from a donation to a tribute, he agreed to an annual ſubſidy of 365 maricuſes, or rather a tax of a maricuſe a day, which amounted to 136l. 17s. 6d. the maricuſe being valued at 37 Saxon pence, or three half crowns of our preſent money.

Returning home, he founded the church and monaſtery of St. Alban, and having juſt compleated it, died at Offly, A. D. 796, having reigned thirty-nine years.

Egfrid ſucceeded for a ſhort ſpace as ſole monarch, but dying, was ſucceeded by Kenulph, who annexed the kingdom of Kent to his own dominions, and barbarouſly put out the eyes of Egbert Pren, the king of that country, whom he took priſoner. Kenulph was killed in a commotion raiſed by the Eaſt Angles A. D. 819, when the crown devolved to Kenelm, who was then only ſeven years of age. The royal infant was ſoon after murdered by his ambitious ſiſter Quendrida, who mounted the throne in his ſtead. This unnatural wretch was, however, depoſed by her own uncle Ceolwulf, who ſeized the reins of government into his own hands. Being driven from the throne by a faction, he was ſucceſſively ſucceeded by Beornulph, Ludican and Wiglaff, who reigned two years each, and were reſpectively defeated by Egbert, king of the Eaſt Angles, who afterwards obtained the name of Egbert the Great, and who, in A. D. 829, annexed it to his own dominions, as he had moſt of the other kingdoms, in purſuance of his plan, which was to reduce all the kingdoms of the Heptarchy under one ſole monarchy. This grand deſign put an end to any hopes which the Welch might conceive of, again breathing the air of freedom in the plains they antiently poſſeſſed. The diſſenſion of the Saxon kings, and their perpetual wars with each other, had long flattered their expectations, that the happy criſis would one day arrive, when they ſhould be able to extirpate the Saxon race, and regain their antient liberty; but Egbert's plan of a general union of the Saxons, baniſhed thoſe pleaſing ideas from their minds, and left them only the bitter reflection, that to their vices, they owed their miſeries; for as a learned and eminent divine juſtly ſays, in their misfortunes "may be obſerved the miſeries and deſolations brought by Divine Providence on a vile, and degenerate nation, driven, when nothing elſe could reform them, out of a fair and rich country, into a mountainous, and barren corner by ſtrangers and Pagans, ſo much more tolerable is downright infidelity in the eye of heaven, than the diſhonouring the chriſtian faith by ſuch unchriſtian works."

SECT. III.

The Eccleſiaſtical and Civil Hiſtory of the Saxons during the Heptarchy.

THE religion of the Saxons, previous to their converſion to chriſtianity, was the groſſeſt idolatry, and many of their notions were extravagantly abſurd. They had a great opinion of the preſcience to be obtained by caſting lots, were fond of augury and divination, and extremely addicted to judicial aſtrology in general. When they were on the eve of a war, they would order a captive of the nation with which they were at variance, if ſuch could be procured, to engage in ſingle combat with a champion of their own, and from the deciſion of the combat, pretended to predict the ſucceſs of the war itſelf. The very neighing of horſes furniſhed their ſuperſtition with matter to prognoſticate by, and many of thoſe noble animals were kept at the public expence as prophetical aſſiſtants to the prieſthood. But it is to obſerved, that the preſaging quadrupede was always of a white colour; for they imagined that black and ſorrel did not poſſeſs the powers of prediction.

* This Dyke, called by the Welch Claud Offa, was an intrenchment beginning at Bleachy, over againſt Auſt Paſſage, on the Severn, and extending ninety miles from the mouth of the Wye, to the mouth of the Dee. Harold made a law, that if any Welchman paſſed this Dyke, the king's officers ſhould cut off his right hand.

The Saxons had a variety of idols, the principal of which were the following:

1. The idol of the ſun, which was repreſented like a man half naked, holding a burning wheel cloſe to his breaſt with both his hands. The face reſembled the ſun. This image was placed in a temple, ſolemnly adored, publickly ſacrificed to, and had Sunday dedicated to it.

2. The idol of the moon, to which Moonday, or Monday was dedicated, had a ſingular appearance, being, though called a goddeſs, dreſſed like a man with a ſhort ſkirted coat, a moon in her hand, and a cloſe cap with long ears on her head.

3. Tuiſco, to which Tuiſ-day, or Tueſday as we now call it was dedicated, had a venerable beard, and was clad in ſkins, agreeable to the ancient ſimplicity.

4. Woden, was an idol inſtituted in honor of a valiant Saxon prince, and was looked upon as the god of victory. When the Saxons were ſucceſsful in fight, they ſacrificed the priſoners they took to this idol, and our Wedneſday is derived from him, being anciently called Wodenſ-day.

5. Thor, the ſon of Woden and Friga, was placed in a large hall, ſitting on a kind of couch, and covered with a magnificent canopy. A crown ſurrounded by twelve ſtars adorned his head, and in his right hand he held a ſcepter. He was deemed the god of the elements, and to him Thurſday, anciently called Thorſ-day, was dedicated.

6. Friga held a drawn ſword in the right hand, and a bow in the left; ſhe was the goddeſs of peace, plenty, love, and amity, and to her Friday, Frigaſday, or Frigedeag was dedicated. — This idol was uſually repreſented as a goddeſs, though ſome have made it an hermaphroditical divinity, by aſcribing to it the properties of both ſexes.

7. Seater, or Crado, was repreſented as ſtanding on the prickly back of a perch.---He had long hair, a long beard, was thin viſag'd, and had no covering on his head or feet. In his right hand he carried a pail of water, containing fruit and flowers, and a wheel in his left. His robe was tied by a girdle, which flew open both ways, to denote the abſolute freedom of the Saxons: his ſtanding with ſuch eaſe on the prickly back of the perch, implied that his worſhippers ſhould paſs through all perils and dangers unhurt; and his pail of water, containing flowers and fruit, ſignified that he would repleniſh the earth with rain, and occaſion the greateſt fertility. To him Saturday, anciently called Seater's-day, was dedicated.

It is ſuppoſed that Tuiſco, Thor and Friga were equivalent to the Mars, Jupiter and Venus of the Romans. But it muſt be confeſſed, that Tuiſco reſembles Mars leſs than he does Mercury, and Friga has a greater ſimilitude to Diana than to Venus.—The Saxons had likewiſe a goddeſs whom they called Eoſter, and who, as ſhe preſided over the month of April, it is probable gave name to the feſtival of Eaſter. But their greateſt favourite was Hertha, by whom they meant the earth. She was ſeated in a moveable temple, covered with ſacred veſtments, and had her reſidence for the chief part of the year in conſecrated groves. At certain times, however, ſhe was drawn by cows, and attended by prieſts through various parts of the kingdom;---wherever ſhe came feſtivity appeared, and when ſhe returned to the grove, her chariot was waſhed in the waters of a lake appropriated to that purpoſe.

Chriſtianity was firſt introduced among the Saxons in the time of Ethelbert, king of Kent. That prince himſelf was no enemy to the perſuaſion, being married to Bertha, a chriſtian princeſs. About the ſame time St. Gregory was advanced to the papal chair, and having long conceived the deſign of converting the Engliſh Saxons to chriſtianity, he deputed Auguſtine, a Monk, afterwards known by the name of St. Auſtin, to conduct this great work. Auguſtine was attended by ſeveral other eccleſiaſtics, who ſet off from Rome in great ſpirits, but being ſoon diſcouraged by the fatigues of the journey, and ſome reports of the barbarities of thoſe whom they were going to convert, they unanimouſly agreed to halt, and diſpatched Auguſtine back again to Rome, in order to get excuſed from the undertaking. But the Pope, inſtead of abſolving them from their miſſion, ſent the moſt earneſt exhortations to them to proceed; intreating them not to be diſcouraged by real difficulties, or the report of dangers, but to perſevere in a work which could not fail to end in their own eternal glory; and concluded with adjuring them by all means to obey St. Auſtin, whom he had appointed their Abbot.

Confirmed by the Pope's exhortations, or aſhamed any more to recede from what they had ſo ſtrenuouſly undertaken, the monks proceeded, and under the conduct of their leader, landed in the iſle of Thanet, in Kent. The miſſion conſiſted of about forty eccleſiaſtics, and ſeveral interpreters from France. On their arrival, Auſtin ſent a meſſage to king Ethelbert, importing, "That he came from Rome to bring the promiſe of eternal felicity to all that would receive it:" The king returned a polite anſwer, and ordered them to be ſupplied with all kinds of neceſſaries, but deſired they would remain in the place at which they landed, where he would ſpeedily pay them a viſit.

The king, with his queen and courtiers repaired to the iſle of Thanet, agreeable to his promiſe. Auſtin and his monks appeared before him, * and were received with great cordiality. After ſeeing divine ſervice performed, and hearing a pathetic ſermon, the king addreſſed the monks in the following memorable words, "The doctrines and promiſes you bring, are " indeed ſpecious and inviting; but being new and " uncertain, I cannot ſuddenly conſent to quit the re" ligion of my anceſtors; but becauſe you are ſtran" gers, and come from far countries, purely to com" municate ſuch things as you believe to be moſt va" luable, you ſhall receive all protection and neceſ" ſary accommodations, nor will I prohibit you from " gaining what perſons you can to the belief of your " religion." He then appointed that they ſhould reſide in the royal city of Canterbury, gave them liberty to preach throughout his dominions, and amply provided for their maintenance. To the honour of theſe monks, their lives did not diſgrace their doctrines; they conducted themſelves with an apoſtolic purity of manners, and ſeemed to emulate the primitive chriſtians in the ſimplicity of their converſation. The Saxons found the tenets they attempted to inculcate replete with univerſal philanthropy and benevolence,

* It is remarkable that Ethelbert met Auſtin in an open field at this firſt conference, from a ſuperſtitious notion, that if he was a ſorcerer his charms could have no power in the open air, but beneath a roof they might be dangerous.

volence, and calculated to benefit and bleſs mankind. † Great numbers daily flocked to them to be baptized, and the king, at length, was won by their ſanctity, and the purity of the precepts they taught, to become a chriſtian.

In the year 598, Auſtin went to France, where he was ordained archbiſhop of the Engliſh nation, by Eutherius, archbiſhop of Arles. Returning to Britain, he ſent two of his aſſociates, viz. Laurentius and Peter to Rome, to give the Pope an account of his ſucceſs, and obtain directions for his future conduct. He then rebuilt a temple, formerly erected by the Romans at Canterbury, eſtabliſhed it as a ſee for himſelf, and called it Chriſt-church. Eaſt of the city, he erected a monaſtery, and perſuaded the king to build the church of St. Peter and St. Paul for the interment of the kings of Kent, and archbiſhops of Canterbury. Afterwards informing Pope Gregory, that there was a deficiency of preachers in the iſland, that pontiff ſent over Mellitus, Juſtus, Paulinus and Rufinian, who brought with them an archiepiſcopal pall, ſacerdotal veſtments, altar cloths, ſeveral books, and a great number of relicks. The Pope likewiſe delegated to Auſtin, the power to ordain an archbiſhop of York and twelve ſuffragan biſhops. Mellitus being one of the biſhops, converted the Eaſt Saxons and their king Sebert, in honour of whoſe converſion Ethelbert built the cathedral church of St. Paul, London; and Juſtus, another of Auſtin's biſhops, built the cathedral church at Rocheſter, and dedicated it to St. Andrew.

Having been thus ſucceſsful in the converſion of the Pagans, Auſtin determined, if poſſible, to bring the Britiſh clergy to acknowledge the papal ſupremacy. He accordingly ſummoned the Welch clergy to meet him on the borders of Worceſterſhire, at a place which, in the time of the venerable Bede, went by the name of St. Auſtin's Oak.

Before the Britiſh clergy repaired to the place appointed, they enquired of one who led an anchoret's life, how they ſhould know if Auſtin was a man from God—he replied, "If ye find him meek and humble, ye ſhall earneſtly hearken to him, as having the trueſt marks of Chriſt's diſciple; but if he carries himſelf with pride and haughtineſs, regard him not, for he cannot then be a man from God."

Coming to the ſpecified place of rendezvous, they found Auſtin diametrically oppoſite to the tokens by which they were to judge of his miſſion, for proſperity and advancement had been his ruin; the paſtor was loſt in the prelate, and the meekneſs which had originally procured him ſucceſs, was ſunk in archiepiſcopal arrogance. The Britiſh biſhops, therefore, abſolutely refuſed to ſubſcribe to any of the articles that he thought proper to propoſe, which chiefly tended to ſubject them to the ſee of Rome, and Dinooth, biſhop of Bangor, in the name of the reſt, addreſſed him in theſe words, "as to the ſubjection you require, be aſſured that in the bond of love and charity we are all ſubjects and ſervants to the church of God, to the pope of Rome, and every good chriſtian, by word and deed to help them forward in the way of life; but other obedience than this we do not know to be due to him whom you term the Pope, yet this obedience we are always ready to pay him and every chriſtian; beſides we are governed under God by the biſhop of Caerleon, whoſe duty it is to overſee us in all ſpiritual matters." Auſtin, highly exaſperated at theſe expreſſions, pronounced the following denunciation againſt the Britons; "Since ye refuſe to accept of peace from your brethren, you ſhall have war from your enemies; and ſince ye will not preach the word of life to whom ye ought, from their hands ye ſhall meet with death." In order to have the prediction fulfilled, Auſtin perſuaded the king of Northumberland to make war upon the Britons, but did not live to be a witneſs of their depredations, as he died in the enſuing year 605, and was ſucceeded in the archbiſhoprick by Laurentius.

Soon after the death of Auſtin, king Ethelbert ſummoned a mycel-ſynod, or grand council, in which, by the approbation of the nobles and repreſentatives of the people, all the grants to the different chriſtian churches in his dominions were confirmed. In 608 Laurentius brought the Scots to ſome conformity with him, particularly with reſpect to the obſervation of Eaſter. But Ethelbert dying, his ſon Eadbald, being a pagan, took the utmoſt pains to undo all that his father had done, and the nation relapſed again into paganiſm. Laurentius, archbiſhop of Canterbury, however, found means to convert the king to chriſtianity, and knowing that the generality of the ſubjects would follow the example of the monarch, he did not deſpair of recalling the people back to the precepts of the goſpel. Having in a great meaſure ſucceeded, Laurentius died A. D. 618, after which Mellitus held the ſee of Canterbury ſix years, and then was ſucceeded in 624 by Juſtus, biſhop of Rocheſter. About this time, Paulinus baptized the king of Northumberland and his ſubjects, and many Mercians. Berinus in 634 was equally ſucceſsful among the Weſt Saxons, and the South Saxons were converted A. D. 686 by Wilfred, biſhop of York.

Ferocious as the Saxons were, they had ſufficient prudence to enact many excellent laws for the general welfare of the people, and the regulation of political and domeſtic happineſs. The principal legiſlators were Ethelbert, Ina, and Offa. As the Codes of the two former have been handed down to us entire, and are in themſelves extremely curious, we ſhall here inſert them for the entertainment of the reader.

The laws made by Ethelbert, and engroſſed in the Anglo Saxon language are theſe:

Let ſacrilege be compenſated twelve-fold, the theft of the goods of a biſhop eleven-fold, the goods of a prieſt nine-fold, of thoſe of a deacon ſix-fold, of thoſe of a clerk three-fold, the violation of the peace of a church two-fold, and that of a monaſtery two-fold.

If the king call an aſſembly of his people, and any damage be done to them there, let it be repaid two-fold, and fifty ſhillings be paid to the king.

If the king is at an entertainment at any one's houſe, and any damage be done there, let it be compenſated two fold.

If a freeman ſteal any thing from the king, let him compenſate at nine-fold.

Let him that killeth a man in the king's own city be fined fifty ſhillings.

Let him that killeth a freeman pay fifty ſhillings to the king for the loſs of a ſubject.

If any one kill the ſervants of the king's maſter-ſmith, or butler, let him pay the ordinary mulct.

Let the violation of the king's patronage be compenſated with fifty ſhillings.

If a freeman ſteal any thing from a freeman, let him repay it three-fold, let a mulct be impoſed, and all his goods confiſcated to the king.

The laws enacted by Ina in a Saxon parliament are as follow:

"Ina, by the grace of God, king of the Weſt Saxons, by the counſel and advice of Centred my father, and Edde and Erkenwald my biſhops, with all my eoldermen and ſage antients of my people, as alſo in an aſſembly of the ſervants of God, have religiouſly endeavoured, both for the health of our ſoul and the common preſervation of our kingdom, that right laws and true judgments be founded and eſtabliſhed throughout our whole dominions; and it ſhall not be lawful, for the time to come, for any eoldermen, or other ſubject whatever, to tranſgreſs theſe our conſtitutions."

1. If a ſervant do any work on a Sunday by command of his maſter, he ſhall be free, and his maſter ſhall be amerced thirty ſhillings; but if he went about the work without his maſter's privity, he ſhall be beaten, or redeem the penalty: but a freeman, if he work on that day without the command of his maſter, ſhall loſe his freedom, or pay ſixty ſhillings: if he be a prieſt, his penalty ſhall be double.

2. The portion or dues of the church ſhall be brought in by the feaſt of St. Martin: he that payeth them not by that time, ſhall be amerced forty ſhillings, and, beſides, pay twelve times their value.

3. If any, guilty of a capital crime, ſhall take refuge in a church, he ſhall ſave his life, and yet make recompence according to juſtice and equity: if one deſerving ſtripes run to a church, the ſtripes ſhall be forgiven him.

4. If any one fight within the king's houſe or palace, he ſhall forfeit all his goods; and it ſhall be at the pleaſure of the king, whether he ſhall have his life or not. He that fights in a church, ſhall pay one hundred and twenty ſhillings; in the houſe of an eolderman, or other ſage nobleman, ſixty ſhillings. Whoever ſhall fight in a villager's houſe, paying ſcot, ſhall be puniſhed thirty ſhillings, and ſhall give the villager ſix ſhillings; and, if any one fight in the open field, he ſhall pay one hundred and twenty ſhillings.

5. He that, on his own private account, ſhall revenge an injury done to him, before he hath demanded public juſtice, ſhall reſtore what he took away, and, beſides, forfeit thirty ſhillings.

6. If a robber be taken, he ſhall loſe his life, or redeem it according to the eſtimation of his head. We call robbers to the number of ſeven or eight men; from that number thirty-five, a band; all above, an army.

7. If a country boor, having been often accuſed of theft, be at laſt taken, he ſhall have his hand or foot cut off.

8. If any one kill another's godfather or godſon, the ſatisfaction ſhall be according to his quality and circumſtances: let the compenſation due to the relations, and that due to the lord for the loſs of his man, be both alike, and let the one encreaſe according to the circumſtances of the perſon juſt as the other doth; but if he be the king's godſon, let him make ſatisfaction to the king as well as the relations; but if his life was taken away by a relation, then let the money due to the godfather be diminiſhed as it uſeth to be when money is paid to the maſter for the death of his ſervant: if a biſhop's ſon be killed, let the penalty be half ſo much.

9. If any Engliſhman, who has loſt his freedom, do afterwards ſteal, he ſhall be hanged on the gallows, and no recompence made to his lord: if any one kill ſuch a man, he ſhall make no recompence on that account to his friends, unleſs they redeem him within a twelvemonth.

The different kingdoms of the Heptarchy were limited monarchies, the ſovereigns being accountable to the general aſſemblies of the ſtates. The crown was elective as well as hereditary, for the people, or rather their repreſentatives, would often oppoſe the lineal ſucceſſion, and fill the throne with a perſon approved by the voice of election.

The ſervices performed by the nobility were honorary, civil and military; honorary in attending his perſon, military in coming armed at the head of their vaſſals and tenants into the field, and civil in trying cauſes in his name within their diſtricts.

The trials were then as now, by jury, and equity was ſo far regarded, that in trials between the Britons and Saxons, one half conſiſted of Engliſh and the other of Welchmen.

Learning, during this period, was at a very low ebb, few but the nobility and clergy knew how to read, the former of whom never, and the latter very ſeldom, were acquainted with any but their native tongue. A prieſt, who could tranſlate latin into the Saxon language, was deemed a miracle of erudition, and a ſquire who could write his own name, was thought a prodigy of literature.

It is obſerveable, that our Saxon anceſtors always repaired to the aſſemblies of the ſtates compleatly armed. A prieſt preſided upon theſe occaſions, and poſſeſſed ſuch authority, that it was a capital crime to interrupt him after he had called ſilence, or to ſpeak without his permiſſion.

None were allowed to wear armour, or what was equivalent to repreſent the people, but ſuch as were approved of by the grand council of the nation. Hence knighthood originated, and repreſentatives were afterwards called knights of the ſhire.

Huſbands did not receive dowries with, but ſettled money on, their wives. If a woman proved falſe to the marriage bed, the huſband might, if he thought proper, ſtrip her naked, cut off her hair, and turn her out of doors in that condition; if this did not gratify his revenge, he had a right to have her ſeverely whipped through the town, and then turned totally adrift.

Rents were more frequently paid in kind than caſh, that is, in corn, cattle, cloaths, &c. than current coin, and the lord of the Glebe had a right to preſcribe the particular quantity which the tenant was obliged to pay annually; free tenures called bocland or bookland, that is, ſuch as were grantable by deed, were alienable by will, but the land held by feoſage, was an abſolute inheritance for all the ſons, to whom it deſcended equally. The people were divided into three claſſes, viz. nobles, freemen, and ſlaves, and degradation was the conſequence of marrying out of any particular claſs. The Saxons in general were great drinkers, and did not deem drunkenneſs diſgraceful. Malt liquor was their common, and indeed favourite beverage, as it is a preſent; nor were they greater drunkards than gameſters, for many, after having gamed away their property, and even wives and children, would ſtake their own freedom, and run the chance of becoming the ſlave of their antagoniſt to gratify this pernicious paſſion. And here we cannot help obſerving, that though the modern Engliſh have refined away moſt of the virtues of their anceſtors, they ſtill retain the two beforementioned vices, and practice them with as much avidity as ever. They were as much addicted to ſudden ſtarts of paſſion, and as ſudden fits of generoſity, and from the ſallies of anger would make haſty tranſitions to the meltings of humanity; and indeed this humorous diſpoſition is ſtill a marking characteriſtic of the Engliſh nation. They had no pompous funerals, yet, as now, inſcribed the tombs of the defunct with an eulogium of their actions when living. For capital crimes, hanging and drowning were the conſequential puniſhments; but ſmaller offences were atoned for by fines. In ſhort, conſidering the rudeneſs of the times, many of the laws were ſalutary and equitable, and ſome of their political inſtitutions would have done honour to more poliſhed ages.

BOOK IV.

From the Eſtabliſhment of the Engliſh Monarchy under one Sovereign, to the Norman Conqueſt.

SECTION I.

EGBERT THE GREAT.

THE clouds of adverſity for many years obſcured this ſun which was doomed to break forth in meridian luſtre, and by the union of the ſeveral kingdoms of the Heptarchy into one great monarchy, to eclipſe the fame of his moſt renowed anceſtors.

This young hero having fled to the court of Charlemagne, then the politeſt in Europe, in order to delude the malice of Brithric, king of the Weſt Saxons, there formed his ideas to future greatneſs, and ſketched out the noble plan of an univerſal Engliſh monarchy.

His fortune began to take a favorable turn A. D. 800, on the death of Brithric, when the Weſt Saxons unanimouſly ſent a deputation to invite his acceptance of a crown to which he had a lineal claim. On his firſt acceſſion to the throne of the Weſt Saxon kingdom, he carefully concealed his grand deſign, and diſguiſed the ſentiments of ambition behind the veil of diſintereſtedneſs.-----Inſtead of ſeeming to aſpire to conqueſt, he appeared the candid mediator between the other kings, and became ſo reſpected for his prudent deciſions, that they appealed to his award upon all occaſions. By thus obtaining their confidence he gradually roſe to an aſcendency which he did not ſeem to aim at, and from an adviſer became a dictator, before his royal cotemporaries were ſenſible of his encreaſing authority over them.

The perpetual inveteracy of the Britons againſt the Saxons in general, and their peculiar prejudice in diſfavour of himſelf in particular, furniſhed Egbert with an opportunity of commencing his military exploits. Accordingly, in 808, he marched againſt the Corniſh Britons, the moſt hardy, and courageous tribe of thoſe people, and the moſt furiouſly tenacious of their independency; the conflicts were frequent and bloody, and the war carried on with great ſpirit on both ſides, till the genius of Egbert prevailing, the Corniſh Britons were vanquiſhed, and Cornwall was added to the dominions of the conqueror.

During this conteſt the Welch had afforded great aſſiſtance to the Corniſh Britons, which ſo irritated Egbert, that he entered Wales with fire and ſword, laid the whole country waſte, wreſted from them the province of Gwyneth, and made a law, which enacted, that if any Welchman preſumed to paſs Offa's Dyke, the offence ſhould be capital.

The ſucceſs of Egbert's arms now awakened the attention and excited the jealouſy of the other Saxon kings. The king of Mercia, as the moſt powerful, determined to ſtem this rapid tide of conqueſt before it ſhould overwhelm or ingulph his own dominions. And the dread of Egbert's military talents had ſuch an effect as even to reconcile antipathies; for the Mercian Saxons and Britons, who had hitherto cordially hated each other, now entered into an alliance offenſive and defenſive, and formed a confederacy to cruſh the aggrandizing power of this formidable warrior.

The firſt operations of the confederates were to invade Devon and Cornwall, in order to wreſt from the conqueror his new acquired territories.---But they failed in the execution of their plan by the ſuperior ſkill of Egbert, who totally routed the Britons in a battle fought A. D. 824, and ſoon after defeated the Mercians near Wilton.

Egbert then turned his arms againſt the kingdom of Kent, when Baldred, the puſillanimous king of that diſtrict baſely deſerted his dominions, without the leaſt endeavours to oppoſe the invader, who annexed them to his own territories. This rapid ſucceſs ſo much intimidated the South-Saxons and Eaſt-Saxons, that they thought proper to acknowledge the conqueror, who encreaſed his own dominions by the addition of theirs. The Eaſt Angles being tributary to the Mercians, Egbert ſpirited them up to a revolt, and ſupplied them with every thing neceſſary to render it formidable. Beornulph, king of Mercia, marched at the head of his forces to bring back the inſurgents to a ſenſe of their duty, but engaging them he was ſlain in the action. Ludican, who ſucceeded him, was aſſaſſinated ſoon after, when Wiglaff being elected by the people in his room, found himſelf unable to make head againſt Egbert, who ſeized upon the kingdoms of the Mercians and Eaſt Angles, A. D. 825; but at the interceſſion of the pious abbot of Croyland, he made the conquered king his deputy, and ſuffered him to rule his dominions in the character of Viceroy.

The only kingdom of the Heptarchy which now remained unconquered was Northumberland, and this unhappy ſtate had been long diſtracted by inteſtine broils. Ealdred, the then reigning king, from the bad ſituation of his private affairs, and the little dependence he had upon the fidelity of his ſubjects, did not think proper to oppoſe a prince of Egbert's power and military genius, at the head of a formidable army inured to conqueſt; he, therefore, with more prudence than magnanimity reſigned his kingdom to the fortunate conqueror, only ſtipulating to govern in future as a deputy, that which he had heretofore ruled as a king.

Egbert having thus ſucceſsfully arrived at the ultimate purpoſe of his ambition, convened a general aſſembly of all the ſtates of the kingdom to meet at Wincheſter, when, by the unanimous conſent of both clergy and laity, he was ſolemnly crowned king of England, A. D. 829. At the ſame time it was enacted, that all that part of the iſland, to the ſouth of the river Tweed, known hitherto by the name of South Britain, ſhould be called England. This appellation included Wales, which having been conquered by Egbert, was deemed a ſubordinate province of England. And here it may not be improper to obſerve, that the name of England had been uſed in common converſation ever ſince the days of Ina, but was never authorized by a public inſtrument till on the preſent occaſion.

Egbert was now in the zenith of his glory, when his repoſe was diſturbed by an invaſion of the Danes, who, A. D. 831, landed in the iſle of Sheepy, in Kent, and committed vaſt devaſtations wherever they came; having made a conſiderable booty they returned home. The enſuing year they came back again with a more formidable force, and landed in Dorſetſhire. Finding no oppoſition, they determined to penetrate into the country for pillage.

Egbert collected together a ſmall force to oppoſe the invaders, but in ſo doing ſhewed more ſpirit than prudence, and committed the greateſt error in generalſhip, of which he had been ever guilty. For unhappily contemning the enemy without being acquainted with their numbers, or ſenſible of their diſcipline, he truſted an affair of the utmoſt importance to a handful of men not equal to the enterprize. Hence he met with a defeat, in which two noblemen, named Oſmond and Duddle, the biſhops Herefrith and Wigferth, and many of his troops were ſlain.

Two years after, A. D. 835, the Danes reviſited England, and were joined by the Corniſh Britons, who thought this an excellent opportunity of throwing off the Engliſh yoke. But Egbert, who now acted with more circumſpection, came ſuddenly upon the confederate armies of the Danes and Britons, and defeated them with great ſlaughter, which freed England for ſome years from their diſagreeable viſits. At length, after reigning twenty-ſeven years as principal king of the Heptarchy, and ten ſubſequent years as ſole monarch of England, he paid the debt of nature A. D. 836, and having reſigned his glories to the grave, left the crown to his eldeſt ſon Ethelwolf.

SECT. II.

ETHELWOLF.

EGBERT, on his death-bed, warned his ſon Ethelwolf not to become a ſlave to that indolence which ſeemed to predominate in his temper. For this prince having been educated in a monaſtery, previous to the death of his elder brother, had contracted the ſloth ſo incident to a monaſtic life, which naturally preſented to the preſcience of the father, an idea of the ſubſequent impolitic apathy of the ſon.

The Danes, encouraged by the indolent diſpoſition of the king, made ſeveral deſcents in England. Some landed at Southampton, and were defeated; others made a deſcent at Portſmouth, and were more ſucceſsful in their enterprize and depredations. At Mereſwar they were again ſucceſsful, and the following year entered Lindſay, Eaſt England, and Kent, and penetrated as far as London itſelf. The next year, with thirty fine large ſhips, they landed again, encountered the forces of Ethelwolf in the ſame place where they had defeated his father, and again proved ſucceſsful. But landing a ſubſequent time in the ninth year of his reign, they were defeated by earl Earnulf, which gave a reſpite of ſix years to the nation from their intruſions. About the ſame time, this inactive monarch diſmembered the kingdom which his father had taken ſuch pains to cement, by giving to his ſon Athelſtan the provinces of the Eaſt Saxons, the South Saxons, and Kent, in order to eaſe himſelf as much as poſſible of the cares of government; and ſtill to put the regal authority more out of his own power, he made his tutor Swithen biſhop of Wincheſter, and joining with him Alſtan, biſhop of Sherborne, he committed to their mutual care the adminiſtration of all public affairs.

In the year 851, the Danes again invaded the kingdom, but were conquered by land both in Devonſhire and Kent; and at ſea, Athelſtan defeated their fleet, and took nine of their ſhips. A. D. 852, however, they returned again, ſailed up the Thames, and committed great depredations, till they were defeated by the Engliſh forces at Oakley, in Surry.

A. D. 853. The Welch took up arms, but were ſoon reduced to obedience; and the ſame year the Danes renewed their depredations by attacking the coaſts of Kent and Surry, when the reſpective governors of thoſe counties were defeated, and the invaders had leiſure to compleat a ſettlement they had already began in the iſle of Thanet.

Biſhop Alſtan, who was a man of abilities, and had really the good of his country at heart, told Ethelwolf that his kingdom would never be ſafe, or his perſon ſecure, unleſs he acted with more vigilance, paid greater attention to public affairs, and kept a proper force on foot to oppoſe the Daniſh invaders. But biſhop Swithen, who was a worldly intereſted prelate, and a moſt artful ſycophant, perſuaded the weak monarch that there was no manner of occaſion to let national affairs interrupt his beloved repoſe, that he ſhould truſt all to the prayers of the clergy, and that if he would but give largely to the church, there was no manner of occaſion to be at the expence of keeping an army. The infatuated prince believed all theſe abſurdities, and being reſolved to truſt more to the beads of his monks than the ſwords of his troops, he called a great council of ſtate at Wincheſter, and gave to the church a tythe of the profits of all lands in the kingdom, free from every kind of deduction; this famous tythe tax, ſigned by the archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, abbeſſes, and deputed ſeculars of England, hath been known ever ſince by the name of THE GRANT OF KING ETHELWOLF.

About this time the king ſent his ſon Alfred, a child of five years of age to Rome, where he was confirmed and anointed by pope Leo IV. On the return of the prince, Ethelwolf very imprudently determined to make a journey himſelf to Rome. Taking the young prince with him, he indiſcreetly put his deſign into execution A. D. 855, without ſettling any of the affairs of his kingdom, or even appointing a regency. Benedict XIII. who had been lately made pope, received him very courteouſly, and at the ſame time took advantage of his extreme weakneſs, by perſuading him to extend the tax of Peter's-pence throughout the whole of his dominions, and to put the tax for the ſupport of lights in the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul under better regulations.

Having waſted the ſpace of a whole year at Rome, he ſet off on his return to England; but paſſing through France, he unfortunately fell in love with Judith, the beautiful daughter of the emperor Charles the Bald, and giving way to his dotage he married her, and imprudently conferred on her the title of queen, which was entirely contrary to a popular Weſt Saxon law, enacted on account of Brithric's being poiſoned by his wicked queen Ethelburga. This indiſcreet ſtep inflamed the diſcontents of his people, and added to the diſguſt they had long conceived againſt him on account of his impotent adminiſtration.

At length ſome of the nobility and prelates entered into a confederacy to depoſe him, and place his ſon Ethelbald upon the throne; but others of a more cool and diſpaſſionate diſpoſition, in order to prevent the effuſion of blood, brought about an accommodation, when the old king conſented to be ſatisfied with Kent, Eſſex, and Surry, and to reſign the reſt of the kingdom to his ſon. This partition re-eſtabliſhed the peace of the nation, and Ethelwolf at length enjoyed repoſe till his death, which happened January 13, A. D. 857. Previous to his demiſe, he bequeathed his paternal patrimony to all his children, and his regal domains to his two eldeſt ſons, with this diſtinction; that Ethelbald ſhould ſtill enjoy the territories already aſſigned him, and Ethelbert thoſe which had been retained by Ethelwolf himſelf. If one died the ſurvivor was to ſucceed to the whole, and in caſe of the death of both, the third ſon to be the next heir.

SECT. III.

Ethelbald and Ethelbert conjunctively.

THE two brothers now began their reign over their reſpective departments, but Ethelbald held the ſuperior rank. The reign of this prince was remarkable only for an atrocious crime which he committed, and his ſubſequent penitence; for growing enamoured of the beauty of his ſtep-mother Judith, he married that princeſs; but being convinced of his inceſtuous crime, by biſhop Swithen, he repudiated her, and paſſed the remainder of his life in contrition for his fault. He died in 860, and was firſt buried at Sherborne in Dorſetſhire, but afterwards removed to Saliſbury.

SECT. IV.

Ethelbert ſingly.

ETHELBERT now ſucceeded to the whole monarchy of England, and was beloved for his equity and moderation. The Danes again invaded England, and landing at Southampton, proceeded as far as the city of Wincheſter, which they burnt; but the king's troops coming up, put them to flight with great ſlaughter, and purſued them to their ſhips. They were afterwards expelled by the inhabitants of Kent from their lurking places in that country. This prince reigned only ſix years, and died A. D. 866, to the great regret of his ſubjects, by whom he was univerſally eſteemed.

SECT. V.

ETHELRED.

ETHELRED, the third ſon of Ethelwolf, ſucceeded to the throne agreeable to the will of that monarch, though Ethelbert had left behind him two ſons named Ealdelhelm and Ethelwold.

In the commencement of this monarch's reign, the Danes began a more formidable invaſion of England than ever. Prompted by their own avarice, and invited by a treacherous Engliſh nobleman, named Bruern Brocard, they landed in Eaſt Anglia, made a truce with the inhabitants, and contracted for a number of horſes to mount their men and bear their baggage. In the beginning of the enſuing ſpring, they penetrated as far as York, and defeated the two governors, or tributary princes of Northumberland, named Oſbert and Ella. In 868, they purſued their courſe towards Nottingham, took the place, and there wintered. This ſo terrified Burhed, the prince of that country, that he repreſented his caſe in the moſt pathetic terms to Ethelred, and implored his ſpeedy aſſiſtance. Ethelred determined to loſe no time in freeing the nation from ſuch mercileſs invaders; and therefore, having aſſembled what forces he could get together, and being joined by Edmund, the tributary king of the Eaſt Angles, he, with his brother Alfred, marched in order to form a junction with the Mercians. This being effected, Ethelred laid ſiege to Nottingham; but not being able to force it, he conſented to a truce, and ſuffered the Danes to depart in ſafety, when they retired accordingly to their cantonments in Yorkſhire.

A. D. 870. Theſe barbarians broke the truce, paſſed the Humber, ravaged Bardney, Peterborough and Ely, and deſtroyed all the monaſteries as they went. But here the memorable conduct of Æbba, abbeſs of Coldingham, ought not to be forgot, who, to prevent herſelf and the nuns of her abbey from becoming ſacrifices to Daniſh violation, perſuaded them to cut off their noſes and upper lips, and by her own example induced them to perform the dreadful operation. The Danes beholding their ſhocking appearance, were ſo exaſperated as to ſet the monaſtery on fire, when all thoſe virtuous ladies periſhed together in the flames. Theſe inhuman ravagers then turned their arms againſt the Eaſt Angles, and having defeated them at Thetford, moſt barbarouſly murdered their king Edmund, by tying him to a tree as a butt or mark, and then ſhooting him to death with arrows; from the burial of whom, the town of St. Edmund's-bury takes its name. Proceeding towards Reading, they were oppoſed by Ethelred and Alfred, and at length coming to a deciſive action on Aſhdown in Berkſhire, the Engliſh obtained a memorable victory, principally through the intrepidity of young Alfred. The Danes, beſides many common ſoldiers, loſt five earls and a king.

Fourteen days after this battle, another was fought, in which the Engliſh had rather the diſadvantage. Two months ſubſequent to this action, the armies again engaged, but the chronicles of thoſe times are rather dark, with reſpect to the prevailing party. They however inſinuate, that the Danes loſt the greateſt number of men in the conflict, but that the Engliſh met with the greateſt misfortune in the death of Ethelred, who was mortally wounded in the engagement, and did not long ſurvive, as he died April 23, A. D. 871, and left the kingdom to his only ſurviving brother.

SECT. VI.

ALFRED the GREAT.

HIſtorians have very juſtly conſidered this prince as the the moſt perfect and amiable character recorded in profane hiſtory, and the Engliſh are more obliged to him than to any other monarch who ever ſat upon the throne of Britain. To him we owe the reſtoration of the luſtre of the Engliſh church and ſtate. He was at once the fountain of true juſtice, the father of his people, and the encourager of literature. He was an admirable grammarian, a perſuaſive orator, an accurate hiſtorian, an excellent mathematician, an elegant architect, and the beſt Saxon poet then living. His learned labours were held in the higheſt eſtimation, he tranſlated many valuable works from the Greek and Latin languages. In particular, he tranſlated into the Anglo Saxon tongue, "Bœtius de conſolatione, Bede's eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, and Gregory's paſtoral." His original compoſitions were remarkable for the profoundeſt erudition, and moſt elevated marks of genius; and while they tended to public utility, diſplayed the claſſical purity of language; * nor was his diſpoſition inferior ſerior to his abilities. His fiery temper, which rendered him extremely intrepid in dangers, was temper'd by the ſofteſt milk of humanity; he was generous with judgement, abſtemious without the leaſt tincture of parſimony, affable with dignity, and the ſweetneſs of his diſpoſition yielded to nothing but the equity of his ſoul, which ſuffered no conſideration whatever to impede the ſtrict courſe of juſtice.

* The following anecdote concerning Alfred hath been handed down to us: At twelve years of age he was unable to read, but obtained that qualification by the following accident. He was one day expreſſing his admiration of a beautiful book, which was elegantly bound, and the letters finely emboſſed with gold and various colours. The queen his mother being preſent, told Alfred and one of his brothers, that the book ſhould be the prize of him who could firſt ſay it by rote.—Fired with emulation, Alfred applied

This excellent prince at the early age of twenty two years mounted a throne, * ſurrounded by difficulties, and began to ſway the ſcepter of a kingdom exhauſted of treaſures, deſolated by the repeated depredations of robbers, while many of its moſt fertile parts were in the poſſeſſion of a ſet of powerful but lawleſs barbarians.---Such a ſituation would have ſtaggered the fortitude of a ſoul leſs intrepid and enterprizing than Alfred's; but ſtimulated to a greater degree of aſſiduity by ſurrounding dangers, he determined to relieve his country or periſh in the attempt.

Alfred had ſcarcely been a month on the throne, when he found himſelf compelled to oppoſe the whole power of the Danes before he had time to collect together a proper army.----He therefore, through unavoidable neceſſity was obliged to engage their forces with only a handful of men whom he had haſtily aſſembled.----In the commencement of the action the Engliſh had the advantage, and obliged the Danes to quit their ground; but the latter finding by the purſuit the inferiority of their enemies in point of numbers, rallied, and charging the Engliſh again, overpowered them merely by being more numerous. This engagement, however, ſo fully convinced the Danes of the ſuperior generalſhip of Alfred, and the ſpirit with which the Engliſh troops would always behave under ſuch a commander, that they gladly conſented to a truce, and agreed to quit the kingdom. But returning the enſuing year, they marched to London, and having entered into a kind of treaty with the Mercians, there took up their winter quarters.

A. D. 874. They proceeded northward, and wintered at Torkſey, in Lincolnſhire, ſubduing all the places wherever they came, and ſpreading devaſtations around whatever ſpot they choſe for their head quarters.

Alfred now conſidered that the expulſion alone of theſe invaders would be only a temporary benefit to his kingdom, as they would ſoon inevitably return; but to prevent their invaſions by oppoſing their armaments at ſea, could be the only method of rendering the nation an eſſential ſervice. Warmed by theſe reflections, he was the firſt Engliſh monarch who conceived the truly patriotic and noble deſign of building an Engliſh Navy, and employing the natural ſtrength of this kingdom in its defence. This laudable reſolution he immediately put into practice by the conſtruction and equipment of a number of gallies, which drew but little water, but were admirably calculated to protect the coaſts. This naval armament, A. D. 876, met with, and defeated a fleet belonging to the enemy, which ſo terrified the Danes who were poſſeſſed of many places in the kingdom, that thoſe in Exeter agreed to evacuate the weſtern parts of England. They were, however, long in the performance of their promiſes, and probably would have broken through the ſolemnity of the treaty, had not king Alfred's gallies defeated another of their fleets, conſiſting of an hundred and twenty ſail of ſhips near Sanwic, in Dorſetſhire. This blow determined them to keep their word, and they accordingly marched into Mercia. By this junction of forces, the Danes were exceedingly numerous and powerful in the midland, and northern parts of the kingdom, which encouraged them to think they ſhould be able ſhortly to drive Alfred from thoſe parts of his dominions which he yet poſſeſſed, and at length totally to extirpate the Engliſh.

Fraught with theſe ſentiments, and knowing that Alfred's forces were extremely weak, they reſolved to diſtract his operations by obliging him either to a diſunion of what few troops he had, or to leave ſome important parts defenceleſs.

Purſuant to this plan, the Daniſh general Haldane, A. D. 878, invited over more of his countrymen, ſent two fleets to make ſeperate deſcents upon the weſtern parts of England, while himſelf at the head of an army penetrated as far as Chippenham. This deluge of barbarians bore down all oppoſition, and ſo greatly terrified the people, that Alfred found it impoſſible to aſſemble a ſufficient force to give them any check. Many of the Engliſh fled to the continent, or to Wales, numbers were murdered, and the reſt thought fit to ſubmit, or rather to revolt to the pagan ravagers.—In theſe deſperate circumſtances, and thus univerſally deſerted, Alfred was compelled to ſeek his perſonal ſafety in privacy; and to enchange his regal habitation for an obſcure receſs. Having diſpoſed of his family to perſons on whoſe circumſpection and fidelity he could rely, he wandered about the ſwampy parts of Somerſetſhire in diſguiſe, and at length took ſhelter in the hut of a cowherd in the iſle of Athelney, * where, to conceal the dignity of the monarch, he ſubmitted to become the domeſtic of a clown.

applied to his learning with ſuch avidity and diligence, that he could ſoon not only read the book, but repeat it, and ever after retained ſuch a reliſh for learning as in time rendered him a bleſſing to this nation, and the greateſt ornament of the age in which he lived. The example of the king gave encouragement to others, ſo that in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries the following learned men flouriſhed in England. 1. Alcuin, or Albinus, abbot of St. Auguſtine's monaſtery, in Canterbury, who going ambaſſador to France, taught Charles the Great logic and the mathematics during his reſidence in that country, and likewiſe perſuaded him to found the univerſity of Paris. 2. Swithen, biſhop of Wincheſter, commonly called St. Swithin. 3. Hubert, biſhop of Eaſt Anglia, who was murdered by the Danes. 4. Johannes Scotus Erigena, who taught Alfred the liberal arts. 5. Grimbald, abbot of Wincheſter. 6. Aſſerius, biſhop of St. David's in Wales, who wrote the life of Alfred. 7. Werefred, biſhop of Worceſter. 8. Plegmund, archbiſhop of Canterbury, in Alfred's time. 9. Dimulf, a herdſman, whoſe great abilities recommended him to the notice of Alfred. 10. John, the monk of St. David's. 11. Wulfsig, biſhop of London. 12. Neotus, or St. Neots. 13. Odo, archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the time of Edward the Elder. 14. St. Dunſtan, ſucceſſor to Odo. 15. Alfric, archbiſhop of York, who tranſlated the Saxon Homilies. 16. Edmund, biſhop of Durham. 17. Ethelwald. 18. Oſwald. 19. Wulfſtan, &c.

† He was the firſt who was anointed king of England, which ceremony was performed at Wincheſter.

* Athelney is a ſmall iſland, or rather Peninſula, formed by the conflux of the rivers Thone and Parret, and ſituated near Taunton in Somerſetſhire. It does not contain above two acres of ſolid ground, and in Alfred's time was covered with trees, briers, thorns, &c. So that the cowherd's cottage had but one narrow winding path leading to it, and that was hid by the circumjacent woods in ſuch a manner as to be very obſcure. Alfred found himſelf under a neceſſity of letting the cowherd know who he was, but the man's wife was kept in total ignorance of the quality of her royal gueſt, which gave riſe to the following whimſical occurrence. Looking upon the king in the light of a common domeſtic, ſhe one day ordered him to mind ſome cakes which ſhe had placed before the fire: Alfred being buſied in doing ſomething to his bow and other weapons, happened to let the cakes burn, which ſo enraged the good woman that ſhe rung an unmerciful peal in his ears, and among other expreſſions told him that he was ready enough to eat the cakes when baked, though he would not take care of them while baking.——This gave riſe to a Latin monkiſh diſtich, which may be thus rendered into Engliſh.

> Sirrah, what cou'dnt you give the cakes a turn,
> But like a blockhead ſuffer them to burn;
> Was ever woman ſerv'd at ſuch a rate,
> I've a great mind to break your ſcurvy pate:
> Tho' you can't mind the cakes for half an hour,
> Yet when they're done, you're ready to devour.

While the king was in exile here he had occaſion not only to experience the fidelity, but likewiſe to obſerve the genius of the cowherd, whoſe natural abilities were ſo great, that as ſoon as the king regained his dominions, he drew him from obſcurity, and placed

The only conſiderable perſon whom he confidentially entruſted with the place of his retreat was Odun, earl of Devon, of whoſe fidelity he had received various and unqueſtionable proofs. This nobleman had gained ſome advantages over the enemy, and had particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf by having taken from them their reafin, or royal ſtandard. Alfred at length determined to emerge from the place of his retreat; but firſt he ſent for all his nobles whom he thought proper to truſt, and having conſulted upon the moſt probable means of checking the power of the Danes, it was agreed to collect together what forces they could, and aſſemble with all poſſible expedition at a place called Buxton in Selwood Foreſt, Wiltſhire.

Before he would determine to venture a general engagement, he reſolved to undertake a private expedition, in order to inform himſelf of the real ſtrength and ſituation of the Daniſh camp. This enterprize he undertook in the diſguiſe of a harper, attended by only one perſon. In this itinerant character he ſo much delighted the Danes by his ſinging and playing, that he was introduced to their king's tent, by which he had an opportunity of making all the obſervations he deſired. On returning to his people, he repreſented the continual drunkenneſs and remiſſneſs of the Danes, and the unguarded ſtate of the camp, and propoſed to attack them on one of their feſtivals, when it was probable, from their ſuppoſed ſecurity, that they would all be in a ſtate of intoxication. This plan was approved and unanimouſly agreed to by all the Engliſh nobles, who immediately prepared to execute it with vigour.

Accordingly, A. D. 879, Alfred proceeded with the greateſt ſecrecy to the Daniſh camp at Yattenden, on the borders of Hampſhire, which he impetuouſly aſſaulted, and forced the lines with a great ſlaughter of the enemy. The fugitives who had eſcaped the ſword, fled to a fortified caſtle at ſome diſtance, where they were near periſhing by famine; for Alfred, to make the moſt of his victory, cloſely purſued them, inveſted the fortreſs, and cut off every ſupply of proviſions. This obliged them to capitulate, which they did upon the following conditions: that they ſhould either quit the kingdom immediately, or turn chriſtians. In conſequence of this determination many of them quitted the kingdom; and to make up for their ill ſucceſs in England, plundered the coaſts of France and Flanders with their uſual rapacity and cruelty. The reſt, with their leader Gutheren, were baptized, king Alfred himſelf ſtanding godfather to the latter, and giving him the name of Athelſtan. Eſſex and Eaſt Anglia were allotted by Alfred for the reſidence of theſe new converts, which their chief was to hold of him as a feudatory, and to govern by a code of laws, written purpoſely by Alfred himſelf on the occaſion. In 881, however, a large body of Danes ſailed up the river and landed at Fulham. But finding that their countrymen, who were become chriſtians, did not chuſe to join them, and that Alfred was in full march towards them, they haſted to their ſhips, and made a precipitate retreat.

A. D. 882. Four Daniſh piratical veſſels infeſting the coaſt, Alfred took the command of his fleet in perſon, and defeated them; two of the ſhips eſcaped, but the other two being taken, the crews were condemned and put to death as pirates. From this time the Danes gave Alfred a reſpite till A. D. 885, when they landed in Kent, and laid ſiege to Rocheſter; but the vigilant Alfred collected his forces in great haſte, marched to the relief of Rocheſter, compelled the pagans to raiſe the ſiege, and obliged them to retire to their ſhips. Finding that theſe invaders ſtill infeſted the coaſt, and that the chriſtian Danes of Eaſt Anglia, contrary to the ſolemn treaty made between them, began to aſſiſt their countrymen in a clandeſtine manner. Alfred augmented his navy, and engaged a fleet of ſixteen Daniſh ſhips near Harwich, when he took or deſtroyed them all.

Alfred being enraged at the treachery of the Daniſh converts, and ſenſible that he never could be ſecure from invaſions, while London remained in their hands, determined, as they had already broken the treaty, to deprive them of that important place. Accordingly, A. D, 886, he made himſelf maſter of that city, and appointed Ethelred, earl of Mercia, his ſon-in-law, to the government thereof.

Having thus far ſucceeded in expelling his enemies, ſecuring his dominions, and eſtabliſhing his authority, this glorious monarch turned his attention to the enacting of wiſe laws, and promoting ſalutary regulations for the benefit of his ſubjects in general. Among other things he ordained that the aſſembly of the ſtates ſhould be held in London, by which that city firſt became the metropolis of the kingdom; and at the ſame time, to render it worthy of this diſtinction, he embelliſhed it with ſeveral magnificent public edifices.

The next great object of concern was the literature of the kingdom, which he found at a very low ebb indeed, for very few of his ſubjects could read Engliſh, ſcarce a prieſt underſtood Latin, as we find from the king's own words in an epiſtle which he wrote upon the ſubject to Wulfſig, biſhop of London, which, as it is deemed a great curioſity, we ſhall inſert entire for the ſatisfaction of the reader.

King Alfred to Wulfſig, biſhop of London.

"Alfred, king, wiſheth greeting to Wulfſig, biſhop, his beloved and friend-like, and thee to know I wiſh, that to me it cometh very often in mind what manner of wiſe men long ago were throughout the Engliſh nation, both of the ſpiritual degree and of the temporal; and how happy the times then were among all the Engliſh, and how the kings, which then the government had of the people, God and his written will obeyed; how well they behaved themſelves both in war and peace, and in their home-government; how their nobleneſs was ſpread abroad, and how they proſpered in knowledge and in wiſdom: alſo the divine orders how earneſt they were, as well about preaching as about learning, and about all the ſervices they ſhould do to God; and how men from abroad, wiſdom and doctrine here in this land ſought; and how we the ſame now muſt get abroad if we would have them, ſo clean has learning fallen among the Engliſh nation, as that there have been very few on this ſide Humber that were able to underſtand the Engliſh of their ſervice, or turn an Epiſtle from Latin into Engliſh; and I wot there were not many beyond Humber that could it: there were ſo few, as that I cannot bethink me of one of the ſouth ſide of the Thames, when I firſt came to reign. God Almighty be thanked, we have ever a teacher in pulpit now; therefore I pray thee that thou do, as alſo I believe thou wilt, that wiſdom, that God has given thee, beſtow all about on them thou canſt beſtow it: think what puniſhment ſhall for this world befall us, when as neither we ourſelves have loved wiſdom, nor left it to others; we only loved the names that we were Chriſtians, and very few of us the duties. When I minded all this, methought that I ſaw, before all was placed him under the care of proper tutors. When this adult pupil made ſuch a rapid progreſs in literature, that ſome years after Alfred made him biſhop of Wincheſter. And to commemorate his own retirement, built a monaſtery in Athelney, the foundations of which were diſcovered in 1674 by ſome labourers. The word Athelney is only a corruption of Athelingey, or the Iſle of Nobles, an epithet given to the place, on account of Alfred's citing a council of his principal nobility there after he had made a diſcovery to the Engliſh of his retreat, and juſt previous to the propitious moment in which his good genius again began to prevail.

ſpoiled and burnt, how all the churches throughout the Engliſh nation ſtood filled with books and ornaments, and a great multitude of God's ſervants; and at that time they wiſt very little fruit of their books, becauſe they could underſtand nothing of them, for that they were not written in their own language; ſo they told us, that our anceſtors, that before us held thoſe places, loved wiſdom, and through the ſame got wealth, and left it us. A man may yet here ſee their ſwath, but we cannot enquire after it, becauſe we have let go both wealth and wiſdom, for that we would not ſtoop with our minds to the ſeeking of it. When I thought of all this, then wondered I greatly that their godly wiſe men, that were every where throughout the Engliſh nation, and had fully learned all thoſe books, would turn no part of them into their own language: but I then again quickly anſwered myſelf, and ſaid, they weened not that ever men ſhould become ſo rechleſs, nor that this learning would ſo decay; therefore they willingly let it alone, and wot that here would be the more wiſdom in the land the more languages that we underſtood. Then I called to mind, how that the law was firſt found written in the Hebrew ſpeech; and after that the Greeks had learned it, then turned they it into their own ſpeech wholly, and alſo all other books: and then the Latin people, a little after they had learned it, they tranſlated all, through wiſe interpreters, into their own language: and all other Chriſtian people have turned ſome part thereof into their own tongue. Therefore, me thinketh it better, if you ſo think, that we alſo ſome books, that be deemed moſt needful for all men to underſtand, into that language turn that we all know; and that we bring to paſs, as we eaſily may, with God's help, if we have quietneſs, that all the youth of free-born Engliſhmen, ſuch as have wealth that they may maintain them, be committed to learning; that while they no other note, can they firſt learn well to read Engliſh writing; afterward let men farther teach in the Latin tongue thoſe that they will farther teach, and have to a higher degree. When I minded how this learning of the Latin tongue heretofore was fallen through the Engliſh nation, though many could ſkill to read Engliſh writing, then began I, among divers and manifold buſineſſes of this kingdom, to turn into Engliſh this book, which in Latin is named Paſtoralis, and in Engliſh The Herdſman's Book, ſome time word for word, ſome time underſtanding for underſtanding, even as I learned them of Plegmond my archbiſhop, of Aſſer my biſhop, and Grimbald my maſs-prieſt, and John my maſs-prieſt: after that I had learned of them how I might beſt underſtand them, I turned them into Engliſh, and will ſend one to each biſhop's ſee in my kingdom; and upon each there is a ſtyle that is of fifty marks: and I command, on God's name, that no man the ſtyle from the books, nor the books from the miniſter, take; ſeeing we know not how long there ſhall be ſo learned biſhops as now, God be thanked, every where there are. Therefore, I would they ſhould always remain in their places, except the biſhop will have them with him, or that they be lent ſome whither, until that ſome other be written out."

To remedy this evil, Alfred founded the Univerſity of Oxford, A. D. 886, by erecting three Colleges, the firſt for grammarians, the next for philoſophers, and the third for theologians, or divines, and that this ſeminary might not be deficient with reſpect to proper maſters, he invited Grimbald and John the monks from France, and the learned Aſſer from Wales. He then put himſelf to great expences to procure books from various parts, in order to furniſh a ſuitable library; thus was every thing effected for the advancement of learning, which wiſdom could dictate, and prudence execute.

Theſe were not the only great works which employed his attention, for this truly patriotic monarch formed a code of ſalutary laws, gave the ineſtimable bleſſings of trials by jury, fortified the principal places in his dominions, erected various caſtles and churches, built ſeveral new towns, and to promote commerce, furniſhed many of his ſubjects with ſhips and money to trade to foreign parts. He likewiſe encouraged foreign manufactures and artificers of all kinds to come and ſettle in his dominions, eſtabliſhed a national militia, divided the kingdom into * counties, tythings, hundreds, &c. and, in fine, changed the whole of the conſtitution for the better, and gave a new face to the nation. Theſe wiſe regulations were productive of ſuch admirable effects throughout the nation, that probity became general, and the integrity of the people was ſuch as gave cauſe to the writers of that age to affirm, that if a perſon had dropped a purſe of gold in the highway, it would remain untouched till the real owner came to ſeek it.

The kingdom had now been happy within itſelf, and free from foreign invaſion for the ſpace of eight years. But A. D. 893, the Danes paid another viſit to England on the following occaſion: The emperor Arnwolf having gained ſeveral advantages over them in France, obliged them to retire to Boulogne, from whence a great part of them embarked in two hundred and fifty ſhips, and ſailing for England, landed near Rye, in Suſſex, and ſoon after made themſelves maſters of the fort of Appledore, while another party, who came in eighty ſhips, ſailed up the Thames, landed and built a fortreſs for their ſecurity at Milton.

Alfred, who was in Eaſt Anglia, no ſooner received intelligence of this formidable invaſion, than he prudently exacted an oath of allegiance from the chriſtian Danes whom he deemed his ſubjects, and took hoſtages for their fidelity upon the preſent emergency. Having taken this diſcreet ſtep, he aſſembled his forces, and ſo diſpoſed them as to prevent the junction of the two parties of the enemy.

The invaders not being joined immediately on their arrival as they expected, by the Danes reſident in England, ſent their ſhips to the iſle of Merſey, and then fancying themſelves ſecure in the ſuperiority of the numbers, which far exceeded the Engliſh, they determined to ravage the country by force of arms as uſual, and afterwards to ſecure themſelves for the winter.

Early in the ſpring, A. D. 894, king Alfred attacked the largeſt body of the Danes at Farnham in Surry, put them to flight and took all their baggage. The fugitives retired to their ſhips, and ſailing up the Colne, they landed at a place called Brickleſey in Eſſex, where they ſtrongly intrenched themſelves. In the mean time, Alfred was informed that Haſtings, the leader of the other party, had left Milton and proceeded to Beamfleet, where he had ſtrongly fortified himſelf; and that the Northumbrian Danes, having broken their oaths of allegiance, had revolted, and with a fleet of an hundred and forty ſhips, were ravaging the northern and ſouthern coaſts of the weſt of England.

This alarming intelligence induced the king to leave a body of troops for the protection of London and the neighbouring parts, and with the reſt to proceed weſtward to the relief of Exeter, which he now received advice was cloſely inveſted by a party of the revolters. On the appearance of Alfred, the inſurgents raiſed the ſiege ſiege of Exeter, and fled with precipitation to their ſhips, when making the beſt of their way to Beamfleet, they joined Haſtings. This Dane, aſſuming the chief command, proceeded to ravage the Mercian counties, but the garriſon of London taking the advantage of his abſence, ſallied out of that city, attacked Beamfleet and carried it by aſſault. Here, beſides the garriſon, they took the wife and children of Haſtings, and ſent them priſoners to Alfred. This worthy monarch no ſooner underſtood who theſe captives were, than he generouſly returned them to Haſtings with this noble meſſage. "I am determined, at the hazard of my life to oppoſe the foreign and domeſtic foes of my country; but women and children ſhould be ſacred from the horrors of war—I therefore return your wife and children, as none ought to be detained in captivity, but ſuch as are capable of committing hoſtilities." As Alfred was upon his return from the weſt of England, Haſtings thought proper to ſue for peace and ſolicit his clemency. His requeſt was granted by the amiable monarch, with a more ready condeſcenſion than ſtrict policy might perhaps allow. But Alfred's humanity always ſuperceded his reſentment, his firſt maxim being the preſervation of his country, and his next to prevent the effuſion of human blood.

But the faithleſs Dane deemed a breach of promiſe abſolutely neceſſary where it coincided with his intereſt, and looked upon an oath itſelf as only a temporary tie, which might be broken with impunity when an elegible occaſion preſented. Poſſeſſed with theſe infernal ſentiments, it is not ſurpriſing that he ſought another opportunity of coming to a rupture with Alfred, that he might reimburſe himſelf for his recent loſſes with a little beloved plunder. Having ſtrongly fortified Shoebury, in the hundreds of Eſſex, and being conſiderably reinforced by the gradual influx of the fugitive Danes from the other parts of the kingdom, he determined to throw off the maſk, and begin his depredations without delay. Proceeding northwards, he made a junction with the Northumbrian Danes, and then turning towards the weſt, he penetrated to the Severn, and ſtrongly intrenched himſelf at Badington, in Montgomeryſhire. Alfred ſent an army againſt the ravagers, commanded by three general officers, who being joined by a body of Welch, blocked them up in their camp. The Danes, at length reduced to the utmoſt extremity by famine, ſallied out of their lines in a fit of deſperation, with a deſign to cut their way through the beſiegers. In this attempt many periſhed in the conflict, ſeveral others in the purſuit, and ſome eſcaped into the covert of the woods. Theſe, however, found means to elude the purſuit of the king's forces, and being joined by ſome more of their countrymen from Eaſt Anglia and Northumberland, they together proceeded to Cheſter, intrenched themſelves again, and paſſed the winter in that manner. In the ſpring of A. D. 896, they retreated through Northumbria and Eaſt Anglia, ſeized on the iſle of Merſey, and proceeding with their ſhips up the river Lea, fixed their ſtation at Hertford.

The citizens of London were exceeding uneaſy to have an army of ſuch inhuman ruffians ſo near them, and more particularly as it was about the time of harveſt, fearing that they ſhould be deprived of the fine crops that adorned the country for many miles round. King Alfred, to be a check upon the Danes, and calm the fears of his ſubjects, immediately marched towards Hertford, and encamped near that town; in which ſituation he could obſerve the motions of the enemy, and protect the reapers from inſult.

Affairs were in this poſition, when Alfred conceived a deſign of deſtroying the Daniſh fleet, by the following ſingular ſtratagem. He ordered ſeveral large trenches to be cut from the river to the low grounds, then drawing off the main ſtream, he turned it into the leſſer channels, and by this ingenious device, the ſhips of the enemy were left a-ground. Aſtoniſhed at ſuch an expedient, and dreading the enterprizing genious of Alfred, the Danes fled with the utmoſt precipitation; the Engliſh then got off what ſhips they could and burnt the reſt. Alfred purſued the advantage the conſternation of the Danes had given him, and followed them to the Severn, from whence they continued their retreat to Northumberland. Reflecting on the military talents of Alfred, and deſpairing of ſucceſs, while a man of his abilities poſſeſſed the throne, they determined to quit the kingdom, and make up for their loſſes in England, by plundering ſome other nation. Being ſupplied by their Northumbrian friends with ſhips, they accordingly ſet ſail for Normandy A. D. 896, after having been greatly diminiſhed in their numbers, diſappointed in their proſpects of plunder, and obliged to carry away with them leſs property than they brought. Subſequent to the departure of theſe unwelcome gueſts, Alfred found no difficulty in puniſhing for their revolt, and reducing to obedience, the Danes of Northumberland and Eaſt Anglia.

Having now ſome leiſure time, this excellent monarch turned his whole attention to put the navy of England upon ſuch a footing, as to render the future deſigns of invaders abortive. In conſequence of this reſolution, he ordered ſeveral veſſels to be built upon a larger conſtruction than thoſe of the Danes, yet they were ſo contrived, that the bulk did not impede their ſwiftneſs. He had ſcarce finiſhed theſe, when he had an immediate call to uſe them, for a ſquadron of Daniſh ſhips appearing off the coaſt of Dorſetſhire, A. D. 897, he ordered out nine of his new conſtructed gallies againſt them. A ſharp engagement enſued, in which the Danes were defeated, and many of them taken priſoners. Alfred, in order as much as poſſible to deter theſe invaders from infeſting the Engliſh coaſt, commanded that the priſoners ſhould be proceeded againſt as pirates, and after condemnation hung up in Terrorem on the ſea ſhore.

Alfred, after this, enjoyed three years of repoſe, which he employed in the moſt laudable manner, and dying October the 25th, A. D. 900, was buried at Wincheſter. He left behind him five children, Edward, who ſucceeded him, Ethelwald bred to literature; Ethelfleda, who was married to the earl of Mercia; Ethelgiva, abbeſs of the monaſtery founded in the iſle of Athelney; and Elfrida married to Baldwin, Earl of Flanders.

From the concurrent teſtimonies of the moſt eminent writers, and Alfred's actions themſelves, it is evident that he was the able general in the camp, the intrepid ſoldier in the field, the profound ſcholar in the univerſity, the eloquent ſpeaker in the ſenate, the ſage politician in the council, the polite gentleman at court, and the worthy man upon all occaſions. Hence from what we at firſt premiſed concerning Alfred, from his ſubſequent tranſactions, and from our eulogium at the cloſe of our account, we ſhall wind up the whole by corroborating our former aſſertion, * viz.

"That

* Spelman thus exclaims concerning Alfred—"O Alfred, the wonder and aſtoniſhment of all ages; if we reflect upon his piety and religion, it would ſeem that he had never gone out of a monaſtery; if on his warlike exploits, that he had lived no where but in a camp; if on his writings and ſtudies, that he had ſpent his whole life in an univerſity; and laſtly, if we regard his adminiſtration of the affairs of his kingdom and ſubjects, one would think that his whole time had been employed in nothing elſe but enacting laws, and promoting juſtice in his tribunals, courts, &c."

“ That he is the moſt perfect and amiable character “ recorded in profane hiſtory ;” for as no one ever diſcharged the offices of king, chriſtian, general and politician with equal propriety, none can be ſet in competition with him in this reſpect. Before we quit the reign of Alfred, it may not be improper to obſerve, that he not only ordered all cauſes to be tried by a jury of twelve men, commanded that culprits who could not find ſureties for their good behaviour ſhould be committed to priſon, inſtituted fairs, reſtrained the power of the nobles over their vaſſals and tenants, erected tything courts, put the wittena-gemots or parliaments upon a better footing, &c. but formed an excellent code of laws, containing forty articles. The following we give as an abſtract of his principal judicial maxims.

The Iſt requires, as moſt neceſſary to all his ſubjects, that each keep his oath or pledge, his promiſe to obſerve the laws, and keep the peace. And if any ſhould be compelled to ſwear, or depoſite a pledge, whereby he may be bound to betray his lord, or unjuſtly to aſſiſt any perſon, he ought to break his promiſe rather than perform it; but in caſe he hath engaged to perform any thing which might juſtly be done, and doth it not, his arms and all his perſonal eſtate ſhall be put into the hands of his friends, and he himſelf kept in the king's priſon for forty days, till he undergo that penance which the biſhops ſhall enjoin him, and alſo his friends and relations require of him: but if he hath not wherewith to ſuſtain himſelf in the mean while, if his kindred are not able to provide him victuals, the king's officers ſhall do it. But if he reſiſt, and be taken by force, he ſhall forfeit both his arms and his perſonal eſtate; and if he be killed, nothing ſhall be paid as the value of his head. And in caſe he eſcape before his time, (viz. of forty days) be out, and be retaken, he ſhall be returned back again to priſon for other forty days; if he eſcape, he ſhall have no benefit of the laws, but be excommunicated from all Chriſt's churches: and if any man have been ſecurity in his behalf, he ſhall make ſatiſfaction for it according to right, and do penance till he make ſuch ſatiſfaction as his prieſt ſhall appoint.

The IId bears the title of The Immunity of the Church.

The IIId is concerning the breach of the king's ſuretyſhip, by the payment of a mulct of five pounds of Mercian larger money; but the violation of ſuretyſhip, or the peace, made to an archbiſhop, by a fine of three pounds; and if any one break or forfeit the king's pledge, or recognizance, he ſhall make amends, according to right and the breach of the ſuretyſhip, to a biſhop or eolderman, by two pounds.

The IVth law is concerning the death of the king, or any other lord. If any one that either by himſelf alone, or by any other perſon, ſhall attempt againſt the king's life, he ſhall loſe his life and goods; but if he will purge himſelf, let him do it according to the valuation of the king's head. The ſame is alſo ordained in all judgments concerning other men, whether noble or ignoble.—Whoever conſpires againſt his lord, ſhall loſe both his life and eſtate, or elſe pay the valuation of his lord's head.

The VIIth law is againſt fighters in the king's palace. If a man ſhall fight, or draw a weapon in his houſe, his life ſhall lie at the king's mercy whether he will pardon him or not: but if the offender flee, and he be taken, he ſhall redeem his life with the price of his head, or be fined according to his offenſe.

The IXth law ordains what mulct a man ſhall pay that kills a woman with-child, which was to be according to the value of her head; and he was alſo to pay for the child in her womb half as much as for a living one, according to the quality of its father.

The Xth ordains what fines or amends every man ſhall pay to a huſband for committing adultery with his wife, which was to be increaſed according to the eſtate or quality of him againſt whom the offence was committed.

The XIth, what mulct a man ſhall pay that wantonly handles the breaſts of a countryman's wife, or offers her any violence, as by flinging her down, &c. though he does not lie with her.

The XXVIth law appoints what mulcts ſhall be paid by thoſe who kill in troops or companies; and alſo to whom theſe mulcts were to be paid. If the ſlain innocent party were an ordinary perſon, that is, one whoſe head was valued but at two hundred ſhillings, he that ſlew him muſt pay the value of his head, and a fine beſides to his kindred; alſo every one that was in the company muſt pay thirty ſhillings: which penalty was ſtill to be increaſed according to the value of the eſtate of the party ſlain, ſo that as to the penalty for the death of a man valued at twelve hundred ſhillings, every one that was preſent muſt pay an hundred and twenty ſhillings, and the manſlayer himſelf the price of his head; and a fine beſides: but in caſe the whole company ſhall deny that he gave the mortal wound, all of them are to be impeached together, and to pay both the value and the fine beſides.

The XXVIIth appoints what ſhare of the mulct or ſatisfaction a man's kindred on the mother's ſide ſhall receive, in caſe he has no kindred on his father's ſide; and what ſhare thoſe of his guild or fraternity ſhall pay, in caſe he have committed man-ſlaughter in a quarrel, viz. the former ſhall pay a third part, and the latter, one half, of the price of the head of the party ſlain.

The XXVIIIth law was made againſt public defamers, or ſpreaders of falſe news; whereby is meant ſpreaders of falſe news againſt the government: and commands that ſuch a one, being convicted, ſhould ſuffer no leſs puniſhment than the cutting out of his tongue, except he redeem it by paying of the value of his head, and even then, he was afterwards to be eſteemed of no credit.

The XXXth ordains, that merchants, when they land, ſhall bring ſuch as come on ſhore with them before the king's officers in folcmote (or county-court,) and there declare their number, that they may be ready to produce them, to anſwer any thing that may be demanded of them in the ſaid folcmote: and that if they happen to bring many ſtrangers on ſhore, that they alſo certify this to the king's officer in that ſaid aſſembly, ſo that they may be forth coming.

The XXXIſt inflicts upon him that ſhall put a ceorle's man, that is, an ordinary countryman, without any fault into bonds, a mulct of ten ſhillings; upon him that beats ſuch a one, twenty ſhillings; if he hang him up aloft, thirty ſhillings; if he cut off his hair to expoſe him like a fool, ten ſhillings; if he ſhave his head like a prieſt, yet bind him not, thirty ſhillings; and in caſe he only cut off his beard, twenty ſhillings; but if he bind him and ſhave his hair like a prieſt, then ſixty ſhillings.

The XXXIVth law impoſes upon him that ſhall ſtrike or fight in open court, before the king's eolderman, both the value of his own head and ſuch a fine beſides as ſhall be thought fit; and alſo an hundred and twenty ſhillings, to be paid to the eolderman by him that by thus drawing his weapon ſhall make any diſturbance in the folcmote: if the eolderman was not preſent, but the fact was done before his ſubſtitute. or the king's prieſt, then a fine or amerciament of thirty ſhillings.

The XXXVth ordains what ſatisfaction ſhall be made for breach of the peace in any other place: as, for example, he that fights in the home-ſtall of a countryman, ſhall pay the ſaid countryman ſix ſhillings; if he drew his own ſword but ſtruck not, half as much: which penalty alſo was to be increaſed according cording to the eſtate or quality of him upon whoſe ground the aſſault was made ; ſo that if he fought in the houſe of one that was worth ſix hundred ſhillings, he was to pay three times as much ; if one worth twelve hundred ſhillings, then the amends was to be twice as much as the former.

The XXXVIth law, of burhbice, or breach of the peace in a town, confirms that part of king Ina's laws concerning that matter, in impoſing upon the offender for the breach of the peace in the king's town or city, by ſetting the mulct of an hundred and twenty ſhillings: but if it be done in the archbiſhop's town, then ninety ſhillings; in that of a biſhop, or eolderman, ſixty ſhillings; in the town of a man valued at twelve hundred ſhillings eſtate, thirty ſhillings; but half as much if done in a village of one worth but half the ſum.

The XXXVIIth is that law concerning beland, by virtue whereof he that holds lands left him by his anceſtors, was forbid to alienate it from his kindred to others, in caſe it could be proved, by writing or teſtimony, before the king or the biſhop, his kindred being preſent, that the man who firſt granted them forbid him all alienation, and laid on him this condition.----This law is now altered, for entails can be cut off by fine and recovery ; and we have too many inſtances of the caprices of imbecility, and the moroſeneſs of peeviſh old age, diſinheriting youth, for the very vices and follies which they themſelves were addicted to in their younger days.

The XXXVIIIth law, concerning quarrels or deadly feuds, which ſince it gives a ſtrange licence for men to take ſatisfaction on their enemies, even without the preſence of any officer, I ſhall likewiſe ſet down. Firſt, it forbids any man to attack his enemy if he find him in his own houſe, except he firſt demand of him ſatisfaction ; but, if he have force enough, he may beſiege the houſe for ſeven days, yet he ſhall not aſſault him if he ſtay within ; but if he will then ſurrender himſelf and his arms into the defendant's hands, he may keep him thirty days without hurt ; but then ſhall leave him ſo to his kindred and friends. In caſe he fly to a church, the honour of the church is to be preſerved. But if the defendant have not ſtrength enough to beſiege him in his houſe, he may deſire the aſſiſtance of the eolderman ; which, if he cannot obtain, he muſt appeal to the king before he can aſſault him. If any one by chance light upon his adverſary, not knowing that he keeps himſelf at home, and he will deliver up his arms to him, he ſhall keep him ſafe thirty days, and then deliver him to his friends; but in caſe he will not deliver up his arms, then he may fight him : but if he be willing to deliver up himſelf and his arms to his enemy, and any other man ſets upon him, ſuch a man ſhall pay the value of his head if he kills him ; or give ſatisfaction for the wounds, if any be given him, according to the fact, beſides which he ſhall be fined and loſe all that may fall to him by reaſon of kindred.

The XLth ſets a certain valuation upon every limb and member, as well as upon every perſon from a king to a bond-ſlave: of this ſee more at large in the laws of his ſucceſſor Athelſtan.

SECT. VII.

EDWARD THE ELDER.

EDWARD inherited all his father's virtues, but not his abilities, and he was called the Elder from being the firſt of that name who ever wore the Engliſh crown.

His firſt uneaſineſs after aſcending the throne was of a domeſtic nature, for Ethelwald his couſin pretended to the crown, as the ſon of Alfred's elder brother Ethelbert. This prince raiſed ſome forces to maintain his claim, though Edward, beſides having been appointed his heir by Alfred himſelf, and anointed king by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, had undergone the formality of an election by the people.

Ethelwald having got together ſome adherents and troops, ſeized upon the towns of Winborn and Tweoneham, or Chriſt-Church in Hampſhire, and boaſted that he would maintain his claim at the hazard of his life ; but he no ſooner heard of the approach of Edward with an army, than he deſerted his friends, and even his wife, and fled to the Northumbrian Danes. As theſe inſiduous ſubjects were very ready to embrace any opportunity of throwing off the Saxon yoke, they of courſe received Ethelwald with open arms, acknowledged him as king of England, and induced their countrymen of Eaſt Anglia to join them in revolting.

Edward, however, no ſooner marched againſt them, than their ſpirits began to fail, and in order to avert the impending chaſtiſement, they obliged Ethelwald to depart their country.—But this pretended loyalty, the effect of fear, did not ſatisfy Edward, who ſeized upon their principal fortreſſes as the moſt eligible method of ſecuring their allegiance. The Danes did not ſubmit without ſome reſiſtance, which gave riſe to the following remarkable occurrence : The king's ſiſter Elfleda, the wife of the earl of Mercia, being a woman of exceeding great courage, threw off the weakneſs peculiar to her ſex, and took upon herſelf the command of a body of troops in perſon, at the head of whom ſhe ſignalized herſelf on various occaſions, and was at once admired by the ſoldiers, and reſpected by the officers. Nor was this lady leſs celebrated for her wiſdom and benevolence than her intrepidity ; for her counſel was often as uſeful to her brother as her courage; and the many charitable foundations ſhe erected ſufficiently evinced her humanity. Indeed it was by her courage, principally, Ethelwald was driven out of the kingdom, and compelled to take refuge in Normandy.

Ethelwald, however, returned in 905, accompanied by a body of foreign troops, and having induced the Danes of Eaſt Anglia to join him, he began to commit the moſt cruel ravages, and penetrated as far as Badinſtoke in Wiltſhire, whither the king followed him. Ethelwald took the advantage of the Kentiſh men's having imprudently ſeperated themſelves from the reſt of the army in ſearch of plunder, to attack them with great impetuoſity. — A bloody conflict enſued, in which, on the ſide of the Engliſh, fell the earls Sigulf and Sigelm, the abbot Earnwolf, and the king's thane Eadwald. Of the enemy, Eric, a Daniſh prince, and Ethelwald himſelf were ſlain. The Kentiſh men were overpowered by numbers, but the Danes had ſo little cauſe to rejoice at the victory, that they immediately after thought proper to ſue for peace, which Edward concluded with them at a place named Ickford in Buckinghamſhire.

The Danes were not now more ſincere than formerly, and conſequently the peace was no longer permanent than their own conveniencies admitted. An inſurrection accordingly enſued in the north, which ſo much exaſperated the king that he ordered an army to march into Northumberland, and to put to death all of thoſe perpetual diſturbers who ſhould be found under arms. This bloody mandate was obeyed by the troops with the moſt ſcrupulous punctuality, and great numbers of the refractory inſurgents fell victims to the reſentment of an incenſed king.

Theſe ſeverities, however, did not alter the diſpoſitions of the Danes, for thoſe reſtleſs intruders hearing that Edward was buſy in Kent, in manning a fleet of above an hundred ſail of ſhipping, injudiciouſly concluded that he had diſpoſed of the greateſt part of his army on board the veſſels, and that not having any land forces to impede their progreſs, they might plunder with impunity. A reſolution to ravage was no ſooner adopted, than put into execution by theſe unthinking deſperadoes; they began their depredations as uſual, penetrated into the heart of the kingdom, and obtained a very conſiderable booty. But as they were retiring with the ſpoils, the Engliſh army overtook them at Tetnal in Staffordſhire, defeated them with great ſlaughter, and deprived them of all their plunder.

A. D. 913. Elfleda became a widow by the death of her huſband Ethelred, earl of Mercia. After having paid the proper reſpect to the memory of her conſort, ſhe took a ſurvey of her extenſive poſſeſſions, improved and fortified all the old cities and towns, and laid the foundations of ſome new ones. The Welch having made ſome incurſions into her territories, ſhe determined to chaſtiſe them, and collected her forces together accordingly. The Welch affected to ridicule an army commanded by a woman, but they had ſoon reaſon to repent of their ill-timed mirth, for that lady defeated them with great ſlaughter, obliged their king to fly to the mountains, took his queen and thirty-four of his nobles priſoners, and ſeized upon the town of Brecknock. Returning to England, and finding that the Danes had poſſeſſed themſelves of Derby, ſhe laid ſeige to that place and took it by ſtorm. During the aſſault, her life was in imminent danger, and ſhe had four of her beſt officers killed by her ſide.

A. D. 914. King Edward rebuilt and fortified the city of Hereford; and A. D. 915 he did the ſame by Witham, in Eſſex. The two enſuing years, being at peace, he employed his leiſure time in a variety of public works, particularly in the reſtoration of Cambridge, which was greatly decayed; but Edward greatly embelliſhed, and erected it into an univerſity upon inſtitutions ſimilar to thoſe of his father at Oxford.

A. D. 917. The Danes began another inſurrection, but were defeated with great ſlaughter. Their incurſions, however, made Edward perceive the neceſſity of fortifying Bedford, Buckingham and Towceſter. Subſequent to this, earl Thurketyll, the Daniſh leader, conſented to quit the kingdom, and accordingly departed to France with all who choſe to follow him.

A ſwarm of Danes from the continent invaded England again A. D. 918, under the command of Otar and Rohault. Sailing into the Severn they frequently landed, and committed many ravages upon the adjacent coaſts, * till they were defeated by the militia of Herefordſhire and Glouceſterſhire. Rohault, and Otar's brother were ſlain in the engagement; and the fugitives fled into a wood, which was immediately inveſted by the conquerors. In this emergency the Danes, as uſual, promiſed to depart the kingdom, and to give hoſtages for their performance of the agreement. Being ſuffered to retire to their veſſels, they treacherouſly landed again in the night, and attempted to penetrate into the country. Being diſcovered in the morning, by the troops, whom the king had judiciouſly ſtationed to guard the coaſt, the greateſt part of them were cut off, and the few who eſcaped went and ſettled in Ireland. Though this ſucceſs was pleaſing to Edward, he met with a great affliction this year in the loſs of his ſiſter Elfleda, who died at Tamworth, in Staffordſhire, to the unſpeakable regret of the whole nation.

A. D. 920. The Danes landed in Wales, and proceeded as far as Cheſter, and the Welch revolted at the ſame time; but both parties were defeated by Edward's forces, and the two chiefs, viz. Leofred the Dane, and Griffith ap Madoc, the Welch prince, were beheaded, and their heads placed upon the tower of Cheſter.

The king continued to improve the old, and erect new fortifications in many parts of the kingdom; when the Danes, while he was thus buſied, made an attack upon Towceſter, but were repulſed with conſiderable loſs, and being purſued were totally defeated. Soon after, between Bernwood and Aileſbury, they attempted to follow the example of the king, by building a ſtrong fortreſs at Tamesford, in Bedfordſhire. Edward, however, laid ſiege to it, took it by ſtorm, and put all who were in it to the ſword. Shortly after this, he ſeized Colcheſter, which was in the poſſeſſion of the Danes, and ſlew all who were found in arms. This ſeverity occaſioned a general revolt of the Danes, in conſequence of which they met with a total defeat, and this obliged them again to a general ſubmiſſion.

A. D. 921. The Northumbrian Danes revolted again, and incited the king of Scotland to aſſiſt them, who deputed his ſon with a conſiderable army, to accompany them in their ravages. Theſe confederates were, however, defeated by prince Athelſtan, the gallant ſon of king Edward.

A. D. 923. The Engliſh monarch took Stamford and Lincoln, and fortified both thoſe places; during the courſe of the ſame year, all the Daniſh chiefs ſubmitted, and ſwore allegiance to him; this was followed by the ſubmiſſion of the Welch princes and nobility, and even the king of Scotland conſented to hold his crown as a vaſſal to Edward. Thus Edward poſſeſſed a more extenſive and unlimited power in the iſland, than any of his predeceſſors had done, and ſpent the remainder of his glorious reign in ſecuring and regulating the poſſeſſions he had gained. He died A. D. 925, and was buried by his father, at Wincheſter. In virtue and courage he was equal to Alfred, but inferior with reſpect to genius and learning. Alfred embelliſhed, and Edward fortified, the kingdom: the former introduced literature, and built a royal navy; the latter added to and improved both; ſo that the Engliſh have infinite obligations both to father and ſon. The laws he made were few, and rather comments on thoſe of his predeceſſors than new ones. He, however, made ſome regulations reſpecting commerce, that were ſuitable to the complexion of the times in which he lived. He was exceeding affable and benevolent, and remarkable for the humility of his temper, of which the following anecdote is a ſingular inſtance. "When Edward the Elder "came to Auſtelen, Lewellyn, prince of North "Wales, came to Betheſtly to treat about a peace; "but refuſed firſt to croſs the Severn, which, when "king Edward heard, he took a boat, and rowed to-"wards him. But the prince, who was then by the "water-ſide, when he ſaw and knew who he was, caſt "off the rich robe he then had on, and which he had "prepared purpoſely for the meeting, and entering "the river breaſt high, and taking hold of the end "of the boat, ſubmiſſively ſaid, Moſt ſage king, "thy humility hath overcome my inſolence, and thy "wiſdom triumphed over my folly—Come, pray Sir, "get upon this neck, which I, like a fool as I am, "have lifted againſt thee, and thus enter that land, "which thy benign clemency hath this day made "thine own; ſo taking the king upon his ſhoulders, "and

* In one of their excurſions, they took priſoner Cumeleac, biſhop of Erchenfield in Herefordſhire, who was afterwards ranſomed by the king for forty pounds.

“and ſetting him on ſhore, he made him to ſit down upon his own royal robe, and putting his own hands between the king's, he there did him homage.”

Edward, by his firſt wife Egwynnea had three children, two ſons, viz. Alfred, who died before him, and Athelſtan, who ſucceeded him; and a daughter named Edgytha. His iſſue by his ſecond wife Elfleda were Ethelwald, Edwin, and ſix daughters, four of whom were married, and two died ſingle. The huſbands of the married ones were the emperor Otho, Charles the Simple, and Hugh Capet, kings of France, and a French duke. His third wife Edgiva brought him Edmund and Edred, both of whom afterwards reigned, and two daughters one of the latter retired to a cloiſter, and the other was married to a French prince.

SECT. VIII.

ATHELSTAN.

ATHELSTAN ſucceeded his father in the year 925, and was crowned at Kingſton upon Thames. A conſpiracy was formed againſt him, (on account of the illegitimacy of his birth) ſoon after his acceſſion by a perſon named Alfred, who laid a plan to ſeize the king at Wincheſter and put out his eyes. But his deſign tranſpiring, he was apprehended and carried before the king, to whom he denied ever having had ſuch an intention. As there was no poſitive evidence to prove him guilty, the king, according to the abſurd cuſtom of the times, ſent him to Rome to purge himſelf from the imputation before the Pope. He, however, loſt his life before he had an opportunity of going through his purgation; for walking up towards the altar of St. Peter, he ſuddenly dropped down in a fit, and being carried to the Engliſh College, expired three days after. The Pope deeming his ſudden death a providential proof of his guilt, refuſed his body chriſtian burial, till the pleaſure of Athelſtan ſhould be known, who gave permiſſion that he ſhould be buried; but ſeized upon his eſtates, and ſettled them upon the monaſtery of Malmeſbury.

This conſpiracy was ſucceeded by an attempt which the Danes made to regain their independency. They were headed by two chiefs called Sithric and Ingwald, who were pleaſed to dignify themſelves with the title of kings. Athelſtan no ſooner heard of this inſurrection than he marched againſt the rebels with a conſiderable force, when Sithric thought proper to ſubmit and implore his clemency. The king, who was good-natured and generous, even to weakneſs, not only pardoned him on condition of his being baptized, but gave him his ſiſter in marriage, which he imagined would conduce to conciliate his fidelity. Sithric died ſoon after, when Athelſtan took his poſſeſſions under his own immediate adminiſtration, without admitting of any ſubordinate ruler. This exaſperated Guthric, the ſon of Sithric, who raiſed a conſiderable force to regain what he deemed his patrimony. But Athelſtan no ſooner advanced towards him at the head of an army, than he fled into Scotland, and ſought the protection of Conſtantine the king of that country. Athelſtan ſent a meſſage to the Scotch monarch to deliver up Guthric as a rebel and traitor, which the latter abſolutely refuſed, and a war between the two nations ſeemed inevitable. At length, by means of ſome of the nobility, an accommodation was brought about, and a conference agreed upon between the two kings. This occaſioned Guthric to return into Northumberland, where, having privately gathered together ſome troops, he made an unſucceſsful attempt upon York, in which he was taken priſoner, and finding means to eſcape, he went to ſea, and paſſed the reſt of his days as a pirate.

Anlaff, the brother of Guthric, having by the force of arms obtained conſiderable poſſeſſions in Ireland, was called the Iriſh king. This petty monarch, impelled by the inveterate hatred he had conceived againſt Athelſtan, perſuaded Conſtantine, king of Scotland, to declare war againſt him, and promiſed to join him with a conſiderable body of forces from Ireland. At the ſame time Howel, king of Wales, agreed to make a diverſion in favor of the confederates. Athelſtan being apprized of the impending danger, collected an army together with great diligence, and marching into Wales, he defeated the Welch; and, in order to puniſh them for their temerity, ordered them to pay a much heavier tribute than they had hitherto done. Athelſtan then marched towards Scotland, when Conſtantine, not having been joined by Anlaff as he expected, thought proper to ſubmit, and implore the clemency of the Engliſh monarch, who not only forgave him, but with his uſual good-nature reſtored all the places his troops had taken. But the gratitude of the Scotch monarch was not equal to the generoſity of Athelſtan, for in the year 938 he formed another powerful confederacy with Anlaff, and the Cumbrian Britons. Their united forces embarked on board two hundred and ſixteen ſhips, and landing at the mouth of the Humber, penetrated to Bromſbury in Northumberland. Here Athelſtan brought a great force againſt them, and at the ſame time ſent a fleet to deſtroy their ſhipping. The two armies kept from an engagement for ſeveral days, watching the opportunity of gaining ſome peculiar advantage; during which interval Anlaff laid a ſcheme to ſeize upon, or aſſaſſinate Athelſtan in the midſt of his army. To effect this, he put in practice a ſimilar ſtratagem to that formerly employed by Alfred in exploring the Daniſh camp. Diſguiſed like a harper he ſecurely entered the Engliſh lines, and was even introduced to play before the king, who handſomely rewarded him for the amuſement he had received. A ſoldier in Athelſtan's army, however, recognized the features of Anlaff, and after his departure informed the king who he was. Athelſtan blamed him for not having given more timely notice that he might have been apprehended in the camp; when the ſoldier nobly replied, “My liege, I firſt gave my military oath to Anlaff; if I had therefore betrayed him, your majeſty might juſtly have ſuſpected the like treachery to yourſelf. But to evince my loyalty, I entreat your majeſty to remove your tent, as I have no doubt but a deſign upon your perſon will be the conſequence of Anlaff's obſervations.” The king, after rewarding the ſoldier for his fidelity, took his prudent advice, and gave orders for the immediate removal of his tent. This precaution, in the ſequel, appeared exceeding neceſſary; for a biſhop coming into the camp ſoon after the removal of the king's tent, and pitching his own in the vacant place, was the firſt who fell a victim to the furious attack made upon the Engliſh by Anlaff in the night. The alarm becoming general, Anlaff was repulſed, but the next morning the engagement was renewed. The Engliſh forces were commanded by the king in perſon, Edmund his brother, and Turketyl his prime miniſter. On the ſide of the enemy, king Conſtantine commanded the Scots, Anlaff the Iriſh, Froda the Danes, and Owen the Cumbrian Britons. Athelſtan, with a body of Weſt Saxons, made a furious attack upon the Iriſh, already fatigued by their nocturnal attempt, and eaſily put them to the rout. Turketyl, with the London militia, pierced the ranks of the Scotch, obliged them to retreat, and a deciſive victory was at length obtained by the Engliſh. Five Daniſh princes, ſeven general officers, and a great number of private men were ſlain in the field; and the king of Scotland, Anlaff and Owen eſcaped with great difficulty to their ſhips. The Engliſh on their ſide loſt Edwin and Ethelwin, Athelſtan's ſtan's two couſins, ſeveral good officers and many excellent ſoldiers. In fine, the hiſtorians of that age repreſent it as the moſt bloody engagement that had ever been fought in Britain. The ſucceſs of the Engliſh fleet was equal to that of the land forces, and the deſtruction of both the army and navy of his enemies, gave to Athelſtan a compleat triumph.

Athelſtan now thought proper to chaſtiſe the Welch for having aſſiſted his enemies. This he did and then effectually, ordered their king Ludeval, and all the Welch nobles to attend him at Hereford, in order to do homage, ſwear allegiance, and pay a tribute. Theſe humiliating conditions the Welch were obliged to comply with, and the tribute paid in conſequence thereof conſiſted of twenty-five thouſand head of black cattle, twenty pounds weight of gold, three hundred pounds weight of ſilver, and a great many hawks and hounds. Athelſtan's next concern was to puniſh the Corniſh Britons for the part they had taken in the late inſurrections, after which he took poſſeſſion of the iſlands of Scilly, and having annexed them to his dominions, ſat down to enjoy the fruits of his various triumphs in the tranquil arms of peace.

The greatneſs of Athelſtan's power, and the ſplendor of his fame, incited the principal princes of Chriſtendom to court his alliance and ſolicit his friendſhip. Three of his ſiſters were ſeverally requeſted in marriage; the firſt by the emperor Henry for his ſon Otho; the ſecond by Hugh, king of France, for his ſon; and the third by the prince of Aquitain for himſelf. The reſpective ambaſſadors from thoſe princes, brought ſuch a profuſion of rich preſents as had never before been ſeen in this nation, particularly a veſſel of onyx, admirably carved; a gold crown curiouſly ſet with diamonds; the banner and ſword of Conſtantine the Great, the hilt of the latter being overlaid with plates of gold, a variety of rich gems, coſtly perfumes, fine horſes with elegant capariſons, &c. &c.

This great prince died at Glouceſter, A. D. 941, in the forty-ſixth year of his age, and ſixteenth of his reign; and left behind him a character inferior to none of the Engliſh monarchs, Alfred excepted. Hiſtorians agree, that he was learned without being pedantic, polite without being frivolous, magnificent without profuſion, generous without oſtentation, and pious without ſuperſtition; he was an able general, a brave ſoldier, a conſummate politician, a ſedulous encourager of commerce, a ſincere friend, a forgiving enemy, and an indulgent maſter. His diſpoſition was ſo amiable, that he won the affections in peace of thoſe whom he conquered in war, and was equally formidable in the field and cabinet. He was not greater in his military and political, than in his legiſlative capacity, being conſidered as the beſt civilian, and moſt elegant Saxon writer of the age; as his laws are equally ſalutary and curious, we ſhall preſent our readers with the following abſtract of them.

The Iſt law requires, that if one conceals a thief, he ſhall pay the value of the thief's head, and the thief himſelf ſhall not be ſpared, who, if he contumaciouſly make reſiſtance, or fly for it, ſhall find no favour. A thief caſt into priſon ſhall ſtay there forty days, and then, after the payment of an hundred and twenty ſhillings, be diſcharged; but his kindred muſt give ſecurity for his future good behaviour: after which, if he ſteal again, they muſt either pay the value of his head, or bring him back to priſon. And in caſe any one reſiſt, he ſhall pay to the king, or to any other whom it concerns, the value of his own head; and if any ſtand by him (defend him) he ſhall pay to the king one hundred and twenty ſhillings.

The VIth law is againſt witchcrafts, enchantments, and ſuch like deeds that procure death: that if any one by them be made away, and the thing cannot be denied, ſuch practicers ſhall be put to death: but if they endeavour to purge themſelves, and be caſt by three fold ordeal, they ſhall lie in priſon an hundred and twenty days; which ended, then their kindred may redeem them by the payment of an hundred and twenty ſhillings to the king: and farther, pay to the kindred of the ſlain the full valuation of the party's head; and then the criminals ſhall alſo procure ſureties for their good behaviour for the time to come. The ſame puniſhment ſhall be inflicted on incendiaries, and ſuch as reſcue thieves: nay, ſuch as endeavour to reſcue them, though no man be wounded in the attempt, ſhall pay an hundred and twenty ſhillings to the king.—As for enchantments mentioned in this law, the Saxon word is Liblacum, which ſignifies the art of conjuration, or witchcraft; not all in general, but that ſort of it called properly faſcination or enchantment, uſed by certain ligatures, faſciæ, or bands.

The VIIth ordains concerning ſimple ordeal; that if one, accuſed ſeveral times of theft, be caſt by it, and have nobody to be ſurety for him, he ſhall be ſent to priſon, and thence freed by his kindred, as before ſaid.

The IXth forbids any commutation of goods, unleſs in the preſence of the king's reeve, the prieſt of the town, or the lord of the ſoil, or ſome other creditable perſon, under the penalty of thirty ſhillings, and the forfeiture of the things charged, to the lord of the ſoil: and if any ſhall bear witneſs, he ſhall be infamous, and no credit given to him ever after, and alſo ſhall forfeit thirty ſhillings.

The XIIth confirms the firſt part of the laws of king Edward the Elder, decreeing that no man buy any thing out of a town, which exceeds the value of twenty pence; and within the town, unleſs in the preſence of the port-reeve or ſome other creditable perſon, or elſe in the preſence of the king's ſheriff or juſtice, in folcmote.

The XIVth appoints, through all the king's dominions, that one and the ſame money be current: and that it ſhall not be coined out of ſome town; and if any minter or coiner ſhall debaſe the coin, he ſhall loſe his hand, which, being cut off, ſhall be affixed to the workhouſe: if any be accuſed of adulterating money, and will purge himſelf, he ſhall by the ordeal of hot iron cleanſe his hands of ſuch wickedneſs; but if by ordeal he be caſt, then he ſhall puniſhed as now was ſaid. Then follow the places appointed for public mints, viz. at Canterbury there ſhall be ſeven minters or coiners; whereof four for the king, two for the biſhop, and one for the abbot: at Rocheſter there ſhall be three; whereof two for the king, and the third for the biſhop: at London, eight, at Wincheſter ſix, at Lewes two, at Haſtings one, at Chicheſter one, at Hampton two, at Werham two, at Exceſter two, at Saliſbury as many, and in every other great town one.

That which follows commands, that for every plough a man ſhall keep two well-furniſhed horſemen.

The XVIIIth forbids horſes to be tranſported, except ſuch as are ſent abroad as free gifts or preſents.

The XXth law enacts, that if any one abſents himſelf from folcmote thrice, he ſhall be puniſhed as contumacious againſt the king, if ſo be that the holding of the aſſembly was declared a ſevennight before; in ſuch caſe, if he refuſe to do right, and pays not mulct to the king, the ancient men of the country are to go and ſeize upon all that he hath, and take ſecurity for his appearance.

The XXIId, in confirmation of a former law, requires that no perſon receive another man's man (as this law words it) into his family without leave firſt obtained of his maſter; he that doth otherwiſe ſhall reſtore the man, and pay the mulct of contumacy againſt the king. And no man is to put away his men, accuſed of any crime, till they have firſt made ſatisfaction.

The XXIVth is concerning traffic, and, in confirmation of former laws, ordains, that if a man buy any thing with witneſs, which another man challenges for his own, the ſeller ſhall make it good and ſecure the bargain, whether he be bond or free. But on the Lord's day no market ſhall be held, under penalty or for feiture of the wares, and a mulct of thirty ſhillings beſides.

In the year 928 he held the Synod of Greatly: The canons inſtituted were nine in number. The ſubſequent is the ſubſtance of the chief of them, with their remarkable introduction.

"I Athelſtan, king, by the advice of Wulfhelm my archbiſhop, and other my biſhops, command all my reeves, in the name of the Lord and his ſaints, that they do in the firſt place give tythes of all my eſtate, both of the living ſtock and of the fruits of the earth; and that all the biſhops do the ſame of all that belongs to them; and alſo my aldermen and reeves: and my will is, that my biſhops, and aldermen, and reeves give this in charge to all that are ſubject to them, and that they do it effectually by the time that we here fixed, that is, the Beheading of St. John Baptiſt. I Athelſtan, king, declare to all my reeves, with advice of archbiſhop, biſhops, and ſervants of God, that it is my will, that, for the forgiveneſs of my ſins, ye always feed one poor Engliſhman; and give him, from two of my farms, every month an amber of meal and a gammon of bacon, or one ram worth four-pence; and one ſhroud every year, for the twelve months' wear: and that ye ſet at liberty one that has, for his crimes, been condemned to ſlavery; for the mercies of Chriſt and for my love, with the teſtimony of the biſhop in whoſe diſtrict it is: and if the reeve withhold it, let him pay thirty ſhillings as a ſatisfaction; and let the money be diſtributed to the poor who dwell in the town where this omiſſion was made, under the teſtimony of the biſhop."

The IId article commands the magiſtrates to put the laws in execution againſt ſuch as were convicted by all the circumſtances of a trial by ordeal.

The IIId is againſt witchcraft, and robbers infeſting the highways.

The IVth regulates the number of mints.

The Vth preſcribes the circumſtances and ceremonies of the ordeal trial, by which a perſon may be known to be guilty or not. In this canon the prieſts are ſpoken of, as having fixed and ſettled places; and the accuſed perſon is permitted to have the conſecrated bread.

The VIIIth orders the biſhops to aſſiſt the judges in the execution of the laws, and to ſit upon the bench with them.

The IXth and laſt canon inflicts a fine upon ſuch magiſtrates as ſhould be found remiſs in their duty; which fine was to be paid to the biſhop of the dioceſe in which ſuch magiſtrate dwelt.

Annexed to the laws of king Athelſtan is the valuation of mens' heads, which was then conſidered according to the following eſtimate:

The king's	Head	30,000	Thrimſas, or pieces of ſilver of about three ſhillings value.
An archbiſhop, or earl's		15,000
A biſhop or alderman's		8,000
A general's, knight marſhal, or field marſhal's		4,000
A maſs-thane, or ſecural thane's		2,000
A peaſant's		267

The one half of theſe fines went to the kindred of the deceaſed, and the other half to the public treaſury. This king likewiſe ordered the bible to be tranſlated into the Anglo-Saxon tongue for the benefit of the common people.

Before we quit the reign of Athelſtan, it is neceſſary to take notice of the only imputation with which his character has been ſtained, viz. The murder of his brother Edwin. This, ſome writers tell us, was occaſioned by Athelſtan's jealouſy of the virtues and perſonal accompliſhments of Edwin, as well as his unqueſtionable legitimacy of birth; ſeveral writers ſay, that he was drowned by order of the king; others, that being expoſed in a rotten bark, without ſail, oars, or proviſions, and with only one ſervant, he was ſtimulated by deſpair to jump into the ſea, where he periſhed. But the moſt authentic hiſtorians affirm, that the accuſation is a falſehood, and William of Malmeſbury poſitively aſſerts, that the whole tale took its riſe from an old ballad.*

SECT. IX.

EDMUND THE FIRST.

As Athelſtan died without iſſue, he was ſucceeded by his brother Edmund, who, A. D. 941, was crowned at Kingſton upon Thames. Being only eighteen years of age at his acceſſion, the Danes deemed his nonage a fair opportunity to make another attempt for independency. In conſequence of theſe ſentiments, they invited to their aſſiſtance Anlaff the Iriſh king, and Olaus, the ſovereign of Norway, when both thoſe princes uniting their forces, landed in Northumberland, and being joined by the Engliſh-Danes, Anlaff took upon himſelf the ſupreme command. The confederates having over-run Northumberland, purſued their rout into Yorkſhire, took the city of York, and then penetrated into Mercia.

The young king, having been informed of their rapid progreſs, aſſembled what forces he could, and marched expeditiouſly towards the north. Having retaken many places from the enemy, and properly ſecured them with Engliſh garriſons, he proceeded to Weſt Cheſter, where he came up with the main body of the confederate army, and immediately prepared for battle. A bloody engagement enſued, which was fought till night parted the combatants with equal ſucceſs on both ſides; when Odo, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Wulſtan, archbiſhop of York, brought about a moſt ſhameful accommodation, for a peace was concluded on the following terms; that Edmund ſhould have all that part of the kingdom to the ſouth of † Watling Street, and Anlaff all the reſidue to the northward of the ſame. The artful Anlaff, by bribes, and a promiſe of becoming a chriſtian, won the venal archbiſhops to his intereſt; and they in return, perſuaded the young king to ſubſcribe to articles derogatory of his honour, and repugnant to his intereſt. Anlaff and Reginald were ſoon after baptized, and Edmund was obliged to be content with a diſmembered part of his own native kingdom.

* Antient writers have been fond of imputing the death of princes of the blood to the jealouſy of reigning princes; in ſome inſtances they have occaſion; in others they have only ſubſtituted their ſuggeſtions for facts, as we believe hath been the caſe with reſpect to Athelſtan. But the moſt ſingular circumſtance is, that the Scotch hiſtorians, through a mean national partiality, are not content to accuſe Athelſtan with the death of Edwin only, but charge him likewiſe with the murder of his brother Edred, though that prince not only lived after him, but reigned as king of England, ſubſequent to his death.

† Watling-ſtreet led from Dover to the coaſt over againſt the iſland of Angleſey and paſſed through London, Dunſtable, Towceſter, Allerſton, &c. and croſſed the Severn near the Wreakin, in Shropſhire.

The young monarch, however, was ſoon ſenſible how infamouſly he had been impoſed on, for A. D. 944 he raiſed a powerful army, expelled both Anlaff and Reginald from Northumbria, and ſubjected the whole country to his own controul.

The petty prince of Cumberland having aſſiſted the Northumbrians in their revolt, Edmund deprived him of his territories, and gave them to Malcolm, king of Scotland, ſubject to this condition; that he ſhould aſſiſt the Engliſh upon all emergencies, and join his own with their forces, both by ſea and land, to repel all foreign invaders.

After this, king Edmund reigned in peace, beloved by his ſubjects, and reſpected by his neighbours, till the hand of a ruffian deprived the nation of a moſt worthy and promiſing prince, his death being compaſſed in the following manner:

On the 6th of May, A. D. 946, the king and principal nobility repaired to Prickle-church, in Glouceſterſhire, in order to keep the feaſt of St. Auguſtin in the moſt ſolemn manner. During the entertainment, the king obſerved at the end of the table, one Leof, a notorious criminal, who had been baniſhed a few years before for his mal-practices. Being naturally of a raſh diſpoſition, he flew at the fellow in order to give him manual chaſtiſement for his preſumption in appearing there. Leof, thinking his death inevitable, and determined to ſell his life as dear as poſſible, drew out a ſhort dagger and gave the king a mortal wound, of which he preſently expired. The nobles aſſaulted the murderer, who defended himſelf with the moſt undaunted fury, till being overpowered by numbers, he was cut to pieces. At the time of this fatal event, the king was only in the twenty-fifth year of his age, and ſeventh of his reign. His body was buried at Glaſtonbury, St. Dunſtan being then abbot; and the town where he was killed was confiſcated, and given to the monaſtery in which he was interred, that a certain number of maſſes might be ſung for his ſoul.

SECT. X.

EDRED.

EDRED, the brother of the late king, was elected to the throne, as that monarch's two ſons, Edwy and Edgar, were then infants, the eldeſt being only four years of age. Edred was therefore crowned at Kingſton upon Thames, aſſumed the reins of government accordingly, and was the firſt ſovereign of this country, who, in his public writings, ſtiled himſelf king of Great Britain, or Monarch of all England.

The Northumbrians, whom neither gratitude could bind, or oaths reſtrain, no ſooner heard of the death of Edmund than they openly revolted. By pretending to aim at freedom, they ſought every opportunity of ſhaking off all obedience to regal government, and with the claim of independency diſguiſed their propenſity to commit all manner of depredations. Edred, on being apprized of their motions, raiſed an army and marched towards the north with great alacrity; but being a prince of a moſt humane diſpoſition, in order to prevent the effuſion of blood, he was willing to try the moſt lenient before he proceeded to coercive meaſures. To effect, if poſſible, an amicable accommodation, he deputed the celebrated Turketyl to receive their oaths of allegiance in his name. The king's benevolent purpoſe ſucceeded, that able ſtateſman prevailed upon the chief Northumbrians to return to their duty, and the king of Scotland, who had inſidiouſly ſpirited on the revolters, thought proper to ſubmit, and take an oath of fealty, in order to avert the impending vengeance of the juſtly incenſed Edred. Peace being thus to all appearance reſtored in the north, the king began to march ſouthward with his forces. But he was no ſooner gone than the faithleſs Northumbrians broke the oaths they had ſo lately taken, invited Anlaff again from Ireland, and A. D. 949, once more appeared in open rebellion. Wulſtan, archbiſhop of York, treacherouſly joined this confederacy, which at length became ſo conſiderable as to threaten a dangerous revolution. Anlaff was for ſome time the commander of the combined forces, but his haughty, and tyrannical diſpoſition ſoon diſpleaſed the Northumbrians, and co-operating with their own natural inconſtancy, induced them to depoſe him from the chief command, which they beſtowed on Eric a Dane.

Edred having raiſed a conſiderable army, marched towards Northumberland, and on his approach, Edric, in a daſtardly manner, fled into Scotland. The Northumbrians finding themſelves thus deſerted by a man whom they had ſo highly favoured, and even dignified with the title of king, made the moſt abject ſubmiſſions to Edred, profeſſed the profoundeſt penitence for their treachery, and promiſed the moſt inviolable fidelity for the future. The king imprudently believed them ſincere, received them again into favor, and with a degree of weakneſs, politically unpardonable, reſtored Eric to the dignity from which he had fled. Thinking their fealty fixed by the infinite obligations they owed him, and meaſuring their gratitude by his own beneficence, Edred thought himſelf in perfect ſecurity, and began his march back again in a very incautious manner. Eric obſerving the want of ſuſpicion, and total relaxation of diſcipline in the Engliſh army, determined to avail himſelf of a negligence ſo invitingly convenient. Impelled therefore by the blackeſt treachery, he ſallied from York and aſſaulted the rear of Edred's forces at a place called Caſterford. The Engliſh, however, collected themſelves with great expedition, formed a compact body, and being animated by the intrepidity of Edred, repulſed their enemies with conſiderable ſlaughter. The injured monarch, exaſperated at this ingratitude, determined to lay waſte the country with fire and ſword. But the wily Northumbrians dreading his vengeance, and wiſhing to appeaſe his wrath, accuſed Wulſtan, archbiſhop of York, and Eric, their prince, with being the ſole cauſe of the late treacherous proceedings. To evince their ſincerity, they ſacrificed the latter to their own ſecurity by murdering him, and ſeizing the former gave him up to the power of the king. Upon theſe conceſſions, the eaſy monarch forgave theſe inſidious people, but prudently deprived them of all fortified places. Wulſtan was committed cloſe priſoner for ſome time, but at length releaſed through the clemency of Edred; and peace being reſtored throughout the nation, this prince diſbanded his forces.

Edred ſoon after fell into a languiſhing diſtemper that terminated in his death, which happened on the 23d of November, A. D. 955. This prince mingled the greateſt clemency with the moſt intrepid valour, and felt more pleaſure in forgiving than conquering. He had many accompliſhments, and few faults. Hiſtorians indeed inform us, that in ſome particulars he was ſuperſtitiouſly weak, and imprudently ſubmiſſive to Dunſtan, abbot of Glaſtonbury. To this haughty prelate he committed all his affairs, both ſpiritual and temporal, and even intruſted him with conſiderable ſums of the national treaſure. On his death bed the king ſent for Dunſtan, in order to give him directions for the diſpoſal of the money; but the prelate, that he might have an opportunity of keeping it to himſelf, procraſtinated his attendance till the monarch expired; by which embezzlement, he was afterwards enabled to outvie the principal nobility in luxurious living.

Though Edred had two ſons, viz. Bertfrid, and Elfrid, yet Edwy, the ſon of his brother Edmund was placed upon the throne, having been only previouſly excluded on account of nonage, and now being deemed fit to reign.

SECT. XI.

E D W Y.

EDWY was only fourteen years of age when he aſcended the throne, but the majeſty of his mein, the beauty of his features, and graces of his perſon beggared all deſcription. Indeed his exterior form was ſo univerſally admired, that he was called Puncalus, or Peculiarly Fair. But the mind of Edwy did not correſpond with his perſon, he had the ſuſceptibility of a woman, rather than the fortitude of a ſovereign, and being of a licentious diſpoſition thought little of ſacrificing his dignity to his pleaſure. His weakneſs degenerated into vice, and his vices, as is uſually the caſe, became the inſtruments of his deſtruction.

On the day of his coronation he gave a very imprudent ſpecimen of his diſpoſition, by ſtealing from his nobles in the midſt of their feſtivity to indulge his paſſions with the lady Ethelgiva and her mother. Theſe ladies, it appears, were equally remarkable for their attractions, the daughter diſplaying thoſe charms in bloom, which in the mother were ripened into the maturity of beauty. The heart of the young monarch was forcibly impreſſed with the captivating images of both, and the ladies were ſo politically diſcreet as to wiſh rather to manage his affections between them, than to loſe him totally by a profeſſed rivalſhip. The behaviour of the king was conſidered by his nobles as an unpardonable ſlight, yet none choſe to undertake the office of repreſenting to him the abſurdity of his conduct, till the abbot Dunſtan, exaſperated by his levity, offered to bring him back again to the hall of entertainment. Penetrating to the place of his ſecluſion he drew him reluctantly, and by force from the ſcene of dalliance. The ladies were exceedingly nettled at ſuch apparent inſolence, and the nobles were aſtoniſhed at this cavalier treatment of a crowned head, while the young king bluſhed reſentment againſt the prelate.

The conſequence of this ſingular occurrence was an inveterate hatred which Edwy conceived againſt the monks in general, and Dunſtan in particular. Indeed it muſt be confeſſed, that if the behaviour of the king was unprincely and impolite, that of the prelate was audacious and over-bearing. The firſt may find an excuſe in the indiſcretion of youth, but the motives of the latter can only be imputed to the imperious dictates of arrogance. Edwy being urged by his favorite ladies, and ſtimulated by his own deſire of revenge, cited Dunſtan to give an account of the treaſures entruſted to him by the late king, which he not being able to do was baniſhed to Flanders.

The eccleſiaſtics in general were alarmed at the king's proceedings, and Odo, archbiſhop of Canterbury, thinking the young monarch only a tool to his paſſions, determined to ſacrifice the ladies to his reſentment, on a pretence of their having made the king their inſtrument. As this prelate was exceeding powerful, and the king had been ſo careleſs as not to provide proper guards for his own perſonal ſecurity, Odo found it an eaſy matter to ſeize Ethelgiva in the palace. Edwy not having either ſufficient authority, or force to protect her, ſhe was dragged to the houſe of the prelate, who, equally inſenſible to her charms and ſupplications, ordered her beautiful face to be branded with hot irons, and not contented with this ſavage aſperity, he condemned her to be baniſhed to Ireland. What became of the mother, hiſtory does not inform us; but from the diſpoſition of Odo, it may naturally be inferred, that ſhe partook in ſome meaſure of the rigour extended towards her daughter.

The king ſaw with extreme vexation that Odo was too powerful for him to attempt to puniſh him for his audacity. However, to give ſome vent to his reſentment, he wreaked his vengeance upon the monks, whom he expelled his territories. Thus the inconſiderate monarch and haughty prelate continued to mortify each other, till the latter ſpirited up prince Edgar to an open rebellion againſt his brother.

Edgar was a prince of an enterprizing genius, and an ambitious ſpirit. The archbiſhop, therefore, found but little difficulty in perſuading him to revolt. His own aggrandizement, and the approbation of the clergy overbalanced fraternal bonds and natural allegiance; and the ſanction of the Northumbrian and Mercian forces confirmed him in the deſign of dethroning his brother Edwy. In A. D. 957, the rebellion became too powerful to be eaſily ſuppreſſed, and the weak monarch, inſtead of exerting a ſuitable ſpirit, fled to Glouceſter, and immured himſelf within its walls in a fit of deſpair. Edgar took advantage of this irreſolution, and ſummoned together the principal nobility, both ſpiritual and temporal. As the nation in general was prepoſſeſſed in his favour, he was unanimouſly elected to the ſovereign authority, and his brother declared incapable of any longer reigning. The unfortunate Edwy ſurvived this popular injuſtice about two years, and then dying of a broken heart A. D. 959, his body was interred at Wincheſter, in the new monaſtery.

SECT. XII.

EDGAR.

EDGAR, during the life of his brother, winked at his remaining poſſeſſed of a trifling part of his patrimony, and on the death of Edwy became the ſole monarch of the kingdom.

Edgar dreading the diſfavor of the clergy, the fatal rock on which his brother had ſplit, did all he could to conciliate their affections, and as a prelude to his future favors, recalled Dunſtan, and loaded him with obligations, making him firſt biſhop of Wincheſter, then advancing him to the ſee of London, and afterwards promoting him to the archbiſhopric of Canterbury. He then turned his whole thoughts to the moſt laudable thing which can poſſibly engroſs the attention of an Engliſh monarch; that is, the improvement of his navy, the only abſolute bulwark, and real ſtrength of this kingdom. A fleet of 3800 ſhips was accordingly fitted out by his command, to cruize round the whole iſland, and ſecure it by a formidable floating fortification. This truly patriotic work, and the favor of the monks, have ſecured his reputation from, or at leaſt counterpoized the innumerable ſtains which would have otherwiſe been thrown upon it.

Having, with ſuch prudence, ſecured his dominions from foreign invaſion, he determined, as much as poſſible, to prevent domeſtic inſurrections. The principal objects of his jealouſy were the ever reſtleſs Northumbrians, whoſe ſtrong holds he garriſoned with troops on whom he could depend. It is true, theſe people aſſiſted him in depoſing his brother; but this very reaſon rendered him ſuſpicious of what deſigns their natural inconſtancy might induce them to entertain againſt himſelf. So juſt is the old proverb, that thoſe who love the treaſon, hate the traitor; and ſuch in all ages hath been the reward of treachery.

In order to ſecure Kennith, the third king of Scotland in his intereſt, he allowed him to do homage for, and hold in vaſſalage, the country of Lothian, and city of Edinburgh. This induced Maccuſe, king of the Iſles, the chief, or Galloway and Dinnal, and the petty princes of Wales to ſubmit to his ſovereign authority, and ſue for his protection. Thus was Edgar conſidered in ſtrength, riches and policy, as one of the moſt conſiderable monarchs in Europe; many princes ſought his alliance, all commercial ſtates courted his friendſhip, and were happy to trade under his auſpices; his cruizers cleared the northern parts of the world from pirates, his prodigious fleet rendered him the moſt formidable naval power in the univerſe, and it was now that England was firſt conſidered as Miſtreſs of the Ocean.

The powerful Edgar at length thought proper to ſummon his vaſſal princes to do him homage; in conſequence of which order they all repaired to Cheſter, being eight in number, viz. Kennith, king of Scotland, Malcolm, king of Cumberland, Maccuſe, king of the Iſles, with Duſwal, Griffith, Huwald, Jacob, and Judehill, petty kings of Wales. Having received the uſual homage, Edgar went into a royal barge, and was rowed up the river Dee by theſe eight tributary kings, another barge containing the principal nobility, attending the triumph; in this manner he proceeded to the monaſtery of St. John the Baptiſt, where, having heard a complimentary oration, he returned with the ſame oſtentation to his palace.

England and Wales being greatly infeſted with wolves, Edgar, in the year 961, conceived the laudable and patriotic deſign of entirely freeing this country from thoſe dangerous and deſtructive animals. To effect this, he changed the tribute paid annually by the Welch in money, and cattle, to the payment of three hundred wolves heads yearly; which expedient proved ſo ſucceſsful, that in a few years, the whole breed was extirpated, and this iſland totally cleared from thoſe voracious creatures.

Impartiality now obliges us to relate ſome things which eclipſe the glories of this great monarch's reign, and appear as foils to the ſhining parts of his character. The poet may draw characters as he pleaſes, but the candid hiſtorian is obliged to take things as he finds them, and to dreſs them in the colours of truth, though the object ſhould be rendered leſs favorable to the ſight.

The principal accuſation againſt him is the rape of Wilfrida. This beautiful lady his inordinate deſires led him to purſue into a cloiſter, from whence he took her by force, and compelled her to become his concubine. For this offence the archbiſhop Dunſtan enjoyned him a ſeven years penance. At another time coming to Andover, he was informed of a young lady of ſingular beauty who reſided in that place. The mere deſcription of her charms inflamed him to deſire poſſeſſion; the admonitions of the archbiſhop, and late preſcribed penance, were forgotten.—He therefore ſent to inform her mother that he intended to pay the young lady a viſit; the virtuous matron, unable to contend with ſo much power, and unwilling to be acceſſary to her daughter's proſtitution, determined to deceive the amorous monarch by a ſtratagem: to effect this, inſtead of her daughter ſhe introduced her maid ſervant to the king's bed in the dark, as darkneſs was a ſtipulation in favor of the ſuppoſed young lady's modeſty. In the morning before the dawn could permit him to diſcover the deception, the girl attempted to ſteal from him as ſhe had been previouſly commanded by her miſtreſs. The king overhearing her, demanded why ſhe meant to leave him ſo ſoon, when the girl innocently replied, that ſhe was obliged to go and do the work her miſtreſs had ordered her. The king, from this expreſſion, immediately perceived the impoſture, and at firſt was tranſported with rage; when the girl fell upon her knees, and entreated the monarch to free her from the cruel tyranny of her lady, as a recompence for having ſacrificed her virtue to him. At length, recollecting himſelf, he thought the affair beneath his reſentment, turned the whole into a jeſt, and being highly pleaſed with the girl herſelf, he took her to court with him, and attached himſelf to her with a degree of conſtancy, little to be expected from one of his fickle diſpoſition, as we find he kept to her only till his marriage with the beautiful Elfrida broke off the connection. The circumſtances preceding the marriage was likewiſe too ſingular to be omitted, as they coincide with the above examples in conferring the character which is univerſally given of this monarch. Elfrida, the daughter of Ordgar, earl of Devonſhire, was ſo exceedingly beautiful, that it was impoſſible to behold without loving her. Her father, ſenſible of the danger to which her captivating charms would expoſe her, had educated her in a moſt recluſe manner. His precaution, however, could not prevent Edgar from being apprized of her attraction; his emiſſaries were laviſh in their applauſe of her perſon, features, and accompliſhments. The king's paſſions were inflamed, and intereſted by the deſcription, he therefore ſent his favorite Athelwald on a viſit to the earl of Devonſhire, that he might have an opportunity of ſeeing the lady, and informing him if ſhe merited the encomiums paſſed upon her.

Athelwald no ſooner beheld the lovely Elfrida, than he became the captive of her charms, and inſtantly determined to ſacrifice the fidelity he owed to the king to the paſſion he had conceived for the lady. Fraught with theſe ſentiments, he deceived the amorous monarch by repreſenting Elfrida as totally unworthy of his regard, and ſo far from being a beauty, that ſhe could ſcarce be deemed tolerable. The paſſions of the king, which was founded only on the inflammatory eulogiums of his courtiers, vaniſhed with the forbidding deſcription of his favorite. This tranquil appearance Athelwald determined to improve to his own advantage, by inſinuating in the moſt artful manner that the lady, though unworthy of the notice of a great monarch, was on account of her immenſe poſſeſſions, a deſirable object for a ſubject; and at length craved the king's permiſſion to marry, in order to improve his own fortune by the addition of her wealth and eſtate. Edgar not in the leaſt ſuſpecting the perfidy of his favorite, freely gave his conſent, when Athelwald found no difficulty in gaining the lady, as her father approved of the match, on account of the reputed power of the bridegroom with the king.

Edgar was ſoon apprized of the whole affair, when, being determined to puniſh the breach of confidence in his favorite, it occured to him to diſſemble as Athelwald had done; in conſequence of which he one day informed Athelwald that he intended to take the pleaſure of hunting upon his eſtate, and to repoſe himſelf at leaſt one night at his houſe. Athelwald was greatly alarmed at this intimation, but knew of no feaſible excuſe to prevent the intended viſit, and therefore turned his whole attention to elude the king's reſentment.—Informing his wife of the affair, he entreated her to diſguiſe herſelf ſo as to conceal her beauty, and render her charms leſs conſpicuous. The lady, now firſt ſenſible of the affront put upon her attractions, and not conſidering that love was the occaſion, came to a reſolution of ſacrificing her huſband to her ambition. Regardleſs of her conjugal vows, and forgetting her duty, inſtead of diſguiſing her charms ſhe ſet them off with all the blandiſhments that art could beſtow, and decorated her perſon with every elegancy that taſte could invent. The king no ſooner ſaw her than he became a victim to a thouſand irreſiſtable graces, ſhe triumphed in his heart, and her huſband's ruin, which he had before ſurmized, was now fully reſolved on. The king, however, ſtill diſſembled his purpoſe, in order to be the more ſecure of his revenge; and taking Athelwald with him to hunt in Harewood Foreſt, he there gratified his reſentment by running a lance through his body.---A natural ſon of Athelwald's happened to paſs by at the ſame time, to whom the king ſternly ſaid, "How do you like this game?" To this demand the daſtardly ſycophant unnaturally replied, "What pleaſes your majeſty ought not to diſpleaſe me." Finding the obſequiouſneſs of the youth, Edgar placed him about his own perſon, and conferred on him many favors. Agreeable to the abſurd ſuperſtition of the times, Edgar, to make the widow amends for the loſs of her huſband, married her himſelf, gratifying thus his own libidinous paſſion, under the ſanction of an act of juſtice; and ſhe, with an equal affectation of piety, built a nunnery on the ſpot where her huſband was murdered, in order to expiate her ſhare of the horrid crime. With ſuch ridiculous retaliations did the ignorance of thoſe fallacious times abound.

The king, though in ſome particulars thus licentious himſelf, did all in his power to prevent intemperance in others. He took great pains to reſtrain drunkenneſs, which was then a reigning vice; and for this laudable purpoſe ordered that ſilver pins ſhould be fixed to the ſides of the cups and pots at certain diſtances, beyond which it was unlawful to drink at one draught. His next care was to make a reform in the manners of the clergy, whoſe lives were ſo exceeding ſcandalous as to give great offence to the people in general; this great work he entruſted to the conduct of Dunſtan, archbiſhop of Canterbury, Ethelwald, biſhop of Wincheſter, and Oſwald, biſhop of Worceſter.

Edgar had filled the throne fifteen years before he was crowned, which was owing to his continual debaucheries; for by a law then in being, the uſe of the ſacred unction to perſons under eccleſiaſtical cenſure was abſolutely forbidden, and Edgar was ſo perpetually committing offences, and doing penance for them, that no previous opportunity could be found; however, the ceremony was at length performed at Bath, on Whitſunday, A. D. 973, by the archbiſhop Dunſtan. In a ſhort time after, an inſurrection happened in Wales, where Jago, a Welch prince, having depoſed his brother, the ſon of the latter drove the uſurper from the throne, and reſtored his father. Jago applied to Edgar for aſſiſtance, who interpoſing in the affair, the diſpute was at length compromiſed, and the country divided between the two brothers.

Edgar died in the prime of life, only two years after his coronation, on the 8th of July, A. D. 975, in the ſixteenth year of his reign, and only the thirty-third year of his age.

The reign of this monarch was the moſt ſplendid of any, previous to the conqueſt, and his life a ſtrange mixture of virtues and vices. He was brave, magnificent and generous, an excellent ſcholar, profound politician, and admirable legiſlator; but at the ſame time, he was oſtentatious, vain, laſcivious, and revengeful. His ſtature was low, and his make ſlender, but he poſſeſſed great ſtrength, ſpirits, and activity. The following anecdote, reſpecting his perſonal courage, deſerves mention. Kennith, king of Scotland, who was of a gigantic ſtature, made uſe of ſome ſarcaſtic expreſſions concerning Edgar's diminutiveneſs. The Engliſh monarch, being apprized of this, one day walked out with Kennith, and drew him to a private place, when pulling out two ſwords, which he had concealed beneath his garments, he preſented one of them to the Scotch king, telling him at the ſame time, that having heard of the improper freedoms he had taken with reſpect to his perſon, he thought proper to convince him, that a great ſoul might reſide in a ſmall body, and that a gigantic ſtature ought to be no protection for inſolence. Kennith was both aſtoniſhed and aſhamed at this addreſs and challenge, and being daunted at Edgar's greatneſs of ſoul, begged pardon for his indiſcreet expreſſions, and made ſuch an apology as appeaſed Edgar, who, upon his ſubmiſſion, eaſily forgave him.

We have no doubt but Edgar's character would have been painted in much darker colours by the monks, (the only hiſtorians of thoſe times) had he not been ſo great a friend to their order: For, in a convention of the clergy, he addreſſed himſelf to the monks in general, and the archbiſhop Dunſtan in particular, in an oration that at once evinced his eloquence, and his reſpect for the regular clergy of the church; which, as it is a curioſity, we ſhall here preſent to our readers:

"Since God hath pleaſed, moſt reverend father, to ſhew his goodneſs to us in a remarkable manner, it is moſt reaſonable that we ſhould exert our endeavours to make a ſuitable return; and ſince he has given us ſo large a command, it is our duty to employ our authority to his honour, and bring our ſubjects to the obſervance of his laws. Now as it is my office to inſpect the conduct of the laity, to take care that there be no ſtop upon juſtice, to puniſh the ſacrilegious, to correct the ungovernable, to protect the weak againſt the mighty, and to deliver the poor from him that is too ſtrong for him; ſo I am likewiſe concerned to promote the intereſt of the church, to enquire into the behaviour of the clergy and religious, to ſee that they manage themſelves ſuitably to their character; whether they are careful in the adminiſtration of their office, and conſtant in their inſtructions; whether they are moderate in their refreſhments, regular in their habit, prudent and equitable in deciding the cauſes that come before them.

"And, under favour, reverend father, if you had looked thoroughly into theſe matters, we had never had the diſſatisfaction of receiving ſo ſcandalous a charge againſt the clergy: and here not to mention their failings in the ſhape of the tonſure, not to mention this, I ſay, what effeminacy do they diſcover in their habit, what haughtineſs in their geſture and motion, what licence in their diſcourſe and converſation: and are not theſe all ſigns that things are terribly out of order within? Then as to the buſineſs of their function, with what negligence is the divine ſervice performed: they will ſcarce vouchſafe their company at the holy vigils; and when they enter upon the moſt ſolemn parts of religion, they appear with a foreign air, and fall ſhort of the gravity of the occaſion. I am ſorry to ſay how exceſſive they are in their entertainments, how much they are governed by an intemperate appetite, and what lengths they have taken in libertine practice; thus the encouragements of religion are perverted, and the bounty of princes abuſed. Had our anceſtors foreſeen their liberality would have been ſquandered away thus profuſely, and ſpent upon luxury and diſorder, they would certainly have held their hand. And if all this miſbehaviour had been private and unobſerved, the caſe had been more tolerable; but, alas! the crimes break out into public notice, and the ſcandal grows notorious; and yet, methinks, the liberty is ſtrangely connived at and overlooked by the prelacy: would not the ſword of Levi, would not the zeal of Simeon, be ſeaſonably drawn and exerted upon this occaſion? Where is the ſpirit of Moſes, who puniſhed the idolatry of the golden calf in his own blood and relations? Where is Phineas's lance, to purſue debauchery and execute juſtice without delay? And yet we ſee this ſeverity of zeal, this ſudden revenge, was acceptable to God

Almighty. What is become of St. Peter's indignation and cenſure againſt ſimony and covetouſneſs? You that are the prieſts of the moſt high God, ought to copy the proceedings, and be governed by the precedents, of him you repreſent. It is high time to appear againſt thoſe who have broke through the rules of duty and religion. I have Conſtantine's, and you have St. Peter's ſword; let us join our force, and unite our reſpective authorities, that by employing the ſpiritual and civil power in the ſame cauſe, and being thus aſſiſtant to each other, the lepers may be diſcharged the camp, the holy ſanctuary may be cleaned, and the ſons of Levi put into the temple miniſtrations: of Levi, I ſay, who was governed by no partialities to his relations; who ſaid unto his father and his mother, I have not ſeen him, neither did he acknowledge his brethren. Awaken your diſcipline, therefore, I beſeech you, that we may not repent our bounty, nor be ſorry for our kindneſs to the church; let the diſreſpect ſhewn to the relicts of the ſaints, let the prophaning the altars with unſuitable approaches, provoke you to animadverſion, and do not ſuffer the piety of our anceſtors to be defeated any longer. You know how much my father, grandfather, great grandfather, &c. have leſſened their royal revenues, and exhauſted their exchequer, in religious benefactions.

"Moſt reverend father Dunſtan, I deſire you would raiſe your imagination upon this occaſion: pray look up to heaven a little; fancy you ſee my father in his ſtation of glory, glittering among the ſtars, and ready to launch himſelf from the ſky; imagine you hear him deliver himſelf to you in this language of expoſtulation and complaint: "O venerable father Dunſtan, you uſed to ſuggeſt ſerviceable advice to me about the building of churches and monaſteries; you prompted my piety upon all opportunities, and aſſiſted in the execution of the project; I pitched upon you particularly for my paſtor and ſpiritual father, for the guardian of my ſoul and the inſpector of my behaviour; and did I not always comply with whatever you ſuggeſted? Did I not always prefer your advice to patrimony and treaſure? How frankly have I laid out my fortune on your propoſals; my diſtributions of charity were always ready, when you called for them. If land or privilege was deſired for the church, it was done as ſoon as mentioned; if you complained the monks or clergy were ſhort in their conveniencies, they were immediately ſupplied by the court. You uſed to tell me, that the beſt uſe of money was to ſpend it upon the church and poor; that ſuch liberalities would prove immortal in the benefit, help towards an atonement for our failings, and prove the greateſt charities to the giver. And is it not an intolerable miſapplication, that this holy revenue ſhould be expended upon women, and miſemployed for the ſupport of vanity and unneceſſary figure? What can you anſwer to ſuch a charge as this?"

"I am convinced (ſays king Edgar) moſt holy father, that this is none of your fault: when you ſaw a thief, you conſented not unto him, neither have you been partaker with the adulterers. No, you have entreated and menaced, but all to no purpoſe: and ſince words ſignify nothing, it is time to riſe in your diſcipline, and come to blows. For this purpoſe you ſhall be ſure not to want the countenance of royal authority: you have likewiſe Ethelwald and Oſwald, the right reverend fathers of Wincheſter and Worceſter, ready to aſſiſt you. I give you three a joint commiſſion for this purpoſe, and refer the management wholly to you; it is your part, therefore, to exert the epiſcopal authority in conjunction with that of the crown, to expel the diſorderly clergy from the monaſteries, and put in ſuch as live regularly in their place."

Edgar enacted ſome ſalutary laws, both eccleſiaſtical and civil.

Of the Eccleſiaſtical.

The Iſt is concerning the immunities of the church, and about paying tythes out of the lands of the thanes, as well as of thoſe of ceorles, or countrymen.

The IId is concerning the payment of tythes and firſt-fruits, as well where a thane had a church with a burying place, as alſo where he had not.

The IIId appoints the times the tythes ſhould be paid at; and what remedy was to be had, in caſe they were not paid at the time when they were due.

The IVth ordains at what time of the year Peterpence ſhould be paid, and the penalty that ſhould be incurred by thoſe that ſhould neglect to pay them in accordingly.

The laſt ordains every Sunday to be kept holy, and to begin at three o'clock in the afternoon on Saturday, and to end at break of day on Monday, upon the penalty appointed by the Judiciary Book.

The ſecular laws were as follow:

The Iſt enjoins, that every man, poor or rich, enjoy the benefit of the law, and have equal juſtice done him. And for puniſhments, he would have them ſo moderate, that being accommodated to the divine clemency, they may be the more tolerable unto men.

The IId forbids appeals to the king in ſuits, except juſtice cannot be otherwiſe obtained: and if a man be oppreſſed, he may betake himſelf to the king for relief. And in caſe a pecuniary mulct be inflicted for a fault, it muſt not exceed the value of the man's head.

The IIId impoſes a mulct of an hundred and twenty ſhillings to the king, upon a judge that paſſes an unjuſt ſentence againſt any man, except ſuch judge will take his oath that he did it not out of any malice, but only from unſkilfulneſs and miſtake in judgment; and in ſuch caſe he is to be removed from his place, unleſs he can obtain favour of the king longer to retain it: and then the biſhop of the dioceſe is to ſend the mulct impoſed upon him, to the king's treaſure.

The IVth commands, that whoſoever maliciouſly ſhall defame another man, whereby he receives any damage, either in body or eſtate, ſo that the defamed party can clear himſelf in thoſe reports and prove them falſe, then the defamer's tongue ſhall be cut out, or he ſhall redeem it with the value of his head.

The Vth is to the ſame effect as in another law we have formerly cited, commanding every one to be preſent at the witena-gemote, or aſſembly of the hundred: and farther ordains, that the burghmotes, or aſſemblies of the great towns or cities, be held thrice a year; and the ſhiregemotes, or the general meetings of the whole county, twice; whereat were to be preſent the biſhop and the alderman, the one to teach the people God's laws, and the other man's.

The VIth requires that every man find ſureties for his good behaviour; and in caſe any man commit a crime and fly for it, the ſureties ſhould undergo what ſhould be laid upon him. If he ſtole any thing, and be taken within a twelvemonth, he ſhould be brought to juſtice, and then the ſureties ſhould receive back what they had paid on his account.

The VIIth ordains, that when any one of evil report is again accuſed of a crime, and abſents himſelf from the witena-gemotes or public meetings, ſome of the court ſhall go where he dwells, and take ſureties for his appearance, if they may be had; but if they cannot get them, then they ſhould take him alive or dead, and ſeize on all his eſtate, whereof the complaining party having received ſuch a ſhare as ſhould ſatisfy him, the one half of the remainder ſhould go to the lord of the ſoil, and the other half to the hundred. And if any of that court, being either akin to the party, or a ſtranger to his blood, refuſe to go to put this in execution, he ſhall forfeit an hundred and twenty ſhillings to the king. And further, that ſuch as are taken in the very act of ſtealing, or betraying their maſters, ſhould not be pardoned during life.

The VIIIth and laſt ordains, that one and the ſame money ſhould be current throughout the king's dominions, which no man muſt refuſe: and that the meaſure of Wincheſter ſhould be the ſtandard; and that a weight of wool ſhould be ſold for half a pound of money, and no more. The former of theſe is the firſt law whereby the private mints to the archbiſhops and ſeveral abbots being forbid, the king's coin was only to paſs.

Edgar had iſſue by his firſt wife Elfleda, Edward, who ſucceeded him on the throne; and his ſecond wife Elfrida bore him two ſons, viz. Ethelred, who afterwards became king of England, and Edmund, who died when he was only four years of age. He had likewiſe a natural daughter by Wilfrida, the lady whom he ſtole out of a nunnery. This child, whoſe name was Editha, was afterwards a nun in the ſame cloiſter from whence her mother had been taken, and became equally celebrated for the graces of her perſon, as for the piety of her ſoul.

SECT. XIII.

Edward the Younger, commonly called Edward the Martyr.

ON the demiſe of Edgar, two powerful parties were formed, the one in favor of Edward, and the other of Ethelred. Dunſtan was at the head of the former, and the queen Dowager Elfrida of the latter; but the archbiſhop and the monkiſh party prevailed. In conſequence of which Edward was crowned at Kingſton upon Thames, being then but little more than fourteen years of age. And Elfrida with her ſon Ethelred retired in diſguſt to Corfe-Caſtle, in Dorſetſhire.

This reign was not remarkable for any thing but the feuds between the monks, and ſecular clergy, the appearance of ſeveral comets, a malignant diſorder which deſtroyed a great number of cattle, and a dreadful famine that greatly diſtreſſed the land. As ſo many diſagreeable circumſtances immediately forerun, it was uſually ſurmiſed that they were ſupernatural portents of the untimely death of the king, and the ſubſequent miſeries in which this nation was involved.

The young king being one day hunting near the caſtle, to which the queen Dowager had retired, grew fatigued with the chace, and determined to call on his ſtep-mother Elfrida, to whom he had always borne the greateſt affection, and ſhewn the utmoſt reſpect. On his arrival at Corfe-Caſtle, ſhe preſſed him to enter, in order to repoſe himſelf; but the king unwilling to alarm his attendants, whom he had dropped in the chace, replied, that he would not at that time alight, but only juſt refreſh himſelf with a cup of wine, as he was exceeding thirſty. The wine was brought, and the cruel Dowager not being able to entice him into the caſtle, gave private orders to a ruffian to aſſaſſinate him while he was drinking. The villain too effectually performed his commiſſion, by giving the king a mortal ſtab juſt as he was liſting the goblet to his head. The unfortunate monarch finding himſelf wounded, clapped ſpurs to his horſe, and rode away at full ſpeed. The loſs of blood, however, ſoon rendered him ſo weak that he fell, and his foot catching in the ſtirrup, he was dragged a conſiderable way, and expired in that miſerable condition. His horſe at length ſtopped of itſelf, and the king's corpſe much bruiſed and defaced, was found by ſome of Elfrida's domeſtics, who had traced it by the blood, and interred privately at Wareham, in Dorſetſhire. But Duke Elfer, who had been privy to the murder, ſtimulated by the horrors of his conſcience, afterwards had it taken up, and royally interred at Shafteſbury, in the monaſtery founded by Alfred. This fatal cataſtrophe beſel the young monarch A. D. 979, in the eighteenth year of his age, and fourth of his reign. All that we know of this prince's character is, that he was of a humane, and meek diſpoſition, had always behaved with the moſt profound reſpect to Elfrida, and ſhewed the greateſt affection for her ſon Ethelred, but he placed himſelf entirely under the direction of the monks, whom he implicitly obeyed upon all occaſions. In fine, ſo harmleſs was his life, and ſuch his affection for his murdereſs and her offspring, that her guilt appears greatly aggravated from his innocence, and the ſimplicity of his conduct.

Duke Elfer not only felt the poinant ſtings of conſcience with the extremeſt ſeverity, but ſoon after fell a martyr to a moſt loathſome diſeaſe, being eaten up by ſuch a profuſion of vermin as neither a continual change of garments could eradicate, or the power of medicines deſtroy. And Elfrida, the principal in this black affair, ſoon beholding her guilt in all its horrors, founded two * monaſteries, into one of which ſhe retired, and paſſed the remainder of her days in all the miſeries of corroding reflection, and corporal mortifications.

SECT. XIV.

ETHELRED II.

AFTER the fatal cataſtrophe which beſel the unfortunate Edward, young Ethelred aſcended the throne. He was at firſt oppoſed by Dunſtan, but at length that prelate thought proper to acquieſce, and to crown him, which ceremony he performed on the 14th day of April, A. D. 979. This young monarch, who had not reached his twelfth year at the time of his coronation, was remarkable for the beauty of his perſon, and weakneſs of his mind.

The Danes, who had not diſturbed England for ſeveral years paſt, thought the preſent an excellent opportunity to renew their depredations. They were well informed that the king was young, inexperienced, weak, and ill beloved by the generality of the people, on account of the crimes of his mother. Add to theſe motives, the Welch had revolted, and there was an univerſal depravity, and an imprudent ſupineneſs throughout the nation. The combination of theſe circumſtances appeared to their piratical imaginations in too favorable a light to be neglected, and this land of plenty was once more doomed to be the ſcene of the moſt horrid barbarities.

In the year 982, the Danes began their invaſion in ſeven large ſhips, by ravaging the coaſt of Dorſetſhire,

* One of theſe monaſteries was at Ambreſbury, and the other at Wherwell, near Andover, in Hampſhire. To the latter of theſe it was that Elfrida retired.

and plundering the iſle of Portland. Another party committed ſimilar depredations at Southampton, and then proceeding to the coaſt of Cornwall, they landed at ſeveral places, but were equally barbarous and rapacious every where. To encreaſe the miſeries brought on the nation by theſe inhuman foreigners, ſome domeſtic misfortunes happened at the ſame time; in particular the city of London was burnt to the ground; and the king having a difference with the biſhop of Rocheſter, inſtead of turning his arms againſt the Danes, laid ſiege to the prelate in his own city.

Dunſtan ſiding with the biſhop, denounced vengeance againſt the king, unleſs he drew off his forces immediately, which Ethelred refuſed, without an hundred pounds were ſent him to reimburſe him for his expences and trouble. This was a very capital ſum in thoſe days; Dunſtan, however, thought proper to ſend it, but at the ſame time it was accompanied by this menace: "Since you have reſpected money more than God "and religion, the calamities formerly denounced "ſhall ſpeedily arrive, though not till after my own "death." With reſpect to the impending calamities, it did not require either a prophetic ſpirit, or great penetration to foreſee them, for any perſon of common underſtanding, who knew the ſtate of the nation, the poſture of public affairs, the diſtractions in the council, the diviſions of the people, the diſaffection of many of the nobles, and all the clergy, and the incapacity of the rulers, might very naturally expect the fatal conſequences which enſued.

The Danes burnt Watchet, in Somerſetſhire, A. D. 988, and the enſuing year were unſucceſsfully oppoſed by the brave Goda, earl of Devon, who was unfortunately ſlain in an engagement with them. This year was remarkable for the death of the celebrated Dunſtan, archbiſhop of Canterbury; Ethelwald, biſhop of Wincheſter, and Oſwald, archbiſhop of York, died ſoon after, when the demiſe of theſe three finally terminated the conteſts between the regular clergy and the ſeculars.

A. D. 991. The Danes again appeared upon the coaſt of this devoted iſland, after having given the natives a reſpite of two years, and under the conduct of their leaders Juſtin and Guthermond, burnt the town of Ipſwich, in Suffolk. Brithnot, duke of Eaſt Anglia marched againſt them with what forces he could collect upon ſuch an emergency, but being defeated, and ſlain, the country lay open to the mercileſs invaders. In the mean time Ethelred ſupinely neglected every means of defence, and inſtead of having recourſe to courage and conduct, ſought his ſafety in the moſt infamous and abſurd expedient that could enter the mind of a king; for Dunſtan's ſucceſſor, the archbiſhop Sericius, in conjunction with the dukes Alfrith and Ethelward, having adviſed the weak monarch to bribe thoſe with gold, whom he could not beat with iron, he unfortunately took their temporizing advice, and inſtead of bravely oppoſing them by the ſword, he baſely paid them ten thouſand pounds to quit the kingdom. This ill judged bribe was extremely pleaſing to the Danes, as it at once allured them to the expectation of future loans, and furniſhed them with the means of encreaſing their naval armaments.

Thoſe who thro' indiſcretion bribe a foe,
Court their own ruin, and invite their woe.

Being incited by this ſucceſs, the Danes appeared again on the Engliſh coaſt in 993, with an augmented force. The king, fully convinced of his former error, ſought to repair it by getting together a formidable fleet with all imaginable diſpatch, which was deſtined to block up and deſtroy the Daniſh navy in any port where they might take ſhelter. This deſign was laudable in itſelf, yet it in a great meaſure miſcarried thro' the indiſcretion of the infatuated monarch, who, in repenting of one error, committed another equally pernicious. Having fitted out a fine navy, he unfortunately gave the chief command of it to Alfrith, duke of Mercia, whom he had ſome time before baniſhed, on ſuſpicion of treaſonable practices, and lately recalled without being convinced of his innocence. This nobleman was of an implacable temper, and ſecretly bearing a mortal hatred to the king, he determined, on the preſent occaſion, to ſacrifice the public good to his private pique, and to gratify his own reſentment by the ruin of Ethelred. Replete with theſe infamous ſentiments, he informed the Danes of all the king's deſigns; when alarmed by the intelligence of this traitor, they collected together their ſhips, and ſtood out to ſea to avoid the impending danger.

Alfrith, to keep up appearances, affected to purſue them, but as ſoon as an engagement ſeemed inevitable, he baſely revolted to the enemy, by which the deſtruction of their whole fleet was prevented. The reſt of the officers in general were exaſperated at this treachery, but the commanders of the London and Eaſt Anglian ſquadrons in particular, were ſtill determined, if poſſible, to ſtrike ſome important blow. They accordingly bore down upon the Daniſh fleet, when a bloody engagement enſued, in which a great number of Danes loſt their lives, one of their ſhips was taken and the treacherous Alfrith very narrowly eſcaped being made a priſoner.

Swein, king of Denmark, having collected together a formidable fleet, joined his powers to thoſe of Anlaff king of Norway, and they in conjunction invaded England, A. D. 993, and committed great ravages in the northern parts of the kingdom.

The king having aſſembled a conſiderable body of forces, with his uſual infatuation which was truly aſtoniſhing, gave the command of them to Frithegiſta, Godoin, and Frena, three noblemen, who were all of Daniſh extraction, and well wiſhers to the invaders; and theſe, as might be naturally expected, betrayed their troops to the enemy, by whom many of them were cut to pieces and the reſt put to flight. Swein and Anlaff then ſailed up the Thames in conjunction, and landing near London, they inveſted that city, which was then ſcarce recovered from the effects of the dreadful conflagration which had ſo recently deſtroyed it. But the citizens behaved gallantly, and bravely repulſed the beſiegers, which ſo irritated the Danes, that they vented their barbarous fury on the adjacent parts, committing great outrages in Kent, Eſſex, Suſſex, and part of Hampſhire. Having during their depredations collected together a great number of horſes, they mounted the whole of their combined forces, and threatened in that manner to traverſe, and lay waſte the whole kingdom.

In this criſis, Ethelred ſummoned a council, when it was again imprudently determined to make uſe of the ſame expedient, which had already proved ſo fatal, and 16,000l. together with an annual tribute, was offered the enemy to quit the country. Theſe terms being ſuch as they wiſhed for, and all they wanted, the invaders gladly embraced them, and retired to their ſhips which were at Southampton, till they could be fulfilled. During the interim, Anlaff paid a viſit to Ethelred, who perſuaded him to become a chriſtian. Immediately after his converſion he ſwore never more to invade England, and it is but juſtice to his memory, to ſay he moſt religiouſly kept his oath.

The money being paid, the invaders left England; but A. D. 997, Swein returned again with a conſiderable force, and landing in the weſt of England, ravaged the counties of Devon and Cornwall; and afterwards entering South Wales, proceeded in the ſame rapacious and cruel manner. Then turning ſouthward, they penetrated into Kent, when Ethelred, being rouſed from his lethargy by the approaching danger, met them at Rocheſter, at the head of a body of forces, and gave them battle. The Engliſh being inferior both in numbers and diſcipline, were defeated, and the barbarous Danes revenged themſelves for this oppoſition on the people of Kent, who had acted with conſiderable ſpirit upon the occaſion. The Engliſh fleet, during this important criſis, lay inactive through the diſſenſions of the principal commanders; and thus innumerable circumſtances, foreign and domeſtic, ſeemed to be in a conſpiracy to ruin the kingdom, when it was providentially relieved by an unforeſeen occurrence. This was a difference that happened between the king of France and Richard II. duke of Normandy, the former having threatened the latter to diſpoſſeſs him of his dominions, which menace occaſioned him to ſolicit the aſſiſtance of the Danes, who were in England. And theſe barbarians, happy to fiſh in troubled waters any where, paſſed over into Normandy, in order to augment the plunder which they had ſeized in England.

After the departure of theſe intruders, a council was held, when it was unanimouſly agreed to enter upon coercive meaſures, and oppoſe the future operations of the Danes with ſpirit. An army was accordingly raiſed, but the fleet which ought to have been the principal object, ſeems to have been too much neglected, and the king ſuddenly affecting a fondneſs for military parade, paid all his attention to the land forces, and appeared to have but little regard for his navy, the moſt natural and only eſſential ſecurity of this iſland.

Ethelred, inſtead of ſecuring the ſea coaſts in a proper manner, entered into a frivolous quarrel with Malcolm, who ruled Cumberland as a dependent on Greme king of Scotland; accuſing him of having favoured the Danes in their late incurſions. Having ravaged a part of Cumberland, the affair was compromiſed, a truce concluded, and matters at length amicably adjuſted.

Ethelred then ordered all the ſhips which could be collected together to ſail to Weſt Cheſter, whither he intended to proceed with his army; and by the junction of the ſea and land forces to enter upon ſome important enterprize. His deſigns, however, were rendered abortive by the inclemency of the weather, the generality of his ſhips being wind bound; and all that he could effect was to ravage the iſle of Angleſey, which was then in the poſſeſſion of the Danes.

The Danes having finiſhed their buſineſs in Normandy, returned to England A. D. 1001, and denounced vengeance againſt the Engliſh for what their countrymen had ſuffered, while they were abſent. Their threats they fulfilled with the moſt barbarous punctuality, and practiſed the moſt ſhocking cruelties to a mercileſs exceſs. At length, Ethelward, high ſheriff of Hampſhire, raiſed the militia of that county, and engaged the Danes at Alton; but, through the inferiority of numbers, his army was defeated, and himſelf ſlain.

The invaders then embarked on board their ſhips, and ſailed to Exeter, where treachery again aſſiſted them, and defeated the national expectation of a deliverance. For Paleg, being ſent with an Engliſh ſquadron under his command, inſtead of oppoſing, moſt baſely joined his force to the enemy. They then laid ſiege to Exeter, but being repulſed, began as uſual to ravage the adjacent country.

Provoked by their depredations, the inhabitants of Devonſhire and Somerſetſhire took up arms againſt them, but were defeated at Penne in the laſt mentioned county. The conquerors then burnt Penne, Clifton, and many other towns and villages, and murdered ſo many people, that they ſeemed to threaten the extermination of the Engliſh race.

The Danes had now over-run all the ſouthern parts of the kingdom, and the northern parts were inhabited either by Danes, or perſons of Daniſh extraction; ſo the Engliſh, who were penned up in the midland countries, were between two deſperate fires, and, at the ſame time, had many domeſtic traitors to fear, whoſe ſecret treaſons were as pernicious as the others open devaſtations.

During all theſe tranſactions, Ethelred ſhewed not the leaſt ſpirit, either to defend his own dignity or protect the lives and properties of his ſubjects; but ſinking into a daſtardly indolence, his deſpondency led him once more to try his former imprudent expedient of bribery, and to purchaſe future calamities, as he had already done thoſe that were paſt. After ſome negotiation, it was agreed, that in conſideration of the ſum of 24,000l. the Danes ſhould ceaſe all hoſtilities, and never more moleſt the Engliſh.

This enormous ſum, for ſuch it muſt be deemed, conſidering the value of money at that period, was levied by means of a tax, called Dane-gelt, or Dane's-money, and this tax was the firſt land-tax known in England. It was raiſed by the owners of land being obliged to pay twelve-pence per hide, the hide being as much as could annually occupy one plough and maintain one family. On receiving this money, ſome of the Daniſh forces withdrew, and others thought proper to remain in England, and ſettle among the Danes, and perſons of Daniſh extraction, who were already ſettled here; but although theſe did not commit open hoſtilities, yet they continued to act with the moſt over-bearing inſolence, treating their Engliſh neighbours with great aſperity, obliging them to labour for their ſupport in idleneſs, and abuſing their wives and daughters at their pleaſure. Hence they were called Lordains, or Lord Danes, a term of reproach ſtill ſubſiſting in ſome countries to expreſs a proud, lazy, inſolent fellow.

Ethelred, inſtead of taking the opportunity of rendering the nation formidable, by animating his diſpirited people, and being arduous to diſcipline them ſo as to be capable of defending themſelves, ſought to acquire additional ſtrength by means of a foreign alliance. With this view he contracted a marriage with Emma,[*] the beautiful daughter of Richard the ſecond, duke of Normandy, with whom he had for ſome time been at variance; but the pope interpoſing, their differences were amicably adjuſted, and this nuptial treaty confirmed the reconciliation. But all the advantages he expected to derive from this alliance were fruſtrated by a ſcheme that he adopted, which was imprudently cruel in itſelf and injurious to the nation.

This ſcheme was no other than a general maſſacre of all the Danes in England. The principal promoters of the bloody plan were Huna, Ethelred's general, a man of a vindictive and revengeful diſpoſition; and Edric, duke of Mercia, whoſe whole life was conſiſtent only in continual acts of treachery. Theſe, with one Leoffig, of whom we know little, but that he bore an infamous character, ſpirited up the king to a deed which was to entail miſery on his country, for Ethelred himſelf was too weak and irreſolute to form any regular plan, or to perſevere ſufficiently to put it into execution.

Theſe counſellors having brought the king to their purpoſe, he, with great privacy, wrote circular letters

[*] This lady's mother was named Gunnor, and her extraction being Daniſh, Ethelred imagined it would induce the Danes to be more reaſonable as well as faithful By his marriage with the Duke of Normandy's daughter, he likewiſe fancied that the ports of Normandy would be in future ſhut againſt the Daniſh fleets, to whom they had hitherto afforded protection and an aſylum in their invaſions of England.

to his ſubjects in the various parts of the kingdom, and enjoined them to be revenged of their oppreſſive enemies, by murdering every Dane, without diſtinction of ſex or age, on the feaſt of St. Brice, November the 13th, A. D. 1002, the Danes of Northumberland and Eaſt Anglia excepted, theſe being deemed too numerous to be overcome by the few Engliſh in thoſe parts.

The maſſacre was tranſacted with a rigorous punctuality; men, women and children fell the indiſcriminate victims of the bloody mandate.—To implore mercy was vain, to ſeek for ſafety by flying to the churches as ſanctuaries was equally fruitleſs, the devoted objects were either dragged from thence and murdered, or ſlain at the altars.

Some Daniſh young men having eſcaped from the carnage ſeized upon a veſſel, and ſetting ſail, ſoon reached Denmark, where they informed king Swein of theſe bloody proceedings, and particularly that his ſiſter Gunildes, or Gunilda was among the ſlain.*

The Daniſh monarch being exaſperated to a degree of phrenzy by this diſagreeable intelligence, bound himſelf by a ſolemn vow to wreak his vengeance on the Engliſh nation. He naturally hated the Engliſh, a trifle would have induced him to make an infraction of the late treaty, but this was too provoking a circumſtance not to call down all his reſentment.

Having fitted out a very powerful armament, Swein landed in England in the beginning of the year 1003. Cornwall was the firſt place where he began his depredations, in which he proceeded with ſuch a ſavage degree of barbarity, as to evince that his thirſt of revenge was inſatiable and boundleſs. Penetrating into Devonſhire, and carrying terror all the way, he ſoon appeared before Exeter, which city was betrayed to him by a traitor called Hugh the Norman, whom queen Emma had procured to be made its governor, and who was ſuppoſed to have carried on a treaſonable correſpondence with the Dane previous to his landing. Exeter having been plundered, and its fortifications razed to the ground, Swein proceeded into Hampſhire, deſigning to penetrate eaſtward, and deſtroy whatever oppoſed him. Ethelred, however, had by this time ſo far ſhaken off his lethargic indolence, as to aſſemble an army in order to ſtop the invader's progreſs; but ſuch was the fatal infatuation of this unfortunate monarch, that he not only forgave Edric, duke of Mercia, his former treacheries, but indiſcreetly entruſted him with the command of this army.

This imprudent meaſure was attended with the conſequences which might naturally be ſuppoſed to reſult from it: For the arch-traitor Edric no ſooner came within ſight of Swein's army, than he pretended to be ſeized with a ſudden indiſpoſition, and feigning that he was unable to lead on his forces at that time to engage, he commanded a retreat; but the orders were deſignedly ſo ill concerted, and every direction he gave, purpoſely, ſo confuſed, as to throw the Engliſh troops into the greateſt diſorder. Swein did not fail to take advantage of this confuſion, for attacking their rear, a total rout, inſtead of a retreat, enſued. This victory, gained with ſuch facility, was followed by the deſtruction of the towns of Wilton and Old Sarum, both of which the Danes ſacked and burnt; when winter coming on a-pace, Swein returned to his fleet, embarked, and ſet ſail for Denmark. The enſuing ſpring, however, A. D. 1004, he again landed with an augmented force, burnt the city of Norwich, and prepared to continue his ravages, when Ulf-ketel, governor of Eaſt Anglia, to ſave the other towns of his diſtrict from conflagration, inſtead of raiſing the militia, and attempting to oppoſe the babarians, had recourſe to that pernicious expedient of bribery, the ill effects of which Ethelred himſelf had ſo fatally experienced. The Danes had no ſooner got the money than, totally diſregarding their promiſe, they burnt the town of Thetford, a place at that time of great importance.

Ulf-ketel, enraged at theſe inſidious proceedings, now began to think of doing what he ought to have done before; that is, of oppoſing by force thoſe whoſe faith could not be in any thing depended on.

Having haſtily collected together ſome troops, he ordered one party to attempt the burning of the Daniſh ſhips, while he with the reſt made an attack upon them, before they could have any notion that he intended to take ſuch a ſtep. Unhappily thoſe who were entruſted with the charge of deſtroying the fleet failed in executing the governor's orders, but Ulf-ketel himſelf behaved with great ſpirit, for making an impetuous attack upon the Danes, a moſt bloody conteſt enſued, till the remarkable bravery of the Engliſh was compelled to yield to the vaſt ſuperiority of the enemy; and the Danes obtained a dear-bought victory. The valour of the Engliſh upon this occaſion rendered the pirates exceedingly circumſpect in their future conduct, they in a great meaſure deſiſted from their depredations; and at the cloſe of the year returned home without having done any very material miſchief ſubſequent to the above engagement.

The enſuing year, A. D. 1005, a dreadful famine afflicted this unhappy land, and ſwept away multitudes of the inhabitants. As ſoon as this calamity ceaſed, the Danes again appeared, that the miſeries of the people might be unremitting. Ethelred had now put himſelf at the head of an army; the knowledge of which, joined to the recollection of the ſpirit with which the Engliſh behaved in their laſt engagement, induced the Danes to act with greater precaution than ever. They ſailed round the coaſt in order to harraſs the Engliſh troops, and whenever they thought Ethelred's army at too great a diſtance to come upon them ſuddenly, they made a deſcent, and acted with their uſual rapacious cruelty. Thus were the Engliſh troops fatigued by continual marches and countermarches, without being once able to come up with, or bring the enemy to an engagement.

Winter coming on a-pace, and the Danes having retired to the Iſle of Wight, Ethelred thought proper to quit the field. His army, which conſiſted wholly of volunteers, diſbanded of themſelves, nor indeed were they to be kept together any longer than while the danger was impending.

The politic enemy having got intelligence of the diſperſion of the Engliſh forces, made a ſudden irruption

* A judicious writer in ſpeaking of this tranſaction ſays, no age or ſex eſcaped, the women were butchered as well as the men, and the brains of children daſhed againſt the walls. At London, in the time of this execution, great numbers fled to churches, but thoſe ſacred places were no ſecurity, for they were all without pity ſlain as they ſtood embracing the altars. And when the multitude found themſelves maſters, they proceeded to new barbarities, digged holes in the ground, put Daniſh women in them up to the waiſt, and then ſet fierce maſtives upon them, which cruelly tore off their breaſts. A popular fury, when backed by authority, knows no bounds, nor authority itſelf, when it has broken public juſtice. There were ſeveral Danes of the higheſt quality in the land, received upon the public faith as hoſtages to ratify the late peace; among whom was king Swein's ſiſter Gunildes, wife to count Paleng, who ſeveral years before had come into England with her family, where ſhe had received the chriſtian faith; and being a woman of great prudence and temper, had often interpoſed to make peace between the two nations, and had now lately given up herſelf, her huſband and her ſon as hoſtages to king Ethelred. This princeſs had firſt her huſband and ſon ſlain before her face, and was then ordered to be beheaded herſelf, which ſentence ſhe took with an unconcerned bravery and courage, and at her death foretold, "That her "blood would coſt England dear, and would not be long unre"venged."

tion into Hampſhire, at a time when ſuch a thing was leaſt expected, viz. about Chriſtmas, A. D. 1006, when they ravaged that and the neighbouring counties, and not meeting with any oppoſition, penetrated as far as Reading in Berkſhire, having burnt all the towns and villages as they paſſed; and then returned towards their fleet by another route, continuing to act in a ſimilar manner as they proceeded. An army was raiſed in Wiltſhire to cut off their retreat, but thoſe parts being under the juriſdiction of the traitor Edric, he gave timely notice to the Danes to avoid the impending danger, who from this intelligence took ſuch meaſures as to eſcape. They, however, ſtill continued to harraſs the coaſt, which induced the weak Ethelred again to bribe them, in order to gain a temporary reſpite, with the ſum of 36,000l. for they always roſe in their demands, well knowing the king was better able to pay the money, than willing to oppoſe their arms.

The barbarous foes having once more taken their leave, Ethelred ſeriouſly ſet about building a formidable fleet to ſecure the kingdom from future invaſions; accordingly, every three hundred and ten hides of land were taxed to furniſh one ſhip. This was ſo ſalutary a meaſure, that the people chearfully acquieſced therein, and willingly contributed to ſuch an eſſential national defence. The years 1007 and 1008 were conſumed in preparing the navy, and the whole being finiſhed in the beginning of A. D. 1009, the largeſt Engliſh fleet hitherto known rendezvouſed at Sandwich.

This powerful fleet being properly manned, there only wanted a commander in chief, when the unhappy Ethelred, ſtill bent on his own ruin, with a degree of facination not to be accounted for, inſtead of appointing as admiral a man of courage, abilities, and integrity, gave the command to Brightric, brother by blood to the faithleſs Edric, and like him, artful, ambitious, and treacherous.

Brightric, not to have any ſpy upon his actions, or the leaſt controul on his power, accuſed Wulfnoth (a diſtinguiſhed and brave officer) of treaſonable practices to the king, in hopes of getting him removed from his command, and put to death.

Wulfnoth was conſcious of his own innocence, but at the ſame time knew it would not protect him from the malice of ſuch powerful villains as Brightric and Edric. Yielding therefore at once to the dictates of ſelf-preſervation and reſentment, he ſought his ſafety in flight, and at the ſame time induced twenty of the Engliſh captains to accompany him with their reſpective ſhips.

Being at the head of this ſquadron, Wulfnoth turned pirate, and by ravaging the coaſts, he became as obnoxious as the Danes. Brightric was univerſally accuſed as being the occaſion of this misfortune, and the diſmemberment of the fleet. Thinking in ſome meaſure to repair the misfortune he had cauſed, or at leaſt to turn the popular voice in his favor, he ſailed in queſt of Wulfnoth with eighty large ſhips under his command; when a ſtorm ariſing, his fleet was diſperſed, and Wulfnoth, before they could re-unite, found an opportunity to take, ſink, or burn moſt of them. Thus were the largeſt, beſt, and moſt capital ſhips of this formidable armament rendered uſeleſs to thoſe at whoſe expence they had been fitted out, either by deſertion, or deſtruction; and thoſe mighty preparations became of no avail through the chief command having been given to an over-bearing traitor.

The Danes being informed of the diſaſters which had attended the Engliſh fleet, immediately put to ſea with a powerful armament, and appeared on the coaſt of England in the ſummer of A. D. 1009. One ſquadron under Turkul, proceeded to Sandwich, where the troops diſembarked, while another commanded by Anlaff and Haming made a deſcent upon the iſle of Thanet. The forces uniting, they began to burn and plunder, as uſual, throughout the county of Kent, and the city of Canterbury itſelf would have ſuffered conflagration, had not the inhabitants redeemed it with a very conſiderable ſum of money.

Alarmed by theſe proceedings, Ethelred drew together an army, and was juſt upon the point of attacking the plunderers as they were retiring to their ſhips with a very conſiderable booty; when the traitor Edric, ever ſolicitous to injure his country, perſuaded him that it was much more prudent to let them paſs unmoleſted than to hazard a battle; and, aſtoniſhing to recite! the unhappy monarch took this advice, and ſuffered them tamely to paſs, laden with the ſpoils of his ſubjects. The Danes having thus reached their ſhips in ſafety, took up their winter quarters in the iſle of Thanet, from whence they made frequent excurſions, did conſiderable miſchief, and even attempted ſeveral times to plunder London, but from thence the citizens always bravely repulſed them.

A. D. 1010. The Danes made a deſcent at Ipſwich, where Ulf-ketel lay encamped with a ſmall army. Subordinate in command to this brave general was Thurketyl Myranheafod, (or the Ant-headed) a faithleſs coward, who, as ſoon as the Danes began their attack, precipitately took to flight. This ſhameful retreat of the ſecond in command ſtruck the men with ſuch a panic, that a general confuſion enſued. In vain did the gallant general Ulf-ketel, and ſeveral brave officers attempt to rally them; the rout became general, when Ethelſtan, the king's ſon, Ulf-ketel, ſeveral officers, and many private men, were ſlain.

The country now lying entirely open, and the Danes having ſeized a great number of horſes, they mounted their troops, in order to extend their incurſions with the greater facility and expedition; when they ravaged Eſſex, Huntingdonſhire, Oxfordſhire, Buckinghamſhire, Bedfordſhire, Hertfordſhire, Northamptonſhire, &c. pillaging, burning and deſtroying a great number of cities, towns, villages, &c. Among theſe were the city and univerſity of Oxford, on which account all ſtudies ceaſed at the latter, till the year 1133. Then turning their arms towards the weſt of England, they ſignalized themſelves by ſimilar devaſtations.

A. D. 1011. The Danes renewed their ravages at pleaſure, while Ethelred, without attempting in the leaſt to oppoſe them, kept himſelf ſhut up in London. At length they determined to lay ſiege to Canterbury, when throwing in a number of red hot balls, ſeveral houſes took fire, and while the inhabitants were buſied in extinguiſhing the flames, a treacherous monk, named Almere, or Æalmar, who was ſaid to be archdeacon of the place, betrayed it into the hands of the enemy, who, as uſual, exerciſed the moſt horrid cruelties, and afterwards burnt the city.

In ſpeaking of the Danes laying ſiege to Canterbury, the antient chronicles ſay, "that in twenty days they took it by the treachery of Almere the archdeacon. Here they committed unheard of barbarities by way of ſport and diverſion: they ſlew ſome by the ſword, threw others over the wall, others into the fire, infants torn from their mothers breaſts were either toſt on ſpears, or had carts drawn over them, matrons and virgins were dragged about by the hair and raviſhed; Alſage the archbiſhop was taken, wounded, and impriſoned in a noiſom place; Chriſt-church was burnt, monks, men, women and children were decimated, whereof nine were killed, and the tenth reſerved to a life worſe than death: ſo that of the whole multitude there remained only four monks, and eight hundred men. They kept the archbiſhop priſoner for ſeven months, during which time theſe barbarous miſcreants were viſited with a plague in their bowels, of which two thouſand periſhed miſerably; and thoſe who ſurvived being grievouſly tormented, the chriſtians took occaſion to urge the delivery of the archbiſhop, but they ſtill deferred it."

At this dreadful criſis, Ethelred ſummoned a council of the principal nobility, which was held at London, A. D. 1012, when no better expedient could be found, than the former pernicious and ineffectual one of bribing them to deſiſt awhile from their depredations. Thus did they ſtill imprudently attempt to allay the flame of avarice, by pouring on it the oil of bribery, which tended to feed, inſtead of extinguiſhing it. The Danes, as uſual, roſe in their demands, and the tribute was now fixed at 48,000l. which being paid, ſome of them returned home, but Turkul himſelf, with forty five ſhips remained at London, promiſing ſubmiſſion to Ethelred, and engaging to defend him from all enemies foreign and domeſtic, on the condition of only receiving ſubſiſtence and apparel; when the king was ſo imprudent as to conſent to theſe propoſals, and to retain the profeſſed enemies of his country in his immediate ſervice.

A. D. 1013. Swein landed again at Gainſborough, when the Northumbrians, who were chiefly Danes, or of Daniſh extraction, made a voluntary ſubmiſſion. Having procured a ſufficient number of horſes to mount all his men, he proceeded ſouthward without oppoſition, the people all the way ſubmitting to him, and arriving at Wincheſter, the gates were thrown open at his approach, and he was received into the city with apparent ſatisfaction.

This uninterrupted ſucceſs induced Swein to think that he ſhould make an eaſy conqueſt of the whole kingdom; he therefore determined to ſtrike his ultimate ſtroke, by getting the city of London into his poſſeſſion, which, as the principal and moſt important place, he imagined would facilitate the ſubjugation of the other parts of the nation. Fraught with this idea, he bent his march towards London, but now his good fortune did not ſeem to attend him ſo cloſely as before, for he loſt a great number of men in the Thames, and he was afterwards repulſed by the citizens of London with great loſs; in one of the ſallies he was near being made priſoner, and at length was compelled to retire to Bath with the remnant of his army. Enraged at their defeat, the troops wreaked their vengeance on the ſeveral defenceleſs towns as they paſſed, and ſpread terror wherever they came. The Weſt Saxon nobility, and Ethelmar, earl of Cornwall, fearing to become the next objects of their cruelties, repaired to Bath, and ſubmitted to Swein, inſtead of endeavouring to cruſh a flying army of barbarians.

The whole kingdom had now made ſubmiſſion to the Dane, London excepted, and that city he was determined at all events to force. Having augmented his forces by procuring freſh recruits, and being joined by many of the Engliſh who had ſubmitted, he aſſumed the title of King of England, and prepared to lay ſiege to London.

The Londoners, deeming it the height of abſurdity to think of reſiſting ſo formidable a power, when not the leaſt ſhadow of expecting any ſucceſs remained, and after all the reſt of the kingdom had revolted, thought the moſt prudent ſtep they could take, was to ſend deputies to make their ſubmiſſion, and procure favorable terms before they had irritated the conqueror too far, or rendered it impoſſible to grant them elegible conditions.

In the interim, the unfortunate Ethelred went on board a ſhip, ſailed to the Iſle of Wight, and diſpatched his queen Emma, with his two ſons, Edward and Alfred, into Normandy, to know if the duke her brother would give him a favorable reception, if he ſhould find it convenient entirely to quit his kingdom. Emma ſucceeded in her embaſſy; Richard was a prince of an intrepid and magnanimous temper, and ſympathizing with the weak and unhappy monarch, he not only promiſed him a ſecure aſylum, and perfect ſafety, but gave him ſome hopes that he would aſſiſt him in regaining his kingdom, and avenging his wrongs. Thus encouraged, Ethelred left his kingdom entirely to the mercy of the Danes, and paſſing over to Normandy, he made the beſt of his way to Rouen, the capital of the dukedom, where he was cordially and affectionately received by Richard, who contrived, by every means in his power to divert his melancholy, and chear his drooping ſpirits. In fine he did his utmoſt endeavours to

"Pluck from his memory the rooted ſorrow,
"Raze out the written trouble of his brain,
"And with a ſweet oblivious antidote
"Cleanſe the foul bottom of that perilous ſtuff,
"Which weighs upon, and galls the ſickly heart."

And indeed, Ethelred was more pitied, and leſs deſpiſed by the Engliſh themſelves, under the full weight of his complicated misfortunes, than while he was bringing them upon himſelf; compaſſion ſucceeded to reſentment, and many who had frequently condemned, now ſympathized with what they could not redreſs.

Some hiſtorians affirm, and particularly Speed, that Ethelred, juſt previous to his departure for Normandy, addreſſed himſelf thus to ſome principal perſons among the Engliſh. "If I myſelf was void of a paternal regard for the defence of the kingdom, or the adminiſtration of juſtice; or even if ye yourſelves were defective in courage for the defence of your native country; I ſhould have brooded over my calamities in ſilence, and given myſelf up a prey to dejection. But as this is not the caſe, I have formed a reſolution to ruſh into the midſt of the enemy, and ſacrifice my life to my kingdom and my crown. I am certain you muſt eſteem that death to be honourable, which is purchaſed in defence of the liberties of our relations and poſterity. Let us then, one and all, reſolve to die in ſo noble a cauſe. I ſee that we are abandoned by Providence; and that our ruin is arrived to its criſis. We are not overcome by the ſwords, or courage of the enemy, but by the treaſon and perfidy of our friends. Our navy is betrayed into the hands of the Danes; our armies are weakened by the revolt of our officers; our deſigns betrayed to the adverſary by our counſellors; who, inſtead of extricating us from our troubles, are continually perſuading us to infamous treaties. I myſelf am diſeſteemed, and contemptuouſly termed Ethelred the Unready: your valour and loyalty is rendered ineffectual by the treachery of your leaders, and our poverty yearly aggravated by the payment of Danegelt, which God only knoweth how we are to redreſs, though it is our duty to make the trial. In vain do we purchaſe a peace with money, in vain do we oblige the Danes to confirm it by oaths. Regardleſs of God and man, they break through the moſt ſacred ſanctions, and pay not the leaſt regard to equity, to the laws of war, or the laws of nations. So far are we from any proſpect of an alteration in our circumſtances to our advantage, that we have the greateſt reaſon to fear the loſs of our kingdom, and the utter extinction of the Engliſh name and reputation. Seeing therefore our enemies are not at a diſtance, and their ſwords are cloſe to our throats; let us, by our wiſdom and prudence, reſcue ourſelves from danger, or elſe courageouſly ſheath our ſwords in the bowels of our enemies. Either of theſe expedients I ſhall adopt with the greateſt readineſs, in order to preſerve the ſtate, and ſnatch the nation from irrecoverable ruin."

If this ſpeech was really made, it ſeems to have been the effects of diſſimulation; as it is apparent from Ethelred's ſubſequent conduct, that his intention was rather to turn his back upon his enemies than to ruſh into the midſt of them; and William of Malmeſbury poſitively aſſerts, "That the ſubmiſſion of the Londoners to Swein was entirely owing to this inglorious reſolve in the king, of whoſe degeneracy they were aſhamed, and that they would have held out to the laſt, though all England had yielded to the conqueror, had not Ethelred abandoned them."

With reſpect to the conduct of Swein, the Engliſh had very little reaſon to be ſatisfied with it, as he was perpetually burthening them with impoſitions in order to pay his troops, reward his favorites and adherents, and gratify his own rapacious diſpoſition. He did not, however, live long to plague the Engliſh, or enjoy his ill gotten power, for his death happened on the third of February, A. D. 1014, but the manner of it is variouſly related; ſome affirm that he was poiſoned, others that he was choaked with rheum.

Florence of Worceſter relates the manner of his death as follows: Swein, while he was encamped at Gainſborough, called a general aſſembly of his great officers, to whom he declared his intention of ſending out a party the next day to plunder and burn the adjacent monaſtery of Bradiceſworth. Scarce had he uttered theſe words, when, on a ſudden, he cried out with great vehemence, Help! help! fellow ſoldier! See! here is king Edmund coming to kill me! and ſo ſaying, he was inſtantly ſtruck with a mortal blow by St. Edmund, and lay in great torment till the next morning, when he expired. But John of Tinmouth, in his Hiſt. aurea. makes St. Edmund's ghoſt to have ſtabbed him with a dagger as he ſat in his chair. William of Malmeſbury ſays, that St. Edmund appeared to him in his ſleep, and ſmote him while he was in bed, for anſwering him rudely; but all agree his death to have been occaſioned by a blow, which he received from St. Edmund. Such are the reports of the old hiſtorians.

The moſt probable conjecture, however, is, that he was aſſaſſinated by the contrivance of ſome of his principal people, who, for political reaſons, connived at the regicide's eſcape; and that the monks of St. Edmund's Bury, taking the advantage of the circumſtance, invented the legend to do honor to their ſaint, and ſecure their monaſtery from future ſacriligeous violations.

We have not ranked this prince under a ſeperate head as an Engliſh monarch, for three reaſons:

1. Becauſe he was never crowned.
2. Becauſe he was never acknowledged as ſuch by a general aſſembly of the ſtates.
3. Becauſe no act of civil authority every paſſed in his name.

On the demiſe of Swein, two powerful factions divided the nation: The one conſiſted of the Danes, and thoſe Engliſh who were well affected to them; the other was formed of the Engliſh nobles and commons, who were diſaffected to the Daniſh government, and wiſhed to throw off ſo diſagreeable a yoke. The former immediately proclaimed Canute, the ſon of Swein, king of England. The latter were for recalling the exiled Ethelred; yet theſe were ſo well acquainted with his diſpoſition, that they determined to reſtore him only on certain conditions.

Ambaſſadors being ſent to Normandy, they propoſed to Ethelred the following articles, as the terms of his reſtoration, viz. That he ſhould rule with juſtice, equity, and moderation; take the advice of none but wiſe, able, and honeſt counſellors; amend his government; and ſhake off that indolence which had been his continual bane.

Ethelred ſolemnly promiſed to perform all that was required of him; in conſequence of which the ambaſſadors returned, Ethelred ſoon followed, and Canute was declared an out-law.

Ethelred was received by the Engliſh with every teſtimony of joy, when a numerous army being raiſed, he put himſelf at the head of it, and immediately marched againſt Canute, who was encamped at Gainſborough. The latter not being in a condition to diſpute his claim to the throne of England, thought proper to make a precipitate retreat, and having gained his fleet he ſet ſail for Denmark, that he might take poſſeſſion of the crown of that kingdom, which was now vacant by the death of his father. In this * he acted with great prudence, for by attempting to ſecure that kingdom where he had the feweſt friends, and but little proſpect of ſucceſs, he might have endangered the loſs of both governments.

The fortunes of Ethelred were truly worthy of obſervation; fate ſeemed induſtrious for his good, while he appeared ſtudious of his own ruin. The paths of equity, and propriety, were pointed out to him, and the cup of proſperity offered to his lip; but he choſe to tread in the ways of vice and folly, and to imbibe the libations of adverſity.----The meaſure of his calamities was at length complete, and the accumulated misfortunes which he had ſo long courted, now ſurrounded him; but his ſufferings rendered him an object of pity, and Providence in an unexpected manner, ſnatched him ſuddenly from the abyſs of woe, to lift him to the pinnacle of human glory. Hence, when the clouds of ſorrow envelope us, let us not deſpair of again ſeeing the beams of joy.

"To-day in ſnow array'd, ſtern winter rules
"The ravag'd plain.——Anon the teeming earth
"Unlocks her ſtores, and ſpring adorns the year.
"And ſhall not we while fate like winter frowns,
"Expect revolving bliſs?——

We are ſorry truth will not permit us to add, that Ethelred, by his ſubſequent conduct, ſtrove either to merit the indulgence of Providence, or the attachment of his friends; for no ſooner was Canute gone, than forgetful of his promiſes, and thoughtleſs of future conſequences, he relapſed into his former errors. Contrary to his ſolemn vow, he gave way to his uſual indolence; or if he was ever aſſiduous, it was only in contriving new taxes to oppreſs his people, and gratify his own avarice. In fine, experience had not eradicated his follies, and to his former crimes he now joined ingratitude, and breach of faith.

To leave nothing undone that might again inſure his ruin, he either diſcarded, or ſlighted his beſt friends, and ſhowered all his favors on the villainous Edric, whoſe treachery had been fatal to him ſo often. This arch-traitor, about this time, A. D. 1015, who was always contriving either to make the king injure himſelf or others, induced the weak monarch to add a crime of a private nature to his many public ones. The fact was thus: two noblemen, named Morcar and Sigeforth, who were of Daniſh extraction, but inviolable in their faithful attachment to Ethelred, had excited the envy or the reſentment of Edric. Whatever were the motives of his malice, he reſolved on their ruin; and to effect this, poſſeſſed the king with a notion that they correſponded with Canute, and had even a deſign upon his life. Ethelred, who was naturally timid and ſuſpicious, lent a ready ear to this tale, and firmly believed its truth. As theſe noblemen were greatly beloved by the people, he thought that a public execution might not be altogether ſafe, but inſinuated that he ſhould be glad to have them taken off privately. Happy to find the king in this diſpoſition, the nefarious Edric took the management of the whole affair upon himſelf: having given them a cordial invitation to his own houſe, he at once violated the laws of honor, hoſpitality, and humanity, by barbarouſly murdering them in the height of their feſtivity. Ethelred, not to be behind hand with his favorite in want of equity, immediately ordered the lady Elgitha, Sigeforth's widow, to be confined in the monaſtery of Malmeſbury, and then ſent his ſon Edmund to ſeize on both their eſtates.

* Concerning this occurrence, a modern author ſays, "We cannot in this place forbear teſtifying our ſurprize, that none of our Engliſh hiſtorians of thoſe times ſhould have aſſigned reaſons for this ſudden going off of Canute, who had never been worſted, and had ſtill many ſtrong places in the kingdom in his hands; but, though our Engliſh hiſtory is ſilent on this head, the Daniſh hiſtory accounts for his proceedings very clearly: for it informs us, that Canute had a younger brother, named Harold, who, having been made regent in the abſence of his father Swein, ſeized upon the kingdom for himſelf. It was this that obliged Canute to leave England in ſo haſty a manner as ſeemed rather to proceed from his fears, than the effect of ſound politics; which latter was however the caſe: for what prince of common prudence would have reſolved to leave the kingdom of his anceſtors in the hands of an uſurper, for the ſake of conteſting a foreign crown in a country newly conquered, and whoſe inhabitants ſeemed determined to ſupport their own prince, whom they had lately recalled at the expence of their lives and fortunes? Beſides, ſhould the event of war prove unfavorable to him, what hopes could he entertain of having ſuccours from Denmark, whilſt that kingdom was in the hands of his brother? The ſubſequent conduct of Canute plainly evinced that the ſtep he had now taken proceeded from very different motives to thoſe of fear, which have been generally laid to his charge; for no ſooner had he ſettled his affairs in the north, than he returned with his victorious troops to England."

But Heaven did not ſuffer theſe crimes to go long unpuniſhed, for Canute having taken poſſeſſion of, and ſecured the crown of Denmark, returned to England with a powerful armament. He firſt appeared off Sandwich, and then ſailing round the coaſt of Kent, he proceeded to the weſt of England, where having landed, he began to ravage Somerſetſhire, Wiltſhire, and Dorſetſhire.

In the mean time Ethelred ſent ſome forces againſt him, under the command of his ſon Edmund, but unhappily his infatuation ſo far prevailed as to give the falſe Edric an equal authority with Edmund, and join him in the command with the prince.

The armies no ſooner came within ſight of each other, than Edmund was informed that Edric had laid a dangerous plot to take away his life as ſoon as the troops ſhould engage. This intelligence being credibly ſupported, the prince found it abſolutely neceſſary, in order to preſerve his own life, and ſave the army from deſtruction, to draw off that part which was more immediately under his command for their mutual ſecurity. This diſmemberment of the army gave the Dane a manifeſt advantage, and the falſe Edric finding that his treaſon, and that his villainy could no longer be hid, even from the long blinded, and infatuated Ethelred himſelf, threw off the maſk at once, openly joined Canute with his followers, induced forty ſhips of the fleet to revolt, and perſuaded the Weſt Saxons, with whom his intereſt was very great, to ſubmit, and ſwear allegiance to the Dane.

Canute's forces being ſo unexpectedly augmented, and powerfully reinforced, A. D. 1016, he entered the Thames at the head of a fleet conſiſting of 160 ſail, compoſed of the Daniſh navy, and the ſhips that had revolted to him at the inſtigation of Edric. Having landed, he penetrated into the midland, and weſtern counties, and ſpread deſolation wherever he paſſed. The gallant Edmund ſympathiſed in the diſtreſſes of the people, and exerted his utmoſt endeavours to rouze the lethargic ſpirit of his father from that indolence and ſupineneſs, which had been his continual ruin.

Ethelred, unable longer to bear the remonſtrances of his ſon, at length conſented to take the field. This reſolution was no ſooner known, than multitudes flocked to the royal ſtandard; not ſo much indeed out of reſpect to the king as to prince Edmund, whoſe ſpirit and abilities the people honored, as much as they deſpiſed the cowardice and weakneſs of his father.

A formidable army was now aſſembled, when ſome Daniſh emiſſaries, who were ſtill about the perſon of Ethelred, poſſeſſed his imagination with an idea that a plot was formed to aſſaſſinate him. Such an inſinuation was ſufficient to a prince of his ſuſpicious and timid nature; he determined to leave the army; in vain did his ſon remonſtrate, in vain did the nobles and officers offer in the moſt ſolemn manner to ſwear allegiance to him, and ratify their oaths by defending him to the laſt drop of their blood. The panic-ſtruck monarch baſely deſerted them at this important criſis, and flying to London, there immured himſelf within its walls.

The Mercians now declined fighting for a king who had refuſed to head them according to his promiſe; and the brave Edmund finding it impoſſible to withſtand the power of the Danes through the ſuſpicious puſillanimity of his father, and the defection of ſo great a part of the army, thought proper to retire northward to join Uthred, earl of Northumberland, who had collected together ſome troops in thoſe parts. Having made this junction with thoſe few who choſe to follow him, they together ravaged the counties that had declared for the Danes. On the approach of Canute with his powerful army, to prevent theſe depredations, Uthred thought proper to ſubmit, and Edmund retired to London. Canute, however, knowing the enterpriſing ſpirit of Uthred, and not thinking him ſincere, thought proper to put him to death, and ſeize his eſtates, which he beſtowed on one Eric a Dane, whoſe inſolence afterwards obliged Canute to baniſh him. Edmund on his arrival at London, found the king his father dangerouſly ill, and on the 23d of April, A. D. 1016, that unfortunate monarch departed this life in the 50th year of his age, and 37th of his reign. His remains were depoſited in St. Paul's cathedral, near thoſe of Sebba, king of the Eaſt-Saxons, being incloſed in a cheſt of grey marble, ſupported by four pillars, and covered with a coped ſtone of the ſame.

Ethelred in his perſon was comely, fair, of a genteel addreſs, and affable behaviour; in his intellects he was timid, irreſolute, inconſiſtent, and indolent. His attachment to Edric marks his character with weakneſs, wilfulneſs and folly; and the maſſacre of the Danes ſtains it with wickedneſs, cruelty, and credulity.

His firſt wife Elgiva, an Engliſh lady, bore him four ſons, viz. Edmund, who ſucceeded him, Athelſtan and Egbert, who died young, and Edwy, who was afterwards baniſhed at the inſtigation of Canute; and three daughters, viz. Edgitha, who married an Engliſh count that was afterwards ſlain in a battle againſt the Danes. Edgiva, who became the conſort of that infamous traitor Edric, duke of Mercia, and Elfgina, who was the wife of Uthred, earl of Northumberland.

By Emma, daughter of the duke of Normandy, his ſecond wife, he had three children, viz. Alfred, and Edward, who, on the death of Ethelred were by their mother ſent into her own country, and the lady Goda, who was firſt married to Walter, count of Maine, and afterwards to Euſtace, count of Boulogne.

SECT. XV.

Edmund II. commonly called Edmund Ironſide.

EDMUND was ſo much beloved by the Engliſh in general, and more particularly by the Londoners, that the latter unanimouſly determined to elect him for their king, (though Canute was approaching to beſiege the city of London, both by ſea and land;) he was accordingly crowned by Livignus, archbiſhop of Canterbury. The reſt of the clergy, however, did not act ſo honeſtly, for on being ſummoned by Canute to attend him at Southampton, they choſe to follow the ſtronger party, and to be borne away by the prevailing current of the times.

Having left a ſtrong garriſon in London, Edmund marched into the weſt of England, where the generality of the people took the oaths of allegiance to him. In the mean time Canute proceeded to lay ſiege to London; having ſailed up the river, he landed his troops at Greenwich, and marched directly to inveſt the city. Coming to the Surry ſide, he cut a deep trench, in order, as much as poſſible, to drain off the water from the river, by which means his ſhips lay almoſt upon dry land, and the convoys of proviſions were eaſily prevented from coming to the relief of the beſieged.

The citizens ſuſtained the ſiege with great bravery, and Edmund began an expeditious march from the weſt, in order to relieve them. On the other hand, Canute acted with much vigour, and cloſely preſſed the ſiege, but was continually repulſed by the gallant Londoners. Finding his endeavours to poſſeſs himſelf of the metropolis of the kingdom ineffectual, and hearing of Edmund's rapid advances, he thought it moſt prudent to draw part of his forces from the ſiege in order to put a ſtop to the progreſs of that gallant prince.

The two armies met at Gillingham in Dorſetſhire, when a bloody engagement enſued, in which both commanders gave admirable proofs of their ſkill and courage. Victory at length declared for the Engliſh, when Canute retreated in tolerable order to Wincheſter, where having ſhut himſelf up, he iſſued his orders to another body of Danes immediately to lay ſiege to Saliſbury.

Edmund hearing of this marched to the relief of Saliſbury; and Canute, having been recruited by Danes and diſaffected Engliſh from various parts of the kingdom, directly followed him, when the two armies met at Sherſton in Wiltſhire.

Beſides Danes, and Anglo-Danes, or perſons of Daniſh extraction, Canute had in his army the men of Wilts and Hants, commanded by Ælgar and Ælmar, two powerful noblemen, and above all, the traitor Edric with a numerous party.

On the other hand, Edmund had many of the moſt reſpectable Engliſh nobility, and the principal inhabitants of Cornwall, Devonſhire, Dorſetſhire, and Somerſetſhire, with many perſons from other different counties.

Great expectations were formed concerning the fate of this battle, and each party was anxiouſly ſedulous for the event. We ſhall take the deſcription of the engagement itſelf from Simeon of Durham, whoſe account is deemed at once the moſt ſtriking and authentic.

On this occaſion the oppoſite princes were well matched in courage, conduct, and experience, and both armies were nearly equal in ſtrength, though the Danes had manifeſtly the advantage in point of diſcipline. Both kings choſe their ground to the beſt advantage, each harangued his men in that ſtrain which was moſt likely to animate to dominion and conqueſt, as the reward of toils and labour, or encourage to the preſervation of liberty, their laws, their children, and their country. The trumpets giving the ſignal, each ſide made a ſhort but awful pauſe, meditating on the part they were to act, and conſidering that on the iſſue of that day depended freedom or ſlavery, glory or ignominy, and that they were now to fall by the ſwords, or triumph in the deaths of their reſpective enemies. But the ſhock of battle ſoon baniſhing all reflections, a deſperate fight enſued, in which, rank cloſing with rank, diſputed every inch of the bloody field with more than human rage. The gallant Edmund ſeemed preſent in a thouſand places, and to ſtake a thouſand lives on one caſt. All his troops equally witneſſed his valour, and equally trembled for his ſafety. Such, indeed, was the conduct and courage that he diſplayed on this occaſion, that the fate of the day muſt ſoon have ſucceeded to his wiſh, had he not had Canute to encounter as an enemy; but the Dane's experience and the veteran boldneſs of his troops, enured to ſlaughter, and trained up in the art of death, for that time balanced the victory, and the ardour of both ſides outlaſting the day, the combatants unwillingly retired; and rather to meditate new revenge than for the purpoſes of repoſe.

Next day the fight was renewed with double fury, and Edmund's valorous efforts, ſeconded by the intrepid proweſs of his gallant Engliſhmen, had already charmed victory over to their ſtandard, when the traitor Edric bethought him of a ſtratagem which damped the ardour of thoſe glorious aſſertors of their liberty, and for a while threw the advantage on the ſide of the Danes. He cut off the head of one Oſmar, who nearly reſembled Edmund, and raiſing it on the point of a ſpear, called aloud to the aſtoniſhed Engliſh, "Yield! and ſave your lives! See here! the head of your king." This contrivance had for a while the deſired effect; and the irreſolute pauſe which this heart-wounding ſight occaſioned, gave the broken Danes an opportunity of rallying, and returning to the onſet. But no ſooner did this news reach Edmund's ears, than, throwing up his beaver, he flew like lightning to ſhew himſelf to his amazed troops, who inſtantly felt their former courage re-animated, and prepared to make their enemies pay dearly for the deceit they had put upon them: however, the advantage the Danes gained by this ſtratagem, enabled them to maintain the combat till darkneſs once more put an end to the fight.

Edmund, not diſcouraged by this diſadvantage, determined to renew the fight the enſuing morning. But Canute, thinking proper to decline the engagement for many prudential reaſons, made a precipitate retreat with all imaginable ſecrecy in the night, in order to join that detachment of his forces, which were then blockading London.

Edmund was ſenſible that Canute's junction with theſe forces would give him a great ſuperiority of numbers; he therefore returned to the Weſt of England, in order to augment his army with new recruits.

The traitor Edric now made a feigned ſubmiſſion to Edmund, and pretended to obliterate the remembrance of his former baſeneſs by betraying to him the Daniſh councils, and ſerving his country with as much zeal and vigilance as he had hitherto ſerved its enemies.

Edmund, though far ſuperior to his father in abilities, unfortunately copied his weak example, in being too eaſily deceived by this wily and hackneyed traitor.—He not only generouſly forgave him, but believed him ſincere, and took him into his confidence.

Having recruited his army, Edmund marched to the relief of London, when the enemy raiſed the blockade, and divided themſelves into two bodies, the one part going on board the ſhips, and the other proceeding to Brentford, where the troops encamped. Edmund purſued the latter party, croſſed the river, in doing which many of his troops were drowned, and having attacked them with great fury, he put them to a precipitate flight.

As this victory coſt him dear, he was obliged to return again to the weſt of England, in order to recruit his forces, and fill up his ranks; when Canute, taking the advantage of his abſence, renewed the ſiege of London, and carried on his operations with redoubled vigour. The bravery of the Londoners, however, was ſuch, that he found all his efforts ineffectual; exaſperated with his repeated diſappointments, he embarked on board his ſhips, and ſailing round to the coaſt of Suſſex, he ravaged that country in all the bitterneſs of deſpair. Proceeding then up the Medway, he treated the county of Kent in a ſimilar manner, when Edmund, hearing of his depredations, arrived in Kent by haſty marches, and croſſing the Thames with a ſtrong detachment of troops, he came up to the enemy at Ottenford, attacked them with great intrepidity, and having ſlaughtered many, drove the remainder into the iſle of Sheepy; when the traitor Edric, interpoſing and perſuading him to diſcontinue the purſuit, he very imprudently ſuffered them to regain their ſhipping and eſcape to Eſſex, where they were joined by other Daniſh forces.

Edmund, however, overtook them at Aſhdown, near Billerica, in Eſſex, when a bloody engagement enſued, and the advantage at firſt apparently inclined to the Engliſh. But the villainous Edric, the bane of his country, ſeeing victory hovering over the ſtandard of Edmund, determined to act with his uſual treachery. With this view he drew off, and diſordered the wing he commanded, which gave the Danes ſuch a manifeſt advantage, that the Engliſh were defeated, and many nobles as well as private men were ſlain, while Edmund was obliged to ſecure himſelf by a haſty retreat to Glouceſter.

Canute purſued the fugitive king and thought to take him while defenceleſs; but Edmund had raiſed another army with ſuch aſtoniſhing expedition, that Canute was in the utmoſt conſternation at being informed of it; he, however, determined to ſtake all upon one ſtroke, and to hazard a battle which might be deciſive, and terminate the differences between the two competitors.

The two armies being in ſight of each other, the traitor Edric ſtepped forth, and in a florid harangue, repreſented to the reſpective troops, the effuſion of blood, which the conteſt betwixt the two kings had already occaſioned, the carnage which was likely to enſue, the improbability of deciding their differences by pitched battles, ſieges, or ſkirmiſhes, and at length, winding up the whole with an eulogium, on the perſonal courage of each, he propoſed that their quarrel ſhould be decided by ſingle combat, and that the victor ſhould unanimouſly be acknowledged as ſovereign.

This ſpeech met with univerſal applauſe, and the general cry was, "Let them either fight or agree." The two monarchs gladly embraced this mode of deciſion, and repairing to the iſle of Alney, in the Severn, they prepared for the combat, while their reſpective armies were drawn up on each ſide of the river.

Having broken their ſpears, the royal combatants fought hand to hand with equal ſkill and intrepidity. At length, Canute perceiving that Edmund had greatly the ſuperiority, both with reſpect to activity and perſonal ſtrength, he propoſed a partition of the kingdom between them. Edmund generouſly acceded to this propoſal, and the two kings cordially embracing each other, both the armies were tranſported with joy at the ſight, and ſent forth the loudeſt ſhouts of approbation.

Having made a mutual interchange of cloaths and armour, in token of amity, the treaty was formally concluded; when it was ſtipulated, that Canute ſhould have all the northern parts of England, and that Edmund ſhould have the city of London, all Weſſex, Eaſt-Anglia, and Eſſex, together with the title of ſupreme king of England.

The Danes by a treaty with the Londoners, were permitted to take up their winter quarters in the city. But Edric, who beheld this amicable convention with a jealous eye, as his greateſt pleaſure ſeemed to conſiſt in the deſtruction of his country, determined to prevent the happineſs it was likely to enjoy; and more particularly, as he had reaſon to think that Edmund would now ſcrutinize into his actions, and call him to account for his perfidy. Fraught with theſe diabolical ideas, he employed two ruffians to aſſaſſinate the brave Edmund, who thus, A. D. 1016, fell a martyr to the conſummate treachery of one of the greateſt villains that ever diſgraced the annals of this or any other country.

Edmund was courageous, generous, benevolent, patient, and ſtrictly equitable; in ſhort, he ſeemed born for the happineſs of his people, had Providence been pleaſed to have extended the line of his mortal life. With reſpect to perſon he was comely, well made, and ſo remarkably ſtrong, as to obtain the ſurname of Ironſide. The deteſtable Edric was the firſt who carried the news of Edmund's death to Canute, who bountifully rewarded him, though he ſecretly hated him for his treachery, and equivocally promiſed that for what he had done he would exalt him above all the lords in England, which he afterwards did in a manner at that time little expected by the perfidious villain.

The remains of this prince were depoſited by thoſe of his grand-father Edgar, at Glaſtonbury. By his wife Elgitha, he left two ſons, Edmund and Edward, and beſides theſe a natural ſon named Edwy ſurvived him. With Edmund fell the ſplendor of the Anglo-Saxons, after their monarchy had laſted 190 years from its eſtabliſhment by Egbert the Great, 432 from the foundation of the Heptarchy, and 568 from the firſt arrival of the Saxons.

SECT. XVI.

DANISH KINGS.

Canute the Great.

EDMUND being dead, Canute, with all imaginable expedition, convened an aſſembly of the nobles, and repreſentatives of the people, to meet in the beginning of A. D. 1017, at London; when he propoſed the two following queſtions to the members of the ſenate, to which he demanded an immediate, and explicit anſwer:

1. Whether in the treaty between the late king, and himſelf (to which they were witneſſes) any ſtipulation had been made in favor of the deceaſed king's brothers in Normandy?

2. Whether in the ſaid treaty there were any articles in favor of the late king's children?

To the firſt queſtion an immediate anſwer was given, that no ſuch ſtipulation was made; but with reſpect to the ſecond, the tendency of which was ſo very obvious, the whole aſſembly remained ſilent.

Canute, however, inſiſted upon a categorical anſwer, when ſome of the members replied in this equivocal manner, "That if any ſuch ſtipulation had been made, they were ſenſible that Edmund deſigned that Canute ſhould be their guardian till they came of age." This mean evaſion not ſatiſfying Canute, he declared that he would not reign in right of another, and therefore poſitively inſiſted that they ſhould ſwear allegiance to him, and entirely renounce the Cerdic race. With theſe conditions, though exceedingly diſagreeable to many, they were all under the neceſſity of complying, as none choſe to diſpute the matter with a powerful and war-like king, who had a numerous and well diſciplined army ready to obey his nod.

Things being brought to this iſſue, he divided England into four diſtinct governments, over each of which he placed a governor, viz. 1. Mercia, which was governed by the traitor Edric. 2. Northumberland, which was held by Eric. 3. Eaſt-Anglia, over which Turkyl preſided. And 4. Weſſex, which he reſerved to himſelf. Having made this diſpoſition, his next care was to conciliate the affections of the Engliſh, to which purpoſe he publicly declared that he ſhould make no difference between his Daniſh and Engliſh ſubjects, either with reſpect to perſonal favor, or public places. He then prudently publiſhed an edict confirming the old Saxon laws, in all parts of the kingdom, except Northumberland and its vicinity, where, as moſt of the people were Danes, or of Daniſh extraction, and had been uſed to be governed by the original laws of their country, a reſervation was made in their favor. This refined policy gained Canute the hearts of moſt of the Engliſh, who were vociferous in their applauſes of a prince of ſuch integrity and juſtice.

Though thus fully ſecured in a kingdom, to which he had neither lineal, or equitable right, he was exceedingly uneaſy concerning Edward and Edmund, the ſons of the late king, greatly dreading that the people would at length be touched with compaſſion, and riſe in their favor.

Being dubious how to act ſo as not to render himſelf obnoxious, or occaſion a revolt, he at length determined to ſend them to the king of Sweden, with this meſſage, "That he would confer an infinite obligation on the Engliſh monarch, if he would deal with them in ſuch a manner, as to prevent their ever returning again to their own country." Shocked with the barbarity inſinuated by this meſſage, and yet fearful of offending ſo powerful a monarch as Canute, whoſe paternal dominions lay ſo near his own, the king of Sweden thought it moſt prudent to ſhift the whole affair from himſelf to another. He therefore ſent the young princes from his own court to that of Solomon, king of Hungary, who, greatly to his honor, cordially received the unfortunate exiles, placed proper tutors over them, and gave them an education ſuitable to the proſpects they had been born to. "Edmund (ſays an accurate author) died in this court, but his brother Edward married Agatha, the queen of Hungary's ſiſter, and daughter of Henry II. emperor of Germany, by whom he had Edgar Atheling, and Margaret, afterwards queen of Scotland."

Although the legitimate offspring of the late king were removed, ſtill his natural ſon Edwy was matter of umbrage to Canute; the many virtues, and riſing popularity of this young prince gave him infinite concern; he therefore conſulted the infamous Edric concerning the beſt method of quieting the perturbation of his mind. This traitor, hackneyed in the ways of villainy, readily undertook to make away with the innocent young prince, and immediately employed one of his tools, named Ethelwald, to murder him. But this perſon not being quite ſo wicked as his maſter, ſtill found pretences to delay the execution of the bloody project, till Canute growing impatient, trumped up a ſham plot, in order to have ſome plauſible pretext for baniſhing him the kingdom. The unfortunate youth being exiled, wandered about in a forlorn condition, but at length returning to England, he died, as ſome authors affirm, through mere penury, whilſt others inſiſt that he was privately aſſaſſinated by order of Canute. It is, however, certain, that he fell a martyr to the ſuſpicions of that monarch.

Thus were three obſtacles to the repoſe of Canute removed, but there ſtill remained two others, and the latter appeared ſtill more dangerous than the former. Theſe were Alfred and Edward, the ſons of Ethelred, who were now grown up to mens' eſtate, and remained in the court of their uncle Richard II. duke of Normandy, a wiſe, politic, powerful, and brave prince, who might, as Canute juſtly feared, endeavour to place one of them upon the Engliſh throne.

To avert this ſurmiſed evil, and prevent any future ſtorm, Canute determined to ſecure the alliance of Richard, by double nuptials; he therefore demanded in marriage the duke of Normandy's ſiſter Emma, and offered the hand of his own ſiſter Heſtritha to that prince.

Theſe propoſals were too flattering to be refuſed, both were therefore acceded to by Richard, and the double nuptials were ſolemnized with great pomp towards the latter end of July, A. D. 1017. When Richard gave up the intereſt of his nephews to wed the ſiſter of the Dane; and Emma baſely deſerting the ties of nature to her children, meanly conſented to marry the profeſſed foe to her late huſband, and his whole family.

Having thus far ſucceeded in all his deſigns, Canute began to turn his attention towards the arch-traitor Edric, and very juſtly thought that a man who could be falſe to his own natural prince, and his native country, would never be true to a foreigner, and an uſurper, and though he very well liked the treaſon which had benefited him, it was natural for him to deteſt the traitor, who, with his uſual treachery, might injure him; he therefore determined, on the firſt opportunity, to puniſh the villain at once for his manifold crimes, and ſecure himſelf from the apprehenſion of his future malefactions. Edric was not long before he gave Canute an opportunity of wreaking his vengeance on him, by treating that monarch, in the public council chamber, with a degree of inſolence that was truly inſupportable, and upbraiding him with not having ſufficiently rewarded him for his many ſervices. On being thus treated, Canute flew into a violent paſſion, and immediately ordered Edric's head to be ſtruck off and fixed on the higheſt gate in London, that his promiſe of exalting him above all the lords in England might be literally fulfilled. Several other perſons were put to death at the ſame time as accomplices with, and coadjutors of Edric in moſt of his villainies, particularly Norman, ſon of duke Leofwine, Ethelward, ſon of duke Ædhelmer, Brightric, ſon of Alphage, earl of Devon, and Edric's own three ſons.

A. D. 1018. Canute laid a tax of 82,000l. upon the nation to pay off the arrears of his fleet; the ſum of 15,000l. of which was paid by the city of London only. This heavy ſubſidy the Engliſh patiently ſubmitted to, as it was to relieve them from ſome very troubleſome gueſts. The money was no ſooner paid than Canute ſent home his navy, forty ſhips excepted; which he retained as neceſſary to the national defence.

Canute was ſo pleaſed with the ready acquieſcence of the Engliſh with this tax, that he convened an aſſembly of the ſtates to meet at Oxford, where he paſſed an act to incorporate the Engliſh and Danes as one people, and re-eſtabliſhed ſeveral of the moſt popular laws of Edgar, and Edward the Elder. Theſe ſteps ſhewed his profound policy, conciliated the affections of the Engliſh, and enabled him to advance any of his countrymen, whom he might think proper, to places of truſt and profit.---He likewiſe enacted,

1. That no markets, fairs, or aſſemblies, ſhould be held on Sundays.

2. That all chriſtians ſhould receive the ſacrament at leaſt three times a year.

3. That a married woman convicted of adultery ſhould have her noſe and ears cut off.

4. That a widow marrying within a year after her huſband's death ſhould loſe her dowry.

Every thing being thus ſucceſsfully adjuſted in England, Canute turned his attention to the affairs of his own country, as a war had broken out between the Danes and Vandals, or Sweeds. He therefore, in

A. D. 1019. went over to Denmark with a conſiderable army, one half of which was compoſed of Engliſh, who were under the command of Godwin, earl of Kent.* Having refreſhed his troops after their debarkation, he began his march towards the enemy, with whom, in the courſe of ſeveral days, he came up towards ſun-ſet. The day being ſo far declined, he thought proper to encamp his army, deſigning to engage the enemy on the enſuing day.

In the night, earl Godwin determined to ſignalize himſelf by a very extraordinary action; he ſecretly drew off his Engliſh, and coming ſilently upon the enemy's camp, he attacked them with ſuch impetuoſity, at a time when they little expected ſuch a viſit, that they were routed with great ſlaughter.

In the morning, Canute was much aſtoniſhed to find himſelf in poſſeſſion of a victory, before he knew of an engagement; and this gallant action greatly endeared to him the Engliſh in general, and their leader, earl Godwin in particular; indeed he rewarded the latter by giving him his ſiſter Thyrſa in marriage, and ever after diſtinguiſhing him with peculiar marks of affection.

Canute having ſucceſsfully terminated this war, returned to England, A. D. 1020. when finding that ſome of the Danes, whom he had intruſted with the adminiſtration of public affairs, had been guilty of many oppreſſions, and acted in a very arbitrary manner, he determined to ſhew his regard for the Engliſh in their puniſhment, and accordingly, having ſummoned a great council to meet at Cirenceſter in Glouceſterſhire, he paſſed the ſentence of baniſhment upon the duke of Eaſt-Anglia, as alſo upon Eric, duke of Northumberland. This act of juſtice and impartiality greatly encreaſed the eſteem the Engliſh had already conceived for him, and to win their affections ſtill farther, he appeared to be deeply penetrated with grief for the vaſt effuſion of blood, which his attempts upon the Engliſh crown had occaſioned, and more particularly for the death of Edmund, for whoſe memory he affected to have the greateſt veneration. To make ſome atonement, he therefore built and endowed a church at Aſhdown, where one of his engagements with Edmund was fought; he likewiſe erected ſeveral monaſteries, chanteries, &c. where other battles had been fought, that prayers might be continually ſaid for the repoſe of the ſouls of the ſlain. Camden ſays, "Among other benefactions he gave the port of Sandwich, with all its iſſues and profits, to Chriſt's-church in Canterbury. He likewiſe founded a monaſtery of Benedictines in Norfolk, which from its ſituation was called St. Bennet's in Holme, (Holme, in the Saxon language, ſignifying a riſing hill or gentle aſcent.) Leland, who ſaw this town and monaſtery, gives us a deſcription of it, which claims our notice. This city, for its ſituation, exceeds any that the ſun ever ſaw: it ſeems, as it were, to hang upon a gentle deſcent, and is waſhed on the eaſt ſide with a little river. Its monaſtery is not leſs noble, whether we conſider it with reſpect to its indowments, its extent, or its unparalleled magnificence. One might even take the monaſtery itſelf for a city, it has ſo many gates, ſome of which are braſs, is adorned with ſo many towers, and has likewiſe a church which cannot be exceeded in grandeur, or magnificence. To this we may add three more churches, which are contiguous, and are, as it were, appendages to this, which are likewiſe admirable for their beauty and architecture. Canute enriched the monaſtery with very conſiderable preſents, brought in the monks with their abbot, granted it the whole town, as well as other eſtates for its maintenance, and offered his crown to the martyr. The pope gave it large immunities, exempting it from the juriſdiction of the biſhop of the dioceſe, beſides the offerings that were brought to Edmund's tomb, its revenues amounted to one thouſand, five hundred and ſixty pounds yearly."

A. D. 1021. Canute found occaſion to baniſh Turkyl, who had been materially concerned in the murder of the archbiſhop Alfage, or Alphage, which was another tranſaction very grateful to the Engliſh, as the memory of that prelate was univerſally eſteemed by them. A. D. 1022. he made a voyage to the Iſle of Wight, in order to exerciſe his fleet, and A. D. 1025. he was under the neceſſity of again repairing to Denmark, to repreſs the Swedes, who had invaded that kingdom with a deſign to annex it to the crown of Sweden, while Canute was ſo earneſtly occupied in the Engliſh adminiſtration. In this expedition as in the former, his army was compoſed of about an equal number of Engliſh and Danes; he was, however, defeated ſoon after his landing, by the Swediſh generals, Wulf and Higlaff, and compelled to return to England the ſame year. During the years 1026 and 1027 he made preparations for a ſtill more important expedition, and A. D. 1028, he again ſet ſail for Denmark, with an army of Engliſh and Daniſh forces, his deſign being to invade Norway, where a powerful party of malecontents were in his intereſt. Having landed, he proceeded with all imaginable expedition into that country; when Olaus, king of Norway, a timid and pacific prince, not expecting ſuch a viſit, nor being prepared to oppoſe it, conſulted his perſonal ſafety in a precipitate flight to Sweden, from whence he removed for greater ſecurity to Ruſſia. Canute, upon this reſolution, ſeized the crown of Norway, and obliged the people to take oaths of allegiance to him.†

When Canute returned to England, A. D. 1029, he diſcovered a dangerous conſpiracy, which had been formed againſt him by a Daniſh nobleman, named Hacum, who had married his niece Gunilda; but the effects of this were prevented by Hacum's being immediately baniſhed, and ſeveral of the other conſpirators put to death. This plot was ſucceeded by the proſpect of a powerful invaſion of England by Robert the ſon of Richard II. duke of Normandy, who, having ſucceeded to that dukedom, in A. D. 1030, took into conſideration the injuſtice, which his couſins, Alfred and Edward, the ſons of Ethelred, ſuffered from the uſurpation of the Dane. Reſolving to intereſt himſelf in their behalf, he deputed ambaſſadors to wait on Canute, and to demand the dominions of thoſe princes which were inequitably withheld from them. Canute, not being uſed to ſuch haughty meſſages, diſmiſſed the ambaſſadors with diſdain, and Robert immediately prepared to give effect to his demands, by force of arms. A ſtorm, however, obliged his fleet, firſt to put into Guernſey, and afterwards to return to France to refit. Nevertheleſs, he ordered many of his lighteſt ſhips to ſcour the channel, and block up the Engliſh ports till he could fit out another navy, and raiſe a ſtill more conſiderable army to complete his deſigned invaſion. Theſe preparations were no ways pleaſing to Canute; the principal part of his Daniſh forces was in Denmark, and he had but a ſmall ſquadron of ſhips in the Engliſh harbours. With reſpect to the Engliſh themſelves, he could very well depend upon them, when they were to fight againſt the Swedes or Norwegians; but he knew too well their love for the Cerdic race, to imagine they would aſſiſt him in oppoſing two innocent and unfortunate young princes, who were deſcended from a long line of their natural ſovereigns. These conſiderations induced him to temporize, and aim to ward off the impending blow, by means of a negociation. He therefore propoſed to reſign one half of the kingdom in favor of the young princes; he however made ſo many artful delays, with reſpect to the ratification of this treaty, and procraſtinated the time in ſuch a manner, that the duke of Normandy was obliged to go to the Holy Land in conſequence of a ſtrict vow he had made, before the affair could be brought to a concluſion; when dying upon the journey, the dukedom of Normandy devolved to his ſon William (afterwards the conqueror of England) who was then only an infant of ſeven years of age, and conſequently the deſign of doing juſtice to the offspring of Ethelred fell to the ground.

* It is ſaid, that Canute gave the command of the Engliſh forces to Godwin, not ſo much becauſe he could confide in him, as becauſe he did not chuſe to leave ſo powerful and popular a nobleman behind him; and that he likewiſe aſſociated with him ſeveral other Engliſh noblemen and gentlemen, whom he thought might breed commotions, and be troubleſome in his abſence.

† Hiſtorians ſay, that the unfortunate Olaus made an attempt to regain his kingdom two years afterwards; but being ſlain by ſome of his own perfidious ſubjects, Canute remained king of Norway without a rival.

A. D. 1031. Canute gave many more donations to the church, and made a pilgrimage to Rome, in order to obtain abſolution of the pope for all his paſt offences. His journey, however, he made uſeful to the Engliſh in many reſpects; ſuch as in purchaſing of all the princes, through whoſe territories he paſt, an exemption from toll for all Engliſh merchants, pilgrims and travellers. In obtaining from pope John XIX. ſeveral privileges for the Engliſh ſtudents at the college at Rome. In procuring a remiſſion of the fines (which were very exhorbitant) heretofore paid by the Engliſh metropolitans, on receiving the ſacerdotal pall, &c. &c.

Canute returned home again by the way of Denmark, from whence he diſpatched Levignus, abbot of Taviſtock, to the clergy, nobility and commons of England, with a letter, which, ſays a modern author, "Ought to be written in letters of gold," to inform them of his ſafety, and communicate to them ſome of the particulars of his journey. As this piece is deemed a great curioſity, we ſhall inſert it here for the entertainment of our readers.

"Canute, king of all England, Denmark, and Norway, with part of Sweden, wiſheth health to Ælnoth the metropolitan, and Alfrick of York; and to all biſhops, primates, and to all the Engliſh nation, both nobles and commoners. Know ye that I lately undertook a journey to Rome, to pray for the remiſſion of my ſins; for the welfare of my kingdom, and that of the people ſubject to my government. This is a journey I had long vowed to make; but I ſtill, till lately, was prevented by the exigencies of my kingdom and other cauſes. Now I humbly thank Almighty God, who has, in this life, granted me, according to my deſire, leave, perſonally to venerate and adore the holy apoſtles, Peter and Paul, with whatever is holy or ſacred, either within or without the walls of Rome. This I was the more inclined to effect, becauſe I had learned, from wiſe men, that St. Peter had received from the Lord great power of looſing and tying, and that he was the key-keeper of heaven; therefore I thought it extremely convenient particularly to beſpeak his patronage with God. Now be it known to you, that there was preſent with pope John and the emperor Conrade, a great aſſembly of nobles at the feſtival of Eaſter, who all of them received me with great honor, and made me particular preſents. The emperor, eſpecially, made me a great many preſents of gold and ſilver plate, as well as of robes and apparel. I then conferred with the emperor, and my lord the pope, and the other princes who were preſent, with regard to the hardſhips of my people, both Engliſh and Danes; demanding that they might be upon more eaſy terms; that they might be more ſecure in their perſons when on their journey to Rome, not meeting with ſo many obſtacles, and being plagued with paying ſo many tolls upon the road. This was granted by the emperor and king Rodulph, and by all the other princes, who iſſued out orders that all my ſubjects, both merchants, and they who went to Rome on religious accounts, ſhould be free from all moleſtations of tolls and impoſitions, both in their going and returning. I then complained before my lord the pope, and informed him, that I could not but take it very much amiſs that my archbiſhops ſhould be ſo much harraſſed, and pay ſo great ſums of money, whenever they went to demand their palls at Rome. Upon which the pope made a decree, that the like ſhould not be done in time to come. Every thing which I demanded for the advantage of my people from the pope, the emperor, king Rodulph, and the other princes, through whoſe territories I paſſed, was moſt chearfully granted, and confirmed even under the ſanction of an oath, in the preſence and under the teſtimony of four archbiſhops, twenty biſhops, and a great many of the temporal nobility. I reſolved, therefore, to pay my thanks to God, having thus ſucceeded in every thing I purpoſed. Now be it therefore known to you all, that I purpoſe to devote myſelf, in every reſpect, to God; to reform my life; to govern with juſtice and piety the people committed to my care; to diſtribute impartial juſtice; and if any part of my paſt conduct hath been inconſiſtent with the rules of juſtice, through the folly or inadvertency of youth, to amend the ſame, through the aſſiſtance of God. I therefore adjure and command all my councellors, to whom I have entruſted the management of public affairs, upon no manner of account, either from the dread of my power or their affections for any one in power, be who he will, that they conſent to any injuſtice, nor ſuffer my people to be harraſſed. I likewiſe command all my deputies, and the governors of my people, as they value my friendſhip, or their own welfare, that they do injuſtice to no man, either rich or poor; but that every one, whether noble or ignoble, whether wealthy or needy, have free acceſs to impartial juſtice, from which they are neither to deviate through royal favor, through their partiality for the powerful, nor for the ſake of amaſſing money for me, nor for any other motive whatſoever; becauſe there can be no manner of neceſſity for exacting money for me by unjuſt means.

"Therefore I am willing you ſhould know, that returning the ſame way I went, I am now upon my road to Denmark, with the view of reconciling all differences between that nation and thoſe who, if it had been in their power, would have deprived me both of my life and kingdom. But this they could not effect, becauſe God confounded their devices by his grace, which preſerved our royalty and honor, and brought to nothing all the forces of our enemies. Therefore, having ſettled peace with all our neighbours, and after ordering and compoſing our government in the eaſt, ſo that we may have nothing to dread from war, or the enmity of our foes, I deſign to come to England as ſoon as I can have a convenient convoy of ſhipping this ſummer.

"Now we have ſent this letter before, that all our people may rejoice at our welfare; for you yourſelves are ſenſible that I never ſpared either my perſon or my pains, and that I never will ſpare them to promote the neceſſary felicity of my ſubjects.

"He then concludes with ſtrict injunctions, that, before his return, all the dues to the church ſhall be paid, of whatſoever kind; threatning, that if any are unpaid, he will, when he returns to England, ſeverely, and without favor to any one, puniſh the offenders."

It is but juſtice to obſerve, that Canute's future conduct was perfectly agreeable to what he profeſſed in this epiſtle, ſo that he gained upon the admiration and eſteem of the reſpective people of the different nations he ruled.

A. D. 1033. Canute entered into a diſpute with Scotland, though it at length terminated without bloodſhed; of the occaſion and concluſion of this rupture we have the following account:

Duncan, grandſon to Malcolm II. king of Scotland, and heir-apparent to that kingdom, held the county of Cumberland in fief of the Engliſh crown. Canute had repeatedly ſummoned him to come and do him homage for thoſe territories, which Duncan had as often refuſed, alledging that Canute had no right to make ſuch a demand upon him, inaſmuch as his homage was due only to the Engliſh born kings of England. This anſwer was highly reſented by Canute, who, ſoon after his return from his pilgrimage to Rome, ſet out with a powerful army to chaſtiſe the Scottiſh prince, and reduce Cumberland to his obedience.---Malcolm, ſiding with his grandſon, brought his forces into the field, and prepared to give the Engliſh battle; and a bloody engagement was on the point of beginning, when the prelates and nobles of both armies interpoſed in order to prevent the effuſion of blood; and an accommodation was brought about between the two kings, when it was agreed that Duncan, and the heirs of the future kings of Scotland, for the time being, ſhould hold Cumberland, according to the original tenure, and do homage to Canute and his ſucceſſors, kings of England, for that fief.

From this time Canute relinquiſhed all thoughts of military glory, and reſigned himſelf up to acts of devotion till his death, which happened at Shafteſbury, in Dorſetſhire, on the 12th of November, 1035. This monarch, who reigned over England nineteen years, was buried in the old monaſtery at Wincheſter. By his firſt wife Elſwina, daughter of Ælfhelm, earl of Northampton, he had two ſons, viz. Swein and Harold; and Emma, his ſecond wife, bore him a ſon named Hardicanute, and a daughter named Gunilda. Harold ſucceeded to the throne of England, Hardicanute to that of Denmark, Swein to that of Norway, and his daughter Gunilda was married to Henry III. emperor of Germany; of this lady the following ſingular circumſtances are related by moſt hiſtorians, and therefore ought to remain ſtill on record:

Being a lady of remarkable beauty, her huſband grew jealous of her, and ſhe being accuſed of adultery, a duel enſued, which was the uſual method of trial in theſe ages. The accuſer being a perſon of gigantic ſize, and extraordinary ſtrength, no perſon was bold enough to undertake the vindication of Gunilda's innocence; till her page, who was but a ſtripling, in compariſon of his antagoniſt, appeared in the liſt, and offered to engage her accuſer. In the combat the youth having the good fortune to cut the ſinews of his antagoniſt's legs with one blow, followed his advantage with ſo much vigour, that he felled him to the ground with another, and then cut his head off, which he preſented to his lady. After Gunilda's honor had thus been vindicated by the valour of her Engliſh page, ſhe thought it a proper time to ſhow her reſentment for the affront her huſband had paſſed upon her by his credulity, and having renounced his bed, notwithſtanding his entreaties to the contrary, turned nun at Bruges in Flanders. After her death, ſhe was buried in the collegiate church of Donation, and her monument, in Speed's time, was then to be ſeen near the north door of that ſacred edifice.

The character of Canute is ſo inconſiſtent with itſelf, that it is impoſſible to draw it in general terms; to do him juſtice, we muſt trace his actions, and characterize him differently at different periods. Some, dazzled by the rapidity of his ſucceſs, and the variety of his conqueſts, may think he merited the title of GREAT, by his victories, but “ Glory by few is rightly underſtood,

“ What's truly glorious muſt be greatly good.

We cannot help thinking, but if theſe very things are viewed with the eye of reaſon, and impartiality, Canute muſt then appear in the light of a murderer, robber, and uſurper; an oppreſſor of innocence, and defrauder of orphans. But view him in the milder and leſs exceptionable parts of his reign, and there indeed he merits the title of Great. It is aſtoniſhing that a man, who waded through ſeas of blood, became familiarized to ſights of horror, and trampled on every law, human and divine, to acquire a crown, ſhould immediately, after obtaining his end, ſink into the benevolent and placid being; and govern the kingdom he had ſo cruelly poſſeſſed himſelf of with juſtice, humanity, and moderation. It muſt be confeſſed he was a man of extraordinary abilities, brave, magnanimous, generous, and modeſt; of the latter virtue, we need no other proof than what is thus related by Huntingdon and Florilegus: One day as he was taking his recreation on the ſea ſhore, at Southampton, accompanied by a train of courtiers, who were idolizing with the moſt fulſome flattery, placing him on a level with the greateſt heroes of antiquity, and extolling his power as ſomething more than human, he ordered a chair to be brought and placed on the beach while the tide was coming in, and ſitting down, he, with a majeſtic air, thus addreſſed himſelf to the ſea. “ Thou ſea art a part of my dominions, and the land whereon I ſit is alſo mine. I charge thee not to preſume to approach any farther, nor dare to wet the feet of me who am thy ſovereign.” But the ſea, as Huntingdon expreſſes it, came rolling on as before, and, regardleſs of his admonition, not only wetted the ſkirts of his robes, but alſo daſhed on his thighs. Upon which riſing up ſuddenly, and turning about with a diſdainful look to his followers, he bid them learn from the example before their eyes, that the title of Lord and Maſter belonged only to him whoſe voice the land and ſea obey: and taking off his crown, which he would never after wear, he ordered it to be placed on the head of the great crucifix at Wincheſter.

Tyrrel has very juſtly obſerved, that it would have been happy for England if Canute had either never ſat upon the Engliſh throne, or had continued on it much longer. And indeed it is ſingular, that power ſo badly attained ſhould have been ſo well uſed, or that the rage of ambition ſhould ſo eaſily meliorate into the milkineſs of humanity. We may, however, conclude that Canute's ruling paſſion was ambition; though at different periods it was of a different nature. In the early part of his life, it was of the fierce, ungovernable, and falſe kind, which, according to the poet, ———“ Is but deſire of greatneſs.

“ And what is greatneſs but extent of power?
“ The luſt of power, a dropſy of the mind,
“ Whoſe thirſt encreaſes while we drink to quench it.”

But in his maturer years, experience taught him to find the ſubſtantial and true ambition.

“ For true ambition there alone reſides
“ Where juſtice vindicates, and wiſdom guides,
“ Where inward dignity joins outward ſtate,
“ Our purpoſe good, as our atchivement great,
“ Where public bleſſings, public praiſe attend,
“ Where glory is our motive, not our end.
“ Wou'dſt thou be fam'd, have thoſe high acts in view,
“ Brave men wou'd act, tho' ſcandal ſhou'd enſue.”

SECT. XVII.

HAROLD THE FIRST.

Surnamed HAREFOOT.

AS Hardicanute had been appointed to the throne of Denmark, and Swein to that of Norway, previous to the death of Canute, it was natural to ſuppoſe that he reſerved the kingdom of England for his ſon Harold; but as this was not ſpecifically mentioned in his will, it occaſioned the kingdom to be divided into three parties. The firſt, which conſiſted of the Danes and Londoners, were for the ſucceſſion of Harold. The Weſt-Saxons were for Hardicanute, and the reſt of the people were for the reſtoration of the Cerdic race. With the latter party, queen[*] Emma cordially coincided, together with ſeveral diſtinguiſhed nobles. The moſt powerful perſon, however, was the celebrated Godwin, earl of Kent, a man to whom this character is given, "That he had all the vices of Catiline, without his immorality and imprudence, all the ambition of Cæſar without thoſe virtues which made it praiſe-worthy, and all the diſſimulation of Tiberius, without his winning adreſs." This nobleman had been ſo high in the deceaſed Canute's favour, that he left him ſole executor to what perſonal fortune he bequeathed to his queen Emma, though, on many accounts he ſeemed to be a man but ill calculated for ſuch a truſt.

As the conteſts between the different factions ran high, a civil war was univerſally expected. Many people retired to the moſt fenny and inacceſſible places, in order to ſecure both their perſons and properties, when the threatened ſtorm was prevented by the prudent advice of ſome perſons high in the eſtimation of the public. A general aſſembly of the ſtates being convened at Oxford, it was agreed to divide the kingdom between Harold and Hardicanute, it being ſtipulated, that the former ſhould have the country, north of the Thames, and the latter to have all the remaining part; but this agreement was ſubject to an exception, in favour of queen Emma, who was made regent of Weſſex, earl Godwin being appointed her ſubordinate lieutenant governor.

Ælnoth, archbiſhop of Canterbury, however, refuſed to crown Harold, on account of Hardicanute's being the real ſon of Canute, and the other ſuppoſed to be ſpurious; for he aſſerted, "that Harold had been obtruded upon Canute, as his ſon, by the artifice of Elfwina, who had recourſe to a falſe labour, (not being with child) in order to ſecure the affection of her huſband, and had paſſed Harold, who was the ſon of a ſhoe-maker, upon Canute for his own." On theſe accounts he laid the royal regalia upon the altar, and denounced the moſt bitter curſes againſt any who ſhould take them thence, in order to crown Harold. The latter, however, found means to ſoften him, and he at length conſented, not only to remove the regalia, but to perform the ceremony himſelf.

Harold, however, ſoon forgot the compliance, but not the affront, for he ever after took a great deal of pains to perſecute the whole body of the clergy; and as ſoon as he was upon the throne ſeized all his father's treaſures, which, by the will of that monarch, belonged to queen Emma, and were depoſited at Wincheſter.

Being now poſſeſſed of great riches, he found means to bring over the powerful earl Godwin to his party, not only by the efficacious application of bribes, but by promiſing to marry his daughter, and declare her iſſue heirs to the crown. This formidable coalition prevailed, and Harold was acknowledged king of all England.

Things being thus ſettled, Emma, according to ſeveral manuſcripts in the Cottonian library, which are now at the Britiſh Muſeum, found herſelf deprived, by this ſudden revolution, of her regency, and her favorite ſon Hardicanute, of the crown of Weſſex, ſoon perceived that all hopes of holding a ſhare in the government were intirely at an end as to him, and therefore ſhe turned her thoughts towards the bringing in one of her ſons, by Ethelred, and place him on the throne, not doubting but ſhe ſhould be powerfully aſſiſted in this deſign by the Engliſh, who wiſhed to have a prince of the race of their antient kings; but fearing earl Godwin's favour, ſhe had recourſe to diſſimulation; with this view, ſhe affected to renounce the intereſt of Hardicanute, and apply herſelf to acts of devotion; but in earl Godwin ſhe had a perſon to deal with, who was not ſo eaſy to be deceived, and who, knowing her talents for fineſſe, was ſuſpicious of this feigned indifference in a manner which he was ſenſible from his knowledge of her ambitious temper and her love ſhe bore to her ſon Hardicanute, could not have failed of deeply affecting her: he therefore imparted his doubts to the king, inſinuating, at the ſame time, that the crown was not ſafe on his head, ſo long as the children of Emma were living to diſpute it with him.

This inference naturally laid the foundation of a plan to get the young princes into their power. To effect which, Godwin forged a letter in the name of queen Emma, inviting them to England, and chiding them with their indifference reſpecting their inheritance. This forgery had the deſired effect, the princes were deceived by it, and Alfred, with a body of Normans, immediately embarked for England; Godwin met him at his landing, and the deluded young prince, thinking him entirely in his intereſt, embraced him with the utmoſt cordiality; at night, however, the young prince, and the greateſt part of his followers, were put to death by the treacherous Godwin.

The next conſideration was to evade the reſentment of Edward and Emma, whom they did not doubt would take every poſſible method to be revenged for the death of young Alfred. They accordingly contrived to have the queen accuſed of treaſonable practices, for which ſhe was A. D. 1037, ordered to be baniſhed the kingdom; when ſhe retired to the court of Baldwin, earl of Flanders, who received her with great cordiality, and aſſigned Bruges for the place of her reſidence.

After two years this queen was viſited by her ſon Hardicanute, out of Denmark, and they comforted themſelves with the hopes of better fortune, that either the hearts of the Engliſh would relent, or the uſurper by ſome other means finiſh his days or his reign. Harold on the other ſide, encouraged by poſſeſſion, omitted nothing that might ſerve to exclude them, or any other pretenders; and accordingly provided himſelf with a fleet, the only bulwark of the iſland, for the furniſhing of which every port in the nation was obliged to pay eight marks of ſilver to every ſixteen ſhips.

[*] A late author, in ſpeaking of queen Emma upon this occaſion, ſays, with theſe joined the queen dowager Emma, who, after having ſatisfied the dictates of ambition, in being twice queen of England, liſtened now to thoſe of nature and juſtice, and ſeemed to long to reſtore to her children, by Ethelred, thoſe rights which her vanity had urged her to ſign away from them by her marriage-contract with Canute.

Engliſh and Danes, at Croſs-ford upon the Severn, in which engagement he proved victorious; but another army being ſent againſt him, he was defeated. This inſurrection occaſioned the celebrated law, which enacted, that every Welchman who ſhould preſume to paſs Offa's Dyke without an eſpecial permiſſion, ſhould have his right hand cut off.

The tyranny of Harold's nature, and his frequent acts of cruelty had rendered him obnoxious to the nation in general, when death relieved the kingdom from his ſway by his * demiſe, which happened, May the 18th, A. D. 1040, when he was buried at Weſtminſter, leaving behind him neither wife nor child.

Hardicanute, who was with his mother at the time of Harold's death, immediately embarked for England, in order to avail himſelf of the favourable criſis, and take the advantage of the faction which intereſted itſelf in his behalf, before the popular tide ſhould turn againſt him and force him from the ſtream of his hopes; he accordingly landed at Sandwich, on the 13th of June, A. D. 1040, and immediately received a ſpontaneous invitation from moſt of the Engliſh nobility and clergy, who ſeem to have ſacrificed their real inclinations for the ſake of avoiding a civil war, and preventing the conſequent effuſion of blood. Even earl Godwin, who had hitherto been his inveterate enemy, appeared among the number of his friends, and thus all parties ſeemed unanimouſly to ſmile upon his acceſſion to the Engliſh throne.

SECT. XVIII.

Canute the IId, or Hardicanute.

HARDICANUTE's character had been repreſented in ſo amiable a light, that the Engliſh expected the greateſt happineſs under a reign, which promiſed to be ſo propitious; but they ſoon found that they had changed bad for worſe, as Hardicanute had more vices than his brother, without any of the virtues of his father.

The firſt action of his reign was an unhappy piece of revenge againſt the defunct: for he ordered the dead body of his brother Harold to be dug up, the head cut off, and the carcaſe thrown into the Thames. The mandate for this purpoſe was iſſued to Alfric, archbiſhop of York, earl Godwin, and Troubl the common executioner, who executed their commiſſion with a moſt rigorous punctuality. The body being afterwards found by ſome fiſher men, floating upon the water, was delivered to the Danes, who buried it in the church of St. Clement Danes, in the Strand, London. But Hardicanute being informed of this, ordered it to be a ſecond time dug up, and again caſt into the river, but being afterwards found once more, it was carried privately to Weſtminſter, and there interred.

The next act of Hardicanute was ſtill more unpopular, as it was a heavy tax laid upon the Engliſh to pay the fleet which brought him hither, and this was impoſed at the time of a dearth. But the complaints of the people concerning this unreaſonable tax, made no impreſſion on Hardicanute, for the very next year, viz. A. D. 1041, he raiſed, by two other impoſts, the ſum of 40,077l. Theſe impoſitions occaſioned a riot at Worceſter, when two of the king's collectors, named Peader and Torſtan, were killed, which Hardicanute revenged by ſending a party of ſoldiers to lay waſte the country in the vicinity of that city. The troops began their devaſtations on the 12th of November, and continued them to the ſixteenth. On this occaſion it is ſaid, the inhabitants, foreſeeing the fate which muſt attend their waiting for the arrival of theſe meſſengers of blood and deſolation, ſeized upon and fortified a little iſland in the Severn, called Beveridge, reſolving there to ſell their lives as dear as poſſible, or to purchaſe their freedom; accordingly, when the king's troops, after having punctually obeyed their inglorious orders, prepared to attack this handful of reſolute men, they met with ſo warm a reception, that after ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts to drive them out of their faſtneſſes, the generals were glad to retire and leave them in the poſſeſſion of their aſylum, which they rebuilt, and, in a ſhort time, reſtored with double luſtre.

It was about this time that Hardicanute ſent an invitation to his brother Edward, then in Normandy, to come over to England; and on his arrival he treated him with great affection and cordiality; and at the ſame period he ſent his ſiſter Gunilda to Germany, to conſummate her nuptials with the emperor Henry III. to whom ſhe had been already ‡ betrothed.

By the influence of prince Edward, and his mother queen Emma, the Norman intereſt began greatly to prevail in England; when Livignus, biſhop of Worceſter, and the celebrated earl Godwin, were accuſed by Alfric, archbiſhop of York, and others, of the murder of prince Alfred. Upon this accuſation, the biſhop was deprived of his ſee, but well knowing the power of money, and the avaricious temper of Hardicanute, he ſoftened him by a bribe, and was again reſtored to his dignity; and earl Godwin, dreading to fall the victim of popular reſentment, followed the example of the biſhop, and found means to purchaſe his peace with an extraordinary preſent, which was a galley with a gilded ſtern, wonderfully rigged, furniſhed out with all conveniencies both for war and pleaſure, and manned with eighty choice ſoldiers, every one having upon each arm a golden bracelet weighing ſixteen ounces, an helmet and corſlet finely gilt, a Daniſh ſcymitar adorned with ſilver and gold hung on his left ſhoulder, in his left hand a ſhield with gilt boſs and nails, and in his right a lance, which, in the language of the Engliſh, was called a Tegar. This uncommon preſent was not ſufficient till he alſo took a ſolemn oath, that prince Alfred loſt not his life by his advice or deſire, but in that he merely obeyed king Harold, then his ſovereign lord; which oath was alſo taken by moſt of the nobility of the land.

Whatever Hardicanute's filial or fraternal love might have been, he ſeems to have had very little affection for the Engliſh; for he not only affected the Daniſh cuſtoms and manners, and was even fond of their vices, but he ſhewed a moſt aſtoniſhing partiality for them, when any diſpute aroſe between perſons of the different nations. At length he fell a martyr to their great failings, drunkenneſs and gluttony,

* Concerning the abſent princes of the Engliſh race, an accurate writer ſays, "The Engliſh, in vain, caſt their eyes on Edward, the ſurviving ſon of Ethelred, who was then in Normandy; for that court, on account of its own diſtractions, was unable to give him any aſſiſtance; and earl Godwin had ſo powerful a party in England, that any attempts made by the natives alone muſt have proved abortive, or have ended only in their own deſtruction. So that this unfortunate prince ſeemed to be in a manner out of queſtion, with regard to the ſucceſſion, more eſpecially as the right of primogeniture was, by moſt men of candour and diſpaſſionate conſideration, looked upon as belonging to Edward, the ſon of Edmund, then an exile in the Hungarian court; but his diſtance from the kingdom, and the general eſtimation in which the other Edward was held by the populace, ſeemed to remove him farther from the hopes of filling the throne of England, than even the ſon of Ethelred."

‡ It is ſaid that this marriage was performed with ſo much magnificence, and with ſuch memorable profuſion, that it got even into the ſongs of the bards of thoſe days, and was tranſmitted in lays, which were ſtill extant at the time when Matthew of Weſtminſter wrote, who records this circumſtance.

tony, for being preſent at Lambeth, at the ſolemnization of the nuptials of Tuvey Prudean, a Daniſh nobleman, with Githa, the daughter of Oſgood Clappa, he revelled to ſuch an exceſs, that the debauch terminated his life on the eighth of June, A. D. 1042, in the third year of his reign; he was buried at New Wincheſter. The Engliſh, in deriſion to his memory, uſed to commemorate the day of his death as a holiday, and to diſtinguiſh it by the name of Hog-Wedneſday, on account of the immoderate luxury of this prince, by the means of which he frequently degraded himſelf even beneath the brute.

Such was the end of this diſſolute young prince, by that vice which was too familiar to the Daniſh nation, which to the cruelty they ſhewed before they got poſſeſſion of the land, they afterwards added gormandizing and drunkenneſs. But as he exceeded all in this kind, ſo though he was born in England, and conſequently might have naturally followed the cuſtoms of that country, yet out of ſimpathy with the humor of the Danes, he bore moſt affection to them; nay, and ſuffered them moſt inſolently to domineer over the Engliſh. So that we are told, if a Dane met an Engliſhman upon a bridge, the latter durſt not move till the former paſſed over; and if the Engliſhman did not bow in the moſt humble manner, his head ſhould be broken, or for his clowniſhneſs, as it was termed, he ſhould be baſtinadoed.

Hardicanute had few virtues, and thoſe ſcarce aroſe above mediocrity; but he had many vices, and theſe in general he carried to exceſs, ſo that he lived deſpiſed, and died unlamented.

SECT. XIX.

Edward, ſurnamed the Confeſſor.

EDWARD, the ſon of Ethelred II. by Emma, was now the only perſon in the kingdom who had any kind of pretenſion to the crown of England; and indeed the principal one whom the Engliſh wiſhed to be their ſovereign, for they were now heartily ſick of a foreign yoke, and of being ruled by the Danes in particular, who had plundered inſtead of governing, and oppreſſed, inſtead of protecting them. So that it ſeems at this time the Engliſh had unanimouſly imbibed ſuch a ſpirit of freedom, that they not only excepted againſt a Daniſh ſovereign, but expelled the Danes, or at leaſt the greateſt part of them, from the kingdom. But concerning the particulars of this revolution, and how it was brought about, the hiſtorians of thoſe times have left us in the dark; the moſt pertinent reflections, however, upon the ſubject, are thoſe of Rapin, which we ſhall here inſert, as they are at once curious, and intelligent:

" This is one of the moſt difficult paſſages in the Engliſh hiſtory. On which ever ſide we view it, it ſtill appears altogether unaccountable. The Danes alone, in a manner, were in poſſeſſion of all the eaſtern and northern counties; and in Mercia, that is, in the heart of the kingdom, they were as numerous as the Engliſh. Three kings of their nation had reigned ſucceſſively, who, far from humbling them, had no doubt ſhewn them great favor, and given them the preference. And yet, without any thing extraordinary happening, except the death of Hardicanute, a prince of little merit and reputation, they will have it that the Engliſh were ſuddenly become ſuperior. But this is not all, 'tis affirmed, that this ſuperiority was ſo great as to enable them to expel the Danes out of the kingdom. How is it poſſible to believe, that the Danes ſhould ſuffer themſelves to be thus treated, without making the leaſt reſiſtance? for it does not appear that there was any war or commotion in the kingdom upon this occaſion. Pontanus, the Daniſh hiſtorian, makes the matter ſtill worſe; he tells us, that all the Danes in England were maſſacred in one night, by the treachery of Harold, the ſon of Godwin, who ordered all the Daniſh ſoldiers to march out of their garriſons, under pretence of ſolemnizing the funeral of the late king. But this account is altogether improbable; for, in the firſt place, Harold, who was then very young, had no hand in the government, and conſequently could give no ſuch orders to the Daniſh officers. In the next place, how came it to paſs, that all the Engliſh hiſtorians, Brompton only excepted, who ſays but very little of the matter, ſhould agree to paſs over in ſilence ſo remarkable an event? How was it poſſible for them to write their hiſtories without ever making the leaſt alluſion to it? If it is objected, they did this, as aſhamed of their nation for ſo barbarous an action, what is the reaſon they acted not in the ſame manner with regard to the maſſacre in the reign of Ethelred? Theſe are difficulties that are not eaſily to be got over. It ſeems at firſt, as if there was a plauſible way of accounting for them, which is, to charge the hiſtorians, as well Engliſh as Daniſh, of not having told the whole truth, or of having aggravated what they relate. But by taking this courſe we run into greater difficulties. It is moſt certain, that ever ſince the beginning of the reign of Edward the Confeſſor, the Danes have been ſo far from making any figure in England, that they are not mentioned in hiſtory any more than if they had never been known there, though juſt before, they were maſters of the whole kingdom. But whence ſhould proceed ſo ſudden a fall, or rather, how ſhould they all vaniſh in a moment, if neither expelled nor maſſacred? Hiſtory acquaints us not that war was made againſt them, that their ſtrong holds were taken from them, that they were brought under new laws: but all on a ſudden, theſe powerful and formidable Danes were reduced to nothing, in the reign of a prince the moſt unwarlike that had ever ſat on the throne. Theſe are hiſtorical difficulties, the ſolution whereof muſt be left to others."

Edward's affairs ſeemed benefited, not only by this revolution, but by the countenance and ſupport of earl Godwin, the moſt powerful ſubject this kingdom had ever known, who ſeemed now to make his country ſome atonement for his late attachment to the Danes, by intereſting himſelf in the reſtoration of the blood of Cerdic. Edward himſelf, however, was but little ſolicitous about his advancement, as he had formed a deſign to retire with his mother into Normandy, from which earl Godwin diſſuaded him by very ſpirited remonſtrances, telling him, " that he had better live gloriouſly a king in England, than ignominiouſly to dye an exile; that the crown did of right belong to him, as the ſon of Ethelred, and grandſon of Edgar, one who was ripe in years, inured to toils, and taught by experience how to adminiſter public affairs, and by his own afflictions how to prevent thoſe of his people. To effect this there would be no obſtacle, if he would confide in him, whoſe intereſt was ſo great in the land. Therefore on condition he would eſtabliſh a firm friendſhip with him, prefer his ſons, and marry his daughter, he ſhould ſhortly ſee himſelf a king; though now as one ſhipwrecked in his fortunes, and a man baniſhed from all expectations, he implored the aid of another perſon."

Edward at length, being rouſed from his uſual apathy, readily embraced the propoſitions of earl Godwin, took his advice, and gave himſelf wholly up to his direction.

at Gillingham, and having, by an artful addreſs, calculated to prejudice the hearers againſt a foreign yoke, and intereſt them in what reſpected the blood of Cerdic, worked up all preſent to his purpoſe; he ſuddenly preſented Edward (who had been previouſly introduced incog.) to the aſſembly, and, at the ſame time, cried aloud, "Behold your king! this prince "Edward the ſon of king Ethelred and queen Em"ma, and to him I pay my allegiance;" when Edward was unanimouſly elected to the throne, though the ceremony of his coronation, on account of a great dearth which then prevailed, was poſtponed till the enſuing year, A. D. 1043, when it was ſolemnized with great pomp at Wincheſter.

The firſt public act of this king's reign, was inhumanly to rob his mother Emma of her lands and treaſures, and the next was uncharitably to accuſe her of a criminal correſpondence with Alwin, biſhop of Wincheſter. Her oſtenſible impeacher was Robert the Norman, who was afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury; but he, not having any evidence to make good his allegations, inſiſted upon her undergoing the fire ordeal, in order to purge herſelf from the imputation; when ſhe walked blindfold over nine red hot plough ſhares, without receiving any injury, to the aſtoniſhment of all preſent, and the confuſion of her accuſers.

As the nature of the trial by ordeal is not commonly known, we have no doubt but the following ample account of it will prove entertaining to the generality of our readers.

The trial by ordeal was two-fold, the one by fire, and the other by water. The trial by fire was performed two ways; the perſon accuſed held in his hand a red-hot piece of iron, of one, two, or three pounds weight, according to his crime, or according to the evidence againſt him; or elſe he was made to walk barefoot and blindfold, over nine red-hot plough-ſhares placed at ſtated diſtances: if he had the good luck to come off unhurt, he was declared innocent; but in caſe he was burnt, he was pronounced guilty. Perſons of quality, only, were tried by fire-ordeal. Trial by water-ordeal was made either by cold or by ſcalding-water. Peaſants and ſlaves were put upon this trial. In the trial by cold water, the party ſuſpected had his hands and feet tied together, and ſo thrown into a pond or river: if he floated, he was held innocent; but if he ſunk he was declared guilty. When ſcalding water was the teſt, the perſon accuſed was to plunge his arm into it as far as the wriſt, and ſometimes up to the elbow. Theſe trials were made with great ſolemnity, and were always managed by the clergy. The perſon accuſed was obliged to ſwear his innocence, and ſometimes, eſpecially if in orders, to receive the ſacrament. After the charge was legally brought in, the perſon impeached was to ſpend three days in faſting and prayer. At the day of trial, which in the fire-ordeal was made in the church, the prieſt in his habit took up the iron which lay before the altar, and repeating the hymn of the Three Children, put it into the fire; then uſing ſome form of benediction over the fire and iron, he ſprinkled the iron with holy water, and made the ſign of the croſs in the name of the trinity; which done, the party accuſed paſſed through the teſt. The ceremony of the ſcalding water ordeal was much the ſame. But when the trial was by cold water, the three days faſt and other circumſtances being premiſed, the perſon ſuſpected drank a draught of holy water, to which the prieſt added an imprecation in caſe he was guilty: then the water into which he was to be thrown, had a ſort of exorciſing form of prayer ſaid over it. All theſe ways of trial continued long after the conqueſt. The firſt public diſcountenance from the ſtate was in the third year of Henry III. The cuſtom among the country people of trying witches, by throwing them into the water with their thumbs and toes tied together, is, perhaps, a relict of the old water ordeal. But the whole of this pretended purgation appears to be an impious deluſion of the ſenſes of mankind, to ſwell the bags of mercenary prieſts; for to them the party was committed to be held in cuſtody, and on them alone depended life or death. In this caſe no price, at the expence either of property or of virtue, was thought too dear by moſt of the accuſed for deliverance. But if the unhappy culprits had nothing to offer, they were ſure to ſuffer. On the contrary, if they could bid up to the prieſt's demand, either of luſt or avarice, they were ſaved by a preparation of oil, then a ſecret with the clergy, but now common with every fire ſwallowing mountebank that travels the country.†

The ſame year, viz. A. D. 1043, Swein, king of Denmark, the ſon of Canute the Great, began to make preparations for the invaſion of England, in order to aſſert his claim to the crown, as his father's ſucceſſor. On this important occaſion, earl Godwin acted with great ſpirit and diligence; he put the Engliſh fleet upon a reſpectable footing, ordered thirty five ſail of large ſhips to rendezvous at Sandwich, and even perſuaded Edward (who was one of the moſt unwarlike king's that ever ſat upon a throne) to repair on board, and take himſelf the command. It was Godwin's intent to prevent the Danes from landing, by attacking their fleet at ſea; but providence ordered matters otherwiſe, for Swein, inſtead of invading England, was obliged to ſtay at home, in order to defend his own territories from the invaſion of Magnus, king of Norway, who had entered his dominions with a formidable fleet.

England thus happily enjoying peace upon eaſier terms than was expected, Edward determined to fulfil his promiſe made to earl Godwin; and, accordingly, married that nobleman's beautiful daughter Editha, A. D. 1044. Ingulphus the abbot, and famous hiſtorian, who lived in thoſe times, and was perſonally acquainted with this lady, ſays, that ſhe was a miracle of perfection, both in mind and body, and with all the graces which could adorn the perſon, poſſeſſed every virtue that dignifies the ſoul. She had, in an eminent degree, dable as his power. The firſt time that he appeared with any degree of eclat, was in the reign of Canute the Great, when that monarch intruſted him with the command of the Engliſh troops in his war againſt the Vandals. As a reward for the ſignal ſervices he did in that expedition, Canute made him earl of Kent, Suſſex, and Surry, and gave him in marriage Thyra, ſiſter to earl Ulpho, his own brother-in-law. Godwin had, by this lady, a ſon, who died young, being killed by a fall from his horſe. He afterwards married Githa, ſiſter to Swein, who was king of Denmark after Hardicanute: by her he had ſeven ſons, Harold, Toſtin, Swein, Ulnoth, Gyrth, Elfgar, Lewin, and a daughter named Editha. His great credit with Canute, the ſuperiority of his genius, his noble alliances, his titles of earl of Kent, and duke of Weſſex, and his poſt of high treaſurer conferred on him by king Harold; and laſtly, the high places of truſt and honour, enjoyed by his ſons, the eldeſt of whom, Swein, was earl of the countries of Hereford, Glouceſter, Oxford, Berks, and Suſſex: and Harold, another, earl of Eſſex and Eaſt-Anglia, had raiſed him to that height, that it was difficult for a ſubject to attain to a more exalted power; and, indeed, the title of king excepted, he poſſeſſed every other requiſite of regal authority; for the better half of the kingdom was actually in his hands, and thoſe of his family: ſo that, as we have before obſerved, he was more than a match for any party that could be raiſed in oppoſition to him.

† Many modes of trial equally ridiculous are, at this day, uſed in various countries, particularly in Africa, where crimes are tried by means of a liquor called Bonda, which the criminal is obliged to drink. If he is ſo far inebriated by it as to fall down as if dead, the prieſt pronounces him guilty, and he is dragged to execution; but if, after drinking, he is capable of ſtanding upright, he is declared innocent.

degree, all the good qualities of her father, and her brothers, without any of their vices or follies; and in particular, without the leaſt tincture of that turbulency of temper, for which they were ſo conſpicuous, and which ſo frequently gave cauſe of uneaſineſs to the weak and timid Edward. Yet this lady's accompliſhments, and profuſion of charms, could not induce the frigid monarch to perform the rites of marriage with her; for, either prevented by ſome natural incapacity, or deterred by a vow, he never conſummated his nuptials, and the monks, principally, for this ridiculous celibacy canonized him, though his conduct was certainly diſgraceful to him a as king, a huſband, and a man. As a king, he ſhould have been ſolicitous for an heir to the crown, which would have prevented the great effuſion of blood, and innumerable miſeries that afterwards befel his country on account of that deficiency. As a huſband, he ought to have followed the dictates of nature, and to have fulfilled the laws of God in the end of marriage, by endeavoring to multiply his ſpecies. If therefore his vow of celibacy was made previous to his nuptials, his marriage was unlawful, but if it was made ſubſequent, ſuch a vow was at once ſinful and abſurd. As a man, it was incumbent on him to treat a lady of Editha's virtues, and amiable qualities, and to whom he was bound by the moſt ſolemn tie, with affection at leaſt, inſtead of which, he not only neglected, but frequently behaved to her with great inhumanity.

A. D. 1045. Earl Godwin's eldeſt ſon, whoſe name was Swein, made an attempt upon the chaſtity of the abbeſs of Leominſter, in Herefordſhire. This offence greatly exaſperated Edward, who proſecuted the young nobleman with unremitting ſeverity, though he offered to make atonement by marrying the lady. But Edward was inflexible, and Swein was ſentenced to be baniſhed to Bruges, in Flanders. During the whole of this proſecution, earl Godwin acted with great policy, and did not in the leaſt intereſt himſelf in his ſon's behalf, which was highly pleaſing both to the king, and the clergy, as they deemed it a reſpectful ſubmiſſion to eccleſiaſtical authority.

Swein being thus baniſhed, he determined on a ſevere revenge; with this view he retired to Denmark, and procuring eight large ſhips, well manned, in A. D. 1046, he made ſeveral piratical depredations on the Engliſh coaſts, which ſo much terrified Edward, that he was willing to come to an accommodation with him; and Swein not being fond of the reſtleſs and dangerous life he then lived, ſeemed ready to acquieſce in any reaſonable conditions; this negotiation was, however, prevented from taking place by Harold, Swein's brother, who, dreading his aſpiring and ambitious diſpoſition, perſuaded Edward to break off the conference, which unhappy jealouſy in Harold occaſioned his brother Swein to retire once more from England in diſguſt, again to meditate future ſcenes of miſchief.

The king of Denmark, about this time, being unſucceſsful in his wars againſt Magnus king of Norway, ſolicited Edward to ſend him ſuccour, and thus requeſted aſſiſtance from the very nation he was but a ſhort time before about to invade. A great council was called upon this extraordinary meſſage, and the matter being warmly debated, earl Godwin was for aſſiſting the Dane with a fleet of fifty ſail of ſhips; but this motion being oppoſed by Leofric,* earl of Mercia, and Siward, earl of Northumberland, they, for this time, had influence enough to over-rule the propoſals made by the powerful earl of Kent.

Swein, king of Denmark, being at length relieved from his diſtreſs, by the death of his powerful enemy, Magnus king of Norway, determined to evince his reſentment to Edward for diſregarding his embaſſy, and refuſing him aſſiſtance. Setting ſail from Denmark with what ſhips he was able to collect together, he began his depredations by ravaging the coaſt of Wales; then proceeding round to Eſſex, he made an irruption into the heart of that country, till he was encountered by the Engliſh forces under the command of the earls Godwin, Siward, and Leofric, when the Danes were routed and driven to their ſhips.

The enſuing year, however, A. D. 1047, Swein, king of Denmark, ſent another fleet to ravage the coaſt of England, which being joined by the eight ſhips under the command of the rebellious Swein, earl Godwin's ſon, the moſt bloody conſequences were to be apprehended. Godwin, to prevent the effuſion of blood, and the miſchiefs which might enſue upon this occaſion, requeſted the king to grant his ſon a free pardon, Edward at length conſented to this, not out of reſpect either to Godwin or his ſon, for he equally hated them both, but through fear of the great intereſt of the firſt, and raſhneſs of the latter, which united might endanger his crown. Count Beorn, ſon of Ulpho, by Eſtritha, ſiſter to Canute the Great, was deputed to inform Swein of the king's intention to pardon, and reſtore him to his former honors. Swein, however, unhappily ſuſpecting the count's ſincerity, and conceiving that he intended to betray him into the hands of his enemies, determined to deſtroy him. With this view he inveigled him on board his ſhip, ſailed away with him to Axminſter, in Devonſhire, and having there murdered him, caſt his body into the ſea. This attrocious addition to his former delinquency, retarded Swein's pardon for a conſiderable time. But Edward equally fearing the father and ſon, and dreading a more powerful invaſion than ever from Denmark, at length concluded to conciliate, as much as poſſible, the affections of the two former, in order to weaken the force of the latter by depriving Swein, king of Denmark, of the aſſiſtance of the rebellious Swein's ſquadron: a reconciliation accordingly took place, and the Godwin family were for a time reconciled to the king.

Edward's conduct was in nothing more exceptionable to the people, than in his extreme partiality to the Normans. His long reſidence among them had attached him to their language, and manners, and he introduced both into his own court. Thoſe who wiſhed to baſk in the ſun-ſhine of royal favor, were obliged to ſpeak the Norman French, and imitate the dreſs and addreſs of a people whom Edward ſo much admired. It has been obſerved, that if Edward's kindneſs to the Normans had been merely a return for their humanity to him while he was an exile in their country, it might have been deemed a laudable inſtance of gratitude; but he carried his partiality to a moſt pernicious exceſs, to the excluſion of his own natural ſubjects from all places of truſt or profit, into which he had power to thruſt his favorite Normans. Moſt of the caſtles, and ſtrong places in the kingdom were entruſted to the care of Norman governors, inſtead of Engliſhmen, a Norman monk was made archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Norman dialect was even introduced into the courts of judicature, for by the king's command, all law proceedings were carried on in that language. This ſtrong attachment to foreigners gave great umbrage to the Engliſh people in general, and to the Engliſh nobles in particular; among the latter, earl Godwin was peculiarly hurt at the abſurd partiality ſo viſible in Edward. This nobleman, bleman, with all his faults, which aroſe principally from ambition, was a real patriot, and had the good of his country truly at heart. He therefore ſeduloufly laboured to detach the king, in ſome meaſure, from his over fondneſs for the Normans, and to induce him to ſhew a greater regard for his Engliſh ſubjects. But the archbiſhop of Canterbury had too great an intereſt with the king, to ſuffer earl Godwin's ſalutary advice to take any effect; and by his inſinuations and artifices, he prevailed on Edward ſtill to continue ſhowering his favors on the Normans only; when an accident happened, which was near making Edward repent of his partiality to foreigners, and plunging him in a civil war with his own people. Of this occurrence we have the following relation:

Euſtace, earl of Boulogne, father to the famous Godfrey, and huſband to the king's ſiſter, having been to viſit Edward, and returning through Canterbury to take ſhip at Dover, one of his harbingers was ſo rude with a townſman in ſeeking for lodgings, that in the heat of anger he provoked him to kill him. The earl with his whole retinue going into the houſe where this ſervant had been killed, ſlew both the murderer and eighteen more who defended him; but the townſmen running to arms, revenged themſelves by the ſlaughter of twenty-one more of the earl's ſervants, and wounding almoſt all the reſt. Euſtace with much difficulty eſcaping, with great clamour haſtened to the king, and being ſeconded by other Norman courtiers, he raiſed him to that fury, that he immediately ordered earl Godwin to march to Canterbury, and puniſh the citizens with military execution. Godwin on the contrary alledged, "That no man was to be condemned unheard," inwardly grieving that the king ſhould favor ſtrangers more than his own ſubjects. Being joined with ſome others who loved their country, Godwin urged, "That the chief actors in the late diſorder ſhould firſt be fairly tried; in caſe they were found innocent, to be diſmiſſed, but if culpable, to be fined, or undergo ſome corporal puniſhment for the breach of the king's peace, and the violence and affront that they had offered to the earl." He further put him in mind, "That it was his buſineſs to protect his people, and not to condemn them without due proceſs." In concluſion, he refuſed to obey his commands, not regarding the king's anger, which he conceived would laſt but a ſhort time; but Edward diſpleaſed at his behaviour, and being by others excited to revenge, called an aſſembly of all the nobility at Glouceſter, when Godwin and his ſons did not think proper to attend, but raiſed and armed a number of troops, in order to prepare for the worſt; and it happened that an occurrence about the ſame time gave them a plauſible excuſe for appearing in an hoſtile manner, for the Welſh having erected a fort upon part of the eſtate of Swein, Godwin's eldeſt ſon, it furniſhed a good pretext for the earl and his family to draw together a body of forces to defend themſelves, in caſe the king ſhould proceed to extremities againſt the former, for his diſobedience of his commands.

Edward was greatly exaſperated at the contempt ſhewn him by the non-attendance of earl Godwin, and his anger was ſtill more increaſed by the arrival of deputies from the Welſh, complaining againſt earl Godwin and his ſons, for having entered their territories in an hoſtile manner. Hereupon Edward ſent to ſummon Godwin and his ſons to appear at the council, having previouſly engaged Leofric and Siward, earls of Mercia and Northumberland, in his intereſt, by whoſe preſence and authority he hoped to be a match for the oppoſite party. Godwin, on receiving this ſummons, was not a little puzzled how to act; he could not, conſiſtently with his own character, refuſe to attend, nor could he with ſafety comply. At length, however, he determined not to obey the ſummons, though he was well aſſurred that this appearance of contempt would ſubject him to all the weight of the royal indignation; but then, on the other hand, he conſidered that the eaſineſs of the king's nature made him the dupe of his enemies, and, though he bore the reſpect due to a king, he could not approve of the meaſures of the adminiſtration.

Agreeable to this determination, Godwin ſent a meſſage to the aſſembly of the ſtates, importing that the machinations of his enemies, and thoſe of the kingdom, made it not ſafe for him to truſt himſelf in their power: he declared the Welſh to have been the firſt aggreſſors, by infringing the laws ſubſiſting between the two nations, and invading the territories of the Engliſh: he painted in the moſt lively colours the injuries the native ſubjects of this land had ſuffered from the encroachments of the Normans, who had engroſſed the royal favor wholly to themſelves: and that he thought it his duty to raiſe forces, in order to chaſtiſe the inſolence of the Welſh, and reſcue his prince out of the hands of foreigners: and concluded by demanding, that the perſons of count Euſtace and his retinue, who had murdered ſo many of the king's liege ſubjects, ſhould be delivered into his cuſtody, as earl and governor of Kent, where they had committed thoſe outrages, and there to be tried by the laws of England.

The king was fired with indignation on hearing this meſſage, and all the members of the aſſembly were aſtoniſhed at the boldneſs of earl Godwin's procedure. Some ſilently approved of his ſpirited conduct, but the generality who were preſent, being court ſycophants, highly condemned ſuch audacious and treaſonable behaviour, as they thought proper to term it.

This aſſembly being diſſolved, a general council was called, to be held at London, merely for the purpoſe of taking into conſideration the conduct of earl Godwin and his ſons. In this council, Swein, earl Godwin's eldeſt ſon, was declared an out-law, and an order was ſent for Godwin himſelf, with his next ſon Harold, to appear, in order to juſtify their conduct, with only twelve perſons to accompany them.

Godwin and his ſons, when they firſt heard that this council was to be ſummoned, thought it moſt adviſeable to march towards London in order to be nearer at hand upon any emergency; they accordingly approached the capital, and took up their quarters in Southwark, where they received the above order to attend the council, to which they returned anſwer, that they would willingly attend according to the ſummons, and with the ſtipulated number of attendants only, provided they might have hoſtages for their ſecurity. This requeſt, which, conſidering the diſpoſition and power of their enemies, was nothing but juſt, was rejected with indignation, and the king iſſued orders for the apprehending the perſons of Godwin and his ſon. Theſe orders, however, had no effect, the adherents of the two noblemen continuing firm to their intereſt. A ſecond citation was thereupon iſſued; but the earl remaining obſtinate, the aſſembly proceeded againſt him for contumacy, and paſſed an order for his departing the kingdom in five days, together with all his ſons, on pain of being treated as traitors to their country.

Though the citations, and orders for apprehenſion made no impreſſion on the adherents of the Godwin family; yet the ſentence of baniſhment produced a different effect: the followers of earl Godwin, and his ſons, were panic-ſtruck; they dreaded to fall victims to the ſame vengeance, the men daily deſerted, the officers grew cool, and this powerful nobleman, with his ſpirited progeny, found themſelves under the neceſſity of complying with their ſentence.

Earl Godwin therefore ſhipped his treaſures on board a ſmall ſquadron at Boſonham, in Suſſex, and, together with his ſons, viz. Swein, Gyrth, and Toſti, ſet ſail for Flanders, where he met with a cordial reception from earl Baldwin; and, about the ſame time his ſons Harold and Leofwin took refuge in Ireland, where they were hoſpitably entertained.

Edward having thus got rid of ſo many perſons who were obnoxious to him, more from their love to their country than on account of any great delinquency, could not yet be ſatisfied, but determined to wreak his vengeance on every branch of earl Godwin's family. With this view, he ſhewed a moſt unmanly reſentment to his innocent queen, who had never, in one inſtance, offended him, by confining her in the nunnery of Whorwell, where he had already impriſoned his own mother Emma. The reaſon he gave for thus treating his amiable conſort, is at once truly ſingular and abſurd; for, ſays William of Malmeſbury, he declared, "He was reſolved, that " ſhe alone ſhould not enjoy peace and plenty, while " her father and brothers were abandoned to difficul- " ties and diſtreſſes." A declaration which plainly evinces, that he was no more ſuſceptible of the impreſſions of humanity, than capable of the delicacies of love. After having thus revenged himſelf upon all Godwin's family, Edward, with his uſual partiality, beſtowed that nobleman's eſtates upon Odda, a Norman nobleman; but not entirely to affront the Engliſh, he thought proper to give Harold's eſtates to Elfgar, ſon to Leofric, the great earl of Mercia.---The conſort of this Elfgar was the celebrated lady Godina, of whom the following remarkable ſtory ſtands on record; That the inhabitants of Coventry, having greatly offended her huſband, he loaded them with grievous taxes; when Godina, pitying the people, and begging her huſband to eaſe them in ſome meaſure of their great burthens, he ſwore he would not, unleſs ſhe would ride naked through the city, a thing that he had not the leaſt idea ſhe would conſent to. The lady, however, though one of the moſt virtuous, and modeſt women of the time, determined to undertake this taſk, rather than ſuffer the people to continue oppreſſed: giving notice to the magiſtrates of her intention thus to ſerve them, they iſſued out ſtrict orders, that none of the inhabitants ſhould look at her during the proceſſion. This being done ſhe mounted her horſe, and rode through the town with no other covering than her own long hair. One perſon, however, having the curioſity to peep at her as ſhe paſſed, was ſtruck dead with lightning, in commemoration of which event the citizens of Coventry ſtill exhibit the ſtatue of a man in the attitude of peeping, on the very ſpot where the ſaid cataſtrophe is ſaid to have happened, and this ſtatue is generally known by the name of Peeping Tom of Coventry.

The impotency of Edward's government prompted the Iriſh and Welch to form the deſign of invading England. Having made a junction, they entered the Severn with thirty-ſix ſhips, and committed great depredations on the adjacent coaſt; but after having defeated ſome men haſtily collected together by the biſhop of Worceſter to oppoſe them, they thought proper to retire, on hearing a ſuperior force was marching to oppoſe them.

Edward, conſcious of his being obnoxious to the people in general, was ſolicitous to obtain ſome little degree of popularity, to effect which, A. D. 1051, he aboliſhed the tax of Dane-gelt; "Nor (ſays a late author) did his kindneſs to the people end here, for he ordered an account to be taken of all the ſurplus money remaining in his treaſury from this tax, and cauſed it to be reſtored to the ſeveral proprietors, from whom it had been collected."

William, duke of Normandy, about this time paid a viſit to his couſin, the king of England, when he was cordially received and magnificently entertained. This, however, was a fatal viſit to England, for William afterwards founded his invaſion upon it, by pretending that Edward, during his ſtay, had made him heir to the Engliſh crown; a pretence improbable in itſelf, and inconſiſtent with the circumſtances of the times, unleſs we ſuppoſe Edward to have been inſane at the time he made William ſuch a promiſe.

A. D. 1052. Emma the king's mother died, whoſe chief faults were ambition, a too great diſregard to the memory of her firſt huſband, and her offſpring by by him. The ſhining talents of Canute, however, in ſome meaſure, excuſe her for having borne a greater affection to him than a man of Ethelred's weak underſtanding, narrow ſpirit, and puſillanimous diſpoſition.

In the interim we find that earl Godwin and his ſons were doing their utmoſt endeavours, and ſtraining every nerve to put themſelves in a ſtate of ſhewing their reſentment to the king of England. To effect this, they tried all their friends, they procured ſupplies of ſhips, men, and money, and having at length gotten together a ſtrong fleet, they reſolved to revenge on Edward the ungrateful treatment they had received from him, and, if poſſible, compel him to reſtore them to their honours and poſſeſſions. Their deſigns, however, could not be kept ſo ſecret, but that Edward got notice of them; and, ſenſible that it behoved him to be well upon his guard againſt the attempts of ſuch an enterpriſing and incenſed foe as Godwin, he gave orders to his two admirals, the earls Rodulph and Odda, to repair on board his fleet, and cruiſe off the coaſt of Kent, to prevent any attempt of a deſcent. This was a very neceſſary precaution; and had it been properly managed, would, in all probability, have defeated, for that time, the deſigns of the exiled earl. Scarce was the fleet met together at Sandwich, the place appointed for its rendezvous, when intelligence was brought, that Godwin, who had ſailed from Bruges, was lying off Romney, in Kent, upon which the admirals immediately weighed anchor to go in purſuit of him, while a numerous body of forces was at the ſame time ſtationed along the coaſt to oppoſe any attempt to make a deſcent. Godwin, not thinking himſelf able to cope with the king's fleet, which was greatly ſuperior to his own, thought proper to retire to Pevenſey in Suſſex, whither two admirals deſigned to purſue him, but were prevented by a ſtorm, which obliged them to return back to harbour. Godwin taking the advantage of this accident, eſcaped to Flanders, and immediately ſent to his ſon Harold, who was in Ireland, to join him with a reinforcement from thence with all poſſible expedition.

Edward's adminiſtration was ſo weak and impolitic, that Godwin no ſooner diſappeared than the Engliſh fleet was ordered to be laid up. Godwin being informed of this abſurd ſtep, determined to take advantage of Edward's folly and careleſsneſs, by returning directly to the coaſt of England. Arriving at the Iſle of Wight, he extorted ſeveral conſiderable ſums of money from the inhabitants, then ſailing to Portland, he laid the people there under contribution; after this, he returned again to the Iſle of Wight, where he was joined by his ſon Harold, with nine ſhips from Ireland. With this fleet he entered the Thames, and proceeded towards London. Edward, upon this emergency, diſpatched orders to his admirals to oppoſe earl Godwin's armament; but this they found impoſſible, for the ſailors in general diſliking the king, his miniſters, and their own commanders, who were principally Normans, deſerted to the earl in great numbers. Thus was Edward's fleet without men, and the ſhips which were deſigned to impede the progreſs of the invader, could not be worked for want of hands. However, the earl did not make ſuch diſpatch but that Edward had time to aſſemble his principal nobles, who all bringing in their quotas of troops, formed an army ſufficiently numerous to defend the capital from any hoſtile attempts of a much ſtronger force than Godwin had brought with him.

Earl Godwin being informed that the king was prepared to give him a warm reception, thought it beſt to diſſemble his real ſentiments, and put on the appearance of humility and ſubmiſſion, though with the ſword unſheathed in his hands; and accordingly ſent a ſupplicating meſſage to the king, in his own name and thoſe of his ſons, requeſting that they might be reſtored to their former honours, of which they had been unjuſtly deprived through the malice of their enemies; and promiſing the moſt loyal and pacific behaviour. But Edward, ſurrounded by his Norman counſellors, rejected the propoſed accommodation in the moſt injurious terms, and even threatened the lives of thoſe who had been charged with the earl's meſſage. This unſeaſonable obſtinacy had very nigh proved fatal to Edward's affairs, for though his army ſeemed to entertain ſentiments of loyalty, yet they could not endure the idea of ſhedding the blood of their countrymen; and ſacrificing their own lives, when lenitives might be ſo eaſily adopted. At length Stigand, biſhop of Wincheſter, and ſome of the principal nobles interfered with ſo much ſpirit, that Edward was in a manner compelled to hear reaſon, and a negociation was concluded upon the following terms:

1ſt. That Godwin, his wife, and ſons, ſhould be reſtored to their reſpective ranks, power and poſſeſſions.

2d. That the queen conſort, Godwin's daughter, ſhould be reinſtated in her former dignity.

3d. That all the king's foreign counſellors ſhould be expelled the kingdom.

In return for the king's compliance with theſe articles, it was ſtipulated that earl Godwin ſhould voluntarily ſubmit to undergo a public trial for the murder of Alfred the king's brother, and to reſt his fate after a fair hearing, upon his acquittal or conviction. To this condition, the earl readily agreed, and gave hoſtages for his appearance on the day appointed for the trial. The hoſtages were ſent to Normandy for the greater ſecurity, as the timid Edward did not think them ſafe in England, and could not help upon all occaſions, placing a greater confidence in the Normans than his own natural ſubjects.

In the interim, the Normans being alarmed at the article of this treaty in which themſelves were included, and their expulſion inſiſted on, thought proper to withdraw in time, leſt worſt conſequences ſhould enſue; but the diſorders they committed in paſſing to the ſea, and the brutality with which they behaved, plainly evinced that the charges brought againſt them by earl Godwin, were but too well grounded. Among the principal perſons exiled, were Robert, archbiſhop of Canterbury, commonly called Robert the Norman, William, biſhop of London, and Ulf, biſhop of Lincoln, both Normans. Oſborne and Hugh, two Norman officers ſurrendered their caſtles to Leofric, earl of Mercia, and were by him permitted to paſs into Scotland.

As the trial of earl Godwin is the moſt remarkable in the Anglo-Saxon annals, and at the ſame time a very ſingular occurrence in itſelf, we ſhall inſert an ample account thereof, from the antient hiſtorian Brompton, together with the judicious annotations of an ingenious modern author.

The awful day of trial being come, and the aſſembly of the ſtates convened, the king, as ſoon as Godwin appeared in it, accuſed him of his brother's death in the following terms: "Thou traitor, Godwin, I impeach thee of my brother Alfred's murder, whom you yourſelf ſlew." Godwin's reply was, "Moſt gracious ſovereign, with all due reſpect to your majeſty's peace and dominion, I never did betray nor kill your brother; and I put myſelf upon trial as to this impeachment before your court." The king then ſpoke to this effect: "My well beloved lords, earls, and barons, here aſſembled, and who have heard my impeachment, and earl Godwin's anſwer, I will that you award judgment, and do ſtrict juſtice upon this impeachment." Upon this a ſtrong debate happened in the aſſembly, and variety of ſentiments were urged. It was ſaid in Godwin's vindication, that at the time of the murder (for ſo Brompton's words are to be underſtood) the earl was no ſubject of the king, and that he had not with his hands committed the murder. But thoſe of the oppoſite party urged the earl's late rebellion as a proof of guilt, and were deſirous of making uſe of the one charge as the moſt proper way to puniſh him for the other. We can by no means be of opinion here with ſome authors, who contend, from the words of Brompton, that no allegiance was due to the kings of England by birth, nor until a man had actually performed homage, or ſworn fealty to the king. This ſeems to be contrary to the ſtrongeſt evidence of our hiſtory and conſtitution. But, be this as it will, it was very warmly urged by Godwin's enemies, that no earl, baron, or other ſubject of the king, could by law wage battle againſt him in his appeal; but ought, upon the whole matter, to ſubmit himſelf to the king's mercy, and offer him reaſonable amends.

"This opinion ſeems to have carried it; for we are told, that when the queſtion was put, Leofric, as being the moſt reſpected in the aſſembly, delivered his ſentiments in the following manner:

"Earl Godwin, ſaid he, muſt be admitted, next to the king, to be the perſon of the higheſt quality in England, and he cannot deny that he had a hand in adviſing the murder of prince Alfred, his majeſty's brother: my opinion therefore is, that he himſelf, his ſons, and twelve of us earls, who are all of us his friends and kinſmen, ſhall humbly come before the king, each laden with as much gold and ſilver as he can carry between his arms, and offer the ſame for his offence, and moſt humbly ſupplicate his pardon, beſeeching him to lay aſide all ill-will, rancour, and malice againſt the ſaid earl, and peaceably reſtore him to his lands, after taking his homage and fealty." This award, which was probably before concerted between all parties, took place; the proceſſion inſtantly ſet out, and Edward accepted, with ſeeming acquieſcence, of the atonement.

"Many are the remarks which hiſtorians have made on this event. What is of real importance to us, is to remark the great authority of a meeting of the ſtates in thoſe days, and that it extended to cauſes which lay perſonally between the king and his ſubjects; that commutation in caſes of murder was even at this time admitted, though of the higheſt nature; that Godwin was tried by his peers, but that the king in his own realm, had no peer. This laſt maxim is implied by an expreſſion of the hiſtorian, which, if not conſidered properly, may be wreſted to very bad purpoſes; for, in giving an account of the debates upon this queſtion, it is ſaid, "that no earl, baron, nor any ſubject of the king, can by law wage battle againſt him in his appeal." But this is far, as has been generally ignorantly or perverſely urged, from taking away the lawfulneſs of all civil reſiſtance. By the term battle here cited, is only meant the ſingle combat, by which every man in thoſe days had it in his power to convict his adverſary, and clear himſelf: and it was then undoubtedly a maxim in the government, that the king of England had no peer, and therefore was not obliged to anſwer any challenge of that kind. This paſſage has we know, never been conſidered in this light; but to conſider it in any other, is giving up the principles of civil liberty, the common ſenſe of our anceſtors, and the genius of this conſtitution."

Earl Godwin being thus cleared by commuting his crime, himſelf, and his family were reſtored to their former dignities and poſſeſſions, all except Swein, who being ſtruck with remorſe for the murder of Beorn, undertook a pilgrimage bare-foot to Jeruſalem, by way of purgation for his heinous offence, but died on his return towards home. The popularity of Godwin rendered that nobleman's reſtoration to his former honors extremely pleaſing to the people in general, and his having procured the baniſhment of the Normans, contributed to encreaſe the love they bore him. Stigand, biſhop of Wincheſter, was promoted to the vacant ſee of Canterbury in the room of Robert the Norman, and many other Engliſhmen had thoſe places aſſigned them which had been lately in the occupation of the Normans.

Earl Godwin did not, however, long enjoy his reſtoration to power and authority, for A. D. 1053, the court being at Windſor, the earl with the reſt of the nobles was at an entertainment which the king had provided for the celebration of the feſtival of Eaſter, when being ſeized with a violent diſorder while he was at table, he fell from his ſeat, and was taken up by his three ſons, Harold, Toſti, and Gyrth, who carried him into one of the king's apartments, where his malady encreaſing he expired five days afterwards. This is the account of this great man's death, as it is given by the Saxon chronicles, Hemingford, Eadmer, &c. But the Norman writers, who were virulent enemies to Godwin, on account of his firm attachment to the Engliſh, and great enmity to foreigners, inſiſt that his death had ſomething ſupernatural in it, and viſibly evinced the hand of divine vengeance in the circumſtances that attended it. The principal of theſe alien enemies to the fame of the deceaſed earl was the abbot of Beverley, who gives the following account of his death :

" As Godwin was ſitting at table with the king, the cup-bearer in his hurry made a trip with one foot, but recovered himſelf with the other. Several who were preſent making themſelves merry on this incident, obſerved that one foot came luckily to the aſſiſtance of the other; and the earl, to increaſe their mirth, added, " So brother ſhould aſſiſt brother, when either ſtands in need." Edward, turning to the earl as ſoon as the words were out of his mouth, replied, " So might my brother have helped me, if Godwin had not interpoſed." The earl being ſurpriſed and abaſhed with this ſudden retort, was very much dejected, and with a countenance that diſcovered deep ſorrow, addreſſed the king to the following effect: " I know your majeſty is perſuaded that I am the author of his death, and that you ſtill give credit to thoſe who aſperſe me, as a traitor both to him and to yourſelf; but God, who knows the ſecrets of hearts, ſhall judge: if I am guiltleſs, I beg that he would ſuffer me to ſwallow this morſel unhurt; but if it ſhould ſtick by the way, you need no further proof of my guilt." Having ſaid this, he endeavoured to get the morſel down, but it ſtuck in the paſſage, and by his continued efforts to ſwallow it, ſtopped up the avenues of life, and choaked him."

But it is to be conſidered, that during the reign of Edward the Confeſſor, there was no ſurer method of gaining the graces of that weak prince, than by appearing to be at enmity with earl Godwin; and, in the ſucceeding reigns after the conqueſt, it became faſhionable to abuſe that patriotic nobleman's memory, and even dangerous to ſpeak well of him. It is therefore no wonder that the Norman writers, in order at once to pleaſe thoſe in power, and gratify their own ſpleen, have loaded the character of earl Godwin with all the infamy that the utmoſt violence of malice could ſuggeſt, without taking the leaſt notice of his many ſhining qualities. Dr. Echard, prebendary of Lincoln, ſays of this great man, " Whatever was the manner of his death, he was a man of an active and turbulent ſpirit, not nicely conſciencious, either in gaining or keeping, and not to be vindicated in his forcing his ſovereign to what he pleaſed; but had he not been ſo great a lover of his country, and an enemy to ſtrangers, thoſe who wrote in the Norman times, and who durſt not but write what would pleaſe their maſters, would have diſmiſſed him without this ſtory, and with a fairer character." And a more modern writer hath, with great accuracy and ingenuity, thus characterized him :

" Thus fell the greateſt ſubject England ever ſaw, and one of the greateſt men ſhe ever produced, had his virtues been equal to his abilities; but he was of an ambitious and turbulent ſpirit, and not over-conſciencious when the intereſts of himſelf or family were in view. However, his great love for his country, and his averſion to foreigners, have occaſioned his character to be handed down to us with blacker circumſtances than it appears to have deſerved. The death of a nobleman of ſuch extenſive power might have occaſioned a change in the adminiſtration, productive of danger; but the earl's influence deſcended almoſt entire to his family. His eldeſt ſon, Harold, ſucceeded to all his titles, poſſeſſions, and authority, unimpaired, and at the ſame time held the office of ſteward of the houſhold, with the governments of Kent, Suſſex, and the Weſt Saxons; but was obliged to reſign his own government of Eſſex to Elſgar, the ſon of earl Leofric. Harold as yet lay under no imputation of any of thoſe crimes of which his father had been accuſed; beſides, he was more humane, polite, and inſinuating; and, on all occaſions, behaved with ſo much reſpect to Edward, that he ſoon got into his good graces: not but that Edward put on a face rather foreign to his heart, for though he might not bear ſo great a hatred to Harold as he had done to his father, yet he was to the full as jealous of him; and indeed with great reaſon, for Harold, whoſe abilities were no ways inferior to thoſe of Godwin, had, by the additional charms of his obliging and courteous behaviour, firmly gained over to his intereſt both the nobles and the people; whereas the natural haughtineſs and reſerve of Godwin's diſpoſition had often times loſt him many friends. In a word, Harold, though he ſeemed to obey the king in the moſt ſubmiſſive manner, commanded him; whereas Godwin, though he endeavoured to command the king, was obliged to obey him."

A. D. 1054 is remarkable for the rupture between Edward, and the famous, or rather infamous Macbeth, who had aſſaſſinated Duncan his lawful ſovereign, and uſurped the throne; the bloody tyrant next made an attempt upon Malcolm Canmore, the ſon of Duncan, but that prince eſcaping, fled to the Engliſh court, where he ſupplicated the aſſiſtance of Edward to puniſh the regicide, and recover the crown of Scotland from an uſurper. Edward readily granted him his requeſt, and ſent an army of 10,000 men into Scotland, under the command of the brave Siward, earl of Northumberland, who, being joined by Macduff, Thane of Fife, they in conjunction marched againſt Macbeth. Concerning the event authors are agreed, but with reſpect to the manner and circumſtances they materially differ: ſome ſay that Macbeth gave battle to the army ſent againſt him, and was defeated, after a moſt bloody conteſt, in which great numbers periſhed on both ſides, when he retired to the Highlands, where he was deſerted by his ſubjects, and at laſt taken and ſlain. Upon his death, Malcolm, the rightful heir to the crown, aſcended the throne of his anceſtors without further oppoſition.

But archbiſhop Spotſwood tells us, that Macbeth, upon receiving advice of the ſtrong army marching againſt him, was ſeized with great dread; and the arrival of the murdered king's ſon and the beloved Macduff was no ſooner known among the common ſoldiers, than they deſerted in great numbers, ſo that the tyrant ſeeing himſelf abandoned, and not knowing what to do, ſhut himſelf at firſt in the caſtle of Dunſinane, a fort that he had lately built. The loyal army marching thither, no ſooner came in ſight, than Macbeth, ſtruck with a freſh panic, abandoned the fort, and thought to have ſaved himſelf on horſeback; but being purſued by ſome of Malcolm's friends, he was taken and killed.

Rice, a Welſh prince, about the ſame time, entered England at the head of a body of men, and committed great depredations; but a number of Engliſh troops coming up with him, his forces were defeated, and himſelf taken priſoner. Being ſent to Edward, he was ordered immediately to be put to death, agreeable to a ſtanding Saxon law, which enacted, "That any Welchman who paſſed Offa's "Dyke, without a particular licence, ſhould ſuffer "death."

A. D. 1055. The celebrated Siward, earl of Northumberland died of a bloody flux. Of this brave nobleman's death, we have the following account:

"Finding his end approaching, he ordered his armour-bearer to put him on his compleat ſuit of armour; then cauſing himſelf to be ſupported on his feet, and taking his ſword in his hand, "Thus (ſaid he) ſhould every ſoldier die." So ſaying, he breathed his laſt in the arms of thoſe who ſupported him."

Similar to this was his behaviour on receiving the news of his ſon Oſbern's death, who was ſlain in the late expedition into Scotland.——Hearing that he was killed, "Whereabouts are his wounds?" demanded he; being anſwered that they were all before, "Haſte then, and bring him to me (he ſaid) that I may give him a ſoldier's burial, as he hath deſerved."

The only ſurviving ſon of this nobleman, named Waltheof, being a minor, the government of the Northumbrian dominions was entruſted to Toſti, the brother to Harold. About the ſame time Elfgar, the ſon of the great Leofric, earl of Mercia, was accuſed before the aſſembly of the ſtates of high treaſon; the particular charges of which, antient hiſtorians have not tranſmitted to us, but we find that ſentence of baniſhment was paſt upon him.

Elfgar thinking himſelf aggrieved, determined to be revenged on Edward, and with this view paſſed into Ireland, where having collected eighteen ſhips, he landed in Wales, and joining with Griffith, the then reigning prince of that country, they together invaded England. Rodulph de Maine, the king's nephew, encountered them while they were committing the moſt cruel ravages in Herefordſhire; but being without either courage, or military ſkill, he was totally defeated. Upon this ſucceſs, the invaders entered the city of Hereford, which they plundered and burnt, after killing many of the inhabitants, and ſeven canons, who defended the door of the cathedral.

The king being greatly alarmed at this intelligence, ordered earl Harold to march againſt the invaders; the latter, however, well knowing the ſkill of Harold, did not chuſe to wait for him, but retired into Wales, and were purſued by the Engliſh as far as the mountains of Snowden, when Elfgar was under the neceſſity of making ſome conſiderable conceſſions, and Harold generouſly intereſted himſelf in obtaining his pardon, upon which affairs were amicably ſettled, and Elfgar was reſtored to his former honors. It is to be preſumed, however, that Griffith, prince of Wales, was not included in this treaty, as he began hoſtilities again A. D. 1057, till the earls Leofric and Harold interpoſing, a peace was concluded between him and Edward. Soon after, viz. Auguſt the third of the ſame year, earl Leofric died univerſally lamented by all ranks of people in the kingdom, as he was brave, wiſe, honeſt, faithful, loyal, pious, humane, and benevolent; and indeed his conduct was in every reſpect ſo unexceptionable, that even the Norman writers of thoſe times, who took great pains to aſperſe every Engliſhman, could not find a ſingle fault to lay to this nobleman's charge, but unanimouſly give him a good character.

Edward being now advanced in years, and very infirm, grew reſtleſs and peeviſh. Moſt of the friends he had loved, and the counſellors, whoſe advice he had paid the greateſt regard to, were either exiled or dead; and above all, he dreaded that any of the late earl Godwin's progeny ſhould mount the throne after his deceaſe, as his hatred to that nobleman's family was fixed and implacable. To prevent ſuch an occurrence, he ſent Aldred, biſhop of Worceſter, his particular favorite, to Hungary for his nephew Edward, the ſon of Edmund Ironſide, that he might make him heir to his crown. That prince arrived in England accordingly, together with his ſon Edgar Atheling, and both were cordially received, not only by the king, but by the people in general, on account of their being the remnant of the Cerdic race.

Harold, who expected to mount the throne of England after the deceaſe of Edward, was ſenſibly affected at this occurrence. He, however, prudently concealed his chagrin, leſt Edward ſhould take the advantage of any appearance of diſcontent, and form a plauſible pretext to ruin him; but he was ſoon relieved from the greateſt part of his uneaſineſs by the demiſe of prince Edward, who died ſoon after his arrival, being about forty years of age, and his remains were depoſited in St. Paul's cathedral. From Edgar Atheling, the ſon of the deceaſed prince, Harold had but little to fear, as he was of a very weak underſtanding, exceedingly irreſolute, and inactive; remarkably timid, and perfectly inexperienced. And it is to be preſumed, that had Edward even declared him his heir upon the death of his father, Harold had the faireſt chance of governing as regent during the minority, in caſe the king did not long ſurvive, which his years and infirm ſtate of health ſeemed to render doubtful. But now an unexpected affair prepared the way for future misfortunes to this nation, for in the year 1058, earl Harold took his famous and fatal voyage to Normandy. Our hiſtorians are greatly divided, not only with regard to the views, but to the manner and circumſtances of this voyage; ſome aſcribing it to mere caſualty, others ſaying it was undertaken from a premeditated deſign. William of Malmeſbury tells us, that Harold being at his houſe at Boſenham, in Suſſex, near the ſea-ſide, he, for his recreation, with ſome of his retinue, took a fiſhing-boat, in order to row up and down at a ſmall diſtance from the land; but running out a little farther to ſea than they were aware, a ſtorm ſuddenly roſe and forced them acroſs the channel to the coaſt of France, where they landed in the territories appertaining to the earl of Ponthieu. The barbarous inhabitants of this part of the coaſt ſoon ſeized Harold and his followers, ſtripped them of every thing they had about them of any value, loaded them with chains, and caſt them in priſon. In this dilemma, Harold thought proper to ſend a meſſenger, with this information to William, duke of Normandy, (according to the moſt authentic hiſtorians) that he (Harold) had been ſent over by the king of England, formally to confirm certain matters of deep import to the duke, which he had hitherto only received by diſtant hints from envoys of inferior note; but that he was kept priſoner by the command of Guy earl of Ponthieu, and thereby prevented from diſcharging his embaſſy; repreſenting, at the ſame time, that William's honor and character were concerned in ſuffering ſuch a breach of the laws of hoſpitality, and ſo great an inſult on his own authority as ſovereign of the country, to go unpuniſhed; and concluded with appealing to him for juſtice, ſaying, " that if it was required of him, to purchaſe his liberty, and that of his followers, with money, he was ready to pay the ſame to duke William; but never would ſubmit to do it to a perſon inferior to himſelf, as was earl Guy." Hereupon duke William inſtantly gave orders for ſetting Harold at liberty, who repaired to the duke's court; where being honorably received, and by the duke invited to accompany him on an expedition he was then about to make into Brittany, he ſo far ingratiated himſelf into the Norman's favor, by his wit, courage, and inſinuating addreſs, that the latter ſhewed him every diſtinguiſhing mark of friendſhip; and Harold, not to be behindhand with ſo generous a patron and protector, promiſed him by oath, that in caſe king Edward died, he would deliver up to him the caſtle of Dover, which was then under his command, and uſe all his influence to procure him the crown of England. Duke William, confiding in the earl's proteſtations, and to endear himſelf and cauſe the more to his care, betrothed to him his daughter, then too young for marriage; and the affair of the ſucceſſion being thus concluded between them, Harold was ſent home, loaded with rich preſents. This is the moſt generally received account, though ſome writers affirm, that Harold, much againſt his inclination, was compelled to take the oath before William would ſhew him any manner of countenance, or even grant him his liberty. But whether the proteſtation was voluntarily made, or by compulſion is uncertain, but all writers of any authority agree, that ſuch an oath was actually taken.

While theſe things were tranſacting at the court of Normandy, Elſgar, the ſon of the great earl Leofric, who had now ſucceeded to all his late farther's honors, riches, and poſſeſſions, again fell under the diſpleaſure of the king of England. And being once more ſentenced to baniſhment, he had recourſe to his former ally, Griffith, prince of Wales, who immediately lent him a conſiderable body of forces. Elſgar, having beſides theſe procured a conſiderable fleet from Norway, with his whole force ſoon appeared upon the coaſts of Kent. This invaſion greatly terrified Edward, and his uneaſineſs was not a little encreaſed by the abſence of Harold, the only general on whom he could ſafely depend; for though he hated the man, he could not help admiring his abilities. In this exigency, the ſpiritleſs Edward thought proper to accede to whatever propoſals Elſgar made: he took off his attainder, reſtored him to his dignities and poſſeſſions, and only ſtipulated, that he ſhould ſend home his forces at his own expence. Elſgar ſoon after died, and his ſons Morcar and Edwin divided his vaſt eſtates between them.

Harold being now returned, Edward determined to avenge himſelf on Griffith, prince of Wales, for having abetted and aſſiſted Elſgar in his late rebellion; with this view he diſpatched Harold at the head of a formidable body of horſe to ſurprize him; but the Welch prince being apprized of Harold's approach, took to flight with great precipitation, and abandoned a fleet which he had juſt fitted out to the mercy of the approaching enemy, which Harold burnt and then returned in triumph.

Soon after, Edward found it neceſſary again to chaſtiſe the Welch, and with this view he ſent Harold with a conſiderable fleet, and his brother Toſti at the head of an army to attack them both by ſea and land. The Welch were ſo terrified at this formidable invaſion, that they baſely delivered up their prince Griffith, in order to prevent their country from being laid waſte; when that unfortunate prince was put to death, as his brother Rice had been ſome time before, and his head was ſent to the king at Glouceſter. Edward, however, thought proper to divide Wales between Blethyn and Rithwallen, the two ſurviving brothers of Griffith.

In this expedition, Toſti, the brother of Harold, had acquired great honour by his military ſkill and proweſs, and had thereby rendered himſelf very popular; yet that ambition and reſtleſs diſpoſition, which ſeems to have been the characteriſtic of the Godwin family, prompted him, on ſeveral occaſions, to behave ſo tyrannically and oppreſſively to the Northumbrians, who were immediately under his government, that, unable longer to ſupport their miſeries with patience, they had recourſe to arms, preferring the proſpect of death to certain want and ſlavery. To encreaſe the general diſcontent he had, about this time, a quarrel with one Goſpatrick, a man of great intereſt in Northumberland, when he found means to get him murdered, and afterwards endeavoured to charge the odium of his death upon his own ſiſter Editha. Not content with this, he, under the ſpecious maſk of friendſhip, got into his power two of Goſpatrick's friends, Gammel and Ulf the ſon of Dulfin, whom he inhumanly put to death in his own palace. Theſe complicated acts of perfidy and bloodſhed put the finiſhing hand to what his pride and inſolence had begun; and three or four of the principal noblemen of the country, at the head of four hundred men, ſeized upon the city of York, made themſelves maſters of all Toſti's treaſures, which were there depoſited, put to death two hundred of his friends and followers, and then ſent a deputation to Morcar, ſon of the deceaſed earl Elſgar, inviting him to take upon him the government of the Northumbrians, who were now determined to throw off all ſubjection to a perſon that had rendered himſelf ſo odious to them, by his male-adminiſtration. In this they were joined by the inhabitants of Nottingham, Derby, and Lincolnſhire. Hereupon Toſti appealed to the king, under whom he immediately held his government, and a conference was appointed to be held at Northampton, while Harold was ordered to march with a ſtrong body of men, in hopes of over-awing the malecontents: but when the conference came to be opened, theſe people, who were warmed with the noble ſpirit of liberty, and not actuated by principles of ambition or rebellion, repreſented their motives for taking up arms, and their reſolution not to lay them down till they had procured redreſs, in ſuch perſuaſive terms, that Harold, perceiving their reſentment againſt his brother to be entirely owing to his own bad conduct, gave a noble inſtance of his moderation and juſtice, by drawing off his forces, and conſenting to their election of Morcar in his room; and making a report to the king much in favour of the complainants. Toſti, finding himſelf thus deſerted by his brother, proceeded to ſuch acts of revenge, violence, and cruelty againſt thoſe of the Northumbrians who were yet in his power, as to render his name odious. His barbarity even extended to the dependants of his own family, for we are told that he always hated his brother Harold, but the conduct of that nobleman in this laſt affair had exaſperated him to ſuch a degree, that he ſeized ſome of his domeſtics, whom he ordered to be cut in pieces, ſalted, barrelled, and ſent as a preſent to their maſter. Theſe and ſimilar outrages, occaſioned the king to baniſh him, when he retired to his father-in-law, Baldwin earl of Flanders.

Malcolm, king of Scotland, about the ſame time, taking advantage of the diſturbances in Northumberland, ravaged that country in a moſt cruel manner, without the leaſt conſideration of the treaty then ſubſiſting between him and the Engliſh, or any grateful remembrance of the ſervices Edward had rendered him, in aſſiſting him to recover the Scottiſh crown from the uſurper Macbeth.

Toſti's baniſhment was a great addition to Harold's power and conſequence, and theſe he augmented by marrying Elgitha, the ſiſter of Morcar, earl of Northumberland, thumberland, and Edwin earl of Mercia, by which his influence was ſo great, and his intereſt ſo well ſecured, that he did not doubt but he ſhould be able to mount the throne after the deceaſe of Edward.

It is now neceſſary to obſerve, that Edward had made a vow to go on a pilgrimage to Rome; but as he afterwards found it inconvenient, as well as diſagreeable to his ſubjects, to leave the kingdom, or, what was ſtill more likely, was fearful of leaving behind him ſuch a ſubject as Harold, who might take advantage of his abſence to ſupplant him in his throne, he therefore obtained a diſpenſation from the pope, abſolving him from this obligation: but he thought he could not employ the money he had raiſed for his journey to a better purpoſe than that of repairing the monaſtery and cathedral of Weſtminſter, which was originally founded by Sebert, king of the Eaſt-Saxons, or rather converted into a Chriſtian church, from a temple in which the old Saxons had worſhipped Apollo.

For this purpoſe, he convoked an aſſembly of the ſtates to meet at London about the latter end of the year 1065, in order to confirm the charter of endowment of this foundation. In this aſſembly, beſides the lords ſpiritual and temporal, the queen Editha was preſent. The charter begins principally with the pope's bull, and then follows this clauſe.

“ The king, for the expiation of his own vow, and alſo for the ſouls of the kings his predeceſſors, as well as ſucceſſors, had granted to that place (viz. Weſtminſter) all manner of liberty, as far as earthly power could reach, and that for the love of God, by whoſe mercy he was placed in the royal throne; and now by the council and decree of the archbiſhops, biſhops, earls, and other of his great men, and for the benefit and advantage of the ſaid church, and all thoſe that ſhould belong to it, he had granted theſe privileges following, not only in preſent, but for future times.” Then follow the exemption from epiſcopal juriſdiction, and the privilege of ſanctuary. This charter was ſigned by the king, queen Editha, two archbiſhops, ſeven biſhops, ſeven abbots, Raynbald the lord chancellor, the earls Harold and Edwin, ſix thanes, and ſeveral inferior perſons.

Edward was ſoon after this attacked by a violent fever; he, however, lived to conſecrate the cathedral he had taken ſuch pains, and been at ſo much expence to repair and embelliſh; but the very day after the conſecration, he took to his bed, and died on the 5th of January, A. D. 1066, in the 65th year of his age, and 24th of his reign, and was buried in his new conſecrated cathedral church of St. Peter, Weſtminſter.

Though Edward's character hath been drawn by the monkiſh writers in the moſt favourable light, yet a variety of dark ſhades were but too conſpicuous in the tranſactions of his reign: his panegyriſts inſiſt, that he was without paſſions, but this we deny; indeed he was deficient in point of the ſocial affections, and thoſe tender ſenſibilities which refine, and humanize the heart; but he was too ſuſceptible of prejudice, implacability and revenge, as his behaviour to his mother, his wife, and the Godwin family, too plainly evince. Hence a modern author ſays, “ he was a bad huſband, a bad ſon, an indolent king, a faithleſs friend, an inexorable enemy, a dupe to foreigners, and a ſponge to the monks”; for they ſqueezed him out of the greateſt part of his treaſures, and in return gave him the higheſt encomiums. Among the other miraculous things which they aſcribed to him, was the ſpecial privilege of curing, by the touch, the ſcrophulous malady from him called the king's evil; a privilege which ſome affirm to have deſcended upon the kings of England his ſucceſſors. “ How far, ſays a late author, this gift was real or imaginary, we leave to the reflection of every perſon of enlightened underſtanding, who need not be told that ſurpriſing effects have been produced by the effluvia of bodies of a certain conſtitution upon the human frame, without any ſupernatural intervention; we ſhall, therefore, only obſerve, that it was not peculiar to the kings of England, ſince the kings of France have claimed the ſame privilege ever ſince the time of Clovis, the firſt chriſtian prince of that kingdom.”

Nevertheleſs, for this and other his reputed virtues, he was canonized by pope Alexander III. about two hundred years after his death, by the name of Edward the Confeſſor. Pope Innocent IV. afterwards granted a bull to fix the anniverſary and order the ſolemnity of the feſtival, which was on the fifth of January, the day of his deceaſe.

Even his eaſineſs of temper, or rather careleſs apathy of diſpoſition, though truly reprehenſible in a king, hath furniſhed the monkiſh writers with matter to pay their compliments to this monarch. Among others, the following ſtory is related as a proof of his affability and good nature.

One day, as he was repoſing himſelf on his bed, with the curtains drawn round, a page of his chamber came into the room, in order to do ſome menial offices, not knowing the king was there; and a coffer being left open, in which was money to a conſiderable amount, the youth, thinking himſelf ſecure from all detection, filled his pockets with the ſpecie, and retired; Edward, who ſaw him all the while through the curtains, not giving him the leaſt diſturbance. In a very few moments the thief returned again, and fell to work as before; when the king, diſpleaſed at this repetition of his boldneſs, called out to him, “ You young rogue, you had beſt be contented with what you have gotten, for ſhould lord Hugolin, the prime miniſter and chamberlain come and catch you, he will not only cauſe you to be ſoundly whipped, but alſo take away the booty you have already made.” The boy, half dead with fear, inſtantly diſappeared, and Hugolin coming in preſently after, and finding that ſome of the bags were miſſing, flew into a violent paſſion, and uttered threats of the ſevereſt puniſhment on the felon, if he could diſcover him: but Edward, with great good nature, endeavoured to pacify him, “ For the poor knave, (ſaid he) who has the money, wants it more than we do.”

But the moſt ſhining part of Edward's character is his merit, in a legiſlative capacity; for he collected, reviſed, and digeſted the laws of the Northumbrians, Mercians, and Weſt-Saxons, with thoſe of Alfred, Edward the Elder, and Edgar; and having reduced them into one body, laid the foundation of what hath been ever ſince termed the common laws of England, though it muſt be acknowledged that the forms of pleading and proceſs are chiefly derived from the Normans.

With reſpect to perſon, Edward was of a fair and ruddy complexion, tall and well made, and in his latter years had a moſt venerable and majeſtic appearance; his beard was long and white, and his perſon, upon the whole, inſtead of borrowing from, gave dignity to the royal robes he wore. When he dreſſed ſuperbly, it was not out of any oſtentatious love of grandeur, but merely to comply with the neceſſary forms of ſtate. In fine, in his enjoyments, he was temperate; in his amuſements, moderate; in his diet, abſtemious; in his common dreſs, plain; and in his manners, ſimple.

Edward was the laſt monarch of the royal Cerdic race, though not the laſt Saxon king, as his ſucceſſor was of that nation.

SECT. XX.

HAROLD THE SECOND.

ON the demiſe of Edward, three competitors appeared for the crown of England, viz. Edgar Atheling, the undoubted heir, as being the grandſon of Edmund Ironſide; William, duke of Normandy, who founded his title on a pretended will of the late king; and Harold, the ſon of earl Godwin, who had not the leaſt ſhadow of pretenſion, except his own popularity, and his bare aſſertion, that the king had deſigned, and promiſed the crown to him. Of theſe three, however, Harold was the ſtrongeſt, as the whole body of Engliſh clergy, and the greateſt part of the nobility, declared for him, while William was of a country which the Engliſh implacably hated, and Edgar was young, inexperienced, weak, timid, and friendleſs. Harold politically made the moſt of theſe circumſtances, and to take away the ſhadow of an opportunity of caballing, he cauſed the king to be buried the morning after his deceaſe, as it was at that time uſual to defer the coronation of a new ſovereign till the former was interred. Immediately after this precipitate interment, an aſſembly was convened, and Harold, having a majority of ſuffrages, was declared king, and inſtantly anointed by Aldred, archbiſhop of York the archbiſhop of Canterbury being at that time very much indiſpoſed: this peculiar hurry ſeems to evince, that Harold himſelf looked upon his pretenſions as unjuſt, and his title as diſputable.

The above is the moſt generally received account of Harold's advancement to the crown of England; the antient hiſtorians, however, greatly differ in relating the circumſtances of this important affair. Ingulphus ſays, that Harold wickedly obtruded himſelf into the throne. Huntingdon tells us, that though the people in power were for Harold, yet the generality of the Engliſh were inclined to favor the pretenſions of Edgar Atheling.

William of Malmeſbury, who inclines to the Norman party, aſſerts, that Harold, finding a great diſagreement among the nobles about the ſucceſſion, ſeized the crown, placed it on his own head, and intimidated the aſſembly ſo, as to extort an oath of allegiance from them; and Henry de Silgrave (an author who wrote in the time of Edward I. and whoſe hiſtory is now in manuſcript in the Cottonian collection) relates, that Harold came to Edward, as he was lying on his death-bed, deſiring him to appoint a ſucceſſor: that he replied, he had already nominated duke William for his heir: but the earl and his friends ſtill perſiſting in this requeſt, the king, turning his face to the wall, replied, "When I am dead, let the Engliſh make either the duke, or the earl, king."

The throne being thus filled by Harold, by an election ſeemingly unanimous, or at leaſt by an apparent majority, he applied himſelf to gain the affections of the people by the moſt laudable and popular meaſures. With this view he repealed ſeveral acts which were generally deemed oppreſſive, and affected on all occaſions to treat the young Edgar Atheling with the greateſt marks of reſpect and kindneſs, hinting at the ſame time, that he took poſſeſſion of the ſovereign power merely for the ſake of the young prince, whoſe nonage rendered him unfit for the weight of government, and that he might poſſibly ſhift the diadem from his own brow to place it upon his, when years had ripened him into maturity for wearing it. He ſpared nothing to give him the moſt liberal education, as a perſon who was one day to rule over others; he loaded him with gifts and honors, and particularly cheriſhed thoſe whom he knew to be favorers of that prince's cauſe. By theſe and the like politic ſteps, he eſtabliſhed ſuch a dominion over their minds, that he reigned the king of their choice, and bade defiance to any cabals that could be raiſed against his power and authority.

> The greateſt pow'r a ſovereign can attain,
> Is o'er his people's hearts by love to reign;
> For the dominion by affection gain'd,
> Is ſtronger far than that by arms obtain'd.

Harold's prudent conduct and wiſe precautions were abſolutely neceſſary, as he had a double cauſe of apprehenſion, namely from the malice of his brother Toſti, who was envious of his ſucceſs; and from the ambition of duke William to whom he had broken his promiſe.

Toſti was at this time in the court of Baldwin, earl of Flanders, father to his wife Judith, and to Matilda or Maud, dutcheſs of Normandy; and preſuming upon this affinity, as alſo being ſenſible of the pretenſions which William had ſet up to the crown of England, went over to Rouen, on a viſit to the duke, in order to perſuade him to invade the territories of his brother Harold. William wanted very little incitement to the attempt; he had already reſolved in his own mind to make the moſt powerful alliances he could againſt Harold, and for this purpoſe he had entered into a new league with the Norwegians, the antient friends of the Normans, and had engaged Harold Harfager, the king of that country, to fall upon the Northumbrian territories, while he himſelf ſhould make a deſcent upon the ſouthern parts.

William being full of theſe ideas, it is no wonder that Toſti was cordially received by him. Indeed, he determined to make this nobleman his inſtrument, in order to ſound the affections of the Engliſh, and with this view, as preparatory to the grand blow intended to be ſtruck, he intruſted him with ſixty ſail of ſhips and a body of forces; with which Toſti ravaged the Iſle of Wight, and then ſcoured the coaſt till he came to Sandwich. Harold, in the mean time ſent a ſtrong ſquadron and a body of horſe againſt him; when Toſti thought proper to withdraw his forces from that part, but ſtill kept plundering the coaſt at different places, till Edwin earl of Mercia, and Morcar, who had ſucceeded Toſti in the government of Northumberland, getting together a body of troops in haſte, encountered the invader, and drove him with a great ſlaughter of his men, back to his ſhips, ſeveral of which they burned, and the enterpriſing exile was obliged to fly for refuge into Scotland, with twelve of his ſhips, all that he had remaining of the fleet he had firſt brought with him Here he endeavoured to engage Malcolm, king of Scots, in his intereſt; but that prince being then embroiled in a civil war with the deſcendants of Macbeth, could not be prevailed upon to join him; therefore Toſti's ſucceſs in Scotland fell far ſhort of his ſanguine hopes.

About the ſame time William, duke of Normandy, ſent a meſſage to Harold, to relinquiſh the crown of England in favor of himſelf by reaſon of his double claim, viz. The will of king Edward, and the oath of Harold while in Normandy. To this demand, Harold returned a ſpirited and peremptory anſwer, by which he gave the duke to underſtand, that in the firſt place the ſuppoſed will of Edward, if any ſuch there really was, made nothing for his claim, inaſmuch as by the conſtitution of the kingdom no monarch of England could bequeath his dominions to any one without the conſent of the ſtates of the kingdom, much leſs to a foreigner; that the right of election of a ſovereign to rule over them was veſted in the nobles and commons of the kingdom; that ſuch election had been formally made in his (Harold's) favor, and therefore, that he held the crown by the moſt authentic of all tenures, the united ſuffrages of the people. Secondly, that as to the pretended promiſe that he might have made to the duke, it was extorted from him while in a ſtate of durance, and as ſuch was null and void by the laws of all nations. And laſtly, he concluded with declaring, that he was ever ready to maintain himſelf in poſſeſſion of that ſovereignty, to which the voices of the people, in full aſſembly, had raiſed him, againſt all thoſe who ſhould dare to conteſt his claim, ſo long as he had an arm to wield a ſword, or a ſoldier that would fight under his banner. This ſpirited anſwer convinced William, that he had nothing to expect but from the ſucceſsful iſſue of a war; for which both parties now made the moſt earneſt preparations. Accordingly the duke applied to the neighbouring princes for ſuccour, with the moſt alluring promiſes of reward, in caſe by their aſſiſtance he ſhould be enabled to compaſs his end.

In the mean time (we are told that) Harold Harſagar, king of Norway, appeared on the coaſts of England, with a fleet of three hundred ſail; and being joined by Toſti, who, ſince his late defeat, had kept hovering on and off the northern part of the iſland, the two fleets ſailed up the river Humber, where they landed their forces, and immediately marched forwards to lay ſiege to the city of York. This invaſion was ſo ſudden and unexpected, that the earls Edwin and Morcar, who were the governors of that country, had not time to levy a ſufficient force to diſpute their landing: however, knowing that ſomething muſt be done in this critical ſituation, in order to check the enemy in their progreſs, till a ſtronger reinforcement could be ſent from the ſouthern parts of the kingdom, they got together a few troops from the adjacent countries, and advanced to oppoſe the invaders; but theſe troops conſiſting of raw undiſciplined men, were quickly beaten, and the enemy proceeding onwards, ſat down before the city of York, which ſoon fell a prey to them, where they put the greateſt part of the inhabitants to the ſword. On the firſt news of Harfagar's deſcent, Harold marched with a choſen body of veteran troops to oppoſe him, but could not come up time enough to prevent the fate of York. At length, however, the two armies met near Standford-brigg, ſince called Battle-bridge, which bridge was guarded by a party of Norwegians, who defended it for ſome time with great intrepidity, but being driven from it, the action became general, and was obſtinately maintained by both parties, till victory at length declared in favor of the Engliſh. The loſs of the invaders was almoſt incredible; amongſt others their leaders Harfagar and Toſti were left dead on the field of battle, and a very conſiderable booty fell into the hands of the conquerors.

Harold wiſely purſuing this advantage, made himſelf maſter of many of the Norwegian ſhips, but at length coming to an agreement with Paul, count of the Orkneys, and Olaus, the ſon of Harfager, he ſuffered them to carry off their wounded in twenty-one ſhips, on their ſwearing never more to invade the dominion of England.

The defeat of the Norwegians, and death of Toſti, greatly diſconcerted the duke of Normandy, but his reſolution, which never forſook him, determined him to purſue his preparations with redoubled vigor, and to obtain the crown of England, or periſh in the attempt.

This victory, however, inſtead of rendering Harold's power more permanent proved but a prelude to his ruin, which the following circumſtance did not a little contribute to accelerate: It was uſual, in thoſe times, after a victory for the ſpoils to be divided between the officers and ſoldiers; but Harold upon this occaſion acted with an impolitic parſimony, by ſeizing all the booty in order to carry on the impending war with the Normans, without burthening his ſubjects with any additional taxes. Laudable as this motive really was, the troops were greatly offended at his conduct, and imagined, that through avarice he had robbed them of the ſpoils, for which they had expoſed themſelves to dangers, and hazarded their lives. Hence, moſt of the officers, and all the ſoldiers were diſcontented, and many of both deſerted.

This defection, with the great numbers loſt in the engagement, greatly weakened Harold's army. He, however, entered the city of York in a triumphant manner, and there continued till he received the unwelcome news of the duke of Normandy's deſcent upon the Engliſh coaſt.

Before we enter into a detail of matters ſubſequent to the invaſion, it is neceſſary to premiſe that William convened together the ſtates of Normandy, in order to get them to give a ſanction to his intended deſign. But in this his utmoſt eloquence could not prevail, moſt of the Norman nobility were averſe to the enterprize, and repreſented, that their country was already drained of men and money by the long war it had carried on with its neighbours, the French; and that they were not obliged to ſerve in foreign expeditions, in which the intereſt of Normandy was not immediately concerned, which they thought by no means to be the caſe in the preſent intended expedition.

Upon this repulſe, we find that William changed his plan of operations, gave over proſecuting his enterprize as connected with the honor and dignity of his dukedom, and determined to make a private jobb of it; with this view he ſet on foot a ſubſcription, to which every man in Europe was invited as an adventurer. This method ſucceeded to his wiſh. In a ſhort time he found means to get ſeveral of the chief men of his duchy to contribute, as private individuals, to that ſcheme which they had oppoſed in their political legiſlative capacities. This inſpired a general emulation who ſhould be foremoſt in aſſiſting their prince. And we have an account of ſeveral perſons who furniſhed him with ſhips, and a ſuitable number of men, viz.

The Landing of
WILLIAM the CONQUEROR

The viſcount of Thouars, and Howel count of Bretagne.

The emperor Henry IV. by the advice of the imperial council, iſſued a proclamation, permitting any of the vaſſals and dependants of the Empire to enter into the ſervice of William. The court of France, however, gave him no manner of encouragement to proſecute his enterprize, but adviſed, or rather commanded him as a vaſſal not to enter into it. But this diſcountenance of the Gallic court was overbalanced by the favour and protection of pope Alexander the II. who, upon William's promiſing to hold England as a fief of the Apoſtolic See, immediately excommunicated Harold, pronounced him a perjured traitor, and an uſurper, and ſent to the duke of Normandy a ring with one of St. Peter's hairs in it, and a conſecrated banner. He likewiſe publiſhed bulls to ſanctify William's cauſe, and invited all chriſtians to aſſiſt in placing him on the throne of England. Theſe concurrent circumſtances not only rouſed many foreigners to join the Norman ſtandard, but numbers of the Engliſh themſelves looking upon Harold as an excommunicated perſon, deſerted him, and joined the enemy of their country. At length he ſet ſail from St. Valery, A. D. 1066, on the eve of the feaſt of St. Michael, the tutelary ſaint of Normandy, and landed without oppoſition the next day at Pevenſey, in Suſſex, having loſt in his paſſage only two ſmall veſſels that were overladen. The duke is ſaid to have been himſelf the firſt who jumped aſhore; and the writers of his life have, upon this occaſion, adapted to him an incident we meet with in the life of Julius Cæſar; for they tell us that his foot, by accident, ſlipping, he fell down, when a ſoldier ſtanding by, immediately turned it into a good omen, ſaying, "Sir, you have thus taken ſeizin of that land of which you will ſhortly be king."

After William had thus effected a landing, he acted with the moſt refined policy, by returning, or, as others ſay, with greater probability, by ſending his fleet back to Normandy, that his men might be deprived of any hopes of perſonal ſafety but by victory; then marching to Haſtings in Suſſex, he erected a fortification and publiſhed a manifeſto, containing his reaſons for undertaking this enterprize, and ſetting forth, that he came to revenge the death of prince Alfred, reſtore Robert archbiſhop of Canterbury, and aſſiſt the Engliſh in puniſhing Harold, who had ſeized the crown, to which he had no right, in direct violation of the oath he had ſworn at the Norman court. But theſe reaſons were treated as frivolous by every Engliſhman of good ſenſe; for in the firſt place, Alfred had fallen by Godwin, who had been tried and fined for the ſame: but although that puniſhment fell far ſhort of the crime, yet Harold could not be involved in the guilt, as it did not appear that he had any hand in the murder. The ſecond reaſon was no better than the firſt (though probably inſerted in the manifeſto on the pope's account, to ſerve as a cover for his partiality to the duke), for it was well known that prelate had been baniſhed by the general aſſembly of the kingdom in Edward's reign, and conſequently the preſent king could not be blamed for it: moreover, it was in itſelf a wiſe and juſtifiable meaſure, and ſuch as was univerſally approved of by the Engliſh themſelves. Thirdly, as to his offering the Engliſh his aſſiſtance to bring Harold to condign puniſhment for having ſeized the crown without right, and in direct contravention to his oath, Harold had fully anſwered every thing that William could allege on that ſubject.

What moſt ſurprized all thinking people was, that William in his manifeſto never mentioned, or even hinted at any will made by the deceaſed king Edward; we may therefore venture to ſuppoſe, that neither will or verbal promiſe had been made, and that the duke of Normandy, in reality, had ſmaller pretenſions to the crown of England than even Harold.

It is to be obſerved, that a political ſtep of William's was of infinite ſervice to his cauſe, for when his proviſions were conſumed, he gave ſtrict orders that his people ſhould not plunder the inhabitants, in order to procure any more.

By this prudent ſtep he, in all probability, ſaved his army from deſtruction; for the inhabitants of the adjacent country, finding themſelves treated thus mildly, endeavoured to ſecure the favor and protection of their new maſter, by ſupplying him with all thoſe neceſſaries which he wanted, inſtead of retiring with their effects, cattle, &c. up the country, which a contrary conduct would certainly have occaſioned.

About this time a Norman baron, named Robert, who had been, for ſome time, ſettled in the northern parts of England, ſent William an account of Harold's victory over the king of Norway, and his return from the north to London, adviſing him, at the ſame time, not to venture a battle with ſuch a numerous army of brave men as the uſurper had to bring againſt him, but rather to entrench himſelf as ſtrongly as poſſible in his camp at Haſtings. William, however, either too judicious, or too intrepid, to follow ſuch timorous advice, returned for anſwer, "that he was come into England to ſeek his enemy; that he put confidence in the valor of his troops, and did not doubt of ſucceſs; and that he held it beneath the honor of a general, who had the ſwords of ſixty thouſand brave men unſheathed in his cauſe, to waſte time in parlying."

Harold, in this exigency, made a general muſter of his forces, and found, too late, the bad effects of his ill-timed parſimony; the conſequences of which he ſtrove to repair by the kindeſt behaviour to thoſe who remained firm to him, and by ſoliciting the aſſiſtance of the nobles of the kingdom, to whom he repreſented the danger to which they, their country, and himſelf were expoſed. Many of the nobility accordingly joined him, or ſent him ſuccours, and in the interim William ſent ambaſſadors to demand the crown, which he accuſed him of having perfidiouſly and perjuriouſly uſurped. Harold, enraged at ſuch an haughty and inſolent meſſage, returned an anſwer teeming with equal aſperity of language, and ſtrained every nerve to oppoſe the Norman with vigor. Some of the Engliſh nobles, however, ſtrove to mitigate that martial fire with which Harold ſeemed to be animated, and perſuaded him to make this propoſition to William: That if he would depart the kingdom quietly, the expences of his expedition ſhould be defrayed. The Norman received this overture with the contempt it merited, and returned this anſwer "That he was not come over for the ſake of plunder, or paltry coin, but to ſeize that kingdom which was his due, and which Harold, in violation of the moſt ſacred oaths had uſurped; and that nothing elſe would ſatisfy him." Upon the receipt of this meſſage, Harold, who, it ſeems thought too lightly of his enemy with reſpect to number, ſkill, and courage, marched towards the Normans, and encamped within ſeven miles of Haſtings. While the two armies were thus ſituated, Gyrth, one of Harold's brother's, who was equally remarkable for his courage and prudence, repreſented to the king, that the wiſeſt ſtep he could take would be to temporize, and procraſtinate coming to an engagement, remonſtrating, "That all his ſupplies were not yet come up; that the enemy was, therefore, much ſuperior in number; that his army was fatigued with its march; and that it would be better to content himſelf with waſting the country and carrying off all the proviſions it afforded, till the expected ſuccours ſhould join him from the north; that ſuch a conduct would greatly diſtreſs the enemy, who, when they found that they could neither ſubſiſt in the country, nor force the iſſue of a battle, would be glad to come into any terms, to ſecure a ſafe retreat, and leave the land with more precipitation than they ever entered it." At the ſame time he beſought his brother to let him take the command of the army upon himſelf: "Reſerve yourſelf, ſaid this able counſellor, to other times; while you are ſafe, the enemy can never be ſaid to conquer, but on your perſon the fate of your kingdom depends. Leave me to fight the Norman, if, peradventure, a favorable occaſion ſhall offer; while you keep yourſelf ready to reap the glory of my ſucceſs, or repair the misfortune of my defeat."

But Harold was unfortunately deaf to this ſalutary advice, till the next day, when in company with Gyrth, he reconnoitered the enemy's camp, and found them far from being ſo contemptible as his ſanguine imagination had repreſented them. Perceiving that he had been greatly impoſed upon, both with reſpect to their numbers and diſcipline, he now propoſed to retreat to London, till he could increaſe his forces, and take the field againſt ſo powerful a foe with greater advantage to himſelf. But here Gyrth again oppoſed his intention, and with a generous warmth told him "that he ought to have gone and abided in that city, agreeable to the advice of himſelf and others his faithful counſellors, till the arrival of his troops; but ſince it was now too late to repent, ſo it would be ignominious to recede; that his honor was now engaged, and he muſt ſtand the teſt, prepared either to conquer or loſe all; that the leaſt ſtep towards a retreat would be conſtrued into a flight, and loſe him for ever in the opinion of his ſoldiers and all the world, animate the Normans, and ſo diſcourage his own men, that they would certainly deſert him, and he would never be able to get them together again."

Harold was convinced of the propriety of this advice, and now the impending ſtruggle for dominion and power entirely engroſſed his thoughts, when a Monk, named Hugh Margot, came to the Engliſh camp on a meſſage from William, with the four following propoſitions, viz. the firſt, was, that Harold ſhould relinquiſh the kingdom, upon certain conditions; the ſecond, that he ſhould hold it under homage to the duke; the third, that they ſhould refer the deciſion of their differences to the pope; and the fourth, to determine their quarrel by ſingle combat, and the kingdom to be the prize of the conqueror.

To theſe propoſitions Harold replied, that he was not ſo ſimple as to ſubmit to the arbitration of the pope, who had already declared himſelf a party; that he ſcorned to hold the crown of England dependent on any prince whatever; nor would he put his kingdom on the iſſue of a ſingle combat, in which, though he ſhould obtain the victory, he could reap no ſolid advantage, and that, therefore, he would leave the deciſion of his cauſe to God alone.

The Norman barons and officers, now grew preſſing to be led to engage, before Harold could receive any farther reinforcements. William was pleaſed with their willingneſs; but at the ſame time to prevent, if poſſible, the effuſion of human blood, and to conceal his ambition beneath the ſhew of reluctance, he determined to try the reſult of a perſonal conference, in which he intended to offer all the provinces of England, north of the Humber, to Harold, and to ſecure the Godwin patrimonial eſtate to Gyrth, provided all the reſt of England was ceded to himſelf. And in caſe of a refuſal to theſe propoſals, to pronounce Harold a perjured traitor, to challenge him to a general engagement, and to declare all ſuch as ſhould adhere to him, excommunicated by the pope.

With this view William advanced at the head of a ſelect party of twenty perſons only, but Harold, not chuſing to enter into a perſonal conference with William, ſent his brother Gyrth to hear what the duke of Normandy had to ſay. After the interview Gyrth made his report to the council, of the duke's offers and threats, the latter of which, we are told, made a conſiderable impreſſion upon many of the members. Perjury and breach of promiſe ſounded ſtrange and ominous to Engliſh ears; and the menace of excommunication carried with it a force, only to be conceived by thoſe who live under the terror of eccleſiaſtical rule, or are the dupes of bigotry and religious ſuperſtition. The aſſembly, therefore, unanimouſly adviſed Harold to come to an accommodation; but Gyrth, alarmed at, though uninfected with, the panic, which had now diffuſed itſelf like a contagion from the council to the army, reſolved to exert his utmoſt efforts to ſtop the ſpreading poiſon to their hopes, and with irreſiſtible eloquence diſplayed to them the certain loſs of honor, power, poſſeſſions, liberty, in a word, of every thing dear to a freeborn Engliſhman, that would await ſo puſillanimous a reſolution; expatiating on the miſeries they had to expect under the rule of a conqueror, who had already devoted their perſons and effects, as a prey to thoſe who aſſiſted him in the conqueſt. This harangue had the intended effect, and inſpired the hearers with an enthuſiaſtic deſire to appeal to the deciſion of the ſword. Harold, to take the advantage of this propenſity, appointed the enſuing day, October the 14th, A. D. 1066, which happened to be his birth-day, for a general engagement.

William, finding that Harold deſigned to give him battle, poſted himſelf advantageouſly on an open plain, and obliged his troops to paſs the preceding night in ſobriety, ſilence and acts of devotion. While on the contrary, riot and confuſion reigned in the Engliſh camp. Harold, fluſh'd with his late ſucceſs againſt the Norwegians, and pleaſed with the apparent ardor of his troops, appeared rather too confident of victory, and ſeemed to be previouſly ſecure of what, upon all ſuch ſanguine occaſions, is in the power of Providence alone to beſtow. Such were the hopes and the behaviour of the adverſe parties previous to the engagement; but of the battle itſelf, the ſubſequent is the moſt ample, and the beſt account extant.

Harold, far inferior in the number of his forces, reſolved not to loſe any advantage in the ground, and therefore drew up his men on the brow of a hill, with a ditch and a line of hurdles before them. The Kentiſh men armed with halberts, pikes, and targets, formed the van, a poſt of honour, which they claimed as their right by antient uſage ever ſince the time of the Saxon Heptarchy; and the care of defending the king's perſon and the royal ſtandard was, by like preſcription, conſigned to the Londoners, whom Harold particularly cautioned to keep cloſe together, telling them that breaking their ranks would be attended with inevitable diſcomfiture. Theſe latter formed the main body, and the remaining ranks were indiſcriminately filled up with the other Engliſh. Harold and his brothers Gyrth and Leofwine placed themſelves in the centre, that their men might be witneſſes of their valor; and diſdaining an indulgence that was not ſhared by the meaneſt ſoldier, they fought on foot. The whole together formed a well-compacted phalanx, whoſe cloſe cemented ranks ſeemed indiſſoluble by any force that could aſſail them.

William, mounting on horſeback, encouraged his men with a voice that ſeemed to breathe victory; he appealed to heaven for the juſtneſs of his cauſe: he then hung round his neck, as witneſſes of his rival's perjury, the relics on which Harold had ſworn, and ordered the conſecrated banner ſent him by the pope to be unfurled in the front of his army. Theſe things, which would be laughed to ſcorn in the preſent enlightened times, had a wonderful effect in thoſe days of dark ignorance and blind ſuperſtition. The Normans thought they marched under the immediate protection of heaven. They advanced in three bodies; the firſt, compoſed of the troops of Bretagne, Anjou, le Maine, and Perche, led by Fitz-Oſberne and Roger de Montgomery; the ſecond, of Poictevins and Germans, under the command of Charles Martel and a German general; the duke himſelf led up the laſt diviſion, conſiſting of his own Normans and the flower of his nobility; and among all the three diviſions, were interſperſed flying bodies of archers, to ſerve as opportunity ſhould offer.

The Normans, marching with the pope's banner at their head, to begin the attack on three ſides at once, Taillefer, a gallant old ſoldier, advanced before the reſt, and ſung, according to cuſtom, the famous ſong of Roland, and the heroes who fell at Ronceval, to rouze the valor of his countrymen. To animate them ſtill more by his example, he obtained the duke's permiſſion to ſtrike the firſt blow in the battle, upon which he ruſhed on to begin the charge, running a ſtandard bearer through with his lance, and killing another with his ſword, but before he could diſpatch a third he was ſlain himſelf. The air was now darkened by a cloud of arrows, diſcharged from the bows of the Norman archers which greatly galled and diſordered the Engliſh, who ſeeing their men fall on all ſides, thought the centre of their army had been broken through, which for a while occaſioned ſuch a confuſion and diſmay as was eaſily perceived by the Normans, who, reſolving to follow their advantage, charged with redoubled impetuoſity; but the Engliſh having recovered from their firſt aſtoniſhment, and forming a penthouſe with their targets over their heads, cloſed their ranks, and preſented ſuch an impenetrable body to their enemy, as obliged them to retire, and being thus reunited, did amazing execution upon them with their javelins, inſomuch that the troops, in the enemy's left wing, giving way, were puſhed into ſome covered ditches, which they had not obſerved as they marched up to the attack. The other corps being ſtruck with a panic, on a falſe report that the duke was ſlain, were preparing for flight, when he, coming up in lucky time, ſhewed them their miſtake, rallied them, and led them again to the fight.

The Engliſh, vain of this trifling advantage, had, contrary to Harold's expreſs command, quitted their poſt on the hill to purſue the broken column into the plain, which as ſoon as William perceived, he, with a happy readineſs, brought up a body of Norman cavalry from his right wing, and cut off the retreat of three thouſand of the moſt advanced of the purſuers, conſiſting of the Kentiſh and Eſſex men, all of whom he put to the ſword: he then renewed the general attack againſt the main body of the Engliſh, by whom he was received with the ſame firmneſs and intrepidity as before. He was repulſed on all ſides, and wherever he ſtrove to make an impreſſion, the loſs reverted upon himſelf. Thus circumſtanced, he deſpaired of prevailing by open force. Thrice had he led up the charge, and each time the horſe on which he rode was killed; he flew from rank to rank, from ſquadron to ſquadron, animating by his words, and encouraging by his example, both the brave and irreſolute; ſometimes ruſhing on with a torrent of death in his rear, ſometimes oppoſing his ſingle authority to a croud of runaways. Harold, with equal ſpirit, with equal valor, but with ſuperior ſucceſs, oppoſed him: the eyes of his faithful Engliſh were fixed on him, by his uplifted ſword they dealt the blow, and mowed down the remaining ranks which his javelin had thinned: no man felt fatigue, no man thought of receſs, while their king ſeemed loſt to every ſenſe but that of a thirſt for glory, and to have nothing in purſuit but conqueſt or death.

And now victory appeared on the point of paſſing over to the ſide of the Engliſh; the drooping Normans ſtaggered under their reſiſtleſs ſhock, when William's genius found means to fix the wavering fortune of the day, by one of thoſe ſtratagems in war, which, from their frequency, are the leſs ſuſpected or guarded againſt; he ſounded a retreat; the knell of Engliſh liberty! for ſo it proved. Harold's brave ſoldiers, thinking that nothing now remained but to glean the deathful harveſt, for which they had ſo painfully laboured, were ruined by a raſh ſecurity; deaf to all order, impetuous and ungovernable, they purſued the wily fugitives into the plain with as little caution as before; and they, who, when united, were invincible, when thus diſperſed, became an eaſy prey to thoſe of whom they thought they had the maſtery. For the Normans rallying upon a ſignal given, cloſed their ranks, faced about, and ſurrounding their purſuers with their cavalry, cut numbers of them in pieces, and the reſt, with great difficulty regained the hill, where they ſtill maintained their ground in ſpite of the utmoſt efforts of the enemy to diſlodge them or break their ranks.

The Normans finding all their attacks were fruitleſs, had recourſe to their former ſtratagem, and, amazing to be told! it met with the ſame ſucceſs; the Engliſh, never to be taught by experience when their fighting humour is indulged, forgot the check they had ſo lately met with, and followed the enemy a third time into the plain, where they were again trodden down by the Norman horſe, and ſtrewed the field with their dead bodies. Weakened as they were with theſe repeated loſſes, they ſtill kept their ground on the hill, unſhaken for ſome time, and, in all probability, might have recovered their ſtrength and ſpirits, and have finally repulſed their fierce aſſailants, had not an arrow, ſhot from the bow of the evil genius of England, laid their monarch breathleſs on the ground, whoſe dying groan was the departing ſigh of Engliſh liberty. William and ſlavery triumphed. Gyrth and Leofwine, the gallant brothers of Harold, ſtill ſurvived, and ſtill animated their countrymen to ſtand their ground; the amazed Engliſh thronged inſtinctively round the ſtandard of their deceaſed prince; but the Normans pouring upon them in redoubled numbers, carried their point: Gyrth and Leofwine fell in each others arms; Harold's ſtandard was pulled down, and the duke's erected in its ſtead, upon which the Engliſh retired from all parts of the hill, and were hotly purſued by the enemy, even after the cloſe of day.

The darkneſs, however, which favored their retreat, had well nigh proved fatal to the Normans, by wreſting the victory out of their hands; for in the eagerneſs of their purſuit, and not being ſo well acquainted with the country as the Engliſh, they fell into moraſſes and deep ditches, and loſt a great number both of horſe and foot. The fugitives, re-animated by this accident that had befallen the foe, turned upon their purſuers, and made a dreadful ſlaughter amongſt them, Engenouf, baron de l'Aigle, falling among the reſt; and, indeed, ſo hot was the action, that Euſtace, count of Boulogne, perſuaded William to ſound a retreat for that night, and not to truſt to the chance of darkneſs, a victory that would be inſured to him by the returning day; while he was whiſpering this council in William's ear, he received a blow between his ſhoulders, which for a while bereft him of ſpeech. The duke, however, reſolving not to leave his victory imperfect, ſtill continued the fight: the battle ſeemed now to be renewed, the Normans redoubling their efforts, but ſtill the Engliſh maintained their ground. At length, William, pretending to be touched with the fate of thoſe whom he now looked upon rather as his ſubjects than his enemies, but in reality being fearful of experiencing one of thoſe ſudden reverſes of fortune, which are ſo frequent in battle, ordered a truce to the combat, and offered liberty for that body of Engliſh to retire: this was accepted; they drew off through the marſhy defiles before-mentioned, and night being now pretty far advanced, William ſaw himſelf left in full poſſeſſion of the field of battle and of the crown of England.

Thus ended this bloody engagement, which decided the fate of England; the loſs of the Normans is ſaid to have been about fifteen thouſand men, but of the Engliſh a much greater number were killed.

After the battle, William ordered all his troops to kneel down on the bloody field, and return thanks to God for their ſucceſs; the enſuing day was ſpent in burying the dead, when the body of Harold, being with ſome difficulty found, we are told, that a Norman ſoldier, who was preſent at the diſcovery, in a fit of unmanly exultation, ran his ſpear into the thigh of the lifeleſs king; which action being told to the duke, he inſtantly ordered the baſe wretch to receive the puniſhment due to ſo daſtardly a deed, and diſmiſſed him from his ſervice. He afterwards ſent the bodies of the king and his brothers to their mother Githa, who gave them as honorable a burial as the preſent circumſtances would permit, in Waltham abbey, which had been founded by Harold himſelf.

Thus fell the gallant Harold, after a reign of only nine months, one week and two days. He was of a comely perſon, and majeſtic preſence, which awed the beholder into a kind of veneration, and inſpired all who ſaw him with reſpect. He poſſeſſed great abilities, and the moſt intrepid courage, and his few faults were overbalanced by many ſhining virtues, and great qualities. With Harold expired in this nation the empire of the Anglo-Saxons, after a continuance of 617 years from their firſt arrival under Hengiſt and Horſa.

With reſpect to Harold's family, it is proper to take notice that he had two wives; the firſt he buried long before he was king, but none of our writers mention her name; his ſecond was Elgitha, widow of Griffith ap Llhewellyn, prince of North Wales, ſiſter of Edwin and Morcar, earls of Mercia and Northumberland. We are told, that by the former of theſe wives he had children, who were of ſuch an age at his death that they waged war againſt the conqueror in the ſecond year of his reign. The firſt was Godwin, who, with his brother Edmund, after his father's death and overthrow, fled to Ireland; but returning again into Somerſetſhire, ſlew Ednoth, formerly one of his father's generals, who encountered him, and, after having made great depredations in Devonſhire and Cornwall, ſet ſail again for Ireland. The next year he made another deſcent upon Cornwall, where he had a battle with Beorne, a nobleman of that county, in which he got the better: from thence he went back to Ireland, and afterwards went to Denmark, to king Swein, where he continued the reſidue of his days.

The ſecond was Edmund, who joined with his brother in all his aforeſaid invaſions and wars, depending abſolutely on him while he lived, and died, like him, in Denmark.

Magnus, the third ſon of Harold, went with his two brothers into Ireland, and came back with them the firſt time to England; after which we hear nothing of him.

By his ſecond wife, Elgitha, he had a ſon named Ulpho, or Wulf, who was but a child at the time of the battle of Haſtings, and was afterwards knighted by William Rufus.

He had alſo two daughters: Gunilda, the eldeſt, falling blind, paſſed her days in a nunnery.

Another daughter of Harold's is mentioned by Saxo Grammaticus, in his Daniſh hiſtory, to have been married to Waldemar, king of Ruſſia, by whom ſhe had a daughter, who was wife to Waldemar, king of Denmark.

Before we conclude this reign, it is requiſite to give ſome account of the famous and fortunate William duke of Normandy, previous to his conqueſt of England. This brave and celebrated prince was natural ſon to Robert the ſixth, duke of Normandy, by Harlotta the beautiful daughter of a ſkinner in Falaiſe, with whom he accidentally fell in love, and from whoſe name it is ſaid, the word harlot, implying a looſe woman, received its origin. Notwithſtanding his illigitimate birth, when he was about nine years of age, his father declared him his ſucceſſor, and cauſed his nobles and chief Norman ſubjects to ſwear fealty to him, and afterwards carried him to do homage to Henry the firſt, king of France, for the dutchy of Normandy, according to the cuſtom of the former dukes. Then delivering him to the guardianſhip of that king, and to the care of the duke of Bretagne, he made a pilgrimage to the holy land, in which journey he died; leaving the young prince to be the founder of his own fortunes, rather than the heir of his father's; which he found expoſed to all the difficulties ariſing from the tenderneſs of his age, the reproach of his birth, a ſuſpected guardian, a diſputed title, and a diſtracted ſtate. For upon the firſt news of duke Robert's death, the nobles of Normandy, who were intruſted with the government during the ſon's minority, found themſelves involved in great difficulties, by the open factions of ſome noblemen, who envied their greatneſs, and by the private practices of others, who being deſcended from ſome of the former dukes, reſolved to ſet up themſelves, but at firſt concealed their deſigns, and joined with the common murmurers againſt the preſent adminiſtration. The governors were ſtill faithful to their truſt, and judged the preſence of the young prince neceſſary to ſupport their authority and his title; they thereupon prevailed with the king of France to ſend him into Normandy, which he did with great honor to himſelf, and kindneſs to his pupil, as well as ſatisfaction to all his loyal ſubjects; but to the great diſappointment of thoſe who pretended their diſcontents were only againſt the governors, and not the ſucceſſion.

No prince ever came ſo early into the cares and burdens of a crown, nor felt them longer; engaged in toils and difficulties, in hardſhips and dangers; his perſon expoſed to the arms of enemies, and the plots of aſſaſſins; his reign embroiled by the revolts of his ſubjects, and the invaſions of his neighbours; and his whole life ſpent in the neceſſary defence of his own title and dominions, or in the ambitious deſigns of acquiring greater. Yet none ever ſurmounted all with more conſtancy of ſpirit, prudence of conduct, and felicity of fortune: for he had a ſtrong and active body, and a brave and vigorous mind; and ſeemed to have been born more for a Hero, than a happy man. His firſt conteſts aroſe from the pretenders to the ſucceſſion, who favored by the defects of his birth, found ſo many followers at home, and ſuch aſſiſtance from neighbours abroad, that they raiſed great forces, and conſtrained the young duke to appear, not only at the head of his councils, but of his armies too, before he was eighteen years of age. Theſe civil wars continued long with many various ſucceſſes, bloody encounters, defeating of troops, ſurprizing, beſieging and relieving of towns, and waſting of countries; till at length William, by his vigilance, bravery and induſtry, totally ſubdued, not only the forces, but the courage of all his competitors and enemies at home, and conſtrained them both to quit Normandy and France, and to ſeek new fortunes in ſeveral parts of Italy, as Apulia, Calabria and Sicily.

When duke William had ſubdued all his domeſtic foes, another appeared from abroad more powerful than any of the former: this was Martel earl of Anjou, who was not only a prince of great power, but was alſo ſtrengthened by the aſſiſtance of the king of France himſelf, who jealous of the Norman greatneſs was very ready to join in the reducing of an aſpiring prince. To which end he encouraged, if not ſet on foot, the earl of Anjou's pretenſions to the dutchy of Normandy, gave him his aſſiſtance to juſtify his claim and purſue it by arms, and by degrees engaged in an open and declared war againſt the duke. This he proſecuted with much paſſion and violence, appeared himſelf in the field with his nobility, and threatened, That nothing but the ocean ſhould ſtop the progreſs of his arms. On the other ſide duke William proceeded with invincible bravery, and with ſuch a preſumption of ſucceſs, that he ſcorned to ſet upon his enemies by ſurprize, but ſent them notice of the very day he would give them battle; a ſort of courage unknown to this preſent age. After many ſucceſſes, he at length brought the conteſt to the deciſion of two fierce battles. The firſt ended in an intire victory on the duke's ſide, with the ſlaughter of three parts of his enemies, amounting to above thirty thouſand men. This loſs rather enraged than diſcouraged the king of France, who gave neither himſelf nor his enemies any quiet till he had engaged the Normans in a ſecond battle, with greater forces and fury on both ſides, but the ſame or worſe ſucceſs than the former. For in this the king of France loſt the flower of his army, the principal part of his nobles, and with great difficulty eſcaped himſelf in perſon. Yet that but little availed this unfortunate prince, who was ſo ſenſible of his loſs, and diſhonour, as he conceived, gained by ſo unequal a match, that he had not the courage to ſurvive it long, but died with grief, and left duke William a calm and peaceable reign. This gave him opportunity in a ſhort time to enlarge his dominions, firſt by the earldom of Mans, and next by part of the dukedom of Bretagne: after which he lived in peace for a conſiderable ſpace, 'till he diſturbed his own and his neighbours quiet by new and greater adventures.

The battle of Haſtings rather opened than completed William's ſucceſs; as the nation was ſtill divided by three powerful factions, viz. The Anglo-Saxon, the Daniſh, and the Norman. The firſt was for reſtoring to the throne the race of Cerdic, in the perſon of Edgar Atheling. The ſecond, or Daniſh cabal, conſiſted of perſons of Daniſh extraction, who were for again bringing the race of Canute the Great, by placing the crown on the head of Swein king of Denmark. And the third party compriſed the Normans, who had ſettled here in the reign of Ethelred the II. and Edward the Confeſſor; of perſons of Norman parentage, and of the victorious Norman troops, who were under the immediate command of William.

Edwin and Morcar, the powerful earls of Northumberland and Mercia, retreated to London, with the ſhattered remains of the forces which had eſcaped the bloody ſlaughter of the late engagement, and convened together a meeting of the Engliſh, where they propoſed to place the crown upon the head of Edgar Atheling, in which they were ſeconded by Stigand, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Londoners; but many other nobles, and moſt of the clergy, were rather for throwing themſelves upon the clemency of the Conqueror, than truſting the guidance of the kingdom at this critical juncture to ſuch a young, weak, inexperienced and timid prince as Edgar. The other party, however, prevailed ſo far, as to obtain a majority of votes, and Edgar was proclaimed king. But the diſſenſions and cabals that immediately ſucceeded among the principal perſons, rendered this ſalutary meaſure abortive.

William, in the mean time, having fortified Haſtings, and left a ſuitable garriſon, determined to poſſeſs himſelf of the town and caſtle of Dover, in his way to which he paſſed through Romney, and ſacked the place in revenge for the ill treatment which the crew of one of his ſhips (ſeparated by accident from the reſt) had received from the inhabitants. This ſeverity, and the fame of his victory at Haſtings, flew before him like lightning, and ſtruck ſuch a terror into the hearts of the garriſon of Dover, that they threw open their gates almoſt as ſoon as he appeared in ſight, or at leaſt ſubmitted after a very ſhort capitulation. As ſoon as the duke was in poſſeſſion, he ordered the town, which Matthew Paris juſtly ſtyles the lock and key of the kingdom, to be more ſtrongly fortified, and ſpent eight days there. Change of climate at that ſeaſon of the year, with alteration of diet, and the amazing fatigues they had undergone, occaſioned ſeveral diſtempers amongſt his ſoldiers. This accident, which would have damped the courage of a leſs intrepid general, ſerved only to convince William that no time was to be loſt; and that it behoved him to follow his late victory with unremitting ardor, while his remaining troops were yet in a condition to aid the vaſt deſigns of their leader: therefore, leaving his ſick in hoſpitals at Dover, he ſet out for London, at the head of a ſmall but truſty army, in which every man was well affected to the cauſe of his general, and all determined to contribute to his ſucceſs, or ſhare in his defeat. However, his march was retarded for ſome time by his falling ill himſelf of the ſame diſorder which had prevailed among his men, and it is to be obſerved, ſays an accurate author, that it is during this march that we are to place the celebrated ſtory of the Kentiſh men meeting William with each a branch or bough in his hand, and obliging him to grant them ſeveral excluſive privileges, and in particular that of gavel-kind (by which all the ſons ſucceed equally to their father's eſtate): but this ſtory contradicts itſelf, as it mentions that they marched with green boughs in their hands, in the beginning of November; beſides, ſo tame an acquieſcence is inconſiſtent with the known character of William, who was as remarkable for his ſeverity to the obſtinate, as for his lenity to the ſubmiſſive. Add to this, that the ſtory was originally taken from the MS. hiſtory of the monks of St. Auguſtine's, Canterbury, written by Thomas Spot, who, in all probability, invented it to magnify the valor of their abbot and of the Kentiſh men. But as neither Somner, in his treatiſe of gavel-kind, and eſpecially Gulielmus Pictavenſis, who accompanied the duke in his march, make mention of this fact, we may fairly refuſe our credit to it. Nor does the well known courage of the Engliſh ſtand in need of being ſupported by idle tales or monkiſh legends; while they had a leader to direct their operations, they fought like brave ſoldiers; when left to themſelves, and no longer able to reſiſt, they ſubmitted like wiſe men.

William thought proper in continuing his march towards London, to divide his army into three diviſions, and to proceed by three different routes. Upon this occaſion he gave ſtrict orders to his men to behave with the greateſt lenity to ſuch as voluntarily ſubmitted; but to act with the utmoſt ſeverity, and waſte the country wherever they met with any oppoſition.

The terrors of the people naturally encreaſed, as William approached towards the capital. The clergy, upon this occaſion, were for pacific meaſures, and adviſed an immediate ſubmiſſion to the conqueror; and the citizens, who greatly dreaded to loſe their wealth if they ſhould provoke William, were ready enough to liſten to any terms of accommodation. But the earls Morcar and Edwin, accuſtomed to the dangers of the field, and well acquainted with the viciſſitudes of war, ſpirited up a party to make one more ſtruggle for the liberties of England. They accordingly, on the approach of the duke's firſt diviſion towards London, ſallied out with an intent to attack the Normans before they had recovered from the fatigues of their march, or were joined by the other two diviſions of their forces: but William was a general of too much ſkill to truſt his troops to officers who wanted vigilance, and his army too well diſciplined to ſuffer a ſurprize of this nature to ſucceed. Indeed the Normans were ſo well prepared for the worſt, and gave the two earls ſuch a warm reception, that they were compelled to retire with conſiderable loſs. This unſucceſsful attack greatly added to the fears of the citizens, the friends of Edgar dwindled off a-pace, and the idea of ſubmitting to the duke of Normandy, became almoſt general. The earls Morcar and Edwin, finding the clergy for ſubmiſſion, the nobles irreſolute, and the commons too much diſpirited to think of withſtanding the conqueror, gave up the cauſe of Edgar, and withdrew to the northern counties.

In the mean time, William, who had the earlieſt intelligence of what paſſed in London, thought the confuſion which that city muſt be thrown into by the departure of the two brothers, in the preſent exigence, offered too favorable an opportunity for compaſſing his deſigns to be neglected even for a moment: accordingly he himſelf croſſed the Thames, and took poſt at Wallingford, in Berkſhire, from whence he ſent out detachments to do military execution on all the country round; after which he marched to Berkhamſtead, in Hertfordſhire; but previous to this ſtep, he ſent a ſtrong body of forces to the Surry ſide of the river, with orders, if they were not received in London, to reduce all Southwark to aſhes; which was accordingly performed with the moſt cruel rigour.

This ſeverity had the deſired effect. The chief of the Engliſh party, foreſeeing that their longer holding out would only open new ſcenes of calamity, reſolved to give way to the torrent of the times, and, if poſſible, ſave their country from devaſtations more ſhocking than it had ever yet experienced. With this view ſeveral nobles, accompanied by Stigand, archbiſhop of Canterbury, Wulſtan, biſhop of Wincheſter, Walter, biſhop of Hereford, and other the moſt eminent citizens of London, repaired to William, at Berkhamſtead, and ſwore him fealty.

The example of the Londoners could not fail of having a great effect upon the inhabitants of various other parts of the kingdom: while their admiration of the conqueror's ſucceſs, and dread of his ſeverity, contributed to expedite their ſubmiſſion; for they reflected, that the only way to ſecure the conqueror's favor was to anticipate his wiſhes, and make a merit of neceſſity. After having conſulted with the nobility, who had already made their ſubmiſſion, they unanimouſly reſolved to go in a body to make him a tender of the crown, with this expreſſion, "That having always been accuſtomed to live under kingly government, they knew no one more worthy to govern them than himſelf."

Though this propoſal was the ultimate end of William's wiſhes, and gave him infinite ſatisfaction; yet he played the refined politician, received it, ſeemingly, with great reluctance, and pretended to have various ſcruples, which would require ſome conſideration ere they could be removed. At length, after the farce of a mock deliberation, he acquieſced in the gratification of his own ambitious deſires, by apparently yielding to the joint importunities of the rejoicing Normans, and ſubmitting Engliſh; the anſwer he returned to the propoſal was, "That he accepted "the crown as their free gift;" and thus ſaith a modern writer, "tacitly acknowledging the right of election in the people of England, at the ſame time that the manner in which he acquired that election plainly ſhewed him unregardful of ſuch right."

In the mean time Edgar Atheling, finding himſelf powerleſs, abandoned, and friendleſs, thought proper to ſubmit to William, who was doubtleſs the greateſt enemy he had in the world; and to implore the protection of a man who robbed him of that crown to which he alone had a legal and lineal right. Thoſe two powerful noblemen, Morcar and Edwin, thought it now unneceſſary to continue any longer the oppoſers of William, they therefore made their conditions with, and ſwore fealty to him. Thus was the whole kingdom ſubdued either by arms, promiſes, or intimidation, and William immediately gave orders for raiſing ſome ſtrong fortifications for the defence and ſecurity of London; but while they were erecting he remained at Barking, in Eſſex, where he iſſued out orders for the neceſſary preparations to be made againſt his coronation, which he deſigned ſhould be ſolemnized with the utmoſt ſplendor and magnificence on the enſuing Chriſtmas-day, viz. December the 25th, A. D. 1066.

We cannot conclude this ſection better than in the words of a learned clergyman, who, in ſpeaking of this period of the Engliſh Hiſtory, ſays, "That notwithſtanding the valor and conduct of the Normans, the Engliſh were the chief forgers of their own fortune, and behaved themſelves as if they deſired to be enſlaved, by thoſe whom they admired, and imitated only in the worſt of their qualities. For beſides the late miſmanagements of Harold, in other reſpects a wiſe prince, the nation and nobility were divided into factions, and could not agree upon the perſon to ſucceed him; and Edwin and Morcar retired with diſcontent into Northumberland, not regarding the ſafety of their country, becauſe their ambitious purpoſes were not gratified. A firm union, and a wiſe management muſt ſtill have put a ſtop to William's arms; but inſtead of preparation for expelling the common enemy, the nobility became enemies to one another, and ſtrove for that crown which the duke had already got, on the point of his ſword, though not on his head. Theſe were prodigious miſcarriages, not incident to any who had their reaſon, but abſolute effects of ſuch vicious tempers as infatuate mens minds, enervate the power of their ſouls, and render them abject, and ripe for ſervitude. Such were the Engliſh at this time, as we are aſſured from Malmeſbury, who being of Engliſh as well as Norman deſcent, profeſſes that he had no prejudice to either nation, and declares, That for ſome years before the arrival of the Normans, piety, and all good literature became ſo unfaſhionable even among the clergy, that contenting themſelves with a very ſmall ſhare of devotion, as well as learning, they could ſcarce read divine ſervice; and to underſtand grammar was next to a miracle. The monks were clad in fine ſtuffs, and obſerved not the rules of their orders. The nobles were given up to gluttony and a diſſolute life, neglected the ſervice of the church, made a prey of the common people, debauched their daughters whom they had in their ſervice, and then turned them off to the ſtews. While the meaner ſort ſpent night and day, and their whole ſubſtances, in rioting and drunkenneſs, and thoſe other vices which effeminate mens reaſons. From hence it came to paſs, that being carried away with temerity and fury, rather than true valor, they engaged with duke William, and brought ſuch calamities upon themſelves and their country. In fine, the Engliſh then wore their cloaths ſhort, cut their hair, loaded their arms with golden bracelets, marked their ſkins with divers images, would eat till they ſurfeited, and drank till they vomitted; which laſt vices they communicated to the conquerors, but in all things elſe followed and admired their modes. But our author would not have this underſtood of all, but of the Engliſh in general; for to his knowledge, there were many good men both among the clergy and laity. "But, adds he, as the mercy of God often permits the bad as well as good to enjoy the like proſperity; ſo his juſtice does not always exempt good men from partaking in the common calamities of their country." Since diviſions and factions, immorality and impiety occaſioned ſuch great miſeries to our anceſtors, we ought carefully to remember this one maxim, that the ſame cauſes ordinarily produce the ſame effects.

BOOK V.

From the Coronation of William I. commonly called William the Conqueror, to the Death of King Stephen.

SECTION I.

William I. commonly called the Conqueror.

WILLIAM, though dignified with the title of Conqueror, did not obtain the crown of England by the ſword only; and, indeed, he was far from claiming it as a conquered country, but ſeemed politically to refer his right to five general cauſes, viz. The promiſe of Edward the Confeſſor, the oath of Harold, the ſubmiſſion and avowed allegiance of the Engliſh, the ceſſion of England to him by Edgar Atheling, who had claimed his countenance and protection, and the ſecurity which the rapid progreſs of his arms had given him.

In this period of the Engliſh Hiſtory, it hath been obſerved, that we remove from twy-light to day-light; and emerge from an æra of obſcurity to a memorable epocha, when England received various and great alterations in laws, language, cuſtoms, faſhions, fortifications, buildings, and moſt things, religion excepted. From which extraordinary mutations, we are to conſider the power of this country in a more extenſive point of view; larger in dominion abroad, greater in ability at home, and of higher reputation in the world: all which proceeded from the Normans, who are thus deſcribed by the judicious William of Malmeſbury. They were, at this time, curious in their cloaths without foppery; choice in their diet without exceſs; fond of war, and ſcarce knowing how to live at peace; quick and intrepid in attacking an enemy; and when open force was too hazardous, cunning in circumventing by ſtratagem, or expert in corrupting by bribes. They built capacious edifices, but lived in them at a moderate expence; apt to envy, deſirous of ſurpaſſing their ſuperiors, yet courteous to thoſe beneath them; loyal, while pleaſed with their ſovereign, but revolting upon the ſlighteſt occaſion, and leaving their perfidy to be judged of by their ſucceſs. Changing ſides for advantage, but in general humane to all parties. To their honor, upon the conqueſt, they revived the diſcipline of the chriſtian religion, then almoſt extinct in England; hence aroſe new churches and monaſteries, erected after a nobler mode of architecture; and thus the face of the country became changed, and the buildings improved after a very extraordinary manner. Theſe advantages the nation in general obtained by this change, though many particular noble families ſuffered by the revolution.

Hence conq'rors are the ſcourges of mankind,
By whom at once they're puniſh'd and refin'd;
And all the nations on earth's ample round,
Which ambient air, and twinkling ſtars ſurround,
Subſervient to the ruler of the ſkies,
Fall by their vices, by their virtues riſe.

Every thing being prepared for the coronation, William proceeded to London, and was ſolemnly crowned in Weſtminſter-Abbey on Chriſtmas-day, A. D. 1066. Concerning this coronation, ſome particulars are very neceſſary to be obſerved, viz.

1. That William was crowned by Aldred, archbiſhop of York, inſtead of Stigand, archbiſhop of Canterbury, who by virtue of his ſuperior dignity in the church, ought to have placed the crown on his head. The reaſons of the preference being given to the archbiſhop of York, upon this occaſion, were, that the archbiſhop of Canterbury had incurred the papal cenſure, and that he was known to be a profeſſed enemy to the Normans.

2. That it had been cuſtomary, on former coronations, for the ſovereign to give his royal word only to maintain the laws, the liberties, &c. of the ſubjects, except upon extraordinary occaſions; but the archbiſhop of York exacted of William a moſt ſolemn oath to this purport, That he ſhould protect the holy church and its governors; that he ſhould govern all the people ſubject to him prudently and juſtly; that he ſhould ordain, and keep juſt laws, and wholly forbid all rapines and unjuſt judgments, and that he ſhould behave mercifully towards his ſubjects, and govern both the Engliſh and Normans by the ſame equal law.

3. That William politically choſe not to receive the crown as a badge of conqueſt, but as a mark of election, for Aldred, by his deſire, demanded of the Engliſh, if they conſented, that the duke ſhould be crowned king; and theſe replying in the affirmative, the biſhop of Conſtance put the ſame queſtions to the Normans, who anſwering, Yes, Aldred immediately placed the crown upon William's head.*

After the coronation, the very firſt ſtep that the new king took was to ſeize upon the treaſures which Harold had amaſſed and laid up at Wincheſter. Theſe, however, he did not keep to himſelf, but liberally diſtributed as rewards to his Norman officers and ſoldiers, and as donations to churches and monaſteries. By this conduct he hoped to anſwer two purpoſes, viz. to retain inviolable the attachment of the army, and to conciliate the affections of the Engliſh clergy, wiſely judging that the gown and ſword would prove his greateſt ſecurities, and far overbalance the power of the lay-nobility and peaſantry. Nor was he ungrateful to the eccleſiaſtics abroad, for he ſent the royal ſtandard of Harold, which had been taken at the battle of Haſtings, as a preſent to the pope, beſides other rich offerings, and was remarkably generous to many others of the foreign clergy. But the expences of William's army and navy, and other contingencies, together with theſe late donations and preſents, exhauſted all William's own money as duke of Normandy, together with what he had ſeized of Harold's, and received as voluntary loans ſince he came to England. It therefore appeared abſolutely neceſſary to recruit his treaſury, and repleniſh his purſe; but the neceſſity being eaſier diſcovered than the remedy, William had recourſe to his uſual policy, and employed ſeveral of his truſty friends and emiſſaries to feel the pulſes of the people, and, if poſſible, to prevail on them to make their new ſovereign a free gift, from an intimation that ſuch an inſtance of their confidence and eſteem could not fail of having the moſt agreeable effect upon the king's mind, and inſure to them his good-will and protection. Theſe plauſible arguments, artfully urged, had the deſired effect; in a ſhort time William received preſents from all quarters of the kingdom, to a very conſiderable amount; the firſt beginning of his reign ſeemed to promiſe his people a ſuitable return, and the deluded Engliſh fondly flattered themſelves that they were about to enjoy all the bleſſings of a juſt and mild adminiſtration.

* We are told by hiſtorians of a ſingular circumſtance that occurred, by miſtake, at this coronation; for the loud acclamations which enſued upon this occaſion had well nigh proved fatal to the inhabitants of Weſtminſter; and, in fact, gave the firſt occaſion to that diſguſt which the Engliſh entertained for the Norman government. The Conqueror, who was too cautious to truſt

Being thus ſucceſsful, he wiſhed to impreſs a general and favorable opinion of his moderation and equity, and the Engliſh conceived great hopes of happineſs, but ſoon found themſelves miſerably deceived, as will appear by the ſequel.

To excite an advantageous idea of his juſtice and clemency, he began his reign by ſtrictly enjoining his principal Norman officers to treat the Engliſh with humanity, and reſpect them as their brethren, and as one people with themſelves: he iſſued orders, forbidding the ſoldiery to commit the leaſt outrage on the inhabitants, under the ſevereſt penalties; and publiſhed an edict, formally confirming all the privileges of the people, and all the promiſes he had made in their behalf by his coronation oath. This artful ſhew of love and kindneſs prepared the minds of the Engliſh for his next ſtep, which was that of dividing among his followers the lands of all the noblemen who had appeared in arms againſt him, as well thoſe that fell in the battle as thoſe that ſurvived: and to leave as little room as poſſible for murmurings or heart-burnings, from a ſuſpicion of partiality in this diſtribution, he diſtinguiſhed with particular marks of favor, Edgar Atheling, to whom he granted many large poſſeſſions, and, as ſome authors ſay, created him earl of Oxford; but this latter circumſtance has been ſtrongly conteſted. He likewiſe conferred poſts of great importance on many other Engliſh noblemen, particularly Edwin and Morcar, to whom he ſhewed all the regard that was due to their high ſtation. And to convince the Engliſh ſtill more fully of his good intentions, he projected matches between his officers and the Engliſh ladies, and at the ſame time provided huſbands among the Engliſh for the Norman heireſſes. He likewiſe granted a new charter to the city of London, confirming the privileges and immunities which the citizens enjoyed in the days of Edward the Confeſſor.

Thus were the citizens of London, with the reſt of the nation, lulled to ſleep, or drawn by his ſpecious baits to repoſe an unlimited confidence in his ſeeming integrity and juſtice. Hence, under a pretence of being anxious for the ſecurity of the people, he erected forts to curb them, and by affecting to introduce better regulations, he found an opportunity of reducing them to the moſt abject obedience. All the places of ſtrength were filled with Norman garriſons, and every fortreſs of conſequence was under the immediate direction of a Norman governor. After having proceeded in this political manner, that he might leave nothing undone that could tend to the ſecuring of his new acquiſition, he reſolved upon a tour through ſome of the principal parts of England, under pretence of inſpecting the civil œconomy of the kingdom, curbing the turbulent, encouraging the quiet, and guarding againſt public danger, by extirpating the banditti and robbers, who infeſted the country, and then ſought ſhelter in the woods, which were at that time very thick in moſt parts of the kingdom.

William took great pains to win the affections of the clergy, and to eſtabliſh a reputation for religion and piety; in particular he erected a church and monaſtery at Haſtings, where prayers were to be ſaid for the repoſe of the ſouls of thoſe who were there ſlain in the battle againſt Harold. Some hiſtorians affirm, that the high altar was raiſed on the very ſpot where Harold's ſtandard had been taken; but others ſay it was on the place where his body was found. The monaſtery, which was called Battle-Abbey, was filled with monks of the Benedictine order from the great monaſtery of Wincheſter, but exempted from epiſcopal juriſdiction, and the church was dedicated to St. Martin. William would have theſe fabricks conſidered as monuments of piety; but it is evident, they were erected by his vanity, as memorials of his victory; and endowed by his policy as inſtruments of his diſſimulation.‡

truſt himſelf in the power of the Londoners without having a ſufficient ſecurity for his perſon, had, under the ſhew of greater ſtate, ſurrounded Weſtminſter Abbey, the place of his inauguration, with a body of Norman ſoldiers; who, when they heard the tumultuous ſhouts of the people within the church, on placing the crown on the duke's head, miſtook their acclamations for an uproar occaſioned by a diſpute or quarrel, and thinking their leader in danger, without taking any time to examine into the truth of the fact, they ſet fire to the city, and began to kill and plunder at random. Thoſe within doors, equally ignorant of the reaſon of the tumult without, and ſeeing the flames and hearing the cries of thoſe who ran to the church for ſhelter, were ſeized with a panic, different according to the different ſituations of thoſe whom it affected. The Engliſh imagined ſome treachery was on foot, and that their victor king had doomed them to deſtruction, in order to fix himſelf more firmly in his new acquired dignity. William himſelf, trembling and aghaſt, thought of nothing but a plot to aſſaſſinate him, and fled with precipitation from his throne to the high altar for ſanctuary. But all parties being ſoon convinced of their error, a ſtop was put to the confuſion, and the flames were extinguiſhed before they had done any conſiderable damage.

‡ Of this place we have the following account from a modern writer; Battle is in the rape of Haſtings. Its old name was Epiton, but it took the preſent from the deciſive battle, (called likewiſe the Battle of Haſtings, becauſe fought betwixt theſe two places) when king Harold was killed by William the Norman; as were alſo great numbers on both ſides. To make ſome atonement for the effuſion of ſo much blood, the conqueror erected an abbey in that called Heath-field, on the very ſpot that was ſoaked with it; wherein he placed Benedictine monks, (whoſe abbot was mitred) to pray for the ſouls of the ſlain. He made it a ſanctuary for the greateſt of criminals that fled to it, and impowered the abbot to ſave the life of any villain, that he ſaw going

A. D. 1067, William began to turn his thoughts on the Norman dominions, which he had drained of its forces, and left almoſt defenceleſs. Indeed he had ſome ſuſpicion that the king of France intended to take the advantage of his abſence to attack his patrimonial territories, which cauſed him to determine on a voyage to Normandy. Previous, however, to his purſuing this deſign, he judged it expedient to take every precaution for the ſecurity of his new acquired kingdom: with this view, beſides the fortifications he had raiſed at London, he erected forts at Norwich, Wincheſter, Haſtings, Hereford, &c. and filled them with Normans. Then he diſarmed the Engliſh in general, broke their militia, and took every method which his imagination could deviſe to prevent an inſurrection. The command of the Norman forces, and the regency of the kingdom he then left to his half-brother Odo, biſhop of Bayeux, whom he had made earl of Kent, a prelate equally qualified for the management of civil, military, and eccleſiaſtical affairs; and to William Fitzoſbern, a wiſe, brave, and experienced general, in whom he placed an entire confidence, and whom he had lately made earl of Arundel and Hereford.

William then embarked at Pevenſey, in Suſſex, and paſſed over to Normandy; at the ſame time ſhewing the moſt conſummate policy by taking with him, not only the hoſtages which had been delivered to him upon the ſubmiſſion of London and the different parts of the kingdom, but likewiſe ſeveral of the principal nobility, whom he imagined likely, either from inclination or power, able to excite any commotions in his abſence. The chief of theſe were Stigand, archbiſhop of Canterbury, Edwin and Morcar, earls of Mercia and Northumberland, the abbot of Glaſtonbury, Egelnoth and Waltheof, ſons of earl Siward, both powerful noblemen, the one in Kent, and the other in the north of England: and to ſtrike at the very root of his apprehenſions, to theſe he added Edgar Atheling, whom he wiſely judged it was not ſafe or prudent to leave behind in a kingdom to which he had an undoubted title. But he pretended that the reaſon of his taking theſe great men with him was, to do them particular honor, and indeed, he affected to treat them with the utmoſt reſpect upon all occaſions, particularly archbiſhop Stigand, whom he always accoſted with the title of father, and conſtantly roſe from his ſeat, in all aſſemblies, to ſalute that prelate whenever he entered.

William's Norman ſubjects received him with the utmoſt demonſtrations of joy; and the king of France, as he had not taken timely advantage of William's abſence to attack Normandy, now thought it beſt to diſſemble his jealouſy of that hero's ſucceſs, and to ſend him an embaſſy of congratulation. Rodulph, the French monarch's father-in-law, was accordingly diſpatched with a ſplendid retinue to Feſchamp, where William intended to keep his feſtival of Eaſter, in order to compliment him on his late victory and coronation. Upon this interview, the magnificence of the robes worn by William, and thoſe who were with him; the variety of jewels that adorned them, and vaſt profuſion of gold and ſilver utenſils which the Conqueror oſtentatiouſly diſplayed, excited the admiration of the French to ſuch a degree, that they could hardly believe their ſenſes, but almoſt fancied that ſuch ſplendor, and ſo much treaſure could only exiſt in the deluſions of imagination. The comelineſs and beauty of the Engliſh youth, who were in William's train, excited the aſtoniſhment of the French, as much as any thing elſe which they ſaw; they were little accuſtomed to ſuch dignity of mein, and delicacy of features, and the hearts of the French and Norman ladies fell victims to the perſonal charms of the vanquiſhed Engliſh.

But while he was indulging himſelf in joy and feſtivity, all the precautions he had taken to ſecure the tranquillity of England were fruſtrated. The inſolence of the Normans could be reſtrained by no authority, but that of William. Proud from the victory they had obtained, greedy of plunder, and looking with contempt on a people who had ſo eaſily reſigned their liberties, they were guilty of every exceſs. They plundered the houſes of the Engliſh, violated the chaſtity of their wives and daughters, and practiſed ſuch enormous cruelties, that nothing but ſavage brutality could invent. Revenge rouſed the ſpirit of the Engliſh. They perceived their dreadful ſituation, and deſpair urged them to retaliate on the invaders of their country all the miſeries they had ſuffered from the hand of wanton deſpotiſm. They were not yet totally inſenſible to the charms of liberty, and determined either to drive their tyrannical maſters out of the kingdom, or periſh in the attempt. But they were deſtitute of leaders, and could form no regular plan for executing their deſign. The inhabitants of Kent, who ſeverely felt the rod of power, applied to Euſtace, count of Boulogne, for aſſiſtance. He liſtened to their complaints, and promiſed them relief. The caſtle of Dover was conſidered as the moſt proper place for a retreat if the enemy ſhould prove too powerful, and they agreed to begin their operations againſt the enemy, with ſeizing that important fortreſs. The plan was conducted with the utmoſt ſecrecy, and Montfort, the governor, being abſent with part of the garriſon, there was great reaſon to hope that the attempt would be crowned with ſucceſs. The night appointed for the execution of his project arrived, and the Kentiſh-men repaired in ſmall parties to the place of rendezvous. About midnight Euſtace landed his forces, and led the combined troops immediately to the attack. The ſtrength of the caſtle ſaved the Normans from the reſentment of the Engliſh. They aſſaulted the gate with the utmoſt fury; but they ſpent their force in vain, for the garriſon, quickly recovering the ſurprize they were at firſt thrown into by this unexpected attack, made a vigorous ſally, and falling upon the aſſailants, put them to flight, drove Euſtace and his men to their ſhips, and a diviſion of the Engliſh, which had joined him, towards the brow of a rock, where moſt of them were precipitated down the clifts into the ſea: Euſtace's nephew was taken priſoner in this ſkirmiſh, and the count himſelf narrowly eſcaped with a few of his followers.

Yet we find, that this bad ſucceſs at the beginning was not ſufficient to damp the ſpirits of thoſe who had unfurled the ſtandard of liberty; their example ran through the kingdom like wild-fire, ſo that no ſooner was the flame extinguiſhed in one part, than it burſt forth in another.

The next ſcene of diſturbance we hear of, had its riſe in Shropſhire and Herefordſhire, and was of ſo violent a nature as to threaten the moſt ſerious conſequences; and ſo high did the tide of diſcontent run throughout ing to be executed. By the remains of it, it was, no doubt, a very ſtately pile, and a mile in compaſs. The Gate-houſe, which ſtands almoſt intire, is made a place for the ſeſſions, and other public meetings. Here is a charity ſchool for forty boys. Its market was firſt granted by king Henry I. for Sundays; but in 1600 Anthony lord viſcount Mountague got it changed, by act of parliament, to Thurſday. It has another on the ſecond Tueſday in every month. All that the town is noted for now, is, for making the fineſt gunpowder, and the beſt, perhaps, in Europe. The incumbent of the church here is called Dean of Battel. The place ſtands in a dirty low country, not reckoned very healthy. There is a hill near it with a beacon on it, for which reaſon it is called Beacon-hill, but its old name was Standard-hill, becauſe William the Norman ſet up his great ſtandard of defiance there, the day before the above-mentioned battle with Harold.

throughout the kingdom, that Coxo, a nobleman of great power and property, and highly in favor with the Engliſh, was murdered by his own vaſſals, becauſe he would not head them in an inſurrection. This worthy lord, whom ſome of our antiquaries take to have been earl of Northumberland, was a man of ſtrict virtue, and notwithſtanding that he lamented the oppreſſion under which ſome of his countrymen laboured, he thought that the oath of fealty he had made to William, in common with other nobles of the realm, after the battle of Haſtings, would not allow him to take up arms againſt him in his abſence: Theſe conſiderations, however, had but ſmall weight with Edric, ſurnamed Sylvaticus, or the Foreſter, nephew to the infamous Edric Streon, who lived in the reign of Ethelred II. This nobleman's eſtates lay on the borders of Wales: hiſtory does not inform us what reaſons he alleged for taking up arms; he had, like earl Coxo, and other noblemen, ſworn allegiance to William, and had met with the moſt favorable reception and kind treatment from him. However, ſeeing himſelf now at the head of a ſtrong party of the malecontents, he attacked the territories of Richard Scrope, and other Normans in Herefordſhire, and being joined by a body of the Welſh, under Blethwyn and Rynwellen, princes of Powis and North Wales, he waſted all the country as far as Luggen bridge, and after making a conſiderable booty, returned home. Nor were theſe the only inſurrections that were raiſed by the Engliſh againſt the Norman intruders; great numbers of thoſe foreigners were ſet upon and cut off by bands of people that rendezvouſed in woods, foreſts, and caves.

As ſoon as the intelligence of theſe commotions reached William's ears, he left the government of Normandy in the hands of Matilda, his ducheſs, and his eldeſt ſon Robert, and ſetting ſail from thence, landed at Winchelſea, on the 6th of December, 1067. By this ſudden arrival he defeated a plan which had been concerted by the Engliſh, for ſhaking off the Norman yoke; and it is not improbable that the diſcovery of this deſign having been imparted to him, was the principal means of haſtening his coming over. The conſpiracy, indeed, was too general, and there were too many concerned in its intended execution for it to be kept ſecret: the deſign was to fall at the ſame hour upon the Norman troops, who were diſperſed in the different parts of the kingdom, and having deſtroyed theſe, the conſpirators imagined they could oppoſe William's again entering the kingdom. But William's return allayed the ſtorm that had been raiſed in his abſence; nevertheleſs, it gave him ſuch a ſuſpicion of the Engliſh, that he determined entirely to curb their turbulent ſpirit by oppreſſion, to cloſely rivet the chains of ſlavery, which before he had only had opportunity to fit on, and in future to rule them with a rod of iron.

It was, however, eſſentially neceſſary to conceal a deſign, the avowal of which would have thrown, perhaps, inſurmountable obſtacles in the way of its completion, by exaſperating the Engliſh to a general inſurrection. He therefore had recourſe to that diſſimulation which had ſerved him ſo well on former occaſions; and though he firmly perſiſted in his intent, he purſued it with the moſt refined policy, gaining his point by degrees, and carrying it on under the veil of the moſt engaging careſſes, and the moſt enſnaring promiſes of kindneſs, affection, and friendſhip.

The firſt ſignal which William gave of his intention to rule by arbitrary power was manifeſted in the revival of the tax of Danegelt, ſo juſtly odious to the whole Engliſh nation. The levying it without calling together the ſtates, gave them great cauſe for ſuſpicion, and added fuel to the preſent diſcontent. On this occaſion, Aldred, archbiſhop of York, took the liberty to make ſeveral remonſtrances to the king with a noble freedom, and endeavoured to diſſuade him from ſo unpopular a meaſure; but William, deaf to his advice, or rather incenſed at his intermeddling, inſtead of deſiſting from his deſign, gave orders for the levying this tax with the moſt rigorous exactneſs. Theſe orders ſtruck a terror into thoſe parts of the kingdom that were more immediately under his eye and the power of his ſtanding army, ſo that little or no oppoſition was made to the payment of it in thoſe counties adjacent to the capital; but the more remote provinces of Cornwall and Devonſhire did not ſo tamely ſtoop beneath the burthen, and the city of Exeter was the firſt that refuſed to ſubmit to the Conqueror's new regulations. It is to be obſerved, that Githa, the mother of Harold, had retired to this city with all her rich effects, after the battle of Haſtings, ſo fatal to her family, and had here, with all her riches, lived uninterrupted, and in a ſplendor little inferior to that of the poſſeſſor of the crown: and it is not improbable but that her influence might, in a great meaſure, have contributed to the reſiſtance made on this occaſion by the inhabitants of theſe counties, who abſolutely refuſed to ſwear fealty to William, or to admit a garriſon of Normans whom he had ſent down to take poſſeſſion of their ſtrong holds. William, not chuſing to ſuffer any one inſtance of refractorineſs to go unpuniſhed, leſt an ill-timed lenity might give riſe to future diſturbances of this kind, ſent the malecontents word, that unleſs they immediately returned to their duty, they had nothing to expect but the moſt rigorous treatment for their diſobedience. They, in no wiſe intimidated by his menaces, perſiſted in the reſolution they had taken, upon which he marched in perſon, with a ſtrong force, to quell them. And here he gave the moſt remarkable inſtance of that refined policy, to which moſt of his ſucceſſes had in fact been owing: notwithſtanding he had ſo many Normans ready to march at his command, the greateſt part of the army he raiſed on this occaſion was compoſed of Engliſh, that he might not leave them even the ſhadow of a plea for their ſtubbornneſs, by alleging that foreigners were made uſe of, to drive them into a compliance with the will of a foreigner; he therefore reſolved to make the Engliſh cut each other's throats, and, oh, ſhameful to be told! they themſelves aſſiſted him in his deſigns. Thus he at once ſpared his faithful Normans, and by thinning the number of the Engliſh, and, what was ſtill more to his purpoſe, by creating between two people of the ſame nation an irreconcilable animoſity, he by degrees attained every point he had in view.

He accordingly advanced againſt Exeter, A. D. 1068, with the Engliſh in the front of his army, when he prepared to lay ſiege to the town in form, which ſo intimidated the magiſtrates and perſons of property within the place, that they ſent a deputation to him, with offers of ſubmiſſion and hoſtages as pledges of their ſincerity. But the populace, who had more reſolution, becauſe they had leſs to loſe, refuſed to abide by the compact the deputies had made, ſhut the gates againſt the king juſt as he was preparing to enter and take poſſeſſion of the city, and declared they would defend themſelves therein as long as one ſtone remained upon another.

William was greatly exaſperated at this behaviour, and to revenge the affront, had recourſe to a cruel device, in order to ſtrike terror into the beſieged, for commanding one of the hoſtages to be brought out in view of the walls, his eyes were there inhumanly put out. This deed, however, had a different effect on the minds of thoſe within from what William had imagined, and only ſerved to make them more deſperate, upon which he found himſelf conſtrained to begin the ſiege in earneſt. Having carried on his approaches almoſt to the foot of the walls, he ordered his battering engines to play furiouſly upon them, and at the ſame time gave directions for undermining the ramparts. His orders were executed with the greateſt alacrity, and the townſmen, who had been before ſo inſolent, now ſtruck with the baſeſt fear, implored the compaſſion of the victor; but William, who was not to be eaſily appeaſed when once his reſentment was thoroughly rouſed, refuſed to hearken to any terms, and threatened to put to the ſword all thoſe who had ſhut the gates againſt him. However, the remonſtrances of the principal nobles and clergy in his camp, whom he did not care to diſoblige, added to the dictates of policy and a deſire to poſſeſs his ſubjects with a notion of his clemency, to which he was in his heart a ſtranger, got the better of his wrath, inſomuch that he not only pardoned them, but even prevented his ſoldiers from plundering their city. As to Githa, ſhe, upon the firſt approach of William, had found means to get on ſhip-board, with her effects, and eſcaped to Flanders. In order to prevent future inſurrections, he built a citadel in the place, which he filled with a ſtrong garriſon, under the command of Baldwin de Moles, on whom he likewiſe beſtowed the government of the county.

Having thus ſubdued Exeter, he marched into Cornwall, to quell the commotions there, in which he ſucceeded to his wiſh; and having provided for the future peace of that county, he returned to Wincheſter, ordered his army into winter-quarters, and in this city he paſſed his Eaſter. Hither his ducheſs Matilda, or Maude, came to him from Normandy, ſoon after the holidays; and was crowned on Whitſunday, by archbiſhop Aldred: and before the expiration of the year, was delivered of a ſon, who was named Henry, and afterwards filled the throne of England.

During theſe tranſactions, Aldred, the good archbiſhop of York, after in vain remonſtrating with William on the illegality and cruelty of his proceedings, anathematized him, and ſoon after died of grief; when William being releaſed from ſo troubleſome a monitor, gave way to the dictates of his imperious diſpoſition, perſecuted the Engliſh with the utmoſt rigor, confiſcated the eſtates of ſome, and loaded all with the moſt grievous burdens.

In this diſtreſs, the people naturally turned their eyes to Edwin and Morcar; they knew their valor, they confided in their popularity, and made no doubt of ſucceſs, if they could induce theſe noblemen to declare in their favor. The earls themſelves were already prepared for any deſperate attempt: if the diſtreſſes of their country had made no impreſſion on their minds, a motive equally ſtrong, though not equally laudable, we mean revenge, inſtigated them to take up arms againſt William; for the Norman, in order to ſecure theſe two noblemen in his intereſt, had, on his acceſſion, promiſed his daughter in marriage to Edwin; but either he had never ſeriouſly intended to perform his engagement, or having changed his plan of adminiſtration in England from clemency to rigor, he thought it was to little purpoſe, to gain one family, at the expence of enraging the whole nation.

When Edwin therefore renewed his application, he gave him an abſolute refuſal; and this diſappointment, added to ſo many other reaſons for diſguſt, induced that nobleman and his brother to concur with their enraged countrymen, and to make one effort for the recovery of their antient liberties. But before they took up arms, they wiſely ſtipulated for foreign ſuccours, from their nephew Blethyn, prince of North Wales, from Malcolm, king of Scotland, and from Swein, king of Denmark.

Far from being alarmed at theſe preparations and alliances of the inſurgents, William advanced by forced marches towards the north. He was already in poſſeſſion of the moſt important fortreſſes, and therefore had little to fear from the progreſs of the diſcontented Engliſh. He firſt viſited thoſe places of ſtrength, and put them in a condition to prevent a ſurprize. The caſtle of Warwick was new fortified, and committed to the cuſtody of Henry de Beaumont, a Norman nobleman, afterwards created earl of Warwick. William Peverel, another Norman, was intruſted with the important caſtle of Nottingham, the fortifications of which were alſo repaired.

Theſe precautions taken by William, and the great celerity of his march, by which he reached York before any of the foreign ſuccors arrived, except a ſmall reinforcement from Wales, ſufficiently convinced the two earls that they muſt either be reduced to the diſcouraging neceſſity of paſſing the approaching winter amidſt the faſtneſſes of the country, while William, poſſeſſing all the places of ſtrength, would be enabled to cut off their ſupplies, or have recourſe to conciliative meaſures with the conqueror. They choſe the latter; and William, not chuſing to exaſperate the Engliſh any farther, received them with ſeeming complaiſance. Archil, another nobleman of great intereſt in the northern parts, followed their example, and gave his ſon as an hoſtage to William for his good behaviour. Upon this, the inhabitants of York, a place at that time of great importance, ſent William the keys of their city. This ſubmiſſion was very agreeable to the conqueror, who immediately gave orders for building two forts, each of which were garriſoned with five hundred men. Egilwin, biſhop of Durham, now likewiſe made his peace; and had alſo the merit of prevailing on Malcolm to enter into a treaty with William, and to do him homage for Cumberland. The people thus deſerted by their leaders, were unable to make any farther reſiſtance. William religiouſly obſerved the terms granted to the chieftains, and allowed them for the preſent to keep poſſeſſion of their eſtates; but he extended the rigors of his confiſcations over their followers, and gave away their lands to his foreign adventurers, who being in poſſeſſion of the military power, and diſperſed through the whole country, left Edwin and Morcar, whom he pretended to ſpare, deſtitute of all ſupport, and ready to fall whenever he ſhould think proper to command their ruin. The Conqueror having thus weathered the ſtorm, renewed his application to erecting caſtles wherever they were wanting, or might be uſeful.

In the mean time all the Engliſh, from whoſe influence with their countrymen William had any thing to fear, ſuffered a kind of proſcription, by being either ſtripped of their eſtates or deprived of their liberty. The deſtruction of ſo many families was a ſufficient proof, that the king intended to rely entirely on the ſupport and affections of foreigners. Many of the Engliſh, therefore, fled into foreign countries, hoping to paſs their lives abroad, free from oppreſſion, or to return, on a favorable opportunity, to aſſiſt their friends in the recovery of their native liberties. Edgar Atheling himſelf, dreading the inſiduous careſſes of William, was perſuaded by Goſpatric, a powerful Northumbrian, to eſcape into Scotland; and he carried with him his two ſiſters, Margaret and Chriſtina. The ſentiments of common humanity prompted Malcolm to receive the illuſtrious fugitives with great civility. As he himſelf had been an exile, he was moved with compaſſion at their fate. This compaſſion, improved by intercouſe, at laſt begot an affection for the perſon of Margaret, whom he afterwards made his conſort.

Theſe proceedings alarmed William, who demanded the fugitives; and Malcolm, with a noble magnanimity which does honor to his memory, treated the meſſage with contempt. A war between the two nations was the conſequence; and the northern parts of the kingdom became again the ſcenes of horror and devaſtation.

Scotland was now crouded with Engliſh nobles; and the Northumbrians, ſure of being powerfully aſſiſted, committed the moſt dreadful ravages on the territories of the Normans; many of whom choſe to abandon their eſtates, and retire into their own country, rather than be perpetually harraſſed by the attempts of an exaſperated people. Nor were the Scots the only people that threatened to attack the Engliſh monarch; the Danes and the Iriſh had joined in the confederacy; and it was agreed to make the attack at the ſame time in different parts of the kingdom. Had this plan been executed with vigor, it would have ſhaken the foundation of William's power; but it was rendered abortive by the diſſentions that prevailed in their councils. The Danes, however, landed at the mouth of the Humber; and William thought it moſt adviſeable to purchaſe their abſence by a large ſum of money; an expedient, which had often been ineffectually uſed by former monarchs.

The want of unanimity in the confederates ruined their whole ſcheme, and, A. D. 1070, the Engliſh inſurgents, when deſerted by their foreign allies, were unable to ſupport themſelves againſt the Norman army: they were obliged to ſubmit to ſuperior force; and the Conqueror had now an opportunity of introducing into England the innovations he thought neceſſary to ſupport that deſpotic power by which he was determined to govern the kingdom. He had now the plea of rebellion to offer as a reaſon for his conduct; and he failed not to uſe it. He confiſcated the eſtates of the nobles, and gave them to the Normans and other foreigners who had aſſiſted him in the conqueſt of this unhappy country. For an Engliſhman to be poſſeſſed either of riches or power was conſidered as a ſufficient crime to render him obnoxious to government. The innocent and the guilty ſuffered equally under the rod of oppreſſion. The moſt antient and opulent families were reduced to indigence; they pined for want on the very eſtates which had deſcended to them through a long line of illuſtrious anceſtors.

Add to this the feudal polity, which had been long introduced into France and Normandy, was conſidered by William as the beſt, perhaps the only method of rendering the ſervitude, to which he had reduced his ſubjects, perpetual, by deſtroying the very idea of liberty, and rivetting the chains of ſlavery on a generous, though conquered people.

He accordingly divided the kingdom into ſeven hundred baronies, which he beſtowed upon his particular friends. No Engliſhman was ſuffered to enjoy that honor. Theſe baronies were ſubdivided into ſixty thouſand, two hundred and fifteen knights fees; which were diſtributed among their retainers, and a few Engliſhmen who had been fortunate enough to gain the favor of the Conqueror, by being baſe enough to deſert the cauſe of their country.

The clergy themſelves were not exempted from theſe arbitrary proceedings: they were obliged to furniſh a certain number of ſoldiers; and in caſe of refuſal, to ſuffer the ſame puniſhment. The temporalities of the eccleſiaſtics enjoyed no greater favor than the eſtates of the laity. The pope remonſtrated againſt theſe proceedings, but without effect. William no longer wanted his aſſiſtance, and was not to be intimidated by the thunder of the Vatican. Alexander II. who then filled the papal chair, perceived it would be in vain to contend againſt the power of William, and determined to accompliſh by policy what he could not effect by force: he flattered himſelf with being able to extend his ſupremacy over the Engliſh dominions; but this, he knew, muſt be effected by an artful conduct: William was too violent to be openly oppoſed. Ermefroy, biſhop of Sion, appeared well qualified for carrying on this difficult and delicate negociation; and accordingly Alexander ſent him into England with the character of legate. Several of the Engliſh clergy were become obnoxious to William: the arrival of the legate, therefore, was agreeable to the Conqueror, who now determined to puniſh them under the maſk of religion. Ermefroy, inſtructed to gain the favor of the Engliſh monarch, ſummoned a general council at Wincheſter, at which were depoſed Stigand, archbiſhop, Agelmar, biſhop of Helmham, Elgeric, biſhop of Durham, and ſeveral other prelates. Among other innovations at this council, William compelled all biſhoprics and abbies, poſſeſſed of baronies, to exchange their tenure, and inſtead of holding them free of all ſecular ſervitude, to hold them by knights ſervice, or military tenure. He likewiſe quartered the greateſt part of his troops upon religious houſes, by which thoſe communities were under the immediate eye of his truſty Norman officers, and his army coſt him little or nothing for a maintenance.

William's avarice encreaſed with his years, and his thoughts ſeemed wholly employed in accumulating treaſures. Being informed, that during the late tranſactions many perſons had lodged their plate, money, and other valuables in the monaſteries, he gave orders to ſearch thoſe places, when his emiſſaries being properly inſtructed, not only ſeized upon what had been concealed, but took away the church plate, and ſtripped the ſhrines of their offerings. Still unſatisfied, for the graſp of avarice is never full, he caſt a longing eye on the wealth of the depoſed archbiſhop, biſhops, and abbots, and determined, as he had wrongfully deprived them of their church livings, he would now with equal injuſtice ſtrip them of their money; which he did with a moſt cruel illegality, and without the leaſt apparent reaſon, as the Norman writers themſelves confeſs. Nor were the decrees of William more unjuſt than rigorouſly executed, indeed the property of ſome of the clergy did not content him, for he impriſoned their perſons, and the vacant livings of all were filled up by foreigners; in particular, Lanfranc, an Italian, was promoted to the ſee of Canterbury, Thomas, a canon of Bayeux, was created archbiſhop of York; the dioceſes of Helmham, Selſey and Wincheſter, were filled by three of his own chaplains. It muſt, however, be confeſſed that though theſe foreigners were obtruded into the places of others, that they were men of real merit and abilities, and deſerved thoſe livings, had they been juſtly obtained.

William now, in order to prevent his officers of the revenue from defrauding him, eſtabliſhed the Court of Exchequer, wherein the accounts of all the officers employed in collecting the king's revenue were paſſed, and all actions relating thereto were heard. The exactions and irregularities of collectors, and the delays and defaults in payment from the perſons aſſeſſed, were particularly cognizable in this court. And it is proper to obſerve here, that the king's revenue at this time conſiſted of ſeveral branches beſides the old demeſne lands, which were reſerved for ſupplying the king's houſehold with oxen, ſheep, corn, hay, and all ſorts of proviſion, according to the nature of the lands, and in the quantities neceſſary; the overplus remaining being compounded for in money. One was a kind of land-tax, called Hidage, and which being levied to make good the ſums promiſed to the Danes, thence got the name of Danegelt; but collected (as appears from Domeſday Book) in William's time, as an ordinary tax, in all appearance at the rate of twelve-pence, though it had been aboliſhed by Edward the Confeſſor. There was alſo a quit-rent paid, before William's coming to the crown, out of all the lands of the ſubject throughout the kingdom, and continued likewiſe upon the knights fees eſtabliſhed afterwards. Another branch conſiſted in the profits of wardſhips, reliefs, and fines, as well for livery of hereditary lands, aſſignations of dower, licences of marriage, and leave to ſue in the king's courts, generally termed Oblata; as of a penal nature, ture, for marrying without licence, and other miſdemeanors, which amounted to large ſums; beſides the forfeitures, mulcts, and pecuniary penalties with which all ſorts of crimes were before, and for ſome time after the reign of William, puniſhed. There were, likewiſe, an infinite number of tolls and cuſtoms paid for paſſage, pontage, freedom of fairs and markets, protection in going and coming, liberty of buying and ſelling, and duties laid upon merchandize, or paid for imports and exports.

This general revenue, with the occaſional aid due from the fees of thoſe that held of the crown by knights ſervice, and the taillages that the king had in his power to levy upon the ſoccage tenants in his own demeſnes, and upon the trading towns of the kingdom, produced an immenſe revenue to William. Ordericus Vitalis ſays, that, ſetting aſide the oblata, fines, and forfeitures, he had coming in near four hundred thouſand pounds a year, every pound being nearly equal to that weight of ſilver, conſequently the whole is to be eſtimated at twelve hundred thouſand pounds of the preſent computation; a ſum which, conſidering the difference of ſpecie between that period and the preſent, was equivalent to twelve millions of money of modern eſtimation.

This amazing revenue, and the vaſt ſtanding army that William kept, could not, however, ſecure him againſt the attempts of the Engliſh, who very naturally wiſhed to throw off a yoke which his tyranny had rendered inſupportable, and ſo far were the meaſures he had taken from anſwering his view of terrifying them into an abject ſubmiſſion, that, on the contrary, it made them deſperate, and many of them wiſhed rather to end their lives in aſſerting their privileges, than to live with the privation of them. Fretherig, the abbot of St. Alban's, exerted himſelf in a particular manner to cheriſh this reſolution in his countrymen, and his indignation at the calamities they ſuffered made him conſider how to remedy them; for this purpoſe he gave refuge and entertainment to all ſuch of the Engliſh who had been ouſted of their eſtates, and proſcribed by the Conqueror, on account of their oppoſition to his meaſures: and here they concerted matters ſo ſecretly and prudently, that they had aſſembled a conſiderable army before William had the leaſt intimation of their deſign. Fretherig, finding his ſcheme ſo ſucceſsful, ſent a meſſage to Edgar Atheling, then in Scotland, inviting that prince to come and put himſelf at the head of the malecontents: which propoſal he readily accepted, and, in a few days after, joined the abbot and his friends, who acknowledged him for their king, and cauſed him to be proclaimed in all the places they had ſeized.

As ſoon as William heard of theſe proceedings, not all his haughtineſs could keep him from trembling for the conſequences: conſcious of the provocations he had given to the Engliſh, he could expect nothing leſs than that they would, to a man, join in a conſpiracy againſt him, unleſs he could find ſome means to cruſh it in its infancy. In this dilemma he conſulted with his favorite and boſom-counſellor, Lanfranc, who adviſed him, on this occaſion, to conciliate the affections of the reſt of the Engliſh by every act of condeſcenſion and kindneſs that his own dignity and ſafety would permit: and in particular he repreſented to him the ſalutary effects that might ariſe from recalling the moſt popular of the proſcribed perſons, and reſtoring them to his favor and protection. William liſtened to this prudent advice, and followed it: he prevailed on the chiefs of the inſurgents to give him a meeting at Berkhamſtead, where, after many remonſtrances and expoſtulations, he, in the preſence of his archbiſhop, ſwore by all the relics of St. Alban, at the ſame time kiſſing the Goſpels, "That he would obſerve the good, approved, and antient laws of the kingdom, which the holy and pious kings, his predeceſſors, and particularly king Edward the Confeſſor, had enacted."

This condeſcenſion having quieted the malecontents, they returned to the army, in order to diſmiſs their troops, believing they ſhould have no farther occaſion for them. But as William had ſuffered the oath to be extorted from him, in regard to the exigence of affairs, ſo he thought of nothing leſs than keeping it; and he no ſooner ſaw his foes diſarmed, than he ſeized and impriſoned their perſons, confiſcated their eſtates, and filled them with Normans. Edgar, upon the firſt news of this treacherous conduct, fled to Scotland, and the reſt of the conſpirators took refuge in different countries. The abbot of St. Alban's, finding all his intentions for the delivery of his country baffled, retired to the Iſle of Ely, where he died ſoon after of grief.

Immediately upon his death, William ſeized on his abbey of St. Alban's, and ſtripped it of every thing that was valuable; and Matthew Paris, in his Lives of the Abbots of St. Alban's, ſays, that the king would have wholly deſtroyed it, had he not been prevented by the remonſtrances of Lanfranc his favorite. The high hand which William carried over his Engliſh ſubjects, as it intimidated ſome into the moſt paſſive ſubjection, ſo it cauſed in others a reſolution to ſhake off their chains, or periſh in the attempt. A number of the diſcontented, of all ranks, repaired to the Iſle of Ely, and among the reſt the two earls Morcar and Edwin (which latter was ſet upon and murdered, as he was on his way to Scotland to engage Malcolm to aſſiſt the malecontents) and were afterwards joined from Scotland by Elgerick and Egelwin, biſhops of Durham and Hereford, Siward Bearn and the brave Hereward de Wake, ſon of Leofric, lord of Brunne, who was reputed the greateſt warrior and the braveſt ſoldier of his age; theſe great qualities and his known hatred to the Norman race, induced the malecontents to chuſe him for their commander. This diſtinction animated young Hereward with freſh ardor, and, in order to ſhew thoſe who had put him at their head, that they had not made an unworthy choice, he ſet about making all the preparations neceſſary for a vigorous defence, well knowing that William would not long let them remain unattacked.

William, alarmed at this inſurrection, reſolved to take the advantage of the ſummer, in which ſeaſon alone the place was acceſſible, being ſurrounded with a deep moraſs, which in winter was always full of water. The firſt thing he did was to build a ſtrong caſtle at Wiſbich, on the eaſt ſide, and to ſtop up all the outlets by which the rebels could make any incurſions. We are likewiſe told, that he built a bridge, two miles long, over the moraſs, on the weſt ſide. However, the beſieged were ſo well fortified, that he was obliged to convert his operations into a blockade, a tedious method of proceeding, and the more vexatious to William at this time, as he had received news of an irruption into the northern provinces by Malcolm, king of Scotland. One morning as the Normans were intent upon their works, the active Hereward ſallied out, engaged and routed the party he attacked, and returned with a conſiderable booty. The check which this ſucceſsful ſally had given to William's affairs, made that prince very uneaſy, and deſpairing of being able to make himſelf maſter of the place in any reaſonable time, he made a truce with the malecontents, which, as it was convenient to their affairs, they readily conſented to, and Hereward went over to the main land; but William ſoon broke this truce, by ſeizing and impriſoning Elgerick, biſhop of Durham, as he was attempting to paſs from the iſland. Hereupon hoſtilities were renewed, and Hereward returned to take upon him the command of the beſieged, bringing with him a ſtrong band of his countrymen, whom he had gathered together during his abſence from the iſland.

William, after having been repulſed in frequent attacks, bethought himſelf of the following ſtratagem: Knowing that the monaſtery of Ely had ſeveral large poſſeſſions which lay on the main land; theſe he fell upon, and, after rifling them of their moſt valuable effects, gave the lands to his ſoldiers. This ſcheme ſucceeded to his wiſh; the brotherhood, touched to the quick with their loſs, began to make ſuch clamors, that Thurſtan, their abbot, was obliged to promiſe them that he would fall upon ſome method to get a reſtitution of their lands from William. Accordingly he privately ſent and offered him to betray the iſland into his hands, with all who were in it, and alſo to pay him a thouſand marks, on condition the lands, which had been ſeized, were reſtored to the convent. William gladly embraced this offer, and the abbot, faithful in his treachery, opened a paſſage for a party of the king's troops, who kept their poſt, notwithſtanding the efforts of thoſe within to diſlodge them, till the whole army entered the iſland. The gallant Hereward, finding himſelf betrayed, cut his paſſage through the Norman troops ſword in hand; but the reſt were obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion, and great numbers of them were made priſoners, among whom was earl Morcar, brother to Edwin. The monks themſelves did not eſcape William's reſentment, for he not only ſtripped their monaſtery of all its rich effects, but ſaddled the brotherhood with the maintenance of forty horſemen, and when they came to pay him the thouſand marks agreed upon, a groat happening to be deficient in the ſum, he took advantage of that trivial circumſtance, and obliged them to double the original ſum.

During theſe tranſactions, the king of Scotland, hoping to profit by ſuch confuſions, had fallen upon the northern counties, but, on the approach of William, he retired; and when the king entered his country, he was glad to make peace, and to pay the uſual homage to the Engliſh crown. To complete the king's proſperity, Edgar Atheling, deſpairing of ſucceſs, and weary of a fugitive life, ſubmitted to his enemy, and, receiving a handſome allowance, was permitted to live in England unmoleſted. But theſe acts of generoſity towards the leaders were, as uſual, diſgraced by the rigor William exerciſed againſt the inferior malecontents. He ordered the hands to be lopped off, and the eyes to be put out, of many of the priſoners he had taken in the Iſle of Ely, and, in that miſerable condition, led them through the country as monuments of his ſavage diſpoſition.

The verv next year, which was A. D. 1073, Philip, king of France, either jealous of William's growing power, or hoping that the unſettled ſtate of his affairs in England would prevent his aſſiſting his ſubjects on the continent, attacked the dutchy of Normandy. This greatly embarraſſed William: he could truſt only to the Normans in ſubduing and awing the Engliſh, eſpecially when he himſelf was abſent. He therefore raiſed an army, wholly compoſed of the inhabitants of this kingdom, and paſſed over to the continent, where his Engliſh forces were joined by ſome troops levied in Normandy. Philip was, by this time, in poſſeſſion of the city of Mans, the capital of the province of Maine, which had ſome time before revolted from the Norman government. The Engliſh appeared ambitious of diſtinguiſhing themſelves on this occaſion, and of recovering that character for valor, which had long been national among them; but which their late eaſy ſubjection by the Normans, had ſomewhat degraded and obſcured. Nor is it impoſſible but they might hope, by their zeal and activity, to recover the confidence of their ſovereign, as their anceſtors had formerly, by a ſimilar conduct, gained the affections of Canute; and to conquer his inveterate prejudices in favor of his own countrymen. The valor of the Engliſh, together with the king's military abilities, ſoon ſurmounted all difficulties in Maine: the city of Mans was re-taken, the inhabitants were obliged to ſubmit to William's government, and the king of France to give him peace upon his own terms.

William, during his ſtay in Normandy, A. D. 1074, received intelligence that a conſpiracy of a very extraordinary nature was formed in England, by perſons, whom, of all others, he imagined he had the leaſt reaſon to ſuſpect of being diſſatisfied. Theſe were the very foreigners whom he had enriched with his bounties, and raiſed to the moſt eminent ſtations, from the love and eſteem he bore to their perſons. Robert, the youngeſt ſon of William Fitz-Oſberne, who ſucceeded to the engliſh eſtate, and earldom of Hereford had, either by way of compliment to his ſovereign, or in compliance with the forms of vaſſalage, applied to William for leave to marry his ſiſter to Ralph de Gauder, earl of Norfolk, and met with an abſolute denial. He, however, proceeded to finiſh the nuptials, and aſſembled all his friends together, with thoſe of Gauder, to attend the ſolemnity. The two earls, diſguſted with receiving a denial to their requeſt, and dreading William's reſentment for their diſobedience, now prepared matters for a revolt; and, during the gaiety of the feſtival, while the company were heated with wine, they opened their deſign to their gueſts. They inveighed bitterly againſt the arbitrary conduct of the king; his tyranny towards the Engliſh, whom they affected, on this occaſion, to commiſerate; his imperious behaviour to his barons of the nobleſt birth; and his apparent intention of reducing the victors and the vanquiſhed, to a like ignominious ſervitude. Amidſt their complaints, the indignity of ſubmitting to a baſtard was not forgot; the certain proſpect of ſucceſs in a revolt, by the aſſiſtance of the Danes and the diſcontented Engliſh, was inſiſted on; and the whole company, inflamed with the ſame ſentiments, and, warmed by the jollity of the entertainment, entered, by a ſolemn engagement, into the deſign of ſhaking off the royal authority. Even earl Waltheof himſelf, who happened to be preſent, inconſiderately expreſſed his approbation of the conſpiracy, and promiſed to aſſiſt in the execution to the utmoſt of his power. Waltheof had married Judith, the conqueror's neice, and at this time poſſeſſed the confidence and friendſhip of his ſovereign, who had lately inveſted him with the important earldom of Northumberland, in the room of Goſpatric, who, on ſome new diſguſt from William, had retired into Scotland, where he received the earldom of Dunbar from the bounty of Malcolm. It is indeed probable, that Waltheof was greatly affected by the tyranny exerciſed by the conqueror over the Engliſh, and which deſtroyed all the ſatiſfaction he could reap from his own grandeur and advancement. Animated by a deſire of relieving the oppreſſions of his countrymen, it is no wonder, when a proſpect was opened, of retrieving their liberty, that he haſtiliy embraced it; while the fumes of the liquor, and the ardor of the company, prevented him from reflecting on the conſequences that would certainly attend ſo raſh an attempt. But when his cool judgment returned, he eaſily foreſaw, that the conſpiracy of theſe diſcontented barons was not likely to prove ſucceſsful againſt the eſtabliſhed power of William; or, if their attempts ſhould be crowned with a favourable iſſue, that the ſlavery of the Engliſh, inſtead of being alleviated, would become more grievous, under a multitude of foreign leaders, factious and ambitious, whoſe union or diſcord would be equally oppreſſive to the people. Tormented with theſe reflections, he opened his mind to his wife Judith, on whoſe fidelity he thought he might ſafely depend; but who, having ſecretly fixed her affections upon another, took this opportunity of ruining her eaſy and credulous huſband. She conveyed intelligence of the conſpiracy to William, and took care to aggravate every circumſtance which ſhe believed would tend to enrage him againſt Waltheof, and render him abſolutely implacable. In the mean time the earl, ſtill unſatisfied with regard to the part it would be moſt prudent for him to act, diſcovered the ſecret in confeſſion to Lanfranc, on whoſe probity and judgement he placed the utmoſt confidence; and was perſuaded by the prelate, that he owed no fidelity to thoſe rebellious barons, who had, by ſurprize, gained his conſent to a crime; that his firſt duty was to his ſovereign and benefactor, his next to himſelf and family; and that if he neglected the opportunity of making attonement for his guilt by revealing it, the temerity of the conſpirators was ſo great, that they would give ſome other perſon the means of acquiring the merit of the diſcovery.

The earl followed his advice; and, when he came to the king, met with a moſt gracious reception. The diſappearing of Waltheof, and ſome ſteps taken by the regency, ſoon gave the conſpirators to know that they were diſcovered, and conſequently that no ſafety was left for them but in their ſwords. Upon this they ſent to the Welſh, who readily joining them, hoſtilities were begun; but, by the diligence of Odo, biſhop of Bayeux, the king's brother and chief regent of the kingdom during his abſence, the conſpirators found moſt of their ſchemes diſconcerted. Robert attempted to paſs the Severn, but was prevented by Wulfſtan, biſhop of Worceſter, and Urſo, high-ſheriff of the county. Ralph de Gauder advanced into the neighbourhood of Cambridge; but being defeated by Odo and Godfrey of Coutances, the juſticiary, retired to his caſtle of Norwich, from whence he went over to France, hoping to obtain aid from king Philip, whom he well knew bore ill-will to William, notwithſtanding the late pacification between them; and by that means he was in hopes to cut out ſufficient work for William till the Daniſh forces ſhould arrive, and throw the balance of power into the ſcale of the confederates; however, theſe towering proſpects were ſoon overturned by the ſudden arrival of William in England, who having ſettled the affairs of his dukedom, embarked about the middle of this autumn, 1074, and, landing ſafely in England, by the vigorous meaſures he took, ſoon put an end to the conſpiracy. The earl of Hereford, finding that he was unable to make head againſt the king's forces, ſubmitted; and, by William's orders, both he and Waltheof, notwithſtanding his diſcovery of the plot, were committed to cloſe impriſonment. The Danes, who, under Canute, the ſon of Sweyn, and earl Haco, were upon the point of making a deſcent in favour of the conſpirators, finding William prepared for their reception, or elſe being bribed by him, laid aſide their deſign, and retired with their ſhips to the ports of Flanders, where Ralph de Gauder went on board; and, being joined by his wiſe and family from England, repaired to an eſtate that belonged to him in France.

A parliament was now ſummoned by William to meet at Weſtminſter, where the caſe of thoſe concerned in the late rebellion came under conſideration; and they were proceeded againſt with the utmoſt ſeverity. Of the inferior rank, ſome were puniſhed with the loſs of their eyes, others had their hands or feet chopped off, ; but no one act of William's drew upon him ſuch deſerved reproach as his treatment of earl Waltheof, who, notwithſtanding the proof of fidelity which he had given in diſcovering the plot, was tried for being an accomplice; and upon the information of his own wife, ſentenced to loſe his head. Lanfranc in vain exerted all his intereſt with William to ſave him; the ſtern Norman was inflexible, he was determined to quench even the ſmalleſt ember of rebellion with blood: beſides, as Mr. Carte ſeems not unjuſtly to have obſerved, his being an Engliſhman of great power and property, and Ino de Taillebois and other Normans thirſting after his eſtate, added to the wickedneſs of his wife, who wanted to get rid of him as an obſtacle in the way to another match ſhe had in view, all theſe things made ſo againſt him, that his innocence proved inſufficient to protect him from the malice of his enemies; and he was accordingly beheaded at Wincheſter, very early in the morning, on April 29, A. D. 1075. He was the laſt Engliſhman who retained any conſiderable power or intereſt in the nation. His corpſe was at firſt thrown into a ditch, but a fortnight afterwards it was removed to Croyland abbey, where, by the monks and abbot, it was ſaid to work miracles. William, who had good ſenſe enough to laugh at theſe idle ſtories, and to reſent them when made uſe of againſt his intereſt or will, was ſo much incenſed at the abbot that he depoſed him, and made Ingulphus, the celebrated hiſtorian, abbot in his room.

William, having thus cruſhed the conſpiracy, and ſecured himſelf by the exemplary puniſhment of the conſpirators, determined to turn his arms againſt Ralph de Gauder, and deſpoil him of his eſtate in Brittany. With this view he paſſed over into that country with a large army, a ſhort time after the execution of Waltheof, and laid ſiege to the caſtle of Dol, where Ralph then was, and who made ſo brave a reſiſtance on this occaſion, that William had it not in his power to effect his deſign againſt the place before Philip, king of France, marched to the relief of the beſieged, with a powerful army; and William, to his no ſmall vexation, found himſelf under the neceſſity of drawing off his forces, and returning, after an inglorious campaign, and with great loſs of men, to England; where, during the reſt of that and the following year, nothing remarkable happened, except a council held at London, to ſettle the precedency of biſhops.

But this vexation did not come alone; for ambition, more prevalent than the ties of blood and nature, occaſioned him new anxieties, and expoſed him to freſh dangers and difficulties, from a quarter whence he aſſuredly had the leaſt reaſon to expect them. In the beginning of the year 1077, Robert, his eldeſt ſon, called, on account of the ſhortneſs of his legs, Gambaron or Courthoſe, being privately inſtigated by the perſuaſions of Philip the French king, who promiſed him powerful ſuccours in caſe of neceſſity, called upon his father in a peremptory manner, to perform a promiſe he had made in the French council, when he was at that court ſoliciting ſuccours to carry on his expedition againſt England, that as ſoon as he ſhould be maſter of that kingdom, he would leave Robert in poſſeſſion of Normandy. It is certain, that William had made ſuch a promiſe, and had even renewed it in a dangerous fit of illneſs, declaring Robert heir to his hereditary dominions; but the diſreſpectful manner in which his ſon now reminded him of it, added to the natural diſlike we have to part with power when once in our enjoyment, made William return this anſwer: “ That he never uſed to ſtrip till he went to bed, and that his ſon ought to “ wait till his deceaſe.”

A reply of this kind could not but be deeply felt by one of Robert's temper, who was naturally turbulent, imperious, and reſtleſs, fond of power, and full of vanity; nevertheleſs, it is to be believed that he would not have proceeded to any open act of diſobedience, had it not been for the inſtigations of thoſe who deſired nothing ſo much as to ſet the father and ſon at variance; beſides, a trifling diſpute which happened about this time, between his brother William and him, and in which his father appeared to favor the former, ſo far inflamed his diſpoſition, that he broke out into open rebellion. The plauſibility of his claim to the dukedom, and the popularity of his perſon, ſoon gained him numerous adherents. His firſt ſtep was an attempt to ſurprize the caſtle of Rouen by night; but Roger Ivery, who had received ſome intimations of the deſigns that were hatching by the prince and his friends, had put the place in ſo good a poſture of defence, that Robert's project was rendered abortive.

William, apprized of this audacious attempt, immediately drew an army together, wholly made up of Engliſh, and paſſed over into Normandy, to put a ſtop to the proceedings of his rebellious ſon; and, with an expedition which is ſo peculiar to his character, advanced againſt him, and ſtraitened him ſo much, that Robert was forced to apply to the king of France for a place of retreat from his father's reſentment. This Philip readily afforded him, by engaging the Vidame Helie to admit the prince into Gerberoy, a ſtrong fortreſs in the Bovoiſis. Hither William followed him, and prepared to beſiege the place in form. While the operations were carrying on, a number of ſkirmiſhes happened on both ſides, which we ſhall paſs over, to take notice of that remarkable action which brought about a reconciliation between the father and the ſon. For Robert, having been joined by a great number of French noblemen and others, made frequent incurſions into the Norman Vexin and the Pays de Caux, levying contributions, and plundering the inhabitants with great cruelty. William, to put a ſtop to theſe outrages, took the reſolution to carry his approaches nearer to the place, in order to ſtraiten the beſieged, and keep them, if poſſible, within their walls. But Robert thinking it a diſgrace to be thus ſhut up within a town at the head of an army, drew out his forces, and gave his father battle. The diſpute was bloody and obſtinate; and William, dreading to ſee his dear-earned laurels torn from his brow by his own ſon, exerted himſelf beyond his ſtrength; and his horſe being killed under him, ſome ſay by an arrow ſhot from the arm of Robert himſelf, fell to the ground almoſt breathleſs, and being very corpulent and unwieldy with age, would certainly have been trod to death by the preſs, had not Robert, either by the ſound of his voice, or from a glimpſe of his face as he lifted up his beaver to get air, luckily recognized him. This ſight awakened in the breaſt of the young prince all the ſentiments of filial reverence and duty; he threw himſelf precipitately from his horſe, flew to his father whom he lifted from the ground with infinite tenderneſs, and then, caſting himſelf at his feet, implored his pardon for the difficulties to which he by his inconſiderate conduct had ſubjected the author of his life, and offered to lay down his arms and return to obedience. This generous behaviour, however, had no effect on William, whoſe ſoul felt the affront done him too deeply to forget or to forgive it; nevertheleſs, as he himſelf had been greatly hurt by his fall, and his ſon William Rufus was wounded, and that the fate of the day was evidently againſt him, he took advantage of this circumſtance to draw off his forces and return to Rouen. During his ſtay in this place, he was, by the interceſſion of his queen, reconciled to Robert: however, not caring to truſt him in his abſence, on the continent, brought him over to England with him, on pretence of ſending him on an expedition into Scotland.

With reſpect to the Scotch, it ſeems the preceding year, taking advantage of William's abſence, they had, on what pretext is unknown, harraſſed the northern borders, and, at the latter end of Auguſt of this year (1079) Malcolm, with a royal army, fell upon Northumberland, and ravaged it as far as the Tyne. The Scots had been the more encouraged to this attempt, as that country was then in a ſtate of confuſion; but Robert marching againſt them, the Scots thought proper to retire, when a treaty was ſoon after concluded between the two kingdoms.

On Robert's return to court, William behaved to him with great indifferency, which determined that prince to travel; accordingly he ſet out A. D. 1080, and continued for the five ſubſequent years rambling from court to court, and ſquandering away whatever money he could procure in the company of Robert de Beleſme, a diſſolute young nobleman. At length he fixed his reſidence in France, where he continued till the death of his father.

A. D. 1081. William obliged the Welch to pay an annual tribute to England, on account of ſome incurſions which they had lately made into the Engliſh territories. Towards the latter end of this year, William laid the foundation of the Tower of London, which, ſays a late author, "ſome writers, over fond of " antiquity, will have to have been originally " founded by Julius Cæſar, but it would be very dif" ficult for them to prove that Cæſar ever was at " London, and ſtill more ſo to prove, that he under" took this work, ſince we do not find the leaſt men" tion of it in his commentaries, and certainly he " never would have omitted ſo material a fact."

Peace was now entirely re-eſtabliſhed, as the Engliſh were effectually ſubdued, and the greater part of all the eſtates in the kingdom poſſeſſed by Normans; ſo that, according to the emphatical expreſſion of William of Malmeſbury, "England was become an ha" bitation and dominion of ſtrangers." This interval of tranquillity enabled William to finiſh a ſurvey of the kingdom, begun by Edward the Confeſſor. In this ſurvey an account was taken of all the lands in England, their extent in each diſtrict, their value, their quality, and the number of the tenants, cottagers, freemen, ſockmen, and villeins, ſlaves; black cattle, ſheep, hogs, cattle for draught, and other animals, with the names of thoſe to whom they belonged; and the number of mills and fiſheries. This work was ſix years in compiling; and was at firſt called, The Roll of Wincheſter, becauſe originally kept in that cathedral; but it was afterwards named Domboc, or Domeſday-book, becauſe there was no appeal from its authority; its evidence was deciſive. It is ſtill preſerved in the exchequer by the chamberlain, and conſiſts of two books, a larger and a leſſer one.

During the time that the proper commiſſioners were engaged in making the above-mentioned ſurvey, William, in A. D. 1082, viſited his Norman dominions, and, during his abſence, a very remarkable affair was tranſacting in England. Odo, his uterine brother, biſhop of Bayeaux, and earl of Kent, who, from being chief juſticiary of the kingdom, and generally regent during William's abſence, had amaſſed immenſe ſums, by the moſt illegal and oppreſſive methods; and, from an idle prediction, made by ſome itinerant aſtrologer, that Gregory, who then filled the papal chair, would ſhortly die, and be ſucceeded by one Odo, reſolved to employ his treaſure in obtaining the papacy. Accordingly, he now purchaſed a magnificent palace at Rome, furniſhed it in the moſt ſuperb manner, and employed a number of agents in that city, to engage the cardinals, and other great men, to favor him at the next election: but judging his preſence would be neceſſary to inſure the ſucceſs of his deſigns, he propoſed to withdraw privately from the kingdom, and repair to Rome, where he intended to reſide, till the death of Gregory ſhould leave vacant the papal throne. He took all his meaſures with the utmoſt ſecrecy, and even perſuaded Hugh d'Avranches, earl of Cheſter, as well as ſeveral others of his tenants and partizans, to follow him into Italy, promiſing to beſtow on them more conſiderable eſtabliſhments in that country.

But theſe ſiniſter proceedings were not, however, ſo effectually concealed as Odo imagined. William received intelligence of the deſign, and juſtly apprehending, that both himſelf and his kingdom might ſuffer for this chimerical project of his brother, he determined to cruſh the aſpiring hopes of Odo, who had now repaired to the Iſle of Wight, where he propoſed to embark for Italy. William accordingly ſailed immediately to that iſland, and commanded his followers to ſeize the biſhop's perſon; but they were ſo impreſſed with his character as a prieſt, and his power as a nobleman, that William could not prevail on them to lay hands on Odo, who ſtrongly inſiſted on his ſacred function, and that he was accountable to no power on earth but that of the pope. William, who well knew how to diſtinguiſh on ſuch occaſions, ſeeing the arrogance of his brother, and the timidity of his own followers, boldly ſeized the delinquent himſelf, telling him, that he was determined to bring him to juſtice, not as biſhop of Bayeaux, but as earl of Kent. This diſtinction reconciled his ſervants to their duty; Odo was ſeized, tried, and convicted of extortion in matters of government, and of ſeducing the great peers of the realm to leave the kingdom. Upon which his eſtates and treaſures were confiſcated, and himſelf ſent priſoner to Rouen, where he continued till the death of the conqueror, notwithſtanding all the efforts of pope Gregory, who had recourſe to both flattery and threatenings in his behalf. This ſpirited behaviour of William did infinite honor to his adminiſtration, in the opinion of all the chriſtian princes, who were then very little better than ſlaves to the Roman pontiff.

William did not return to Normandy ſo ſoon as he intended, on account of an epidemical diſorder which broke out at this time in that dukedom. In order, therefore, to amuſe himſelf during this conſtrained abſence from his native country, in favour of which he was warmly prepoſſeſſed, he ſpent great part of his time in hunting, a diverſion of which he was fond to infatuation; and the meaſures he took to gratify that paſſion were at once abſurd and tyrannical. Not contented with thoſe large foreſts, poſſeſſed by former kings, in different parts of England, he reſolved to make a new foreſt near Wincheſter, the uſual place of his reſidence, without diminiſhing his own revenue. Accordingly he laid waſte the county of Hampſhire, for an extent of thirty miles, expelling the inhabitants from their houſes, ſeizing their property, and even demoliſhing the churches and convents, without making the unhappy ſufferers the leaſt compenſation for the injury. This cruel tranſaction gave riſe to ſeveral bitter invectives from the ſufferers, who ſtiled him the father of wild beaſts: but he was ſo far from endeavouring to conciliate the minds of his people, by acts of kindneſs and benevolence, that he enacted the moſt rigorous laws relating to foreſts, claiming an abſolute right over thoſe diſtricts, and forbidding all his ſubjects, under the moſt ſevere penalties, from hunting in any of them, without his expreſs permiſſion. Laws like theſe could not fail of being conſidered as oppreſſive both by his Norman and Engliſh ſubjects, particularly by the nobility, who were now deprived of purſuing their favorite diverſion, the only one they could have recourſe to in that illiterate age, for paſſing away the tedious hours. Theſe and many ſimilar oppreſſions which the Engliſh ſuffered under this prince, ſufficiently demonſtrated, that their complaints were not without foundation, though perhaps their impatient behaviour might ſometimes exaſperate William to have recourſe to harſher meaſures than he would have purſued, had they ſeemed more ſubmiſſive.

Hiſtorians likewiſe aſſert, that William even endeavoured to aboliſh the Engliſh tongue and introduce his own in its place. He did not, indeed, dare abſolutely to abrogate the laws of Edward the Confeſſor, but he introduced divers alterations in the modes of adminiſtering juſtice. He ordered all the laws to be publiſhed in the Norman tongue; and no other was heard at court. He erected ſchools in all the towns and boroughs of the kingdom, the maſters whereof were Normans, and taught in that language; and all parents were commanded to ſend their children to theſe ſeminaries, under ſevere penalties.

Add to this, A. D. 1084, he impoſed a tax in England of no leſs than ſix ſhillings upon every hide of land, which was three times as much as Danegelt uſed to be. This brought a prodigious ſum of money into his coffers; and one would be tempted to think that William had acted from ſome ſecret preſage, ſince he ſoon found occaſion to employ the monies he had thus raiſed, in preparations againſt an invaſion he was threatened with from Denmark, which happened in the year following.

William was, in the latter end of the autumn, called over into Normandy, by the ſickneſs of his queen Matilda, or Maud, of whom he was tenderly fond, and who reſigned her breath in his arms ſoon after his arrival. He was ſo much afflicted at her death, that he abſtained from his uſual diverſions for ever after. Her funeral he celebrated with great magnificence in the nunnery of the Holy Trinity, at Caen, where he himſelf was afterwards buried.

Much about this time an inſurrection broke out in le Maine, and was fomented by the nobility, who were not reconciled to the Norman government. Theſe diſturbances laſted upwards of three years, and many perſons of noble birth and exemplary valor loſt their lives on both ſides, till at length William, finding he could not quell the diſaffected party by force, made a treaty with the chief of them, by which matters were again ſettled on a quiet footing. But from William's known military ſkill, and the great number of veteran troops he had at his command, there is the greateſt reaſon to believe that he would have reduced the inſurgents much ſooner to obedience, had he not been called off the very next year after his going over to Normandy, by advices that the Danes were actually ready to make a deſcent upon England with a ſtrong naval armament, which was to be joined by the forces of Robert, earl of Flanders.

Upon the firſt notice of the ſtorm that threatened him, William croſſed over to England with a numerous army of mercenaries from Spain, France, and Germany, well knowing that he could expect little aſſiſtance from the Engliſh whom he had lately governed with ſuch an iron ſway; on the contrary, he dreaded, with reaſon, that they would by a general inſurrection favor the attempts of the enemy.

The king of Denmark was no ſooner ſettled on the throne than he began to form a deſign of aſſerting his right to the crown of England, which his predeceſſors had always kept alive ſince the firſt conqueſt of this kingdom by Canute the Great. In this preſent deſign, however, the Dane appears to have been guided chiefly by the inſtigation of his father-in-law, the earl of Flanders, between whom and William, it is neceſſary to obſerve, there had for ſome time been an animoſity, and who promiſed to aſſiſt in the expedition with all his forces. The preparations made by Canute on this occaſion were very extraordinary, and had taken him up no leſs than two years. He had a formidable fleet, amounting to near a thouſand ſail, on board of which he embarked a prodigious quantity of warlike ſtores, with proviſions ſufficient for the maintenance of an hundred thouſand men. He had aſſembled all his forces, and his fleet lay ready to ſail, when William returned to his Engliſh dominions and took thoſe precautions we have already related. Whether the knowledge of theſe, or the diſagreement between himſelf and his brother Olaus, as ſome hiſtorians affirm, or elſe a mutiny among his ſailors, might be the occaſion, it ſo happened, that Canute was obliged to abandon his deſigns againſt England, and William was rid of an enemy, of whom he was peculiarly apprehenſive on account of his connections and intereſt with the natives of this iſland. When he had certain intelligence that the Daniſh expedition was laid aſide, he diſbanded one half of his troops, but kept the remainder together till winter, to prevent a ſurprize.

The enſuing year, A. D. 1086, according to Florence of Worceſter and others, it was that the king knighted his ſon Henry, at Weſtminſter, in Whitſun-week; and on this occaſion ſummoned all his prelates, nobility, and the moſt conſiderable of his military tenants throughout the kingdom, to attend him, on the firſt of Auguſt, at Saliſbury, there to take an oath of fidelity to him before his intended voyage to Normandy, and at the ſame time obliged them to enter into an aſſociation to defend his perſon and government againſt all attempts of his enemies. No ſooner was this ceremony performed than he gave them a ſpecimen of what they were to expect from the engagements they had ſo lately entered into; for while he was waiting in the Iſle of Wight for a fair wind, he iſſued out his warrants for levying money upon his ſubjects, on account of the order of knighthood he had conferred on Henry, it being a Norman cuſtom to make their prince preſents when he knighted any of his ſons; and this cuſtom was too flattering to William's avaricious diſpoſition not to be introduced by him into England on the very firſt opportunity.

At length departing for Normandy, he took Edgar Atheling with him, whom he ſtill looked upon with a jealous eye, notwithſtanding the conduct of this prince plainly ſhewed him to be diveſted of every ſpark of ambition, and fitted, both by talent and inclination, for the humble ſtate of a private nobleman, rather than the exalted dignity of an Engliſh monarch. Edgar, on his ſide, could not forbear entertaining ſome ſuſpicions of William; and knowing his fiery and revengeful temper, trembled for his own ſafety, in caſe his lordly keeper ſhould take it into his imagination that he was engaged in deſigns againſt his perſon or authority; he, therefore, applied to him for leave to go to the Holy Land, in company with Robert, the ſon of Godwin, to fight the infidels. This requeſt was muſic to the ears of William; he immediately conſented to his propoſal, and, to cover the joy he conceived at his removal, under a ſhew of regard to his perſon, he loaded him with preſents; and Edgar ſet out with a ſplendid equipage, and accompanied by two hundred Engliſh gentlemen, who, having been deprived of their eſtates in their own country, reſolved to try their fortunes in other climes. At the ſame time Edgar's unmarried ſiſter, Chriſtina, who had all along lived with him, in order to remove every cauſe of jealouſy from William, took the veil in the monaſtery of Bermondſey.

A. D. 1087 was remarkable for a dreadful famine which raged in England, and was one of the melancholy conſequences of that general deſpondency which had ſeized on the oppreſſed Engliſh, who, having no longer any property they could call their own, loſt the ſpirit of induſtry, neglected the culture of the lands, as they knew they worked only for others, and thought that ſcarcity was at leaſt as tolerable an evil as ſlavery: this univerſal neglect begat famine, famine diſeaſes, and both of them jointly, mortality; ſo that an incredible number died in the ſpace of a few months. To add to their calamities, almoſt all the chief cities in England were, at different times, partly conſumed by fire, amongſt which the greateſt part of London, and the cathedral of St. Paul were burnt.

Dreadful as theſe diſaſters were, they ſeem to have made little impreſſion upon the heart of William, for we do not find him remitting any part of the burthens he had laid upon his people; on the contrary he began to make preparations for invading the dominions of Philip, king of France, on ſome diſputes which had happened between them. Raiſing, therefore, a great army, of ſuch who choſe rather to die by the ſword in any country, than periſh by want in their own, he entered the Iſle of France, which he waſted for ſome time in a furious manner; but finding himſelf oppreſſed with years and corpulence, he accepted certain propoſals of peace made to him by Philip. But ſoon after falling ill, he was conſtrained to keep his bed at Rouen: the news of this being carried to Philip, he, who had ſo lately ſpoke the language of a ſuppliant, now gave a looſe to the moſt unmanly exultation; and William having been adviſed to go through a courſe of phyſic in order to reduce his corpulency, which detained him longer than he either expected or intended, Philip one day aſked, in a ſcoffing manner, "Whether the good woman of England was ſtill in the ſtraw?" which unſeaſonable ſarcaſm being reported to William, it raiſed all his indignation, and he ſwore by the brightneſs and reſurrection of God, that, as ſoon as he was on foot again, he would preſent the taunting French-man with ſuch a number of candles as ſhould make his reſidence too hot for him to continue in it.

At length reſentment getting the better of his diſtemper, about Auguſt William was able to take the field; and putting himſelf at the head of a great army, he re-entered France, where he left no kind of ravage uncommitted, in order to fulfil the promiſe he had made: towns and churches, the nobleman's palace, and the labourer's hut, alike felt his fury; and death, deſolation, and flames, marked his progreſs whereſoever he went. The city of Mantes particularly experienced his rage; for having made himſelf maſter of it, he gave directions that it ſhould be burnt to the ground, and during the conflagration, rode about the ſtreets in a kind of triumphant exultation.

But his triumph was of no long continuance; his horſe, terrified by the ſmoking ruins, ſuddenly ſtarted aſide, and bruiſed his belly againſt the pommel of the ſaddle. A rupture attended by a fever was the conſequence. He was carried to Rouen; and ſenſible that his end was approaching, he was ſtruck with remorſe for the many violences and cruelties he had committed to ſatisfy the cravings of an unbounded ambition. He laviſhed donations on churches and monaſteries, and practiſed all the external acts of religion, which in that bigotted age were conſidered as the higheſt, and moſt powerful acts of religion. He gave Normandy and Maine to Robert his eldeſt ſon, and named William his ſecond ſon, as his ſucceſſor to the crown of England. Henry, his youngeſt ſon, he left only the portion of his mother Matilda; but foretold, that he ſhould one day ſucceed to the undivided inheritance of his father, and ſurpaſs his brothers in power, in prudence and in riches. He paid the debt of nature on the ninth of September, A. D. 1087, in the ſixty-firſt year of his age, the 52d of his reign over the Normans, and the 21ſt of his reign over the Engliſh.

As ſoon as his attendants perceived that the ſtroke of death was over, and had heard the groan of expiration, they immediately deſerted the lifeleſs body to plunder his coffers and ſeize on his valuable effects. They even ſtripped his corpſe of the rich mantle with which it was covered, and left the remains of this mighty conqueror, whoſe nod had decided the fate of thouſands, naked and expoſed. A country gentleman beheld this ſcene of rapacity, and was touched with compaſſion. He cauſed the body to be embalmed at his own expence, and made the neceſſary preparations for interring it in the church of St. Stephen in Caen, purſuant to William's own requeſt. The proceſſion was awfully ſolemn, and an elegant funeral oration was pronounced by Gilbert, biſhop of Evreux, who, with ſix other prelates, attended this mournful ceremony. But juſt as they were going to depoſit the body in the earth, one Anſelm Fitz-Arthur, a Norman gentleman, preſſed forward through the croud, and with an audible voice, forbad the prelates to inter the body. "That ſpot," ſaid he, "was once the floor "of my father's houſe, which was unjuſtly ſeized by "William, who I now ſummon before the tribunal "of the moſt High, to anſwer for that flagrant act of "tyrannical oppreſſion." The people trembled, and the biſhops were ſtruck with terror at the ſolemnity of this invocation. At laſt it was agreed to give thirty ſols for leave to bury the royal body, and Henry promiſed, if his claim ſhould appear to be well founded, to make him a reaſonable ſatisfaction for the eſtate of which he had been deprived.

Such was the death of William I. who has been uſually diſtinguiſhed by the title of The Conqueror, the tracts of whoſe character may be thus marked. He had many ſhining qualities, but his paſſions rendered his virtues uſeleſs: his genius was great for conqueſt, but ſtill greater for command; and by ſeeking to live and reign over ſlaves, his life was unhappy, and his reign a continued ſeries of trouble. Both were without that even tenor of government, which diſtinguiſhes the father of a people from the tyrant. Glory, not virtue, was his aim, therefore power, without happineſs, was his reward; and when he went to the grave, his fortune was admired, while his memory was curſed. He was not, however, without private virtues: he was a tender huſband, an indulgent parent, and a generous maſter, when matters of ſtate did not interpoſe. His attendance at the ſacred ſervices of the church were remarkable and regular; and we ought, in charity, to believe, that ſome of the many iniquities he was guilty of, rather flowed from the exigences of his ſituation, than the cruelty of his nature.

His majeſty, however, proves how little he regarded all laws, when they obſtructed his rapacious deſires; and how unlamented he died, even among his natural ſubjects, who were ennobled by his conqueſts, and rendered happy by his labours. And hence we may conclude, that true fame can only attend the memory of a prince, whoſe munificence is directed by wiſdom, his ſeverity by juſtice, and his conduct by reaſon. William undoubtedly poſſeſſed munificence and magnanimity, but was certainly deſtitute of equity and humanity.

With reſpect to exterior qualifications, he was of a graceful perſon, and had great dignity of aſpect; but towards the latter part of his life, he grew corpulent, and had a protuberance of belly, which appeared diſguſtful to beholders, and was diſagreeable to himſelf. His ſtrength was amazing, ſo that few men could be found who were able to draw his bow.

William had three ſons, viz. Robert, William, and Henry; he left Normandy and Maine to his eldeſt ſon Robert: he wrote to Lanfranc, deſiring him to crown William king of England. He bequeathed to Henry nothing more than the poſſeſſions of his mother Matilda; but foretold that he would one day ſurpaſs both his brothers in opulence and power.

Beſides theſe ſons he had five daughters, namely, Cicily, firſt a nun in the monaſtery of Feſchamp, afterwards abbeſs in the Holy Trinity of Caen, where ſhe died in 1127. Conſtantia, married to Allen Fergeant, earl of Britany. She died before William's expedition to England. Adela, married to Stephen, earl of Blois, by whom ſhe had four ſons, William, Theobald, Henry and Stephen. Agatha, betrothed to the king of Gallicia, but died on her journey before ſhe reached her bridegroom.

WILLIAM II. SURNAMED RUFUS.

SECTION II.

WILLIAM, ſurnamed Rufus, was his father's great favorite, and the ſon whom the conqueror deſigned ſhould ſucceed him on the throne of England. It is true that Robert, by the right of primogeniture, had a greater claim to that dignity, but the conqueror never loved him, and determined to the laſt to promote the intereſt of William, on which account he had always earneſtly recommended to the latter to make a friend of Lanfranc, archbiſhop of Canterbury, whoſe great power, he had no doubt would firmly eſtabliſh him upon the throne, and overcome the difficulties * which would certainly oppoſe him.

William, when he received the news of his father's death, determined to act conformable to the counſel of the deceaſed monarch; with this view, he repaired immediately to the archbiſhop Lanfranc, accompanied only by Bloet, the deceaſed king's chaplain, and Eudo his treaſurer.

The vanity of Lanfranc was highly gratified by this immediate application, and he inſtantaneouſly determined to attach himſelf entirely to the intereſt of William, for whom he had a natural affection, on account of his having educated him from his earlieſt youth. But although the confidence William placed in him, the love he had always borne him, and the gratitude due to the late king, whoſe deſire it was for William to ſucceed him, were ſtrong motives to incline him towards young Rufus, yet honor and a regard to juſtice were powerful conſiderations with him, and he would not abſolutely promiſe to eſpouſe his cauſe till he had firſt given him his oath, in the moſt ſolemn manner, "that, in caſe through his agency he ſhould obtain the throne of England, he would govern with equity and moderation, maintain the liberties of the people, and behave like a dutiful and obedient ſon to the mother-church." This promiſe being agreed to on the part of Rufus, the archbiſhop ſet himſelf heartily to work, in order to remove every obſtruction in his way to the diadem, and ſo very great were the eſteem and credit in which Lanfranc ſtood with the Engliſh, that in a ſhort time he gained over to his party the leading men of both nations; and, effectually to work upon the minds of the populace, a report was induſtriouſly ſpread, that William had reſolved upon a plan of government entirely different from that of his father; that he had a natural affection for the Engliſh, whoſe ſufferings he had often commiſerated, and was determined to alleviate, if ever it was in his power; and, in particular, that it was his intention to aboliſh the very rigorous laws relating to the game then in force; in fine, that he would be the reſtorer and defender of thoſe rights and privileges which his predeceſſor had wreſted from them. Thus much for the Engliſh. As for the Normans, they were taught to believe that their intereſts were inſeparably connected with thoſe of Rufus, and that they had no other chance for continuing in poſſeſſion of what they had got in England, but by ſupporting the cauſe of the young prince to whom his father had, in his dying moments, bequeathed the ſucceſſion.

* An excellent writer ſays, Rufus, at the time of his father's death, had many diſadvantages to ſtruggle with, which to any genius but his own, muſt have been unſurmountable. Addreſs without courage, could never have conquered them; and brutal courage, the only quality which our hiſtorians allow to this prince, without the moſt conſummate addreſs, muſt have proved ineffectual. He was the younger brother of a prince, noble, generous, and popular through ſufferings. He was the eldeſt brother to another prince of great addreſs, great courage, and ſolid wiſdom. He was beloved by neither, and deſpiſed by both. His father, whoſe darling he was, died hated by his own natural-born ſubjects, and this hatred fell ſtrongly upon his favorite: but theſe were not the chief diſadvantages Rufus had to encounter. He had a nomination, and that too little more than verbal, to a kingdom, the nobility of which, in another capacity, owed their allegiance to his eldeſt brother. The military tenures, by which they held in both kingdoms, rendered their duties to both incompatible. in caſe of any difference, ſince the ſame nobleman or knight, who was obliged perſonally to attend William, at the head of his tenants in England, was perſonally obliged to attend Robert, in like manner, in Normandy. Robert's right to Normandy was undiſputed, and undiſputable; but that of William's to England was diſputed and doubtful.

After all, it is imagined that William's deſign would have proved ineffectual, and theſe lenient and perſuaſive arts have failed of the deſired effect, had not the inactivity of Robert given them a force much greater than their own. Rufus owed the Engliſh crown to the indolence of his brother. Robert was ſo ſure of the affections of the people, that the ambitious deſigns of his brother gave him no uneaſineſs; and when his friends adviſed him not to truſt his intereſt wholly to precarious hope, probably founded on deception, but to croſs over immediately into England, and conciliate, by his preſence, the affections of that generous people; he anſwered, with a haughtineſs which nothing but the moſt ſuperlative vanity could inſpire, "That precipitation was unneceſſary: "the ſcepter was his undoubted right; the Engliſh "were his inſeparable friends, and would never pre"ſume to appoint a ſucceſſor to the throne in his "abſence." He was, however, for once, miſtaken, and became the dupe of his own vanity. Lanfranc's unwearied application in favor of Rufus, prevailed over the intereſt of an abſent prince; and William was crowned by that prelate on the ſeventh of September, which was only eighteen days ſubſequent to the death of his father.

In the mean time, Odo, biſhop of Bayeaux, the chief miniſter and favorite of Robert, jealous of the authority of Lanfranc, whoſe great abilities and high ſtation he envied, paſſed over into England, under pretence of ſoliciting the reſtitution of an eſtate he formerly poſſeſſed as earl of Kent, and which had been confiſcated by the Conqueror. He was received with great affection, and reinſtated in his former poſſeſſions. But the recovery of an eſtate was not the principal deſign of Odo's viſit: he intended to wreſt the ſcepter from the hand of Rufus, and give it to Robert, as the undoubted heir of the Conqueror. He according applied to ſeveral of the principal barons, and found them ready to ſupport the pretenſions of his patron, provided they could be aſſured of a ſufficient force from Normandy to ſecond their attempt.

Having met with ſuch ſucceſs in his intrigues, Odo ſent an account of the conſpiracy to Robert in Normandy, aſſuring him, that nothing but his preſence, at the head of a reſpectable body of Norman troops was wanting, to recover that throne from which he had been excluded by the unjuſt caprice of his deceaſed father; and Robert, though of an indolent diſpoſition, had a ſoul not inſenſible to the call of ambition: he received this news with great ſatisfaction, and informed Odo, that as ſoon as his friends were in a condition to declare in his favor, they might depend upon being powerfully aſſiſted by an invaſion from Normandy, upon which the conſpirators repaired to their reſpective caſtles, in order to make the neceſſary preparations for taking the field, expecting ſoon to hear, that the Norman army was landed in England. The biſhop of Coutances, and his nephew, Robert de Mowbray, ſtruck the firſt blow, by ſeizing upon Bath, Berkley and Briſtol, whence they made excurſions, and ruined eſtates of thoſe noblemen who had embraced William's party. Their example was ſoon followed by Roger Bigod, who raiſed a conſiderable party in the county of Norfolk, while Hugh de Grentmeſnil made himſelf maſter of moſt of the fortreſſes and ſtrong holds in Leiceſterſhire. The earls of Hereford and Shrewſbury raiſed the Welſh, and all their own tenants, at the head of whom they over-ran the whole country, between the frontiers of Wales and Worceſter. The behaviour of the good biſhop Wolſtan, on this occaſion, deſerves to be tranſmitted to poſterity. Though he had many perſonal cauſes of diſlike to archbiſhop Lanfranc and his clergy, he made private injuries ſubmit to the love he bore his country: he refuſed to admit the forces of the malecontents into Worceſter; and when at length he was obliged to ſubmit to the ſuperiority of numbers, and abandon the city, he retired into the caſtle, where he made ſo noble a defence, that he obliged the inſurgents to raiſe the ſiege, and retire with the utmoſt precipitation.

In the mean time William, fully ſenſible of his dangerous ſituation, endeavoured to engage the affections of the native Engliſh; and as that people were now ſo thoroughly ſubdued, that they no longer aſpired to the recovery of their antient liberties, and were contented with the proſpect of ſome mitigation in the tyranny of the Norman princes, they zealouſly embraced William's cauſe, upon receiving ſome general promiſes of good treatment, and of enjoying the licence of hunting in the royal foreſts. By their aſſiſtance, he was enabled to take the field, when he immediately entered upon action, by making an attempt to ſurprize Rocheſter, where he had been informed Odo, with a choſen band of the malecontents, had taken up their ſtation; but, on his arrival before the place, he not only found it in an excellent poſture of defence, but alſo that Odo was removed to Pevenſey, another of his caſtles. This was no ſmall diſappointment to William, who thought if he could ſecure the perſon of that arch-rebel, he ſhould ſtrike at the very root of thoſe commotions that diſturbed his reign: he therefore, leaving Rocheſter, marched to Pevenſey, where Odo had fortified himſelf, expecting the arrival of ſuccors from Robert. The king, without loſing a moment's time, cloſely inveſted the place, and carried on his attacks with ſuch fury, that Odo, ſeeing no probability of relief, and dreading the fatal conſequences that might follow an obſtinate reſiſtance, made an offer to capitulate; but William would hearken to no other terms than thoſe of ſparing his life, and that only on condition that he ſhould abjure the realm, and prevail with the garriſon of Rocheſter to ſurrender. Hard as theſe conditions were, Odo was glad to comply with them: he gave the king admittance into Pevenſey; and then, going along with an eſcorte, appointed by William for that purpoſe, he preſented himſelf before the gates of Rocheſter, ſummoning the town and thoſe within to ſurrender to the king at his requeſt. The garriſon of Rocheſter was at this time compoſed of the flower of the Norman party in England, with many other of the principal French and Engliſh nobility: Euſtace, count of Boulogne, was there alſo, who gueſſing the ſtate of affairs from the countenance of Odo, and that he acted only upon compulſion, got together a ſtrong party, and making a ſudden ſally, took Odo, and the perſons who were with him priſoners, and retired with them into the city.

This diſappointment did not damp the ſpirits of William, for on receiving information of the matter, he determined to ſeize by force what he could not gain the poſſeſſion of by treaty. In conſequence of which reſolution, he marched his forces thither, and ſat down before the city, which was ſo vigorouſly defended that he began to deſpair of ſucceſs; but an epidemical diſtemper having got among the beſieged, which carried off great numbers, they were at length compelled to propoſe terms of ſurrender, offering to take an oath of allegiance to William, and to ſerve him ever after with all duty and ſubmiſſion; but William, with a ſtroke of policy, affected for a while to treat theſe offers with great diſdain, by which he had opportunity of obliging thoſe of his party who petitioned for their friends and relations in the town: at length, ſuffering himſelf to be prevailed on by their intreaties, he gave the beſieged leave to enjoy life and limbs, but no manner of hopes that they ſhould ever be reinſtated in their fortunes. As to Odo, he found means to eſcape by ſhipping to Normandy, where Robert made him lieutenant of his duchy; but all his great eſtates and poſſeſſions in England were ſeized upon by Rufus, who diſtributed them amongſt thoſe who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their fidelity and ſervices.

All unſucceſsful attempts to overturn a government, revert with tenfold loſs upon the authors, and ſtrengthen in proportion the hands of thoſe in power. Robert's party was now entirely broken; and William, having no longer any thing to fear, thought himſelf at liberty to diſpenſe with the performance of thoſe promiſes which the former exigence of his affairs had prompted him to make; and the honeſt Engliſh, who, from their late ſervices, thought themſelves juſtly entitled to every reaſonable mark of favor from a king whoſe throne they had ſo loyally and bravely upheld, found themſelves cruelly diſappointed, by his enacting ſeveral rigorous laws concerning foreſts. Lanfranc could not behold ſuch proceedings in ſilence, but, with a becoming boldneſs, remonſtrated to him how very inconſiſtent they were with the ſacred promiſe he had made to him, when only a candidate for the crown. William's haughty ſoul was ſtung to the quick with this freedom of the archbiſhop's; but not judging it politic to break with a perſon of his great influence in the kingdom, he affected to laugh it off, by ſaying in a jeſting manner, "Piſh! man, doſt think kings can keep all their promiſes?" It was not long, however, before William was delivered of this too honeſt counſellor, who died within a few months afterwards, juſtly regretted by the good men of both nations.

The exhortations of this venerable man being no longer a check to the king's inclinations, he began to indulge himſelf without reſtraint in that thirſt for money-getting, which ſeems to have been the prevailing paſſion of his father and himſelf, but with this difference, that the firſt William always took care to keep his coffers well ſupplied againſt any ſudden emergency; whereas this prince, avaricious without frugality, ſquandered the immenſe ſums he drained from his ſubjects in idle expences, to gratify his own vanity, or ſatisfy the cravings of his favorites.

It was now that the kingdom felt all the weight of arbitrary power; the Engliſh were at once inſulted and oppreſſed: even the privileges of the church, ſo ſacred in early times, proved a feeble rampart againſt his uſurpations. Mitres and croſiers were put up to ſale, and the higheſt bidder was ſure to be the purchaſer. Nor were theſe illegal methods ſufficient to ſatiſfy his avarice; the appointing of ſucceſſors to vacant benefices was delayed by this all-graſping monarch, that he might ſeize their revenues. The alarm occaſioned by this tyrannical adminiſtration was univerſal; but the terror of his authority ſtifled the voice of complaint.

A. D. 1090. Robert's ſupineneſs, which had loſt him the Engliſh crown, threatened alſo to deprive him of his Norman dominions. Robert was valiant, and at the head of an army prudent and intrepid; but he was a ſtranger to policy; he had no talents for holding the reins of government. The reſtleſs and independent ſpirit of his vaſſals was greatly increaſed by his looſe and negligent adminiſtration. The ſword of civil diſcord was drawn, and Normandy felt all the horrors of an inteſtine war. Robert had mortgaged the Contantin to his brother Henry for three thouſand pounds. Perhaps a leſs degree of natural affection never ſubſiſted than between the three ſons of William the Conqueror. Henry, fearful of loſing the dominions he had obtained, applied to William for aſſiſtance; and adviſed him to attack the Norman dominions of his brother, where he could not fail of the greateſt ſucceſs. Rufus, whoſe avaricious ſoul was never ſatiſfied, paſſed over to Normandy, at the head of a powerful army. Robert was in no condition to oppoſe his brother; he beheld with aſtoniſhment his towns ſucceſſively taken, and even the capital itſelf on the point of falling into the hands of the invader, by the treachery of the governor. He applied in vain to the king of France for aſſiſtance; that monarch was attached to the intereſt of William. Henry now ſaw his error, and trembled for his own dominions. He deſerted the party of Rufus, and joined Robert with an excellent body of forces. The two brothers arrived juſt ſoon enough to ſave the capital; and Robert, exaſperated at the perfidy of the governor, cauſed him to be thrown headlong from the battlements of the caſtle, when he was daſhed to pieces.

A. D. 1091. The king of England having thus miſcarried in his attempt upon Rouen, laid aſide his deſign of making himſelf maſter of Normandy, and returned to England. Perhaps he did not think it prudent to engage the combined army of his two brothers: a defeat might have been attended with the loſs of his crown. His tyranny had rendered the Engliſh ripe for a revolt, and they would gladly have joined the victorious army to hurl him from the throne. A peace was, ſoon after, concluded between Robert and William; by which it was ſtipulated, that on the death of either, without iſſue, the ſurvivor ſhould ſucceed to both dominions.

In this treaty, not the leaſt care had been taken of the intereſts of Henry, which ſo much exaſperated that prince, he retired to St. Michael's mount, a ſtrong fortreſs on the coaſt of Normandy, and infeſted the neighbourhood with his incurſions. Robert and William, with their joint forces, beſieged him in this place, and reduced his forces to great ſtreights for want of water. Robert hearing of his brother's diſtreſs, granted him permiſſion to ſupply himſelf, and alſo ſent him ſome pipes of wine for his own table. Being reproved by William for this ill-timed generoſity, he replied, "What! ſhall I ſuffer my "brother to periſh with thirſt? Where ſhall we find "another when he is gone?" The king alſo, during this ſiege, performed an act of generoſity, which was leſs ſuitable to his character. Riding out one day alone, to take a ſurvey of the fortreſs, he was attacked by two ſoldiers, and diſmounted. One of them drew his ſword in order to diſpatch him, when the king exclaimed, "Hold, fellow! I am the king of England." The ſoldier ſuſpended his blow, and raiſing the king from the ground, with great marks of reſpect, received a handſome reward, and was taken into his ſervice. Prince Henry was ſoon after obliged to capitulate; and being deſpoiled of all his eſtates, wandered about for ſome time, with few attendants, and often in great poverty.

Much about this period Edgar Atheling returned to Normandy from Paleſtine, and was kindly received by Robert; but Rufus, who entertained ſome diſagreeable apprehenſions of that prince, inſiſted on his brother's obliging him to quit his dominions, which he accordingly did; and William having ſeized upon the eſtates he held in England, Edgar found himſelf once more obliged to have recourſe to Malcolm, king of Scotland, to whom he repreſented his hard treatment, in ſo affecting a manner, that the Scot reſolved to revenge his cauſe on William, and to march at the head of a powerful army into England, in order to place him on the throne of his anceſtors. And accordingly, taking advantage of William's abſence in Normandy, he entered Northumberland, in May, ravaged the whole country, which was in a defenceleſs ſtate; and, having made a conſiderable booty, retired again into his own country.

On receiving the news of this invaſion, Rufus immediately made preparations to attack the Scots, both by ſea and land; but the ſucceſs of the war was far from being favorable to the Engliſh, for the fleet, which had been deſtined to make a deſcent on the Scottiſh coaſt, was moſtly deſtroyed by a tempeſt, ſo that it could effect nothing of any conſequence.

In the mean time, Robert, at the invitation of Rufus, came over from Normandy, to aſſiſt him in his land expedition againſt the enemy; and both brothers advanced with their joint forces as far as Scotwater, where they were met by an envoy from Malcolm, with this meſſage to William, "That as he neither did nor would acknowledge him as king of England, conſequently he could look on him only as the invader of his kingdom; but that if his brother Robert was with him, he was ready and willing to do that prince homage for Cumberland, as the eldeſt ſon of William I. his lord paramount."

The receipt of this meſſage induced William to call a council of war, to conſult upon the moſt proper meaſures to be purſued; when Robert de Mowbray, earl of Northumberland, a wiſe and experienced general, repreſented the neceſſity there was of coming to an accommodation, as the Engliſh were greatly weakened and diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, the enemy having ravaged the country ſo entirely, that there was neither forage for their horſes nor food for the men. Theſe ſage remonſtrances had the deſired effect, and Robert was pitched upon by the council to go to the Scottiſh camp with propoſals to Malcolm, by whom he was received with the greateſt complaiſance; and his offers being ſeconded by the perſuaſions of Edgar Atheling, whom Mowbray had ſecretly found means to perſuade that he would get him reſtored to his eſtates in England, and who had none of the ambition of a crown about him, Malcolm conſented to a peace with Rufus, on the following terms: that William ſhould reſtore to Malcolm twelve manors, which the latter had held under the firſt William, and pay him annually twelve marks of gold; and that Malcolm ſhould do homage to William in the ſame manner as he had done to his father. At the ſame time William was obliged to receive Edgar Atheling into favor, and reinſtate him in the poſſeſſion of his eſtates.

Affairs being thus amicably adjuſted between the two ſovereigns, though, it muſt be confeſſed, in a manner not very glorious to William, this latter retired, with the ſhattered remains of his army, to England. And now Robert thought it was a ſeaſonable opportunity to remind his brother William of the treaty that had been made between them, and to require to be put in ſeizin of the eſtates which were to be given him in England by virtue of that treaty. William, however, only amuſed him with flattering promiſes, without ſhewing the leaſt inclination to perform his contract; upon which Robert, in a pique, quitted England, and took Edgar Atheling with him.

Soon after William's return to England, he received the agreeable intelligence of the conqueſt of the county of Glamorgan and Morganwye, by Robert Fitz-hamon, a Norman, and his ſubject. The hiſtory of his conqueſt is a melancholy proof how fatally civil diſſention operates to ſubjection; and how dangerous it is for a prince to attempt to aſſert his right, by calling in a foreign power ſuperior to his own. One Jeſtyn, the ſon of Gurgant, poſſeſſed, as is ſaid, by rebellion, the territories of Glamorgan and Morganwye. A war breaking out between him and Reis ap Tudor, who was prince of South Wales, Jeſtyn, finding himſelf too weak for his adverſary, reſolved to apply to the Engliſh for aid. Accordingly he diſpatched one Enion ap Kadivor, his ſon-in-law, a nobleman of great intereſt in the country, to ſollicit aids. Enion applied to Robert Fitz-hamon, a warlike Norman, whoſe eſtate bordered upon Wales. This ſervice, of itſelf, being of too important a nature, he imitated the conduct of the Conqueror: he took along with him twelve knights, who were to ſerve under him, and ſhare in the profits of the expedition. Having ſtipulated with Enion what their pay ſhould be, Fitz-hamon and his twelve knights, with as many men as they could raiſe, ſet out. The names of the twelve were as follow: 1. William of London, or de Londres. 2. Richard Granvil. 3. Pain Turbervil. 4. Oliver St. John. 5. Robert de St. Quintin. 6. Roger Bekeroul. 7. William Eaſterling, (ſo called becauſe he was of German deſcent) whoſe poſterity were called Stradlings. 8. Gilbert Humfranvil. 9. Richard Siward. 10. John Fleming. 11. Peter Soore. 12. Reginald Sully. It was not long before both parties came to a deciſive battle on Black-hill, where Reis was killed by the Normans, and Jeſtyn remained maſter of the field. Fitz-hamon and his knights, ſoon after demanded from Jeſtyn their ſtipulated wages, which occaſioned ſome diſpute between the principal and his auxiliaries. Enion, who had made the bargain, was appealed to, and gave it in favor of the Normans. Fitz-hamon, glad of this handle, and allured by the fertility of the ſoil, made a new agreement with his knights, to which Enion was invited; and, all together, they reſolved to attempt the conqueſt of the country for themſelves. In this they ſoon ſucceeded, not ſo much through their own prowess, as through the civil diviſions then prevailing all over Wales. The country contained, in length, according to Stow, from Rimid-bridge on the eaſt-ſide, to Pallekinan on the weſt-ſide, ſeven and twenty miles; the breadth, from the haven of Aberthaw on the ſouth-ſide, to the confines of Brecknockſhire about Morley's caſtle, is two and twenty miles. The barren part of it was granted to Enion, and the fertile part divided among the twelve knights (whom he called his peers) and himſelf, on this condition: that they ſhould hold their land, in fee and vaſſalage of him, as their chief lord to aſſiſt each other in common, and that each of them ſhould defend his ſtation in his caſtle of Cardiff, and attend him in his court for the adminiſtration of juſtice.

When Robert returned to Normandy, A. D. 1092, he found his brother Henry in poſſeſſion of Danfront, a ſtrong ſea-port town in Normandy, which had been delivered into his hands by Robert de Belleſme, together with the whole province of the Contantin. William now thought proper to ſupport Henry ſecretly, not chuſing to appear openly in this conteſt; ſo that Robert found it impoſſible to reduce his brother, ther, or diſpoſſeſs him of the territories he had ſeized. Nor was this the only inſtance which Rufus gave of his inſincerity with regard to the treaty concluded with Robert: he was continually endeavouring to draw off the Norman barons from their allegiance, hoping to weaken his brother ſo effectually by degrees, as to be able to make himſelf maſter of Normandy with very little trouble, and no great expence.

In the enſuing year, the clergy were grown very uneaſy with regard to the long vacancy in the ſee of Canterbury, and renewed their ſolicitations to have it filled; but William, who entertained a hearty contempt for the whole order, diſregarded their remonſtrances, till the affair was likely to take a very ſerious turn, the clergy having long maintained a powerful influence over the common people. At laſt one of the nobility propoſed Anſelm, abbot of Bec, as a perſon of unexceptionable character, and every way qualified to fill the archiepiſcopal chair. But while this propoſal was under conſideration, William fell dangerouſly ill at Glouceſter: and, as none but the truly virtuous are truly brave, William betrayed, on this occaſion, all the ſigns of puſillanimity and terror. He had now recourſe to the prayers and counſels of that order of men he had always before affected to treat with contempt; while they, true to their grand principle, the acquiſition of power, embraced the preſent opportunity of improving the fears and terrors of the monarch, in order to gain their purpoſe. They ſucceeded, and the archbiſhopric of Canterbury was beſtowed upon Anſelm, who was then in England, on a viſit to his friend the earl of Cheſter. At the ſame time Robert Bloet, one of the king's chaplains, was created biſhop of Lincoln.

Rufus alſo promiſed Anſelm to reſtore all the revenues of the archiepiſcopal ſee, part of which had been given, at the death of Lanfranc, to perſons in civil employments. But his diſeaſe had no ſooner taken a favorable turn, and the king found himſelf freed from the immediate terror of a ſpeedy diſſolution, than he repented of the conceſſions he had made, and diſregarding, on his recovery, all the promiſes he had made in his ſickneſs, gave the clergy to underſtand, that they had taken unfair advantages of his weakneſs, and therefore countermanded ſeveral orders he had iſſued in their favor. Theſe proceedings gave occaſion to a conteſt between him and Anſelm, which proved the ſource of many troubles to the nation.

Upon William's recovery, Malcolm, king of Scotland, ſent ambaſſadors into England, to demand the performance of that part of the late treaty, which regarded the twelve Engliſh manors. William, inſtead of giving a direct anſwer to the demand, deſired that Malcolm would repair in perſon to him at Glouceſter, where juſtice ſhould be ſpeedily done him. Malcolm accepted the invitation, but was received in ſo haughty a manner by Rufus, that he returned in a tranſport of rage to his own country, where he immediately aſſembled a powerful army, at the head of which he entered Northumberland, and committed the moſt dreadful ravages. Robert de Mowbray, earl of Northumberland, collected what forces he could to oppoſe the invaſion, but could not prevent Malcolm's beſieging the caſtle of Alnwick, which had been ſeized by the Engliſh. Mowbray, unable to meet the Scottiſh army in the open field, came ſilently, by night, to the enemy's camp, and fell upon the Scots with ſuch fury, that both [*] Malcolm and his ſon were ſlain.

In the beginning of the year 1094, William paſſed over to Normandy with a ſtrong army: but, in order to give ſome colour to ſuch unnatural hoſtilities, he ſent to propoſe an interview with his brother, at which Robert made ſome propoſals that were rejected with great diſdain by king William. Robert then propoſed a ſecond conference, at which were preſent all the barons and great men who had ſworn to guarantee the treaty; but numberleſs difficulties being ſtarted in the courſe of the negociation, it was finally broke off, and both ſides prepared to purſue coercive meaſures.

William, ſoon after the commencement of hoſtilities, made himſelf maſter of ſeveral places, the governors whereof he had bribed, and flattered himſelf with the hopes of quickly ſubduing the whole dutchy. But the king of France, whoſe intereſt it was ever to keep the two brothers at variance, without ſuffering either to become too formidable, marched with an army to the aſſiſtance of Robert, and immediately changed the ſcene. The towns and caſtles, which Rufus had gotten poſſeſſion of, were reduced one after another, and garriſoned with a mixture of Normans and French: and the affair became ſo ſerious, that William found himſelf under the neceſſity of ſending to England for a reinforcement of troops.

Upon the receipt of William's meſſage, levies were made, and twenty thouſand men being raiſed, a general muſter was appointed at Haſtings; and as the men were to be employed in foreign ſervice, the ſeveral barons or knights, under whom they had been raiſed, furniſhed each man, in compliance with an antient cuſtom, with ten ſhillings towards defraying their expences during the campaign; this made in all the ſum of ten thouſand pounds of the money of thoſe times, equal to nearly two hundred thouſand pounds of the preſent currency. William, who had expended vaſt ſums in corrupting Robert's officers and governors, began to find his coffers almoſt exhauſted, and therefore put in practice an expedient to recruit them, that muſt call the bluſh upon the face of any private man of the leaſt honor, but ſtamps indelible infamy on the character of a king. He, either by the perſuaſions of ſome of his favorites, or of his own adviſement, diſpatched directions to Ralph Flambard, his prime miniſter and high-treaſurer, to get this money, if poſſible, out of the hands of the ſoldiers, and tranſmit it over to him in Normandy. The miniſter meanly complied with this order; and having cauſed the troops to be drawn up on the ſea-ſide, he there made a ſpeech to them, in which he told them that the king his maſter having more occaſion for money than for recruits, every man might be excuſed from the expedition upon paying the bounty-money he had received into his hands, for the king's uſe. The men, whoſe livelihood and that of their families depended chiefly on their labour, readily embraced the compoſition, and having paid their money to the treaſurer, the whole body was diſbanded, and the men had liberty to return to their reſpective habitations.

In Normandy, however, William's affairs bore but an indifferent appearance. Moſt of his towns were now reduced, and he himſelf ſhut up in the city of Eu, waiting for ſupplies from England. Robert had formed a plan for terminating the war, by attacking Eu, and taking his brother priſoner. In this critical moment William received the money, and well knowing, that the ruling paſſion of Philip, the French king, was avarice, he was perſuaded that he might be induced, by a handſome ſum, to deſert Robert's party. William was not miſtaken. Philip accepted the offer; and though he did not immediately withdraw his forces from Robert's army, yet he propoſed ſo many difficulties, and occaſioned ſo many delays in the operations propoſed by Robert, that no tranſaction of conſequence happened during the remainder of the campaign; and William was ſoon after prevented from proſecuting the war, by an inſurrection in Wales, which called him back to ſecure his kingdom.

[*] The Scotch writers give a different account of this tranſaction, for they tell us, "That the governor of the place, whoſe name was Morel, having demanded a capitulation, on pretence of preſenting the keys to Malcolm on the point of a ſpear, thruſt the weapon into his eye, and killed him on the ſpot. Edward, Malcolm's ſon, ſeeing his father fall, called out, Treachery! and prepared with his followers to revenge his death; but, being at ſome diſtance from their camp, they were all cut to pieces by the beſieged, who immediately on ſeeing the fate of Malcolm, and the motions made by Edward, ſallied out furiouſly upon him and his party. Thus fell the gallant king of Scots and his ſon, by one ſtroke of unexampled treachery.

On his arrival he found no difficulty in repelling the enemy, but was not able to make any conſiderable impreſſion on a country, guarded by its mountainous ſituation. He, therefore, contented himſelf with giving ſtrict orders to the wardens of the marches to guard the borders with the greateſt care, and to build ſtrong forts, in proportion as they gained ground on the enemy.

About the year 1095, ſubſequent to his return from the frontiers of Wales, William received advice that a conſpiracy was formed againſt his life, and that all his perſonal and political abilities would be wanting, to prevent the conſequences. The Normans ſettled in England were perſuaded that the conteſts, in which William was engaged on the continent, tended only to exhauſt England of her money and beſt troops; and conſidering themſelves as Engliſhmen, had formed a deſign, during William's abſence, of bringing about a total revolution in the government. At the ſame time, Robert de Mowbray thought, that his merit in defeating the Scottiſh army had not been properly rewarded. This nobleman, having great power and intereſt in the north, his diſcontent ſoon infected William count D'Eu, Richard de Tunbridge, Roger de Lacey, and ſeveral other noblemen and gentlemen.

The recent invaſions of the Scots were of great uſe to the conſpirators; they furniſhed Mowbray with a pretence for building ſeveral forts, filling magazines, raiſing troops, and making other military diſpoſitions, without giving the leaſt ſuſpicion of the real uſe intended to be made of theſe preparations. William, however, was perſuaded that this exceſs of public ſpirit aroſe from ſome private views, and therefore ſent ſeveral meſſages to Mowbray, requiring him to attend him at Wincheſter, to anſwer for his plundering four merchant ſhips, which had put into an Engliſh port under his juriſdiction. Robert, conſcious of his guilt, or vain of his ſervices, refuſed to obey the royal mandate. William, therefore, marched immediately againſt him; and Mowbray, being in no condition to give William battle, ſhut himſelf up in Bamborough-caſtle, which the king immediately inveſted. Mowbray knowing that the fortreſs, though impregnable, muſt, for want of proviſions, be forced to ſurrender, found means to eſcape from the caſtle. He repaired to Tinmouth, and endeavoured to corrupt the governor; but before he could effect his purpoſe, a detachment of William's army followed him, and took him priſoner. The caſtle of Bamborough ſurrendered, and the governor impeached all the conſpirators. Mowbray was ſentenced to be confined for life in Windſor-caſtle, ſeveral were executed, and the eſtates of the greater part of them confiſcated.

In the mean time, William count D'Eu was impeached by Geoffrey Baynard of high treaſon, in being privy to the late conſpiracy. He denied the charge, and offered to vindicate himſelf by ſingle combat; but being defeated by his antagoniſt, he was condemned to be caſtrated, and loſe both his eyes. His couſin William D'Alderi, was ſentenced to be publicly whipped, and afterwards hanged on a gallows thirty feet high. He ſuffered the whole puniſhment with the greateſt intrepidity, and, with his dying breath, declared himſelf innocent of the crime laid to his charge.

The famous quarrel between Anſelm archbiſhop of Canterbury, and king William, renders the year 1096 very remarkable, the particulars of which are as follow: William had ſome time ſince appointed Anſelm to the ſee of Canterbury, and as it was cuſtomary, at that time, for perſons raiſed to any place of dignity to make preſents to the king proportional to the value of the poſt; William, in conſequence, expected a very conſiderable ſum from Anſelm. But, to his aſtoniſhment, the prelate's offering amounted to no more than five hundred pounds. Enraged at this parſimonious gift, the king refuſed to take it, and treated Anſelm with great indignity. The archbiſhop left the preſence, carrying the money with him; and could not be prevailed upon to furniſh any aid towards the expences of government.

About this period a ſchiſm happened in the Roman church. Two prelates claimed the pontifical dignity. Odo, biſhop of Oſtia, under the name of Urban II. was acknowledged pope in Italy and France; while his competitor, Gilbert, archbiſhop of Revenna, under the title of Clement III. was conſidered as the ſucceſſor of Peter, by ſeveral of the European powers, and particularly by the king of England. Anſelm oppoſed his ſovereign. The haughty prelate diſdained to ſubmit to any temporal authority. He even determined to mortify William, and accordingly demanded leave to repair to Rome, and receive his archiepiſcopal pall from the hands of Urban II. adding, that he regarded him as the true head of the church. Provoked by this inſolence, William was with the utmoſt difficulty prevented from laying violent hands on the churchman; and Anſelm, perceiving that he ſhould not be ſupported by the prelates and clergy, retired out of the kingdom, when William ſeized immediately on the temporalities of the archiepiſcopal ſee.

It hath been juſtly obſerved, that ſuperſtition and enthuſiaſm formed two of the principal features of theſe times, and produced ſuch conſequences as have aſtoniſhed people of more enlightened ages. A monk of Picardy, known by the name of Peter the hermit, having made a pilgrimage to Jeruſalem, repreſented, at his return, in ſuch ſtrong colours, the outrages and oppreſſions exerciſed by the Turks on the Chriſtian pilgrims, that Urban II. conſidered him as a proper inſtrument to exhort the ſovereigns of Europe to undertake the conqueſt of the Holy Land. Peter was accordingly ſent from province to province, in order to rouſe the people to action.

While pope Urban II. perceiving that the ſtrong paintings of Peter began to produce the deſired effect, held a council in the open fields near Placentia, at which above thirty thouſand ſeculars, beſides eccleſiaſtics, were preſent. The project of invading Paleſtine was univerſally applauded; but none engaged in the enterprize. Urban, therefore, held a ſecond council at Clermont in Auvergne, where he made a ſpeech in the market-place, in which he expatiated on the miſeries ſuffered by the Chriſtians in the Holy Land, and painted, in the ſtrongeſt colours, the ſcandal that was daily offered to the Chriſtian princes by the Turks, in not ſuffering their ſubjects to viſit a city, where the great author of their religion had laid down his life for the redemption of the human race. This ſpeech, exactly calculated to the meridian of the times, produced the deſired effect. The Italians wept over the miſeries of the Chriſtians in Aſia; the French took up arms in their defence. That country was then peopled with a great many new lords, reſtleſs, independent, and fond of a life of war and diſſipation.

The pope promiſed them the remiſſion of all their ſins, and to open to them the gates of paradiſe, on the eaſy conditions of gratifying their predominant paſſion for war and tumult. No wonder that ſuch terms were readily embraced by a multitude of enthuſiaſtics. An infinite number of perſons took the croſs, and were ready to precipitate themſelves upon Aſia. Many even forgot, on this occaſion, the duties they owed to themſelves, to their families, and to their country. The glory of the undertaking baniſhed all other conſiderations. They reflected not on the fatigues, the obſtacles, and the dangers they muſt meet with before they trod the plains of Paleſtine. The churches and cloiſters made their advantage of this enthuſiaſtic madneſs; they purchaſed, at very low rates, many of the eſtates of the barons, who imagined that a little money and their arms were ſufficient for them to conquer kingdoms in Aſia. Every thing conſpired to fill their minds with the moſt chimerical ideas. The glory of the enterprize, the piety which it indicated, the advantages that might reſult from it to religion, the honor of extirpating the infidels, and the brilliancy of an eaſtern conqueſt, acted too powerfully on the minds of a ſuperſtitious people to be withſtood. The meaneſt lords of manors ſet out at their own expence, and the poor gentlemen followed them as ſquires.

Though this fanatical fury robbed Europe of millions of inhabitants, it had alſo its advantages. It tended greatly to eſtabliſh the peace of nations. Great part of the turbulent barons with their vaſſals were removed to a diſtance, and their eſtates reſted in the hands of more peaceable proprietors. The ſovereigns enjoyed their crowns, and the people their eſtates in more tranquillity: they were no longer alarmed with the fury of thoſe reſtleſs ſpirits that had often ſpread the horrors of civil diſcord over their reſpective kingdoms. The French monarchy recovered its luſtre by this enthuſiaſtic inſanity: the principal part of the large eſtates of the moſt opulent and powerful barons being purchaſed by the crown. But no prince gained more, or deſerved it leſs than Henry. Robert, his brother, infected with the enthuſiaſm of the times, and impatient to undergo all the fatigues of a holy war, took the croſs, and applied himſelf to make preparations for leading an army into Paleſtine. But he ſoon perceived that the revenues of his dutchy were too ſmall to anſwer this purpoſe: they were not ſufficient to enable him to appear in a manner ſuitable to his rank and ſtation at the head of his vaſſals. He had therefore recourſe to his brother, and mortgaged his dutchy for three years to Rufus, for the trifling ſum of ten thouſand marks. William raiſed the money by contributions on his ſubjects; and Robert, after putting him in poſſeſſion of Normandy, ſet out at the head of his vaſſals to gather laurels in Aſia.

By this occurrence and acceſſion of territory, which happened in the year 1099, William was conſidered as one of the moſt powerful princes of his time. England and Normandy were once more united, and the many contentions that had ſubſiſted between the barons of the two provinces entirely laid aſide. Both were ſubjects to William, and both felt the weight of his tyranny. But notwithſtanding the great power of Rufus, a ſingle baron dared to ſet that power at defiance. Helie, earl of la Fleche, a ſmall town in Anjou, alarmed the monarch of England. That nobleman made ſo many inroads into William's dominions, and ſtruck ſuch terror into the inhabitants, bordering on his dominions, that Rufus was obliged to croſs the ſeas ſeveral times, in order to drive him out of his territories. But Helie was not to be intimidated; he embraced the firſt opportunity of William's abſence to renew his incurſions, and this year laid ſiege to the city of Mans. William was hunting in the new foreſt when he received advice of this tranſaction; when, turning to his attendants, he aſked them in what direction the city of Mans lay from them. He was immediately anſwered, and turning his horſe's head towards the place, rode full ſpeed to the ſea ſide, calling to thoſe that were about him, "Let him that loves me, follow me." Dartmouth was the firſt ſea-port town, and there they found only an old and crazy veſſel, which William entered notwithſtanding all the perſuaſions of his attendants to the contrary. The maſter of the veſſel declared, that the tempeſtuous weather rendered it madneſs to put to ſea, it was nothing leſs than running into unavoidable deſtruction. "Set ſail, replied William; didſt " thou ever hear of a king that was drowned?" None daring to diſpute his peremptory command, he arrived next morning at Barfleur in France. He then diſpatched ſummonſes through all Normandy, for his officers to repair to his ſtandard at Mans; but the enemy, ſurprized at this prodigious diſpatch, raiſed the ſiege, after a few ſkirmiſhes, and made a precipitate retreat, in which the earl of Fleche was taken priſoner. Being brought into William's preſence, the latter could not help reproaching him for his conduct, not without a mixture of inſult. But the earl fiercely replied, "That he had but little cauſe for " triumph, for an advantage owing not to valor, but " to fortune. Were I but at liberty once more, con" tinued he, I know what I ſhould do." William was glad of this opportunity to make amends for his inſult on ſo brave a man: "And what would you do, " ſir, ſaid he, were you at liberty? Haſte! begone! " fly! you are at liberty to do what you will; and, " by the face of St. Luke, continued he, if ever it " ſhall be your chance to conquer me, I ſhall de" mand nothing for this favor." "His actions, ſays " Malmeſbury, equalled his words; and he diſmiſſed " his foe, with admiration of his valor, rather than " enmity to his perſon. William, continues the ſame " excellent hiſtorian, was not a man of letters, and " therefore we cannot ſuppoſe that, in this action, " he followed a like inſtance of magnanimity record" ed of Julius Cæſar, by Lucan. No, it was the " effect of his own generous, uninſtructed ſentiments; " they were ſuch as were born with him; but, were " there any ground for the Pythagorian transforma" tion, we might be tempted to believe, that the ſoul " of Cæſar animated the body of William."

William returned to England about September, after having reſtored peace and tranquillity to Normandy and Maine. Soon after his arrival the great biſhopric of Durham, which had been for ſome time vacant, was beſtowed upon Ranulph, who had long acted as firſt miniſter in England. This perſon, from a mean original, advanced himſelf by his eloquence and bold meaſures, to the office of lord ſteward of the kingdom, the moſt conſiderable poſt in England.

The ſame year is alſo diſtinguiſhed by the taking of Jeruſalem by the chriſtian forces. Robert, duke of Normandy, being the moſt illuſtrious adventurer, as well as the greateſt warrior in the whole army, was elected king of Jeruſalem by the unanimous voice of the confederate princes. But the great reputation he had gained in the fields of Aſia, filled him with the fond idea that it would now be eaſy for him to recover his dutchy, and even get poſſeſſion of the Engliſh crown. He therefore declined the ſceptre of Jeruſalem; upon which Godfrey of Boulogne, a prince of inferior rank, but ſuperior virtues, was elected, and while he lived, the city was governed with great juſtice and wiſdom. But there is ſufficient reaſon to believe, that Robert's declining this honor, was ever after attended with very fatal effects to his intereſt.

A. D. 1100. William, earl of Poictiers, and duke of Guienne, inflamed with the glory without being diſcouraged by the misfortunes which had attended former adventurers in the cruſades, had put himſelf at the head of an immenſe multitude, ſaid by ſome hiſtorians to amount to ſixty thouſand horſe, and a much greater number of foot, and propoſed to lead them into the Holy Land againſt the infidels. But wanting money to forward the preparations requiſite for this expedition, he offered to mortgage his dominions to William, without entertaining any ſcruple of that rapacious hand into which he was going to conſign them. Rufus, who deſpiſed and ridiculed the enthuſiaſtic madneſs of the time, had kept his kingdom free from thoſe bigotted expeditions; and, for ſome years paſt had been amaſſing large ſums, from a perſuaſion that he ſhould have an offer of making another purchaſe as valuable as that of Normandy. This offer of the earl of Poictiers convinced him he was not miſtaken, and William readily accepted the offer; agreeing to pay down the ſum demanded, provided he was put into immediate poſſeſſion of the eſtates. This being complied with, a great army was raiſed, and a powerful fleet fitted out in England, the king intending to carry over the money in perſon, and take poſſeſſion of the provinces of Poictou and Guienne, celebrated for their riches and fertility.

Theſe proceedings joined to the aſpiring ſpirit of Rufus, alarmed all Europe, then mad with religious rage, and weakened by unprofitable expences. A prince in the flower of his age, of great experience in war, of unbounded ambition in peace, maſter of England, and of the richeſt provinces of France, muſt have ſoon given laws to Europe; nor was it poſſible to ſee what was capable of reſtraining his ambition. But when every thing was ready for this important expedition, an accident happened which put an end at once to his life, and all his ambitious projects. He was engaged in hunting, the favorite, and indeed almoſt the ſole diverſion and occupation of princes in that rude and barbarous age, when ſociety was little cultivated, and the arts afforded few objects worthy of attention. Walter Tyrrel, a French gentleman, remarkable for his addreſs in archery, attended him in this recreation, of which the new foreſt was the ſcene; and as William had diſmounted after the chace, Tyrrel, impatient to ſhow his dexterity, let fly an arrow at a ſtag, which ſuddenly ſtarted before him. The arrow glancing from a tree ſtruck the king in the breaſt and inſtantly killed him; while Tyrrel, without informing any one of the accident, put ſpurs to his horſe, haſtened to the ſea ſhore, embarked for France, and joined the cruſade in an expedition to Jeruſalem; a penalty he impoſed upon himſelf for this involuntary crime. The body of William was afterwards found in the foreſt by the country people, and buried without any pomp or ceremony in the cathedral church at Wincheſter. His courtiers were negligent in paying their laſt dues to a maſter who was ſo little beloved; and every one was too much occupied in the intereſting object of fixing his ſucceſſor to think much about the dead ſovereign's burial.

In this manner, in the year 1100, fell William Rufus on the ſecond of Auguſt, in the forty-fourth year of his age, after a reign of twelve years, ten months, and twenty days. In his perſon he was of a middle ſtature, but appeared ſhorter than he really was, on account of his being very fat. His complexion was florid, his hair of a yellowiſh red, and one of his eyes ſpotted, which rendered it unlike the other. In bodily ſtrength he exceeded moſt men of his time; his manner of ſpeaking was diſagreeable, from an impediment in his ſpeech. His countenance was ſevere and his voice ſtrong, which he frequently exalted in order to intimidate thoſe to whom he was ſpeaking; though he was remarkably affable in private converſation with his nobles.

With reſpect to the character of this monarch, William's courage was ſuch that he thought it a ſtain upon his honor, if, on any occaſion, he was not himſelf the firſt who drew his ſword, or ſuffered the meaneſt of his ſubjects to ſurpaſs him in time of danger. His magnanimity declared itſelf on many occaſions, in a manner becoming the greateſt of princes. He was a profeſſed patron of perſons of merit, in all profeſſions, to whom his court was always open, and whom he always encouraged in proportion to their talents. He had the higheſt ideas of grandeur, and an extraordinary genius for architecture. But all theſe virtues were more than balanced by his vices. He was a violent and tyrannical prince; and a perfidious, encroaching, and dangerous neighbour. He was equally prodigal and rapacious in the management of his treaſury; and the abilities he poſſeſſed were ſo confined under the government of impetuous paſſions, that they were of little uſe in his adminiſtration; governing his whole kingdom by that domineering policy, which, being blended with courage and vigor, was well ſuited to the age.

We ſhall corroborate this character by what William of Malmeſbury, an accurate judge, and an excellent hiſtorian, ſays, of this monarch, "William Rufus, ſays that hiſtorian, was born in Normandy, long before his father invaded England. He was moſt carefully educated by his parents; and, by the pregnancy of his genius, he attained the higheſt pitch of power. He was, without all doubt, a prince not to be matched in his age, had it not been that he was overſhadowed by the greatneſs of his father's reputation, and was hurried off the ſtage of life before he had corrected the errors of unbridled power and overboiling youth. When he ceaſed to be a boy, his youth was ſpent in military exerciſes, in riding, ſhooting, in rivalling the old in judgment, aud the young in activity. He thought it a ſtain upon his courage, if, on any warlike occaſion, any one had a ſword in his hand ſooner than him; and if he was not the firſt, either to challenge the foe, or, if himſelf challenged, to fight him."

He again adds, "That William's exceſſes this way, were in a great meaſure owing to his neceſſity at the commencement of his reign, to get the army, at any rate, on his ſide, by great largeſſes, and greater promiſes. His performance of thoſe were punctual, till what was at firſt habitual became at laſt natural. Thus things with him were eſtimated not by the value, but by their price." Of theſe he gives an apt inſtance: "One morning, ſays he, as he was putting on a pair " of new boots, he aſked his gentleman of the bed- " chamber in waiting, what they coſt? He was an- " ſwered, three ſhillings. You ſcoundrel, ſaid the " king, did you ever hear of a king wearing ſuch " pitiful boots as thoſe? Go, bring a pair of a merk " of ſilver. The bed-chamber-man went, and brought " a pair much worſe; but told his maſter they coſt " what he had ordered. Ay, replied William, theſe " are boots fit for a king to wear! and ſo put them " on."

With reſpect to remarkable occurrences which happened, during this monarch's reign, we are told, that in the ſecond year after he came to the crown, a dreadful earthquake ſhook the whole kingdom, which was followed by a great ſcarcity of fruit, and ſo late a harveſt, that corn was not full ripe at the end of November.

On the 5th of October, A. D. 1091. A violent ſtorm happened in ſeveral parts of England, particularly at Winchelſcomb, in Glouceſterſhire, where the ſteeple of the church was thrown down by thunder and lightning, and the crucifix with the image of the Virgin Mary was broken to pieces; this hurricane was ſucceeded by a noiſome ſtench and thick ſulphureous air. On the 17th of the ſame month another ſtorm blew * from the ſouth-weſt, threw down above 500 houſes, and blew off the roof of Bow-church, n Cheapſide, London; and at Saliſbury, it not only deſtroyed many houſes, but blew off the ſteeple belonging to the cathedral.

And to conclude, A. D. 1094 was remarkable for ſo great a mortality of men and beaſts in England and Normandy, that the ground remained untilled, and a very ſevere dearth enſued.

William was never married, and conſequently left no legitimate iſſue; and hence the crown became conteſted between his two brothers.

HENRY I. SURNAMED BEAUCLERC.

SECT. III.

INTELLIGENCE of the death of William was immediately carried to his brother Henry, who, at the time was alſo hunting at ſome diſtance in the ſame foreſt. The idea of ſeizing the crown to the injury of his elder brother Robert, directly ſtruck his imagination; but at the ſame it occurred to him that nothing could ſo effectually facilitate ſuch a deſign as the immediate ſeizure of the deceaſed king's treaſures, which were depoſited at Wincheſter. He accordingly poſted away to that city with the utmoſt expedition to make himſelf maſter of the defunct's riches, conſidering them as the ſtrongeſt ſinews of war, and the greateſt ſecurity of peace. When he arrived at Wincheſter, however, William de Bretueil, a Norman nobleman, and eldeſt ſon to William Fitzoſbern, the favorite companion and general of the Conqueror, who was keeper of the treaſury, flatly refuſed to give Henry admittance, pleading in excuſe, that as he had ſworn fealty to Robert, who had the right of primogeniture, he looked upon himſelf as much bound in duty to own him for his liege lord, as if he was perſonally preſent; intimating at the ſame time, that this demand of Henry carried with it ſtrong marks of a treacherous deſign. This altercation was on the point of becoming very ſerious, and might have had fatal conſequences, had not Robert de Meulant arrived in a lucky minute with a number of the late king's attendants, and declared in favor of Henry, obliging Bretueil to deliver up to him the treaſures, the poſſeſſion of which was to Henry almoſt as deſirable an object as the crown itſelf.

The prince having now a ſufficient fund to reward the ſervices of thoſe who ſhould eſpouſe his cauſe, he ſoon found his party conſiderably increaſed; and in leſs than four days after his brother's death, his friends having aſſembled a council in London, of the principal nobility that could be gotten together at ſo ſhort a warning, Henry was, by the majority of voices, declared king; and the ceremony of his coronation was performed the following day (Sunday, Auguſt 5) by Maurice, biſhop of London, who had been one of the firſt William's chaplains. And thus, by a moſt ſurpriſing and unparalleled diſpatch (if not previouſly concerted) a total revolution was brought about in the affairs of the nation: a king in the flower of his age, and in the zenith of his power, was cut off by an inſtantaneous death, the cauſe of which was never judicially enquired into; the true ſucceſſion was ſet aſide, the treaſures of the kingdom ſeized by a perſon who had not the leaſt claim to them; and all this in leſs time than is commonly taken up to deliberate upon affairs of the moſt private concern, or of the leaſt conſequence.

Henry, immediately after his coronation, acted with great policy, for the ceremony was no ſooner over, than to ingratiate himſelf into the affections of the people, he ordered a charter to be proclaimed and publiſhed, to ſecure to them their liberties; which, on account of its great importance, and its having been the baſis of many other charters obtained from ſucceeding monarchs, we ſhall here inſert:

1. Henry's charter to all his faithful ſubjects.

Henry, by the grace of God, king of the Engliſh, to all his barons and faithful ſubjects, both French and Engliſh, greeting.

" Know ye, that, by the mercy of God, and by " the common counſel (with the (1) aſſent) of the " barons of the kingdom of England, I am crowned
" king of the ſaid kingdom; and becauſe the king-
" dom has been oppreſſed with unjuſt exactions, I,
" from the love of God, and the regard I bear you
" (all) in the firſt place, free the holy church, ſo as
" that I will neither ſell nor farm it out; nor, upon
" the death of an archbiſhop, or a biſhop, or an ab-
" bot, will I accept of any of the churches property,
" nor aught from any of its tenants, until a ſucceſſor
" enters upon the ſame. And I baniſh all the evil
" uſages with which the kingdom of England has " been (unjuſtly) oppreſſed, part of which evil uſages
" I here ſet down. If any of my barons, earls, or
" of my tenants, holding of me, ſhall die, his heir
" ſhall not redeem his land, as was the cuſtom in the " days of my brother; but ſhall relieve the ſame by " a juſt and lawful relief. In like manner ſhall the " tenants of my barons relieve their lands from their " lords by a lawful (certain) juſt relief. And if any " of my barons, or other my ſubjects, have a mind to " give a (their) daughter in marriage, or ſiſter, or " niece, let him treat with me; but I will neither
" accept any part of his fortune for ſuch licence, nor " will I prohibit his diſpoſing of her, unleſs it be to
" my enemy. And if any of my barons, or ſubjects,
" ſhould, at his death, leave a daughter his heir, I " will diſpoſe of her with advice of my barons, toge" ther with her lands. And if, upon the death of " the huſband, a wife ſhall ſurvive without children,
" ſhe ſhall have her (own) dowry and marriage-
" portion; neither will I give her to a huſband, but

* This was the very ſame point from which the dreadful tempeſt blew in the reign of queen Ann, and to which Mr. Addiſon alludes in his admirable poem, called the Campaign:

" So when an angel by Divine command,
" Spreads all his terrors o'er a guilty land;
" Such as of late o'er pale Britannia paſt,
" Calm and ſerene he drives the furious blaſt,
" And pleas'd th' Almighty's orders to perform,
" Rides in the whirl-wind and enjoys the ſtorm.

"with her own conſent. But if the wife be left with children, ſhe ſhall then have her dower and marriage-portion; nor will I give her to a huſband, but with her own conſent; provided the wife ſhall keep her body in chaſtity: and either the wife, or ſome other relation, who is to deal juſtly, ſhall be guardian of the children and the eſtate. And I command my barons, that they act conformably hereunto, towards the ſons, daughters, and wives of their tenants. The common mintage (2) money, which was taken throughout cities and counties, and was not in uſe under king Edward, I abſolutely forbid to be taken for the future. If any minter, or other perſon, be taken with falſe money, let right juſtice be done upon him. (3) All fines and debts due to my brother, I forgive; excepting my juſt farms, and thoſe bargains which concerned the inheritance of others, or for thoſe effects which juſtly concerned other perſons. And I forgive all bargains which any man has made with regard to his right of inheritance. And if any (of my barons or tenants) ſhall lie ſick, ſo as that he ſhall give or diſpoſe of his money, I will, that ſuch diſpoſition ſtand good; but if he, prevented by war or ſickneſs, ſhall not give or diſpoſe of his effects, let his wife, children or parents, or his lawful tenants, divide it among themſelves, as ſhall ſeem beſt to them. If any of my barons, or tenants, ſhall forfeit, he ſhall not give a pledge for favor of the (whole) fine, as he did in the time of my father and brother; but, according to the meaſure of the forfeit, ſo ſhall he be fined, in ſuch manner as fines were laid on, under thoſe, my predeceſſors, who reigned before my father and brother: but if he ſhall be convicted of treaſon, or wickedneſs, let him make ſatisfaction, as ſhall ſeem juſt."

2. Concerning the confirmation of king Edward's laws.

"I pardon all murders committed before my coronation; and thoſe which ſhall be hereafter committed, ſhall be ſatisfied for, according to the law of king Edward. I have by common conſent of my barons, retained in my hand the foreſts, in like manner as my father had them. I alſo grant, of my own free gift, to my knights (i. e. tenants by knight-ſervice) who defend their lands by their habergeons, that their demeſne lands ſhall be free from all unjuſt guilds or taxes, and all works (that their fidelity may be in proportion to my kindneſs;) that, ſince they are eaſed of ſo great a burden, they may the better provide themſelves with horſes and arms, and ſo be made fitter and more ready for my ſervices, and for the defence of my kingdom. I reſtore to you the laws of king Edward, together with thoſe amendments which my father made by the advice of his barons.

"If any one has taken any thing from me, or from any other perſon, he ſhall forthwith reſtore the ſame, without making ſatisfaction; and he, upon whom any ſuch thing is found, ſhall make ſtrict ſatisfaction to the owner.

"Given in preſence of the archbiſhops, biſhops, barons, earls, ſheriffs, and nobles of all the kingdom of England, on the day of my coronation."

N. B. The words incloſed within bracked, thus ( ), are the ſupplements taken from Matt. Paris, the Red Book of the Exchequer, the Rocheſter copy, and others.

There were as many copies of this charter as there were counties, and one of them was lodged in the moſt eminent abbies in each county; nevertheleſs, there was ſcarce one to be found in the reign of king John, whoſe Magna Charta was founded upon it. There is a copy at this day in the Red Book of the Exchequer, and Matthew Paris has given us a tranſcript of that which which was ſent into Herefordſhire, which has been tranſlated by Mr. Tyrrel.

This charter was not the only inſtance he gave the people, that he was deſirous of rendering them happy: he committed Ranulph, biſhop of Durham, the inſtrument of all the oppreſſions in the late reign, priſoner to the Tower, with an intention of giving him up to the juſtice of his country. The charge againſt him was, his adviſing the late king, whoſe confidence he had abuſed, to oppreſs his ſubjects with many unjuſt impoſitions. But the artful prelate found means of eſcaping into France, where he endeavoured to embroil England in trouble, ſince he could no longer direct the meaſures of its adminiſtration.

Henry being ſenſible of the great authority Anſelm had acquired by his character of piety, and by the perſecutions he had ſuffered from William, ſent repeated meſſengers to him at Lyons, where he now reſided, inviting him to return, and take poſſeſſion of his dignities. The prelate, at laſt, accepted the offer, and, upon his landing in Kent, was received with extraordinary joy and reſpect. But when the king propoſed to him the renewal of that homage which he had done his brother, and which had never been refuſed by any Engliſh biſhop, Anſelm gave an abſolute refuſal: declaring, that ſo far from doing homage for his ſpiritual dignity, he would not even communicate with any eccleſiaſtic who paid that ſubmiſſion, or who received inveſtitures from laymen. However provoked Henry might be at this behaviour of the haughty prelate, he thought proper to diſſemble his reſentment, and only deſired, that meſſengers might be ſent to Rome, to accommodate matters with the pope, and to obtain his confirmation of the Engliſh laws and cuſtomary privileges.

The prelate Anſelm had not been long in England, before an affair happened, which obliged Henry to have recourſe to his authority. Matilda, daughter to Malcolm, the third king of Scotland, and niece to Edgar Atheling, had, on her father's death, and ſubſequent revolutions of the Scottiſh government, been brought to England, and educated under her aunt, in the nunnery of Rumſey. This princeſs Henry propoſed to marry. She was not only accompliſhed with all that could render a woman deſirable, but unexceptional in point of intereſt; her uncle Edgar having no children, and the old Engliſh party conſidering her as the only remains of the Cerdic race, from whom they were to expect the continuance of that venerable line. But as ſhe had worn the veil, though never taken the vows, doubts might ariſe with regard to the lawfulneſs of this action; and it was abſolutely neceſſary for Henry, not to ſhock the religious prejudices of his ſubjects. Recourſe was therefore to be had to Anſelm, whoſe authority was deciſive in this particular; but the prelate would do nothing of himſelf. He ſummoned a ſynod to meet at Lambeth, where Matilda proved, that ſhe never intended to embrace a religious life, and had worn the veil, merely in imitation of a cuſtom familiar to the Engliſh ladies, who protected their chaſtity from the brutal violence of the Normans, by taking ſhelter under that habit, which, amidſt the horrid licentiouſneſs of the times, was generally revered. The ſynod, ſenſible that even a princeſs, could have recourſe to no other method for the ſecurity of her honor, admitted the plea as valid, and declared that Matilda was free from all religious engagements, and ſtill at liberty to marry. Anſelm, acquieſcing with his clergy, her marriage with Henry was celebrated by the archbiſhop, with the moſt ſolemn pomp.

During the interim, Robert returned from his eaſtern expedition, and took poſſeſſion of the dutchy of Normandy without oppoſition. On his return from the Holy Land, he paſſed through Italy, where he became acquainted with Sibylla, daughter to the count of Converſana, a young lady of great beauty and merit, whom he eſpouſed; and indulging himſelf in this new paſſion, as well as fond of enjoying eaſe and pleaſure, after the fatigues of ſo many rough campaigns, he lingered a twelve-month in that delicious climate. By this delay, he loſt the crown of England, which the great fame he had acquired during the cruſades, as well as his undoubted title, both by birth, and the treaty formerly made with his deceaſed brother, would, had he been preſent, have infallibly ſecured to him; thus did he a ſecond time prevent himſelf from being a king.

A. D. 1101. His arrival, though too late to aſcend the throne of England, without meeting with a powerful oppoſition, revived at once the hopes and fears of the Normans of his party, who had poſſeſſions in France. He ſaw himſelf, contrary to his expectations, prevented from ſucceeding to the crown of England, and complained loudly of the injuſtice of his younger brother. Robert de Belleſme, earl of Shrewſbury and Arundel, having ſucceeded to the great eſtates of his family, both in England and Normandy, was, at this time, one of the moſt conſiderable of Henry's ſubjects. His genius was enterprizing, his behaviour arrogant, and his principles entirely in favour of Robert. He was joined by his two brothers, Roger and Arnulf, William de Warenne, earl of Surry, Robert de Pontefract, Robert de Mallet, Yvo de Grentmeſnil, and many others of the principal nobility, who entered into an aſſociation, for inviting Robert to make an attempt upon England, and promiſed to join him with all their forces. Robert accepted the invitation, and applied himſelf cloſely to make preparations for invading England and aſcertaining his right.

Henry was greatly alarmed at the defection of ſo many of his nobles, and ſtill more at the great popularity of his brother, who was become the idol of the people, on account of his having ſo greatly contributed to reſcue the holy city of Jeruſalem out of the hands of infidels. Perſuaded of the power of popular bigotry, and dreading the conſequences of his injured brother's obtaining the crown, he had recourſe to Anſelm, whoſe ſanctity and wiſdom he now pretended to revere. He conſulted him in all difficult emergencies, ſeemed to be governed by him in every meaſure; promiſed a ſtrict regard to eccleſiaſtical privileges; profeſſed a great attachment to Rome, and a reſolution of perſevering in an implicit obedience to the decrees of councils, and to the will of the ſovereign pontiff. By theſe careſſes and declarations he gained entirely the confidence of the primate, whoſe influence over the people, and authority with the barons, was of the greateſt ſervice to him in his preſent ſituation. Anſelm became ſurety for the king, pledging his faith, that he would govern the kingdom, as long as he ſat upon the throne, by juſt and equitable laws. By this means, the king was in a condition to oppoſe the great intereſt of his brother, which had already induced many of the ſailors to declare in his favor, and even to carry over to him the greater part of a fleet, which had been fitted out to oppoſe his paſſage, and prevent his landing.

With a greater degree of aſſiduity than uſual, Robert ſeized this favorable opportunity to put to ſea with a fine fleet, and landed at Portſmouth about Midſummer, A. D. 1101. Immediately upon the news of his debarkation, Henry, who had a ſtrong army poſted at Pevenſey, on the Suſſex coaſt, advanced to intercept him in his march to London, and prevent him from being joined by ſuch of his adherents as had already ſhewed themſelves inclinable to eſpouſe his cauſe. Nothing could at this time have kept up the drooping ſpirits of Henry but the fidelity and ſteadineſs of Anſelm, who attended him ſtep by ſtep, and, with unwearied aſſiduity, harangued, flattered, and threatened by turns thoſe of whoſe attachment he was moſt doubtful, repreſenting in ſo lively a manner the heinouſneſs of breaking their oath of allegiance, that all the principal officers ſwore to a man to ſtand by their ſovereign againſt all invaders. To crown his labours in Henry's behalf, Anſelm publicly declared his intention to excommunicate Robert, in caſe he perſiſted in his deſign of driving his brother from the throne. Eccleſiaſtical cenſures were, at that time, more formidable to the vulgar, than the moſt powerful armed force; and Robert ſoon found that his party, inſtead of increaſing upon his arrival in vigor and numbers, daily grew weaker and dropped off. However, both armies continuing to march forwards, they came in ſight of, and encamped over againſt each other on a plain not far from Wincheſter, in which ſituation they remained for ſeveral days, without either ſide offering to come to action; Robert declining the battle on account of his not being joined by the reinforcements he expected from his friends on this ſide the water, and Henry, from an apprehenſion that his ſoldiers would fail in their fidelity in the day of battle, and, by going over to his brother, put him in danger of loſing his life and crown.

Thus were things ſituated, when the two brothers being equally deſirous to come to a treaty, many meſſages paſſed between them, and many propoſals were made and rejected on both ſides; at length, by the mediation of Anſelm, and ſome of the moſt prudent of the nobles in each army, an accommodation was effected on the following terms.

I. That the king ſhould reſign to the duke the Contantin, together with all the other places and ſtrong holds he was then in poſſeſſion of, in Normandy, excepting Donfront, which he could not cede without violating the oath he had given to the inhabitants when they admitted him into their town, that he would never give it up but with his life.

II. That the friends of each party ſhould have full reſtoration of all their lands and eſtates, both in England and Normandy.

III. That Henry ſhould pay to Robert the yearly ſum of three thouſand marks of ſilver; and that if either of the two brothers died without lawful iſſue, his demeſnes ſhould be inherited by the ſurvivor, as well in England as Normandy.

This agreement being ſigned and ſworn to by twelve lords on each ſide, as guarantees for its faithful execution, both armies were diſbanded, and Henry carried his brother Robert with him to court, where they lived together in the greateſt apparent harmony for the ſpace of two months, at the end of which term duke Robert took his leave, and embarked for Normandy.

Henry, being now delivered from his formidable rival, and firmly eſtabliſhed on the throne by the late accommodation, reſolved to take ſevere revenge on ſuch of the great men who had ſhewn themſelves moſt zealous in the cauſe of his brother Robert. Opportunities of being revenged are ſeldom wanting to thoſe who have the power in their own hands: accordingly, ſoon after the departure of his brother, he ſeized on the eſtates and perſons of Hugh de Grentmeſnil, Robert de Pontefract, and Rober de Mallet, on various pretences; but of all thoſe who had eſpouſed his brother's cauſe, no one was ſo particularly the object of his indignation and revenge as Robert de Belleſme, earl of Shrewſbury and Arundel, on account of his having openly (and, indeed, with an unpardonable imprudence) declared, "that Henry was an uſurper, and that it would be an eternal diſgrace to all, of the Norman or Engliſh nations, who ſhould permit, much more aſſiſt, him in holding the crown in prejudice of his elder brother." Accordingly Henry ſummoned this young nobleman to appear before him at his court, and anſwer to five and forty articles of impeachment which he publiſhed againſt him, the leaſt of which was ſufficient to bring him to the block. The earl, conſcious that, by his unguarded behaviour, he had given the king too fair a handle to ruin him, aſked leave for time to prepare his anſwer; which being granted him, he made uſe of the interval to fortify his caſtle of Shrewſbury, determined to defend himſelf to the laſt, rather than, by a tame ſubmiſſion, to encounter that fate which he knew was unavoidably prepared for him: at the ſame time he had recourſe to his friends in Normandy, where he had a great eſtate, and ſent his brother Arnulph to ſolicit aid from the Welſh.

A rebellious act of this nature gave Henry the moſt plauſible excuſe for effecting his total ruin. According he ordered him to be publicly proclaimed a traitor, for having refuſed to appear before his peers in the king's court when duly ſummoned; and iſſued out commiſſions for a general array of all the militia in England; and taking the field in perſon, went and laid ſiege to the earl's caſtle of Arundel, in Suſſex: but he found it ſo ſtrongly fortified, that he was obliged to turn the ſiege into a blockade. While this was doing, he ordered the biſhop of Lincoln to beſiege Teckhill, another ſtrong fortreſs of the earl's, lying a few miles from Doncaſter, while he himſelf advanced into Shropſhire, the greateſt part of which belonged to Robert de Belleſme. Here he attacked Bridgenorth, accounted the ſtrongeſt place in England, the earl, who was the moſt excellent engineer of his time, having exerted his utmoſt ſkill in fortifying it. This ſiege coſt Henry ſome time and trouble, and it is more than probable that he would have found himſelf baffled in his attempt had he not had recourſe to money to bribe the garriſon, which conſiſted of a body of Welch, under Cadogan and Gervith, the two chief princes of Wales. This method proved effectual, and the Welſh ſurrendered the place after having defended it three weeks. Almoſt at the ſame time Henry received advice, that the officer he had left before Arundel, had compelled that caſtle to ſurrender; and that the biſhop of Lincoln had proved no leſs ſucceſsful in his operations againſt Teckhill, ſo that Shrewſbury was now the only place of any conſequence left in the hands of Robert: the roads to it were bad, narrow, and very fatiguing to an army in its march, the country being over-grown with thick woods, which the enemy had lined with archers to gall the ſoldiers in their paſſage; but Henry, with admirable preſence of mind, employing his men in cutting down the woods and opening the roads, ſoon got over theſe difficulties.

The deſperate ſituation of his affairs ſtruck Robert with diſmay; he plainly ſaw it would be impoſſible for him to make head againſt ſo powerful a force as Henry was bringing againſt him; and, therefore, as the king drew near the town, he went forth to meet him, acknowleged his crimes, and, preſenting him with the keys of the place, threw himſelf upon his mercy. The king accepted his ſubmiſſion, and thus this dangerous inſurrection was quelled in little more than a month from its firſt breaking out. The earl and his followers were diſſeized of all their eſtates in England, and obliged to quit the kingdom.

Henry by this ſucceſs, and the deſtruction of the great family of Belleſme, ſaw himſelf abſolute maſter of his kingdom: before this time he had never conſidered himſelf as a real king; he now reſolved to be ſo, by making himſelf independent of all powers abroad, and of every claſs of his ſubjects at home. It muſt be obſerved, that the moſt conſiderable power now left in the nation, diſtinct from that of the crown, was lodged in the biſhops and abbots; and Henry could not, without a mixture of indignation and apprehenſion, perceive the attempts they were continually making to circumſcribe the regal prerogative: the inſolent and ambitious diſpoſition of Anſelm, not a little heightened by conſcious merit of the late ſervices he had done the crown, threatened Henry with little leſs than annihilation of all his authority in eccleſiaſtical matters. That haughty prelate had two favorite points in view; the one was to oblige the clergy to celibacy, and the other to wreſt from the crown the right of giving the inveſtiture to biſhops and abbots. In the midſt of his ambition he had, however, ſufficient diſcernment to know that the compaſſing his deſigns could not fail of being attended with many and great difficulties; but, nothing daunted at the proſpect of the obſtacles in his way, he convened a ſynod, in which a ſentence of excommunication was fulminated againſt married prieſts. Pleaſed with this ſucceſs, Anſelm determined to proceed, notwithſtanding he perceived he ſhould be oppoſed by the whole power of the crown. Nor was he contented with depriving Henry of a prerogative enjoyed by all the monarchs that had filled the Engliſh throne from the firſt eſtabliſhment of chriſtianity; he propoſed, that all the biſhops who had received the inveſtiture from the king, ſhould immediately reſign their ſees, or ſtand abſolutely excommunicated. Exaſperated at this inſolent attempt, Henry ſummoned Anſelm to appear in the king's court. He obeyed; and was commanded inſtantly to do homage to the king, to conſecrate ſuch perſons as had been nominated to vacant ſees, or to depart the kingdom immediately; the king declaring, in expreſs terms, "That no perſons ſhould reſide in any parts of his dominions, who refuſed to pay the allegiance due to a ſovereign." But Anſelm deſpiſed the threats of royalty; and with the reſolution of a man conſcious of his power, told the court, "That he was not to be intimidated from doing his duty; that he ſhould immediately retire to Canterbury, where he ſhould continue to exerciſe his archiepiſcopal functions, and wait the iſſue with reſignation and tranquillity." As Henry was determined not to part with ſo valuable a branch of his prerogative, and the prelate not to recede from the cauſe he had undertaken, there remained no hopes of an accommodation. At laſt it was agreed by both parties to ſend a deputation to Rome, in order to lay the whole diſpute before his holineſs; and that in the mean time the biſhops and abbots ſhould continue to exerciſe the functions of their reſpective offices.

A. D. 1103. This eccleſiaſtical diſpute did not, however, divert Henry's attention from his intereſt in other particulars. He had already greatly reduced the exorbitant power of the nobility, and reſolved to purſue that intention ſtill farther. William de Warrenne, earl of Surry, who retired into Normandy on the accommodation between Robert and his brother, had been diſſeiſed of his Engliſh eſtate; but was continually importuning the duke to uſe his good offices with Henry, in order, if poſſible, to procure his being reinſtated in his lands. Robert, whoſe heart glowed with the benign warmth of humanity and compaſſion, determined to pay a viſit to his brother in order to ſollicit in perſon the reſtitution of the earl of Surry's poſſeſſions. Previouſly informed of the deſign of Robert's viſit, Henry was fully prepared for his reception, and immediately on his arrival, pretended to be highly diſpleaſed at his brother's entering his kingdom without permiſſion, and bringing with him, in his retinue, thoſe whom he well knew to be enemies to his perſon and government. At the ſame time the king charged Robert with a breach of the late treaty, by giving refuge and encouragement to the rebellious earl of Shrewſbury, and putting him in poſſeſſion of his father's demeſnes in Normandy. Robert now perceived the wrong ſtep he had taken, by thus putting himſelf in the power of his brother; but it was too late to recede. He therefore remonſtrated boldly with his brother, in behalf of the earl of Surry, but met with ſo bad a reception, that Robert began to apprehend his own liberty was in danger, and was therefore glad to purchaſe an eſcape, by reſigning his penſion. The earl of Surry was, however, reſtored to all his poſſeſſions, and remained ever after a faithful and uſeful ſubject to the king of England.

A. D. 1104. Henry purſued his deſign of wreaking his vengeance on the Engliſh nobles, whom he ſuſpected of not being cordially attached to his intereſt. About the ſame time, William count de Mortaigne, in Normandy, and earl of Cornwall in England, the king's couſin German, claimed the earldom of Kent, as heir to Odo, biſhop of Bayeaux, who had accompanied the duke of Normandy in his expedition to the Holy Land, and died at Palermo in Sicily. This claim he preſſed in a manner rather too peremptory for a ſubject; but as it happened in the time of the public commotions, and that Henry ſuſpecting him of favoring the rebellious earl of Shrewſbury in his heart, he was not willing to weaken his own intereſt, and ſtrengthen that of his enemy, by the defection of a nobleman of ſo great power and intereſt; therefore he amuſed him with ſpecious promiſes, which kept him quiet; but as ſoon as Henry found himſelf ſecurely eſtabliſhed on the throne, he thought it high time to take down his towering ſpirit, and make him an example to others of his ſubjects, who, preſuming too far on their weight and importance, might be tempted to fly in the face of majeſty. Accordingly, when the earl, upon finding the affairs of the kingdom ſettled upon a quiet footing, took an opportunity of repeating his claim, and demanding to be put in poſſeſſion of the whole county of Kent, the king not only gave him a flat denial, but alſo exhibited againſt him a charge for divers maleverſions in the government of thoſe counties committed to his care, and, at the ſame time, with ſeveral miſdemeanors againſt the ſtate; and the different articles being proved to the ſatiſfaction of the judges, the earl was declared guilty, upon which he immediately fled over to Normandy.

Hence it is pretty apparent, that the juſticiaries were the king's creatures, and ready to give any ſentence that they thought agreeable to his ambition or avarice; for, upon the earl's withdrawing himſelf out of the kingdom, they condemned him not only to loſe the lands which it may be preſumed he had, like other rapacious Normans, uſurped, but (what is utterly inconceiveable) the earldom of Cornwall and all the great eſtates in Suſſex and other counties, of which his forefathers were juſtly poſſeſſed, according to Domeſday Book, and which he inherited from them by an undoubted title.

Hence, according to Florence of Worceſter and the Saxon chronicles, we learn that William, who had retired to his eſtate of Mortaigne, in Normandy, hearing of theſe tranſactions, and incenſed at the ingratitude, perfidy, and avarice of king Henry, fell upon thoſe lands belonging to him and his partizans, that lay contiguous to his own, and had not been delivered up to Robert purſuant to the firſt article of the peace concluded between the two brothers. In theſe operations he was ſoon joined by a number of the exiled noblemen, who were all greedy of plunder; but what greatly ſtrengthened his party was, the alliance between de Belleſme and him. This latter nobleman was in poſſeſſion of no leſs than thirty four ſtrong caſtles in Normandy, in which he had placed all the wealth he had amaſſed, and which were provided with good garriſons; ſo that theſe two turbulent chieftains and their adherents harraſſed their native country with continual devaſtations, while Robert, either deſpiſing the world, and given up to devotion, or, as Ealmer obſerves, amuſing himſelf in plays and feaſting, took not the leaſt ſtep to oppoſe their progreſs; and his indolence ſeeming to increaſe in proportion to the calamities of his country, he at length, without the privity or conſent of his brother Henry, patched up an infamous peace with the rebels, which exaſperated his ſubjects to ſuch a degree, that they determined to throw themſelves into the arms of Henry, for the protection of their lives and properties.

During all this time Henry had been acting the moſt crafty part. Ever ſince he had found himſelf in peaceable poſſeſſion of England, he began to look with a wiſhful eye upon Normandy, and was greatly deſirous of annexing that dutchy to his crown. Robert's ill conduct had confirmed him in the hopes of one day compaſſing his end, and he waited only for a favorable opportunity to put his deſign in execution. With this view he made not the leaſt effort towards chaſtiſing the rebels for their depredations on his Norman lands, either in perſon or by application to his brother. He knew full well that Robert's power was more to be feared than that of the malecontents, and therefore, with an unnatural and deteſtable policy, he ſuffered them to oppreſs his brother without offering the leaſt aſſiſtance. This neglect of Henry's concurring with Robert's indolence, had been the chief inducement to the latter's having concluded the late diſgraceful peace with the malecontents.

The opportunity which Henry had been impatiently waiting for now offered itſelf, and he did not fail to make the moſt proper uſe of it. Salo, biſhop of Sens, and Robert, abbot of the ſame place, were the firſt who broke forth into open diſcontent, (A. D. 1105) and publicly declared themſelves, by excommunicating Robert, and flying over to England, where they were received with open arms by Henry, who now ſaw himſelf on the point of having his ſecret wiſhes fully ſatisfied. However, he had not as yet any juſtifiable pretence for coming to a rupture with his brother Robert; and moreover, he was fearful that if he ſhould too prematurely declare himſelf, it might be a means of making the duke and the rebels join together for their mutual ſecurity.

Senſible of the blackneſs of his deſign, he thought it neceſſary to give it the face of juſtice, by yet appearing to act from a motive the very reverſe of what really inſpired his proceedings. With this view he wrote a letter to his brother Robert, reflecting in the ſtrongeſt terms, that his conduct lately had given juſt ground of complaint to all degrees of his ſubjects, who could not, without great concern, behold the indolence and inactivity of his diſpoſition, and the little care he took either to redreſs their grievances, or ſecure their properties; and that the late infamous peace he had made with the enemies of the public, and the deſpoilers of his country, had given thoſe under his rule but too ſtrong reaſons to believe that they had little cauſe to look to him for protection. He entreated him in the moſt preſſing manner to reſume the ſentiments of the prince and the common parent of his people, and inſtantly to ſet about redreſſing the grievances of which his ſubjects complained, or otherwiſe not to think it ſtrange that, in caſe he turned a deaf ear to theſe remonſtrances, he himſelf ſhould be obliged to eſpouſe the cauſe of the diſtreſſed Normans. This artful letter, however it might be varniſhed over with the pretence of love and kindneſs, was, in fact, intended only as a libel to inflame the minds of the Normans to a greater pitch of diſcontent againſt their duke. Henry took eſpecial care to have it made as public as poſſible, and the iſſue fully anſwered his expectations; for, in a very ſhort time afterwards, he received a general application from the Norman nobility, beſeeching him to have compaſſion on the miſeries of their church and ſtate, and take them under his immediate care. This was what Henry aimed at; and accordingly he no ſooner received the invitation, than he haſtened to comply with it; and, about the autumn of the ſame year, he paſſed over to Normandy with a powerful armament.

Henry's conduct muſt appear to every unprejudiced perſon a downright violation of every civil and political tie; and, there is no doubt to be made but that Henry would have loudly complained of, and ſeverely reſented, the duke his brother's attempting to intermeddle in his government of the Engliſh, which, indeed, there ſeems to have been an equal reaſon for, ſince we find Henry, at the very time he was thus rebuking his brother for mal-adminiſtration, and aſſuming the character of protector of the diſtreſſed Normans, ſaddling his own ſubjects with exorbitant impoſitions, in order to defray the expences of his expedition to Normandy, in which this country certainly could have no concern; and this tax was levied with all the aggravating circumſtances of rigor. But, indeed, we ſeem to have been fated, ever ſince our exiſtence as a people, to be the dupes either of quarrels or alliances with the continent, for the moſt part equally frivolous and diſadvantageous, notwithſtanding that nature, by our inſular ſituation, deſigned us to be exempt both from the one and the other.

As ſoon as it was known that Henry had landed at Barfleur, his court was filled with the Norman nobility, who all repreſented their real or fancied grievances in the moſt ſpecious manner, imploring the king of England to take them under his protection. It required no great rhetoric to perſuade Henry to gratify the principal wiſh of his ambition; but as the ſeaſon of the year was too far advanced to admit of any military operations, he contented himſelf with having an interview with his brother Robert, which paſſed in recriminations on both ſides: Robert, on his part, accuſed Henry with a deſign to ſtir up his ſubjects againſt him, and deprive him of his dominions. Henry charged his brother with having not only given aſylum to rebels and the betrayers of their king and country, but with having made allies of thoſe very peſts to ſociety, by agreeing to an infamous peace with them. This altercation would have grown very warm, had it not been for the interpoſition of ſome of the moſt moderate noblemen on each ſide, who pacified matters ſo well, at leaſt in appearance, that Henry and his brother parted ſeemingly good friends; and the former returned to paſs the winter in England, after having firſt made a kind of progreſs through thoſe parts of his own eſtate in Normandy which he thought required his preſence, and which he put in the beſt poſture of defence he could againſt the enſuing ſpring. However, while he remained in Normandy, he, againſt all the laws of nature and nations, ſeized into his hands the ſtrong towns of Bayeux and Caen, belonging to his brother Robert, and garriſoned them partly with his own Engliſh troops, and partly with Norman malecontents.

A. D. 1106. The campaign was opened with the ſiege of Tenchebray; and it now became ſufficiently evident, both from his preparations and progreſs, that he intended to uſurp the entire poſſeſſion of Normandy. Robert was at laſt rouſed from his lethargy, and being joined by the earl of Mortaigne, and Robert de Belleſme, earl of Shrewſbury, the king's inveterate enemies, he raiſed a conſiderable army, and approached his brother's camp, intending to finiſh, by one deciſive battle, the quarrel between them. He was now entered upon that ſcene of action, in which alone he was qualified to excel; and, accordingly, he ſo animated the Norman troops by his example, that they made a great impreſſion on the Engliſh, and had nearly obtained the victory, when the flight of Belleſme threw the whole army into diſorder, and occaſioned a total defeat. Henry, beſides making a great ſlaughter among the enemy, took near ten thouſand priſoners, among whom was duke Robert himſelf, together with moſt of the conſiderable barons, who adhered to his intereſt.

Hence this victory was followed by the entire reduction of Normandy: Rouen immediately ſubmitted to the conqueror: Falais, after ſome negotiation, opened its gates; and by this acquiſition, beſides rendering himſelf maſter of an important fortreſs, Henry got into his hands the perſon of prince William, the only ſon and heir of Robert. He now aſſembled the ſtates of Normandy; and, having received the homage of all the vaſſals of the dutchy, ſettled the government, revoked his brother's donations, and diſmantling the caſtles lately erected, he returned to England, carrying with him the duke as a priſoner. That unfortunate prince was detained in cuſtody during the remainder of his life, which was no leſs than twenty-eight years, when he died in the caſtle of Cardiff, in Glamorganſhire: happy, if, without loſing his liberty, he could have relinquiſhed that power, which he was not qualified to hold or exerciſe. Prince William was committed to the care of Elias de St. Saen, who had married Robert's natural daughter, and who, being a man of more probity and honor, than was common in thoſe ages, executed the truſt with great affection and fidelity. Edgar Atheling, who had followed Robert in his expedition to Jeruſalem, and who had ſince reſided with him in Normandy, was another illuſtrious priſoner, taken in the battle of Tenchebray; but Henry gave him his liberty, and ſettled on him a ſmall penſion, with which he retired, and lived to a good old age in England, totally neglected and forgotten. This prince was diſtinguiſhed by great probity; but nothing can be a ſtronger proof of the mediocrity of his talents, in every other reſpect, than that, notwithſtanding he poſſeſſed the affections of the Engliſh, and enjoyed the only legal title to the crown, he was allowed, during the reigns of ſo many violent and jealous uſurpers, to live unmoleſted, and deſcend to his grave in peace.

In the year 1107, the famous controverſy between king Henry and the primate was brought to a concluſion. The deputies who, as we have already obſerved, had been ſent to the court of Rome, were now returned to England. Their ſucceſs with the haughty pontiff had been very indifferent. His holineſs had behaved with great decency, but with remarkable firmneſs. He wrote two letters, one to Henry, and the other to Anſelm, both of them condemning all lay-inveſtitures, in direct terms. That directed to Henry was delivered into his own hands, and conſequently the contents of it were known only to himſelf, and perhaps to the prelates who had been ſent on this embaſſy, and who were entirely in Henry's intereſt. Anſelm made no ſecret of the contents of his letter; he imparted them to all, and applauded himſelf for acting ſo agreeably to the ſentiments of his holineſs. Vexed, and diſdaining to be defeated in a cauſe ſo intimately connected with the dignity of his crown, Henry had recourſe to a ſubterfuge, which, to this enlightened age, will perhaps appear ſomething extraordinary. He again ſummoned the archbiſhop before his court, and inſiſted on his immediately complying with his will, in regard to inveſtitures, or quitting the kingdom. Anſelm was aſtoniſhed at this peremptory demand, ſo directly contrary to what he had reaſon to expect. He repreſented to the king, that the letter with which the pope had honored him, left him no room for compliance, and intreated his majeſty to impart to him the contents of the letter he had received, ſince he was both ready and willing to obey the will of his ſovereign, as far as his own conſcience, and the commands of his holineſs would give him leave. But this Henry abſolutely refuſed; and plainly told Anſelm, that the pope's determination had very little influence with him; that he did not think himſelf obliged to produce his letter, and that if he did produce it, the contents would, perhaps, be very far from anſwering the primate's expectations: in ſhort, that the queſtion now ſolely regarded his ſubmiſſion, and that he expected his direct compliance. This anſwer ſavored too much of abſolute power. Anſelm appealed to the contents of his own letter, for a vindication of his conduct; and Henry was obliged to have recourſe to another expedient. He appealed to his deputies, who now declared, that with regard to the letters in queſtion, they were entirely ignorant of what they contained; but that they were perfectly acquainted with the pope's ſentiments, and that they had verbal inſtructions, to inform both the king and his court, that, provided the king behaved with proper ſubmiſſion to the holy ſee, in other reſpects, he would diſpenſe with the matter of inveſtitures. With regard to the letters, they obſerved, that it would have been extremely improper for the pope to have given any ſuch indulgence under his hand, ſince it might have encouraged other princes to expect the ſame favor. Anſelm's two meſſengers, who were both monks, affirmed, that it was impoſſible this ſtory could have any foundation; but their word was not eſteemed equivalent to that of three biſhops; and the king, as if he had entirely gained his cauſe, proceeded to fill up the ſees of Hereford and Saliſbury, and to inveſt the new biſhops in the uſual manner. But Anſelm, who, from ſufficient reaſons, gave no credit to the aſſeverations of the king's meſſengers, not only refuſed to conſecrate theſe prelates, but even to communicate with them; and the biſhops themſelves, finding how odious they were to the people, returned back to Henry the enſigns of their dignity. The quarrel every day increaſed between the king and the primate: the former, notwithſtanding his great prudence, and the moderation of his temper, threw out menaces againſt all ſuch as ſhould pretend to oppoſe him in exerting the antient prerogatives of his crown: and Anſelm, ſenſible of his diſagreeable and dangerous ſituation, deſired leave to undertake a journey to Rome, in order to lay the caſe before the ſovereign pontiff. Henry, well pleaſed with being freed, without having recourſe to violence, from ſo inflexible an antagoniſt, readily granted him permiſſion; and Anſelm ſet out on his journey. He was attended to the ſea-ſhore by an infinite number of people of all ranks, who regarded his departure as the final diſſolution of religion and piety in this kingdom. But the king, though he had granted Anſelm leave to repair to Rome, immediately confiſcated all the revenues of his ſee, and ſent William de Warelwaſt to negociate with pope Paſcal, and ſo find ſome means of bringing this delicate affair to an accommodation.

Anſelm and the envoy had an audience at the ſame time. Warelwaſt, preſuming upon the experienced compliance of the Roman ſee, when it was treated with any degree of firmneſs, opened his maſter's cauſe with great ſpirit, and boldly told the pontiff, "That "whatever opinions might be entertained abroad, he "knew his maſter would as ſoon part with his kingdom, as with his right of inveſtitures." The pope, who was then in full conſiſtory, could not bear this freedom. He liſtened very attentively to the beginning of Warelwaſt's harangue; but now interrupted the ambaſſador, crying out in a vehement manner, "Your maſter will part with his kingdom, as ſoon as "with the right of inveſtitures! Know then, that "while Paſcal is pope, he ſhall never quietly enjoy "them." All the cardinals preſent applauded this reſolute anſwer, which greatly diſconcerted Warelwaſt, who relied principally upon their friendſhip. Anſelm himſelf did not ſpeak a ſingle word on this occaſion. He was too well pleaſed with the manner of proceeding, to offer any thing to mitigate the pope's indignation. At laſt, both the prelate and ambaſſador had leave to return, after the pope had given ſentence in the moſt expreſs terms againſt lay-inveſtitures, and charged Anſelm with letters to Henry on the occaſion.

The ambaſſador now perceived, that any further application would be in vain, and therefore ſet out with Anſelm, whom he accompanied to Lyons. On their arrival in that city, Warelwaſt took an opportunity of hinting to the primate, that unleſs he would conſent to give up his claim to inveſtitures, he could not return with honor and ſafety to England. Anſelm was himſelf of the ſame opinion, and therefore contented himſelf with ſending Henry an account of the ſucceſs of his commiſſion, with the pope's determination, intimating, that he could not return to England, but upon the terms he himſelf had previouſly propoſed.

Obſerving the firmneſs of the two prelates of Rome and Canterbury, Henry proceeded with equal reſolution. He ſeized all the revenues of the vacant biſhoprics and abbies, and cauſed the rents of the archbiſhopric to be collected by two of Anſelm's tenants. This reſolute behaviour daunted his holineſs, notwithſtanding all his late ſhew of reſolution. The archbiſhop ſtill continued in exile, till Henry's intereſt made him lend an ear to the interceſſion of his ſiſter the counteſs of Blois, when matters were ſo far made up, that all farther talk of excommunication was laid aſide, and the archbiſhop, about the time of the battle of Tinchebray, returned into England, where he afterwards received a letter from Henry himſelf, with an account of that great ſucceſs; and, ſoon after, matters were made up amicably.

This year likewiſe died Edgar king of Scotland, brother-in-law to Henry, after a peaceful reign of nine years and ſix months, in which his gratitude to the Norman race appeared by his never giving, as was the manner of his country, any diverſion to the Engliſh arms, when embroiled either in foreign or domeſtic wars. In the next year Henry held a great meeting of the ſtates, in which he was importuned by his nobility, both ſpiritual and temporal, to give way to the redreſs of many grievances which had crept in, to the great oppreſſion of the common people. His court and attendants had, for ſome time, claimed and practiſed a barbarous privilege of living upon free quarter in all places through which their maſter paſſed. This occaſioned the land to be abandoned by the inhabitants, when they ſuſpected a royal progreſs; for the inſolent attendants ſpoiled and plundered all that came in their way, while the people retired, with all the proviſions they could carry off, into woods and receſſes. An effectual ſtop was now put to this abuſe by the king's proclamation, which inflicted ſevere corporal penalties, ſuch as the loſs of eyes, hands, and limbs, upon all who were guilty, for the time to come, of the like depredations.

Adulterating and defacing the current coin of this kingdom was another grievance, which called aloud for redreſs. The loſs of eyes and other members was inflicted on all counterfeiters. Small money, ſuch as pence and half-pence, were often broken by the country people, for the conveniency of ſmaller pieces; by this means, when they were not broken in equal pieces, the ſmaller ones remained on the hands of the proprietor, to his great prejudice. This abuſe, which was grown to a great height, was remedied by coining pence in one round piece, with two creaſes interſecting it into four equal parts; ſo that, by breaking it according to thoſe creaſes, it might fall into two halfpence, or four farthings.

Beſides theſe, ſeveral other very uſeful regulations ſeem to have been made at this time, which we ſhall take notice of, the rather as they have been paſt over by our other hiſtorians. The barbarous cuſtom, which is a reproach even to later ages then prevailed, of the proprietors of thoſe ſhores where a ſhip happened to be wrecked, ſeizing on the wreck as their own property, while the poor ſailors were turned aſhore to hunger and miſery, and often met on land the fate they had eſcaped at ſea. This cuſtom was aboliſhed by Henry, who iſſued out a proclamation, that, in ſuch caſes, if one ſingle ſoul in the ſhip remained alive, the whole, including both the bottom and cargo, that ſhould be ſaved, ſhould belong to him. But this excellent edict was repealed under his ſucceſſor, to the reproach of his reign. The reader is here to obſerve, that Henry's making thoſe regulations by proclamation is far from being an argument that the royal proclamations in thoſe days had the force of an act of the ſtates. The regulations themſelves were no other than putting in force, reviving and recommending the laws which were already in being, but their execution neglected or perverted by inferior magiſtrates, and therefore a proclamation was ſufficient for all the purpoſes of the ſubject. The regulation of meaſures was the ſubject of another proclamation. A law had paſſed in the firſt year of Henry's reign, that every yard ſhould be the length of the king's arm. This regulation had been greatly neglected and abuſed, but was now revived and enforced by royal proclamation.

All theſe regulations could not fail of being very agreeable to the Engliſh nation; but Henry was not quite diſintereſted as to the motives of his patriotiſm. The heavy tax of Dane-gelt was now revived, at the rate of two ſhillings upon every hide of land; and many oppreſſive foreſt prerogatives, brought in by his father and brother, were continued.

In the interim, while Henry was making himſelf powerful at home, a ſtorm threatened to break upon his dominions abroad. Philip king of France being dead, he was ſucceeded by his ſon Lewis. This prince, jealous of Henry's greatneſs, ſince he had re-annexed the dukedom of Normandy to the crown of England, took occaſion, upon ſome diſputes about the fortreſſes on both frontiers, to make great preparations for invading Normandy. Robert had left in France a young prince, his ſon, whoſe name was William, of promiſing capacity, and beautiful in his perſon. Henry, perceiving the hoſtile diſpoſitions of the king of France, grew apprehenſive leſt he ſhould tamper with this young prince, and prompt him to attempt the recovery of his father's dominions. About the beginning of Auguſt, therefore, in the year 1108, without diſcovering his real intentions, Henry, having nothing to fear in England, paſſed over to Normandy. At firſt he ſeemed to mind nothing but the putting his frontiers in a poſture of defence; but all of a ſudden he gave orders to Rober Beauchamp, viſcount of Arches, to ſeize the perſon of the young prince of Normandy, who was then in a caſtle belonging to his tutor, Elias count of St. Saen. This order was not kept ſo ſecret, but that the prince had timely notice of it, and made his eſcape into France; while Elias's caſtle was ſeized upon by Henry, and the cuſtody of it committed to William de Warren. As to William, his tutor carried him firſt to the court of France, and afterwards to thoſe of the neighbouring princes, whom the graceſulneſs of his perſon, and the ſweetneſs of his manners, diſpoſed to attempt ſomewhat in his favor. But the activity of Henry, at this juncture, prevented all endeavours of that kind. The party of Robert, however, were indefatigable in their ſolicitations. Robert earl of Shrewſbury ſtill retained an implacable enmity to Henry and his government, and, in conjunction with the young prince's tutor, applied not only to Lewis king of France, but to William duke of Poictou, Henry duke of Burgundy, and Alan duke of Britanny. Thoſe princes, all of them, diſcovered the beſt diſpoſitions towards the diſinherited prince; but all he could now obtain, were aſſurances of ſupporting him at a proper juncture. Henry, not ignorant of the diſpoſitions of his neighbours, redoubled his attention to the ſtate of his Norman territories and frontiers, and at the ſame time negociated an alliance which might counterbalance all the intereſt of his rival on the continent.

This alliance was with Henry, the fourth emperor of Germany. The territories of the two princes were too diſcontiguous for them to enter into any treaty, on account of mutual ſupport, againſt a third power; an alliance of blood was therefore neceſſary to cement their intereſts, ſo diſtant in point of territory. Henry had a daughter at this time, whoſe name was Maud, but of too tender years for a connubial ſtate; but this was no objection to a match of intereſt. A marriage between the young lady and the emperor was negociated, and agreed upon; and the imperial embaſſadors were to demand her in form for their maſter, as ſoon as Henry ſhould return to England.

Henry had put his affairs in Normandy upon ſo good a footing, that, notwithſtanding all the intereſt of his brother's family, he was able to hold a great council of his ſtates, on Whitſunday, 1109, at Weſtminſter.

Here the emperor's embaſſadors made their demand of his daughter, and the terms were finally agreed upon. It had been a cuſtom, in all countries where the feudal ſyſtem was eſtabliſhed, for the ſubjects to furniſh an extraordinary ſubſidy upon the marriage of their king's eldeſt daughter. Henry laid hold of this cuſtom for impoſing an extraordinary tax this year, of three ſhillings upon every hide of land throughout the kingdom; by which he raiſed a noble portion for the young lady, who continued in England till next year. This practice gathered ſtrength with time, and its veſtiges are ſtill diſcernable upon the like occaſion. But it muſt be owned, that the nation, is not now near ſo liberal that way as it was formerly, ſince, by a moderate computation, the money raiſed by Henry for his daughter's portion, amounted to the value of eight hundred thouſand pounds of the preſent money.

This year is memorable for the death of the famous Anſelm, archbiſhop of Canterbury, of whoſe character it were ſuperfluous to ſay any thing in this place. It is likewiſe a celebrated æra of learning, by the revival of letters in the univerſity of Cambridge.

A. D. 1110, the bethrothed empreſs left England, with a noble retinue; and Henry's affairs were in ſuch tranquillity, that he was now at leiſure to proſecute ſeveral of his great barons, who had either openly or ſecretly favored the cauſe of his enemies. Of thoſe, we have the names of Philip de Brauſe, William Mallet, and William Bainart; but Huntingdon, who delivers the fact, neglects to inform us of the particulars of their impeachment; for he only tells us, that they loſt their eſtates for their treaſons. At the ſame time we learn, that Elias, the famous earl of Maine, was put to death by order of Henry, whoſe feodatory he was. The hiſtory of this prince's ſucceſſion is of importance to our hiſtory, and comes naturally in here. Henry wanted to ſeize into his own hands the earldom of Maine; but was prevented by Fulk, earl of Anjou, who had married the daughter of Elias, and who ſtrengthened his intereſt with the Normans, by openly eſpouſing the part of William, the prince of Normandy. Fulk, by the acquiſition of Maine, became now a conſiderable power upon the continent, and entered into engagements with the king of France, Almeric earl of Montfort, nephew and heir to William earl of Evereux, and Robert the reſtleſs earl of Shrewſbury, for invading Normandy. To give the better colour to their cauſe, a treaty of marriage was opened between William the Norman prince, and the daughter of Fulk, and great preparations were made for ſupporting his intereſt; while Henry, on the other hand, accuſed Fulk of uſurping the duchy of Anjou, and declared his intentions of conquering it by force, though then too late in the year to open the campaign.

Henry croſſed over to Normandy in Auguſt, A. D. 1111, and continued two years abroad, during which time he proſecuted the war againſt the favorers of his nephew with various ſucceſs, and had no ſmall difficulties to encounter; however, by a perſeverance which would have done honor to a better cauſe, he at length ſurmounted all obſtacles. He found means, towards the end of the year 1112, to detach the earl of Anjou from the party of William and the French king, upon a promiſe of marrying his ſon to the other's eldeſt daughter, and beſtowing on him the earldom of Maine, for which he was to do homage. As to the earl of Shrewſbury, who was his moſt inveterate enemy, having been ſent by Lewis on an embaſſy, about a treaty or conference in order come to an accommodation, and coming to Bonneville on the Tonque, Henry cauſed him to be arreſted, and ſent to Cherbourg, and from thence into England, where he was condemned to perpetual impriſonment at Wareham-caſtle.

The apprehending of the perſon of Robert de Belleſme was attended with the moſt ſalutary conſequences to Henry's Norman affairs; for the court of France, thus deprived of, or abandoned by, its moſt powerful friends, found itſelf too weak alone to ſupport prince William's pretenſions; and ſoon after, to the amazement of all the world, Lewis and Henry had an interview at Giſors, which was followed by a treaty of peace, in which the former agreed for ever to renounce his pretenſions to the dukedom of Maine and the ſovereignty of Bretagne. And the prince of Normandy, thus deſerted, was obliged to take refuge in the court of Baldwin, earl of Flanders, who generouſly gave him protection, and a ſubſiſtence ſuitable to his birth.

Henry, having thus happily terminated theſe troubles, returned to England in July, 1113. Before he had undertaken his Norman expedition, he had admitted into England a great number of Flemings, who, by the inundation of the ſea on their own coaſts, had been obliged to emigrate in queſt of new habitations. They were kindly received by Henry, and firſt of all ſettled in the more barren parts of Yorkſhire; but were afterwards tranſplanted into Roſs and Pembrokeſhire, where they formed a ſtrong barrier againſt the neighbouring Welſh, who were every now and then diſturbing the frontiers between the two nations by their invaſions. Theſe latter, enraged to find themſelves thus bridled by a ſet of vagabonds, became ſo troubleſome, that Henry was reſolved to march againſt them in perſon, and make the entire conqueſt of their country. Accordingly he entered Wales in the year 1114, with a numerous army; but, after many vain endeavors to bring them to a general engagement, which they always eluded by retiring to the mountains on the king's approach to give them battle, he found his army ſo embarraſſed by the fatigues of their march through an almoſt impaſſable country, that they were in the greateſt diſtreſs; and as there appeared no likelihood of drawing the enemy out of their holes and lurking-places, he thought it moſt politic to liſten to terms of accommodation; a peace was made with them, and thus the expedition ended, with little advantage, however, to Henry.

Returning then to London, he yielded to the intreaties of ſeveral of his nobles, both eccleſiaſtical and ſecular, and filled up the vacant ſee of Canterbury, the revenues of which he had kept in his hands for five years. Ralph, biſhop of Rocheſter, was on this occaſion unanimouſly choſen archbiſhop, to the great ſatisfaction of the people, by whom he was highly eſteemed; and Thurſtan, one of the king's chaplains, was nominated to the ſee of York. At the ſame time all other vacancies were filled up, but with ſuch glaring partiality to the Normans, as made the Engliſh in general murmur loudly, and indeed not without juſt reaſon.

In the ſame year, Henry went over to Normandy, in order to get his ſon William, then only twelve years of age, recognized as his ſucceſſor in his Norman dominions. This point he effected, and all the great barons ſwore an eventual fealty to the royal minor; and Henry returned to England, where the year following he did the ſame, in order that nothing might be wanting, that human prudence could invent, to ſecure a long continuance of the ſceptre in his own line. In the month of September, he called a great council of his peers, both ſpiritual and temporal, at his palace of Weſtminſter, where ſeveral matters relating to the preſervation of the peace of the kingdom were diſcuſſed and provided for.

A. D. 1116, Lewis of France, ſtill jealous of Henry's riſing power, had reſumed his engagements with prince William of Normandy, ſon to duke Robert; and claiming, as ſovereign lord of Normandy, a right to diſpoſe of that duchy, he gave the inveſtiture of it to the young prince, and promiſed to aſſiſt him with all his power: he alſo found means to bring ſeveral of the French princes to join his army; and affairs put on ſo ſerious an aſpect, that Henry found it abſolutely neceſſary to paſs over into Normandy. But before he ſet out on that expedition, he ſummoned a great aſſembly of the ſtates at Saliſbury, on the thirteenth of March, in which he got his ſon William to be publicly acknowledged as his ſucceſſor, and all preſent took an oath to defend his right againſt all pretenders whatever.

The king of England paſſing over to Normandy, Rees, the prince of South Wales, redoubled his hoſtilities againſt the Engliſh, and the other ſubjects of Henry, lying upon the borders of Wales. In the firſt run of his ſucceſs, he took ſeveral of Henry's caſtles, which he burned and levelled with the ground. Encouraged by this, he entered Roſſe and Dyvent with great fury. The Normans and Flemings, inhabiting thoſe countries, upon this, met, and reſolved to call unto their aſſiſtance ſuch of the Welſh noblemen as remained ſtill firm to the Engliſh intereſt. The caſtle and town of Carmarthen were at that time of much importance, and in great danger of falling into the hands of the enemy. It was therefore propoſed, by Henry's ſubjects, that the Welſh in his friendſhip ſhould, by turns, garriſon the caſtle, to prevent its falling into the enemy's hands. The Welſh, among whom we have the names of Owen ap Rytherech, and Rytherech ap Tudor, undertook this ſervice; but Rees, being informed of their determination, reſolved to prevent them. Underſtanding the caſtle to be but meanly garriſoned, he ſuddenly aſſaulted it. Owen ap Caradoc, who then commanded the place, hearing the ſhouts of the aſſailants, immediately attacked them; but found himſelf, all at once, abandoned by his men. Unwilling, however, or unable to retreat, he fell with his ſword in his hand; and Rees forced his way into the town, which he took, and laid in aſhes; the caſtle itſelf, which was likewiſe taken, ſuffering great damage. This ſucceſs gave ſuch encouragement to the other Welſh, that, in a few days after, a body of brave young men entered themſelves under the command of Rees.

Thoſe ſucceſſes of Rees raiſed him to the general command of the Welſh. They who had been diſpoſſeſſed of their habitations by the Normans and Flemings repaired to his ſtandard; the caſtles belonging to Strongbow were taken, and their garriſons put to the ſword; at laſt, laying ſiege to a caſtle, named Aberyſtyth, a party of his men were intercepted by the Engliſh, and drawn into an ambuſcade, in which moſt of them were cut to pieces. Henry, after this, ſent Robert, his natural ſon, to command againſt the Welſh. This nobleman was joined by another Owen ap Caradoc, Owen ap Rytherech, and Lhywarch ap Trahern. Gerad, ſteward of Pembroke, advanced likewiſe, at the head of the Flemings, to join the royaliſts; but an antient animoſity ſubſiſting between him and Owen ap Rytherech, who did not dream of being attacked by thoſe of his own party, the ſteward took advantage of Owen's ſecurity, and killed him, with many of his men. This diſguſted the Welſh in the king's intereſt to a great degree: however, they being at variance among themſelves, the government of England found means to ſecure the peace of the kingdom.

Henry, at the ſame time, was in Normandy, where the war again broke out between him and the king of France. The latter pretended a promiſe which Henry had made him, of demoliſhing, within a prefixed time, the important caſtle of Giſors, which was as it were a key for a paſſage either into Normandy or France. Henry being in poſſeſſion of it, was too ſenſible of its conſequence, to comply with the repeated demands of the French for its demolition. This exaſperated Lewis to the higheſt degree, and a ſtrong confederacy was formed for reducing Henry's exorbitant power in France. The contracting parties were the earl of Flanders, the duke of Burgundy, the earl of Blois and the earl of Nevers.

The confederates, in the year 1116, attacked Normandy, and marched as far as the river Epte. Here they found Henry's forces drawn up on the oppoſite bank; but neither party was able to force its paſſage in the face of the other. Lewis, however, who was a prince of great ſpirit, and little command of temper, as the agreement between him and Henry, about demoliſhing Giſors, had been perſonal, and as they differed in facts, thought his honor obliged him perſonally to maintain his own reputation. He, therefore, ſent a ſolemn deputation to Henry, upbraiding him with breach of promiſe, and appealing him to ſingle combat. Henry, though perſonally very brave, not chooſing to forego an advantage for an idle point of honor, ſent his antagoniſt word, "That true valor was beſt ſeen by the conduct in field, at the head of their armies; and, in that character, he never would decline to meet him, when time, and proper place, and opportunity permitted." Though this reply greatly exaſperated Lewis, yet he found himſelf in no condition to paſs the river.

Thus both armies, for ſome days, lay facing one another, till the want of proviſions obliged the Normans to extend their line towards Giſors; and leaving the river unguarded a little above that fort, the French, early in the morning, took the opportunity of paſſing it without loſs. They were oppoſed by the Normans, and a bloody diſpute enſued. At laſt, the latter receiving conſtant ſupplies from Giſors, the French were repelled, though they were in great hopes of opening a paſſage into the caſtle by their ſwords. This defeat diſabled the French from making any farther progreſs this campaign, and they were obliged to retire into their winter quarters. The winter was ſpent in each party's endeavouring to fortify itſelf by new alliances. Great ſubſidies and great armies were paid, which were ſeverely felt by England. The earl of Britanny, however, was a powerful ſupport to Henry; and the French, in all their attempts, ſtill found him ſo well provided, that they were always diſappointed in their expectations: for Henry was contented to keep himſelf on the defenſive. He found the princes and noblemen of France growing every day more jealous of his power, and his brother's intereſt daily increaſing, not ſo much through an affection to his cauſe, as from their own averſion to Henry, whom they conſidered as aiming to give laws to the kingdom. In ſhort, freſh claims were made every day againſt Henry, and the confederacy againſt him became almoſt general. Almeric de Montfort reviving his claim to the earldom of Evereux, had that city delivered into his hands by Pointel, its governor. This ſucceſs encouraged other princes and great men, who had not yet ventured to declare themſelves, openly to eſpouſe the part of William, ſon to the then impriſoned duke. Stephen earl of Albemarle, and Robert de Gournay, were of this number; and Henry, on a ſudden, found himſelf attacked from all quarters. Had he been ſafe to depend upon the fidelity of the Normans, he might have made head againſt all his enemies; but he found the ſpirit of diſſatisfaction to his government ſo ſtrong among them, that he was obliged to garriſon ſome of his moſt important towns with Engliſh.

The earl of Flanders had attacked Normandy, upon the ſide of Tellau, with ſo much vigor, that he over-ran great part of the country, and burnt a great number of towns, even in ſight of the king, who durſt not truſt to the loyalty of his Normans to give him battle. Encouraged by this ſucceſs, he laid ſiege to Bures, a ſtrong town garriſoned with Engliſh. The garriſon made a brave defence; and, in a ſally, not only cut off great part of the beſiegers, but mortally wounded the earl himſelf, and the ſiege was raiſed. In the mean time, the king of France and the earl of Anjou were carrying fire and ſword into other parts of Normandy, where duke Robert's party, or rather that of his ſon, became ſo ſtrong, that every day brought Henry accounts of ſome great nobleman's revolting from his intereſt, and being in arms againſt him. In this diſtreſs of his affairs, he ſummoned a council of his ſtates at Rouen, to conſult about reſtoring the peace of that country. It was now the beginning of October; and, we meet with many Engliſh noblemen, particularly the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who ſat in this aſſembly. From this circumſtance there is reaſon to believe, that the ſtate of England, as well as of Normandy, took up part of their time; and that the neceſſity of Henry's preſence in his ducal dominions prevented his holding any aſſembly of his ſtates in England. The deliberations of this aſſembly at Rouen ſeem to have produced but little effect, as we find the general diſcontent became rather greater than ever. Among others, Euſtace de Bretueil, who had married one of Henry's natural daughters, threw off his allegiance to his father-in-law, of whoſe ſituation he had taken the advantage, to perſiſt in ſome unreaſonable demands. His vaſſals, however, returned to their duty, and made their peace with the king. But it muſt be owned, that Henry, at this time, was obliged to purſue meaſures very mortifying to a high ſpirit. Almeric earl of Evereux was one of his moſt dangerous enemies; him Henry courted into his friendſhip, by offering to put him in poſſeſſion of the earldom of Evereux: but that nobleman, who had been highly exaſperated by Henry, continued faithful to his engagements with the other party. Henry, it is true, was ſomewhat more ſucceſsful with the earl of Anjou, for it had been agreed, that the young prince of England ſhould marry this earl's daughter. As the parties were then too young for a connubial ſtate, the marriage had been delayed; and views of intereſt intervening, very little regard was paid, by either party, to the agreement. Henry, however, at this time, ſecretly renewed this negociation; but the earl having experience of the king's intereſted politics, was very cautious of his artifices.

A. D. 1118 is diſtinguiſhed by the death of the excellent Matilda. This princeſs had lived in great harmony with her huſband; and the peace of England, during the long abſence of Henry, was, in a great meaſure, owing to her virtues and moderation. The reſpect which the old Engliſh ſtill retained for the blood of Cerdic, was, doubtleſs, of great advantage to Henry's government; and the iſſue of the royal pair was looked upon as ſo many ſhoots, ſpringing from that illuſtrious ſtem, which the fate of arms and invading ambition had cut down to the root. She was buried in Weſtminſter-abbey. One circumſtance relating to her burial muſt not be omitted here, as it concerns the antiquities of England. For it appears, by a famous roll (which formerly was miſtaken for a roll of the fifth of king Stephen; but has been, by a great antiquary, reſtored to the year and reign we now treat of) that the ſheriffs of London had the care of her funeral; ſince, in their accounts paſſed in the ſaid roll, they charge the crown with fifteen ſhillings and two-pence halfpenny, for oil expended in burning upon her tomb; and with three ſhillings, for cloth for covering the ſame. Her death happened upon the thirtieth of April, and her memory was celebrated in an epitath, ſome lines of which would do honor to the politeſt of later ages.

In the ſame year happened the death of Robert earl of Mellent. This nobleman, who was a foreigner by birth, connection, and intereſt, was Henry's firſt miniſter; and conſidering England only as a conquered province, he was the author of many pernicious ſchemes, for the ſupplying his maſter with the means of preſerving and acquiring his foreign territories. The war between Henry and Lewis continued to rage. The Normans began now to ſee, that, inſtead of England becoming an acceſſion to Normandy, Normandy, in fact, had become ſo to England. For though the Engliſh themſelves bled, yet Normandy had thereby no relief, her miſeries being encreaſed in proportion as Henry was ſupported by his regal dominions. As we have ſeen before, their greatneſs had introduced luxury, and luxury corruption; the ſources of corruption having been dried up, they became needy, and then factious. The court of France knew how to improve thoſe diſpoſitions; and nothing but the exceſſive ſums, with which Henry was ſupplied from England, could have prevented all Normandy, at this juncture, from falling into the hands of Lewis. For though the intereſt of duke Robert and his family was made the pretence of the war; yet it was plain, that, had the French arms ſucceeded, the duchy muſt have fallen into the hands of Lewis. Both parties, in the year 1119, exerted all their ſtrength. The Normans who continued ſtill faithful to Henry, were ſuch as had great eſtates in England, or were under ties of perſonal obligations. The names of the chief were Richard earl of Cheſter, Ralph de Conchis, William de Warren, William de Romara, William de Tancardi Villa, Ralph de Sancto Victore, Walter Giffart, Nigel de Albiney, with his brother William, with Waleran and William, the two ſons of the deceaſed earl of Mellent. Thoſe noblemen, though few, were firm and powerful. As they had but one point in view, which was the ſupporting their intereſt, their ſtrength was undiſſipated, and therefore conſiderable. On the other hand, the Norman party, though numerous, was divided. The French intereſt then grew to be viſibly ſuperior in the councils of the depoſed princes; and the earl of Anjou, dreading more the power of France than that of Henry, began now to lend a willing ear to the advances of the latter; but fearing leſt his giving any open encouragement to the Engliſh party ſhould alarm the French court, he ſtill continued to act with his allies. For Engeram de Chaumont having ſurprized the caſtle of Andely Sur Seine, which put the French in poſſeſſion of all the country, from the river Epte to the town of Pont St. Pierre; the French, at the ſame time, beſieged the caſtle of Alanſon, in Maine. As the loſs of this caſtle muſt have been attended with that of all Henry's intereſt in that county, he advanced in perſon to relieve it; but he was met by the earl of Anjou, who, after ſome action, obliged him to retreat, and then he himſelf forced the caſtle to ſurrender. This bad ſucceſs was, in ſome meaſure, repaired, by the earl of Flanders being at this time taken off from the confederacy. The late earl Baldwin had been mortally wounded at the ſiege of the caſtle of Ou, which he took from Henry, whoſe implacable enemy he was. He was ſucceeded by Charles, his nephew, and ſon to the king of Denmark, who being a prince of a more placable diſpoſition, ſtudied to preſerve his dominions in peace, and therefore left the allies. He was followed by Fulk earl of Anjou, whoſe late ſucceſſes in the county of Maine had rendered him more independent than he had hitherto been on' the French court. He, therefore, gave Henry to underſtand, that he was ready to conclude on the terms that had been offered; and it was mutually agreed, that William, the prince royal of England, ſhould come over into France immediately, to eſpouſe the earl's daughter. No ſooner was the prince arrived, which he did in May, than the earl ſent to acquaint Henry, that he was prepared to give him the laſt proof of his friendſhip; and all matters being made up, the marriage was celebrated, in preſence of the king and earl, in June following. At the ſame time we learn, that William Talvace, the ſon of the earl of Shrewſbury, was, through the mediation of the earl of Anjou, put in poſſeſſion of his father's Norman eſtate. The defection of the earls of Flanders and Anjou from the allies, changed the face of affairs greatly in Henry's favor. He had, for ſome time paſt, been contented with acting on the defenſive, being yet apprehenſive of a general defection of the places he ſtill held in Normandy; but he now took the field, and carried fire and ſword into the caſtles and poſſeſſions of his rivals. His firſt fury ſpent itſelf upon the more inconſiderable barons, who had been buſy againſt him during the late war. Thoſe he either ſeverely chaſtiſed, or effectually overawed. He next laid ſiege to the caſtle of Evereux, then in the hands of Almeric, the moſt implacable of all his foes, which he took and reduced to aſhes.

This progreſs alarmed the court of France. Lewis, who certainly knew little of Henry's character, imputed his late conduct either to weakneſs or cowardice, and dropped ſome inſolent expreſſions, intimating, that he ſhould have been pleaſed to have met his brother of England in the open field. But Henry, of all mankind, was the moſt inſenſible of that glory, which muſt be purchaſed by an equal venture. In contempt, therefore, of the romantic humour of the age, he even bore the reproaches of his friends, and coldly anſwered, That he had learned a maxim from his father, which was, to ſuffer the French to ſpend their firſt fury, and then they might be eaſily conquered. And it was not long before Lewis was convinced of the truth of this maxim; the king of England determined to give him battle, that he might have an opportunity of diſplaying his military abilities. The Engliſh army was divided into three bodies; the van conſiſted of the chief nobility, who ſerved on horſeback, with their military tenants; the main body was led by Henry in perſon, at the head of his guard and houſhold troops. And the rear, on which his chief dependence lay, was compoſed of Engliſh infantry, led by two of his own natural ſons.

On the other hand, Lewis, that he might retain the Normans in his intereſt, affected to ſhew great regard for their young prince. He gave him the ſecond command in his army, and ordered him to advance towards Audely on the river Sein; he himſelf propoſing to ſupport him with the main body, and to come up time enough to join him in caſe of a battle. William accordingly moved forward at the head of a large detachment, when he heard that his uncle had marched his army into the plain of Brenville, in order to give him battle. He immediately ſent an account of this intelligence to the king of France, who advanced without delay, and diſpoſed every thing for a general engagement. The French army was divided into two lines; the firſt was commanded by the prince of Normandy, and conſiſted of the flower of the Norman and French nobility, who all ſerved on horſeback; the ſecond line was headed by Lewis himſelf, and contained the allies and French infantry.

The Norman prince began the charge at the head of the French ſquadrons, with ſo much fury, that he broke through the firſt line of Henry's army. This diviſion, conſiſting wholly of cavalry, the diſorder was communicated to the ſecond line, where Henry himſelf commanded in perſon; and the French ſtill purſuing their advantage, the king was oppreſſed both by his friends and foes. Henry, however, maintained his poſt with great intrepidity, and rallied his men, but was in the utmoſt danger of loſing his own life; for when the engagement became cloſe, the French had the advantage, and William de Criſpin, a nobleman of Normandy, in the intereſt of Robert, cut his way even to the ſpot, where Henry was giving his orders. Perſuaded that the king's death would finiſh the diſpute, he attacked him with ſo much reſolution, that Henry owed his life to the temper of his helmet; for Criſpin ſtruck him twice upon the head, with ſo much force, that though he could not pierce the helmet, yet he bruiſed it ſo greatly, that the blood poured down the king's face. Henry, however, preſerved his uſual coolneſs, and, taking the advantage of an unguarded ſtroke, he aimed a blow at Criſpin ſo happily, that he fell, together with his horſe, at the monarch's feet, and Criſpin was immediately taken priſoner.

In the mean time the third line of Henry's army, conſiſting wholly of Engliſh, was drawn up at too great a diſtance, to aſſiſt the reſt of the army during the furious attack of the French cavalry; and Lewis marching up immediately with his ſecond line, ſo well ſupported the ſucceſs of the Norman prince, that the firſt line of Henry's army was very roughly handled, and on the point of yielding to the enemy. In this deſperate ſtate of the battle, the Engliſh flew to the relief of their ſovereign. The French, till then, ſure of the victory, had now a battle to fight, with inferior numbers, but with men, who would not ſubmit to be vanquiſhed. The fortune of the day was changed, and the French totally routed, without ſo much as daring to ſtand the charge of the Engliſh. A great number of priſoners were taken in the purſuit, among whom were many noblemen, and Henry returned to Rouen in triumph. Among other ſpoils of the day, was Lewis's ſtandard, which Henry redeemed from one of his own knights, who had taken it, for twenty marks. The Norman prince behaved with the greateſt intrepidity during the whole action. On the firſt appearance of the rout, he diſmounted and fought on foot; by which means his fine horſe, with his rich furniture, fell into the hands of Henry, who, when the battle was over, ſent it back to the young Norman, together with a noble preſent, by his ſon, the prince royal of England.---An act of true magnanimity.

A. D. 1120. As both parties were now heartily weary of the war, there was but little difficulty in bringing about an accommodation between them, which was ſoon after effected by the mediation of the pope; but the intereſts of young William were entirely neglected. Soon after the peace was concluded, the prince royal of England did homage to Lewis, king of France, for the duchy of Normandy, and received the proper inveſtitures. However, this public proſperity of Henry was ſoon over-balanced by a domeſtic calamity. Henry had ordered a numerous fleet to rendezvous at Barfleur, where he ſet ſail in a kind of triumph for England, and was ſoon carried out of ſight of land. The prince was detained by ſome accident; and his ſailors, as well as their captain, Thomas Fitz-Stephen, having ſpent the interval in drinking, were ſo intoxicated, that being in a hurry to follow the king, they ran the ſhip upon a ſunken rock, where ſhe immediately foundered. The prince was put into the long-boat, and had got clear of the ſhip, when hearing the cries of his natural ſiſter, the counteſs of Perche, he ordered the ſea-men to row back, in hopes of ſaving her: but the boat no ſooner came to the ſide of the ſhip, than the imminence of the danger, which had deſtroyed all reſpect to perſons, prompted every individual to take care of his own ſafety, and ſuch numbers crowded into the boat, that ſhe immediately ſunk, and the prince, with all his retinue, periſhed. Above an hundred and forty young noblemen, of the principal families in England and Normandy, were loſt by this accident. A butcher of Rouen was the only perſon on board who eſcaped: he clung to the maſt, and was taken up the next morning by ſome fiſhermen. Fitz-Stephen, the captain, took hold alſo of the maſt, but being informed by the butcher, that prince William had periſhed, he declared he would not ſurvive the diſaſter, and accordingly threw himſelf headlong into the ſea. Henry entertained hopes for three days, that his ſon had put into ſome diſtant port of England: but on receiving certain advice of the diſmal calamity, he fainted away; and it was remarked, that he never was ſeen to ſmile, nor ever recovered his former chearfulneſs.

A. D. 1121. The king now had not any legitimate iſſue, except Matilda, or Maud, who was betrothed in the year eleven hundred and ten, when only eight years of age, to the emperor Charles V. and ſent over to be educated in Germany. Henry, therefore, fearing her abſence from the kingdom, and her marriage into a foreign family, might endanger the ſucceſſion, reſolved to enter into a ſecond marriage, his queen Matilda having been dead ſome years. Accordingly he made his addreſſes to Adelais, daughter of Godfrey, duke of Lovaine, and niece to pope Calixtus, a young princeſs of a very amiable diſpoſition, and beautiful perſon. Deputies were accordingly ſent to the court of Lovaine, and the young queen ſoon after arrived in England, where ſhe was crowned by Ralph, archbiſhop of Canterbury. Soon after the ceremony of the coronation was over, the earl of Anjou ſent to re-demand his daughter, the conſort of the late prince royal. She had fortunately come over with the king, and by that means eſcaped the fate of her huſband, when Henry complied with the demand, and ſent her back to her father.

A. D. 1122. The only material circumſtance which happened during the courſe of this year, was the death of Ralph, archbiſhop of Canterbury, a man of an excellent character, except in matters where he fancied his prerogative was concerned. He was ſucceeded in the archiepiſcopal ſee by William Corboil, abbot of St. Bennet's.

But A. D. 1123 the troubles of Normandy began to revive. The earl of Anjou being diſappointed of his ambitious expectations, by the death of his ſon-in-law, ſent over to England to demand back his daughter's portion, as the marriage between her and prince William had never been conſummated. Perhaps Henry would have readily agreed to this demand, had he not been convinced, that it was made only to furniſh a pretence for further commotions. He had diſcovered, that the natural inconſtancy of the Normans had again induced them to join with his enemies, and that a powerful confederacy was now already formed by the intrigues of the court of France. This confederacy conſiſted of ſome of the firſt perſons among the Norman nobility, who, from Henry's having no male iſſue, revived the claim of William, ſon to duke Robert. Theſe noblemen were ſupported by the earl of Anjou, who now gave his eldeſt daughter in marriage to the prince of Normandy, and with her the duchy of Maine: aſſuring him, at the ſame time, that he would aſſiſt him with all his forces, to recover his parental inheritance. Henry, not being in a condition of paſſing over into Normandy this ſeaſon, diſpatched thither his natural ſon Robert, and Ranulph earl of Cheſter, with what forces they could get together, in order to ſtop the progreſs of the rebels. They accordingly croſſed the ſea, and were joined by all the king's troops in that duchy; but the inſurgents, not having committed any act of hoſtility, they contented themſelves with viſiting all the fortified places, and putting them in the beſt poſture of defence.

During all theſe tranſactions, cardinal de Crema was ſent by pope Calixtus into England, with a legantine commiſſion, in order to reform ſeveral abuſes that had crept in among the clergy. The legate was received in the moſt pompous manner, but at the ſame time given to underſtand, that he muſt not attempt to make innovations in the kingdom, or do any thing prejudicial to the royal prerogative.

A ſynod was, however, called at London, where, among other canons, a vote paſſed, enacting ſevere penalties on the marriage of the clergy; and the cardinal, in a public harangue, declared it to be an unpardonable enormity, that a prieſt ſhould dare to officiate immediately after he had riſen from the ſide of a ſtrumpet, the decent appellation he beſtowed upon the wives of the clergy. But it happened, that the very next night, the officers of juſtice breaking into a diſorderly houſe, found the cardinal in bed with a courtezan; an incident, which threw ſuch a ridicule on his legantine character, that he immediately ſtole out of the kingdom: the ſynod broke up abruptly, and the canons againſt the marriage of clergymen were executed with more remiſſneſs than before; but in order to prevent all diſputes with the holy ſee, for the future, Henry ſent William, archbiſhop of Canterbury, to remonſtrate with the court of Rome againſt theſe legantine commiſſions, and to aſſert the liberties of the Engliſh church. It was a uſual maxim with every pope, when he found he could not prevail in any pretenſion, to grant princes or ſtates a power which they had always exerciſed, to reſume, at a more proper ſeaſon, the claim that appeared to be reſigned, and to pretend, that the civil magiſtrate had poſſeſſed the authority only from a ſpecial indulgence of the Roman pontiff. After this manner, the pope, finding that the French nation would not admit his claim of granting inveſtitures, had paſſed a bull, giving the king that authority; and he now practiſed a like invention to elude the complaints of the Engliſh monarch. He conſtituted the archbiſhop of Canterbury his legate, renewed his commiſſion from time to time, and ſtill pretended, that the rights which that prelate had always exerciſed as metropolitan, were entirely derived from the indulgence of the holy ſee.

A. D. 1124. While Robert, and the earl of Cheſter, were augmenting and repairing the fortifications in Normandy, Henry was providing both money and troops in England; and, about the middle of the ſummer, landed at Rouen, where he ordered a general rendezvous of his army. But no action of conſequence happened during the whole courſe of the campaign, both parties employing themſelves in ſtrengthening their reſpective intereſts with the people and nobles. In the mean time, the king of France ſupplied the conſpirators with all kinds of neceſſaries, though he had not yet declared himſelf in their favor. Henry, therefore, thinking it more for his intereſt to have an open than a ſecret enemy, declared war againſt France, and both parties made preparations for taking the field early in the ſpring.

Accordingly, in A. D. 1125, on the twenty-fifth of March, the army of the inſurgents advanced from Belmont to Watteville, with a deſign of penetrating into Henry's Norman dominions; but were met by the royal army, which had been increaſed by draughts from all the neighbouring garriſons, in order to oppoſe the progreſs of the enemy. William, earl of Tankerville, who commanded Henry's army, concealed the greater part of his men in a bottom, where they could not be ſeen by the enemy. Having formed this ſtratagem, he charged the inſurgents, at the head of a ſmall body of troops, near the village of Teroud, about eight miles diſtant from Rouen. The French vivacity, at firſt, bore down all oppoſition, and Tankerville retreated, with very little loſs, towards the place where his men were planted in ambuſh, where the conſpirators ſoon found themſelves ſurrounded, without being able to form themſelves properly for making reſiſtance. The rout was general, and the number of priſoners more than double that of the ſlain. Henry took particular care to improve this victory, and accordingly marched againſt all the caſtles and forts belonging to the conſpirators, which generally ſurrendered on the firſt ſummons, or, at leaſt, after a very feeble reſiſtance. Additional works were alſo raiſed round Rouen, and the fortifications of many other important places repaired and augmented. But notwithſtanding all his ſucceſs and precautions, Henry found it impracticable to conquer the averſion which the Normans ever retained to his title.

It is proper here to notice, that while Henry continued in Normandy, Alexander the Fierce, king of Scotland, paid the debt of nature, and was ſucceeded in the throne by his brother David, earl of Huntingdon, who, with the crown of Scotland, inherited large poſſeſſions in the Engliſh dominions.

Henry, having thus terminated the rebellion in Normandy, paſſed over into England, in A. D. 1126, where he found the people in general very diſcontented, on account of the enormous taxes that had been impoſed upon them, for ſupplying the exigencies of the campaigns in Normandy; while the miſeries ſuffered by the populace had almoſt driven them to deſpair. The perſons intruſted with the government during his abſence had almoſt totally neglected the executive part of juſtice, by which means robberies, thefts, and murders, were become ſo frequent, and perpetrated in ſo daring and open a manner, throughout the whole kingdom, that neither the life or property of any perſon was ſecure. Henry, therefore, made it his firſt care to reform theſe abuſes, and enacted ſeveral ſevere laws againſt all diſturbers of the public peace: at the ſame time, he cauſed forty-four criminals, who had been convicted of enormous crimes, to be executed, and puniſhed others in a very exemplary manner. While Henry was employed in reſtoring juſtice, and protecting his people from violence, the emperor Charles V. died without iſſue, leaving Maud, the daughter of Henry, a young widow and the greateſt fortune in Europe. This princeſs, as ſoon as the laſt duties were paid to the remains of her huſband, came over to England, when Henry, who had now no proſpect of children by his conſort, aſſembled the ſtates of the kingdom at Windſor, where it was propoſed, that an oath ſhould be taken by all preſent, to receive the empreſs Maud as queen of England, in caſe the king ſhould die without male iſſue. The propoſal, after a ſolemn debate, was unanimouſly agreed to, and the oath was taken accordingly.

A. D. 1127. Henry flattered himſelf with having now ſecured the peace of his dominions, but a few months convinced him, that his hopes were deſtitute of foundation. Freſh diſturbances ſoon broke out in Normandy, which called for his preſence. Henry's treatment of his brother Robert was, at once, unjuſt and inhuman. His conduct with regard to France had ſo thoroughly diſguſted that court, that a ſincere reconciliation could hardly be expected; and the French lying more contiguous to the princes who were capable of giving Henry diſturbance, it was much eaſier for them to raiſe, than for him to quell any commotions excited in his dominions. Lewis had now a favorable opportunity for diſtreſſing Henry. Charles, earl of Flanders, who had long been a firm and uſeful ally to the latter, fell by a conſpiracy of his nobles, while he was at his devotions in the church of Bruges. The right of inveſtiture of this province belonged to France, and the earldom was claimed by William, duke of Normandy, in right of his grandmother Matilda, queen to William the Conqueror. Perhaps the French court would have paid little regard to William's right, had it not been ſubſervient to their own intereſts. But on William's reſigning into the hands of Lewis all the territories he before poſſeſſed in France, together with thoſe given him as a portion with his wife, he received from the French monarch the inveſtiture of the earldom of Flanders.

Henry feared that this acceſſion of power might render the young prince formidable to him in Normandy. He therefore reſolved to detach the count of Anjou from his alliance, by forming with him a nearer connexion than ever, and one more material to the intereſt of his family. Accordingly, he propoſed a marriage between his daughter the empreſs Maud, and Geoffrey Plantagenet, the eldeſt ſon of Fulk, count of Anjou. This offer was readily accepted, and the nuptials were accordingly celebrated by the archbiſhop of Rouen, the king himſelf aſſiſting at the ceremony in perſon.

Henry had flattered himſelf that the choice of this huſband would be more agreeable to all his ſubjects, than that of the emperor, as it ſecured them from the fears of falling under the dominion of a great and diſtant potentate, who might bring them into ſubjection, and reduce their country to the rank of a province: but the barons were diſpleaſed, that a ſtep ſo material to the intereſt of the nation, had been taken without conſulting them; and Henry had too ſenſibly experienced the turbulence of their diſpoſition, not to dread the effects of their anger.

A. D. 1128. Lewis of France openly declared his intention of putting William in poſſeſſion of the dukedom of his depoſed father. And Henry, in order to prevent his deſigns from being carried into execution, invaded the French king's territories, at the head of a powerful army, having previouſly excited the Flemings to a revolt againſt their new earl, in favor of Thierry, landgrave of Alſace, who alſo pretended a title to that province. Henry advanced as far as Eſpargne, where he offered Lewis battle for eight days ſucceſſively; but the French monarch, ſenſible that his army was greatly inferior to the Engliſh, declined an engagement, and exerted all his abilities to put himſelf in ſuch a poſture of defence, as would render it impoſſible for the enemy to force him to fight on unequal terms. During this ſituation of the two armies, the earl of Flanders was making prodigious efforts for recovering the town of Aloſt, which had revolted to his rival, the landgrave of Alſace. He had reduced the town to great extremities, when Thierry, at the head of an army, much ſuperior to that of William, came to its relief. A battle enſued, in which the landgrave was defeated, and forced to fly into Aloſt for ſuccour. William immediately returned to the ſiege, and would certainly have taken the place, and his rival priſoner, had he not been wounded in the ball of his thumb, by the thruſt of a lance, during a ſally made by the beſieged. The wound, though at firſt conſidered as of little conſequence, ſoon after mortified, and he died in a few days; which unhappy accident, together with the great ſuperiority of Henry's army, induced Lewis to conclude a peace with the king of England, who was now left the undoubted heir to the duchy of Normandy, which had ſo long been a bone of contention.

A. D. 1129. Henry having ſurmounted all oppoſition, began to taſte the ſweets of eaſe and tranquillity. He now ſuffered the milder ſentiments of mercy and forgiveneſs to ſucceed thoſe of fury and reſentment, which had ſo long ruled predominant in his breaſt. He extended his pardon to all who implored it, and attached ſeveral perſons of great credit and influence to his intereſt, by acts of generoſity and kindneſs: he releaſed many of the late conſpirators, and among the reſt Mellent and Fitzgervas, whom he reſtored to their Norman poſſeſſions. Theſe acts of mercy greatly increaſed his reputation both at home and abroad; and his ſituation with his neighbours was ſuch as promiſed, that his life, which had hitherto been tempeſtuous and cloudy, would cloſe in ſerenity. During A. D. 1133, alſo every thing in England continuing in the utmoſt tranquillity, Henry took the opportunity of viſiting Normandy, to which he was invited, as well by his affection for that country, as by his tenderneſs for his daughter, the empreſs Maud, who was always his favorite. Some time after that princeſs was delivered of a ſon, who received the name of Henry; and the king, in order to inſure her ſucceſſion ſtill farther, prevailed upon all the nobility of England and Normandy to renew the oath of fealty, which they had already ſworn to her. In the interim, while Henry was enjoying his eaſe in Normandy, his brother Robert, whom he had, for ſome years, treated with great cruelty, paid the debt of nature in the caſtle of Cardiff, after being confined twenty-ſeven years, and was buried in the cathedral of Glouceſter, A. D. 1134.

A. D. 1135. The ſatiſfaction Henry enjoyed in the company of his daughter rendered his reſidence in Normandy very agreeable to him; and he ſeemed determined to ſpend the reſt of his days in that country, when an incurſion of the Welſh obliged him to think of returning to England. He was accordingly preparing for the journey, when he was ſeized with a ſudden illneſs at St. Dennis le Froment, from eating too plentifully of lampreys, a food which always agreed better with his palate than his conſtitution.

Henry now finding his diſeaſe was attended with mortal ſymptoms, became ſenſible, that his diſſolution was approaching. He therefore ſent for Hugh, archbiſhop of Rouen, his natural ſon Robert, earl of Glouceſter, William de Warrenn, and ſeveral other noblemen, then in Normandy, to receive his laſt commands. He recommended to them, in the moſt pathetic manner, the intereſts of the empreſs, without mentioning her huſband Geoffrey, with whom he was highly diſpleaſed; declaring her, and her children, by lawful ſucceſſion, to be the heirs of all his dominions, both in England and on the continent. He then ordered conſiderable ſums to be diſpoſed of in charitable uſes, and gave above ſixty thouſand pounds ſterling among his domeſtics. He ordered that all his debts ſhould be diſcharged; that all forfeitures and mulcts, lately fallen to the crown, ſhould be remitted; that all the exiles ſhould be reſtored to their country; and that all, who had been unjuſtly deprived of their eſtates, ſhould be reſtored to them, and ſuffered to enjoy them in peace and ſafety. Having thus ſettled his temporal concerns, he reſigned himſelf up to the care of the clergy, and expired on Sunday, the firſt of December, in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his age, and thirty-fifth of his reign. His body was carried the next day to Rouen, attended by a prodigious throng of people; and being there embalmed, was conveyed to Caen, and thence to England, where it was buried in a monaſtery, founded by himſelf at Reading, in Berkſhire.

Henry had many amiable qualities, both of mind and perſon. He was at once a warrior, a politician and a ſcholar. His ſuperior eloquence and judgment would have given him an aſcendant, had he even been born in a private ſtation; and his perſonal bravery would have procured him reſpect, even though it had been leſs ſupported by art and policy. By his great progreſs in literature, he acquired the name of Beauclerc; but his application to theſe ſedentary purſuits abated nothing of the activity and vigilance of his government. He was a tender huſband, an affectionate parent, and a generous maſter. He knew the true intereſts of his people better than any prince of his time; and though England ſuffered many oppreſſions under his government, yet it alſo enjoyed many advantages. The uninterrupted courſe of tranquillity, except from the incurſions of the Welſh, invited over great numbers of foreigners, eſpecially manufacturers, who diſſeminated their arts through the kingdom, and laid the foundations of a more extenſive commerce. At the ſame time, theſe virtues were ſullied by cruelty and avarice. The inhuman treatment of his brother affords a ſufficient inſtance of the former, and the groans of an oppreſſed and impoveriſhed people of the latter. Had he poſſeſſed leſs power, or could he have been perſuaded to reſign part of what he had acquired, he might have enjoyed the remainder in peace and tranquillity. But his conduct ſufficiently demonſtrated, that he was too much diſpoſed to ſacrifice all the maxims of juſtice and equity to his ambition.

With reſpect to his perſon, Henry was of a middle ſtature; his hair black, and towards his forehead buſhy; his eyes clear and penetrating; his cheſt broad and full. The affability of his addreſs encouraged thoſe who might be overawed by the ſenſe of his dignity or his wiſdom; and though he often indulged his facetious humor, he knew how to temper it with diſcretion, and always kept it a diſtance from indecent familiarities with his courtiers.

Henry's legitimate children were, 1. One ſon named William, the manner of whoſe death we have already related. 2. One daughter, generally known by the name of Maud the Empreſs, on account of her firſt marriage. Her ſecond huſband was Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, by whom ſhe had Henry, afterwards Henry II. king of England; and two other ſons, Geoffrey and William, that died without iſſue. The natural children of Henry were, 1. Robert, whom he created earl of Glouceſter in the ninth year of his reign, by Neſta, daughter of Rees ap Tudor, prince of Wales. 2. Richard, by the widow of one Anſkell, a baron in Oxfordſhire. He was drowned with his half-brother prince William. 3. Reynauld, created earl of Cornwall in the fifth of king Stephen, by Sibylla, daughter of Sir Robert Cabot, of Alceſter, in Glouceſterſhire. 4. Robert, by Editha, daughter of an Engliſh nobleman. 5. Gilbert. 6. Henry, by Neſta aforeſaid. 7. William de Tracy, ſo named from a town in Normandy; he died ſoon after his father. 8. Matilda, counteſs of Perche, who periſhed with her brother William in his fatal ſhipwreck. 9. Another Matilda, married to Conan, earl of Brittany. 10. Julian, married to Euſtace de Paiz, natural ſon of William de Breteuil, eldeſt ſon and heir of William, and elder brother of Roger, earl of Hereford, in England. 11. Another daughter, married to Matthew, ſon of Borchard de Montmorency, from whom are deſcended the antient family of that name. 12. Elizabeth, by Elizabeth, ſiſter of Walleran, earl of Meulant or Mellent, married to Alexander I. king of Scots.

The moſt remarkable occurrences of this king's reign are thus handed down to us by different hiſtorians: In the ſecond year of his reign, Glouceſter and Wincheſter were burnt. In his fourth, a comet appeared; and four circles were ſeen about the ſun. In his ſeventh, another comet was ſeen; and on Thurſday night before, two full moons appeared, one in the eaſt and another in the weſt. In his tenth, a third comet was ſeen, and an earthquake happened in Shropſhire. In his eleventh year, the river Trent, near Northampton, ceaſed to run its courſe for four and twenty hours, and ſo long the channel was dried up. There was, this year, a great mortality of men, a murrain among cattle, both domeſtic and of the field; the fowls alſo periſhed in abundance. In his thirteenth year, Worceſter city, the church, caſtle, and many citizens were burnt; and the water of the river Medway failed ſo much, for many miles, in the midſt of the channel, that the ſmalleſt boats could not float; and the Thames was ſo low, between the Tower and the Bridge, that many men, women, and children waded it over on foot, which was occaſioned, ſays Sir John Hayward, by reaſon of a great ebb in the ocean, that laid the ſands bare ſeveral miles from the ſhore, which continued for a whole day. The city and chief monaſtery of Chicheſter was burnt to the ground; and there were violent tempeſts, with a comet. During the next year, almoſt all the bridges in England, being then built with timber, were broken down by the ice, when it thawed after a ſevere froſt. In Henry's ſixteenth year, on the firſt of November, there fell a prodigious ſtorm of hail, accompanied with unuſual claps of thunder and flaſhes of lightning: in December a great earthquake happened, and the colour of the moon appeared like that of blood. In his ſeventeenth, the cities of Bath and Peterborough were burnt. In his twentieth year, there was an earthquake, in September. In his twenty-ſecond, the city of Gloceſter was burnt; and Lincoln the year following. Matthew Paris gives us the following hiſtory of founding the order of the knights templars of Jeruſalem under this year (1122.) "About this time (ſays he) ſeveral noble knights formed themſelves into a ſociety, obliging themſelves to celibacy, and to live after the manner of regular canons. The founders of this order were Hugo de Pagan and Godfrey of Eadmer, who were ſo poor that they had but one buckler and one horſe between them; in commemoration of which, the ſeal of the order has two knights mounted on one horſe. As they had no dwelling place, Baldwin, king of Jeruſalem, aſſigned them an apartment in his own palace for their reſidence, and the canons of the Temple granted them an area near the palace to erect their offices. The king himſelf, as well as the clergy, granted them a daily allowance for their table and cloathing. The knights at firſt undertook to clear the roads towards Jeruſalem from the banditti and robbers, with which they were infeſted; and in a ſhort time the order was ſo reſpectable, that it ſpread all over Europe, and was embraced by perſons of the moſt diſtinguiſhed birth and abilities." In his twenty-third year Henry built or repaired the palace of Woodſtock, and adorned it with a park, the firſt that ever was in England. In his thirtieth year, Rocheſter was almoſt deſtroyed by fire: and London in his thirty-ſecond. In the year before he died, on the ſecond of Auguſt, juſt as he was about to take ſhipping for Normandy, an eclipſe of the ſun and moon appeared; at which time William of Malmeſbury, who was then living, writes that he ſaw the ſtars plainly about the ſun. This eclipſe was followed by a moſt horrid earthquake, in which the ſame author relates, the houſe wherein he ſat was lifted up with a double remove, and at the third time ſettled again in its proper place.

STEPHEN.

SECTION IV.

THE uncertainty of human events was never in any inſtance more conſpicuous than in the ſucceſſion of Stephen to the throne of England. No prince could take more prudent meaſures for ſecuring the ſovereignty to his daughter and family, than did the late king; notwithſtanding which, it devolved on the very perſon whom Henry had the leaſt ſuſpected of making any pretenſions to the Engliſh crown.

Stephen, earl of Boulogne, was the third ſon of the earl of Blois, by Adela, daughter of William the Conqueror. His graceful perſonage, his courage, his affable demeanor, his liberality, and many other diſtinguiſhed qualities, had ſo endeared him to Henry, that he ſeemed to take pleaſure in making him rich and powerful, having beſtowed on him many valuable poſſeſſions, particularly the great eſtate forfeited by Robert Mallet in England, and that forfeited by the earl of Mortaigne in Normandy. The king had married him to Matilda, daughter and heir to Euſtace, count of Boulogne, by which marriage he acquired a new connexion with the royal family of England; Mary, his wife's mother, being ſiſter to David, king of Scotland, and to Matilda, the wife of Henry, and mother to the empreſs Maud.

In return for the many favors received from Henry, Stephen profeſſed a great attachment to him, and appeared ſo zealous for the ſucceſſion of Maud (empreſs of Germany and daughter to the late king) that when the barons ſwore fealty to that princeſs, he contended with Robert earl of Glouceſter, the king's natural ſon, who ſhould firſt be admitted to give her this teſtimony of devoted zeal and fidelity.

Notwithſtanding theſe outward appearances of reſpect, Stephen had ſelf-intereſted views at heart; he took great pains to cultivate, by every act of popularity, the friendſhip and affection of the Engliſh nation, and the many virtues with which he appeared to be endued, favored the ſucceſs of his intentions. By his activity and vigor, he acquired the eſteem of the barons, and by his generoſity and familiar addreſs, he obtained the affection of the people, particularly the Londoners. And though he was fearful of taking any ſteps towards his farther grandeur, leſt he might expoſe himſelf to the jealouſy of ſo penetrating a prince as Henry, he ſtill hoped, that by accumulating riches and power, and by acquiring popularity, he might ſome time or other be able to wear that crown, which had adorned the brow of his greateſt patron.

The empreſs Maud had a great ſpirit, and was naturally of a very turbulent diſpoſition. She had been bred up in the arbitrary maxims of the family; ſhe poſſeſſed the Norman dominions of her father; ſhe was married to a foreign prince, a ſtranger to the cuſtoms and conſtitution of England; ſo that the clergy and people of that kingdom had no proſpect from her government, but a continuance of that mode which had been practiſed by her father.

We have already obſerved, that Stephen was the third ſon of the earl of Blois; and he had a brother ſtill younger than himſelf. His eldeſt brother was defective, and therefore incapable of managing any affairs of a public nature. His ſecond brother ſucceeded to his father as earl of Blois, and claimed in right of his mother the inveſtiture of the duchy of Normandy. Though this claim was neither founded on juſtice or policy, yet he ſoon found a ſtrong party in his favor, and made himſelf maſter of ſeveral important places, before the earl of Anjou, (the ſecond huſband of Matilda or Maud, empreſs of Germany) could gain a footing there firm enough to prevent him. This prince appears to have been without the vivacity or ambition of his brother Stephen, but poſſeſſed of more honour than ſeems to have been common with the princes of that age.

Very different was the character of Henry, the younger brother of Stephen. He had been bred in the monaſtery of Augny, and was made, by the late Henry, firſt abbot of Glaſtonbury, and then biſhop of Wincheſter.

His diſpoſition was turbulent, his ſpirit bold, his tongue voluble, and his morals faithleſs. He was inconſtant or reſolute, haughty or ſubmiſſive, a prieſt or a prince, juſt as objects appeared to his own confined views and narrow underſtanding. But, with all theſe faults, his learning and high quality, joined to an addreſs peculiar to his nature, had gained him a prodigious intereſt with the clergy; and he was, in conſequence of this, eſteemed one of the moſt conſiderable ſubjects in England.

Stephen, at the time of Henry's death, was in France; and no ſooner did he hear of the event, than, inſenſible to all the ties of gratitude and fidelity, and blind to every danger, he immediately embarked for England. On his landing, the inhabitants of Dover and Canterbury ſhut their gates againſt him, in conſequence of which he haſtily poſted to London, where his brother, the biſhop of Wincheſter, and other noblemen of his party, had been ſo aſſiduous in promoting his intereſt, that he was received with the greateſt acclamations of the people, who univerſally announced him their ſovereign.

Elated with the ſucceſs he had thus met with, his next point was, to acquire the good will of the clergy, without which, he well knew it would be impoſſible to wear the crown of England, either with pleaſure to himſelf or advantage to the kingdom. His brother, the biſhop of Wincheſter, had great weight with William archbiſhop of Canterbury; and Roger, biſhop of Saliſbury, who was rich and powerful, even to envy, was the profeſſed enemy of the empreſs and her party. Her ambition, her education, her principles, and her deſpotic ſpirit, were repreſented, on all occaſions, in the moſt aggravating terms; and it was every where inculcated, that it was mean and ſcandalous, for ſo many brave men to be ſubject to the commands of a woman and a child.

Thoſe, however, who had ſworn fealty to the empreſs and her family, were not to be moved by mere invective and ſurmiſe. It was therefore neceſſary to have recourſe to ſome other artifice, to produce the deſired effect; accordingly, an expedient was found, though equally diſhonorable with the other ſteps with which this great revolution was effected. Hugh Bigod, ſteward of the houſhold, came before the primate, and voluntarily made oath, that Henry, on his death-bed, had expreſſed his concern for the ſettlement he had made of his crown; and, at the ſame time, declared his intentions of ſetting aſide the empreſs Maud and her children, if he ever ſurvived his ſickneſs. This depoſition, together with the perſuaſion of the biſhop of Wincheſter and others, ſo effectually prevailed on the credulous archbiſhop, that he readily embraced the intereſt of Stephen.

In conſequence of this a great council of the ſtates was immediately ſummoned, in which the party of Stephen appearing the moſt numerous, it was reſolved to exclude the empreſs and her children from the ſucceſſion, and ſet Stephen on the Engliſh throne. The archbiſhop accordingly anointed him, placed the crown upon his head, and declared him the rightful ſovereign of England. Stephen, however, was not inſenſible, that great oppoſition would ſoon be made by the empreſs and her party; he, therefore, the better to ſecure himſelf, paſſed a charter, in which he made liberal promiſes to all orders of men. He aſſured the clergy, that he would ſpeedily fill all the vacant benefices, and would never receive the rents of any of them during the interval: he promiſed the nobility, that they ſhould not be proſecuted for hunting in their own foreſts; and the people, that he would not only remit the tax of Danegelt, and reſtore the laws of king Edward, but would alſo grant them ſuch other privileges as ſhould make them happy under his government.

The Engliſh appearing ſatisfied with theſe conceſſions, Stephen repaired to Wincheſter, where he ſeized upwards of one hundred thouſand pounds, which had been amaſſed by Henry, for the uſe of his daughter. By means of this treaſure, he inſured the compliance, though not the attachment, of the principal clergy and nobility. But not truſting to this frail ſecurity, he invited over from the continent, particularly from Britany and Flanders, great numbers of thoſe ſoldiers of fortune, who are always ready for any deſperate enterprize, and who, under Henry, had found no employment. With theſe, and the Engliſh mercenaries, he formed a powerful army, which ſtruck ſuch a terror in the empreſs Maud's party, that there were little hopes of any attempt being made in favor of that princeſs.

A. D. 1136. In the beginning of this year the corpſe of the late king was brought over from Normandy and interred at Reading, according to his own requeſt, Stephen himſelf walking as chief mourner on the occaſion. Thoſe noblemen, who ſtill adhered to the empreſs Maud, were ſo aſtoniſhed and diſguſted at the rapid ſucceſs of Stephen, that, unable to reſiſt the torrent of popular favor, they retired to Scotland, where they were kindly received by David the then king, who was an equal advocate for the party they eſpouſed.

During theſe tranſactions, Robert, the earl of Glouceſter, natural ſon to the late king, and a perſon of ſtrict honor and great abilities, was embarraſſed with regard to the meaſures proper for him to purſue in this difficult emergency. To ſwear allegiance to the uſurper appeared to him very diſhonorable, and a breach of the oath he had taken in favor of the empreſs: to refuſe giving this pledge of his fidelity was to baniſh himſelf from England, which muſt render him totally incapable of ſerving the royal family, or contributing to their reſtoration. He therefore reſolved to take the oath of allegiance to Stephen, but with ſuch expreſs conditions as he was perſuaded the uſurper would infallibly violate.

Fixed in his reſolution of having recourſe to this expedient, he came over to England, and offered to ſwear fealty to Stephen on this expreſs condition, that the king ſhould maintain all his ſtipulations, and never invade any of Robert's rights and dignities. Stephen, though ſenſible this reſerve, ſo unuſual in itſelf, and ſo unbecoming the duty of a ſubject, was intended only to afford Robert a pretence for a revolt on the firſt favorable opportunity, was, notwithſtanding, obliged to accept his terms, on account of the numerous friends and retainers of that popular nobleman.

The intereſt of Stephen was farther increaſed by the attachment of the Norman nobility, who no ſooner heard of his having taken poſſeſſion of the Engliſh crown, than they transferred their allegiance to him, and put him in poſſeſſion of their government.

The great ſucceſs of Stephen ſo enraged that part of the nobility, who were advocates for the empreſs Maud, that they determined to make ſome attempt in her favor. Among theſe was Baldwin de Redveriis, earl of Devon, and lord of the Iſle of Wight. He had received many favors from the family of Henry I. and always objected to recognize Stephen's title to the crown. But not content with refuſing to take the oath of allegiance, he fortified the caſtle of Exeter, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the citizens, who were in Stephen's intereſt, and had applied to him for aſſiſtance.

Stephen loſt no time in protecting his friends; he marched at the head of all the forces he could collect, and beſieged the caſtle: but the place being ſtrongly fortified, the garriſon held out for three months, when they were obliged to capitulate for want of water, on condition of marching out with their baggage. In the mean time the earl, who was not in the caſtle, repaired to the Iſle of Wight, whither he was purſued by Stephen, who obliged him to fly to France, and afterwards ſeized on all his Engliſh eſtates.

This inteſtine commotion was immediately followed by another. Robert de Bathenton, a nobleman of a very debauched life, revolted, and fortified his caſtle. Stephen immediately made preparations for reducing him, and Robert, dreading the conſequence of a defeat, offered to deliver the caſtle into the hands of the king's officers. Accordingly a party was detached for that purpoſe; but Robert found means to intoxicate them with liquor, and then retired back into his caſtle, which he now determined to defend againſt Stephen.

Exaſperated at this behaviour, the king marched againſt Robert in perſon; and Bathenton, endeavouring to eſcape over the caſtle wall by means of a rope, was taken priſoner; when Stephen, contrary to his uſual diſpoſition, ordered him to be hanged up in ſight of his garriſon. The ſentence was accordingly executed, which ſtruck ſuch a terror into the beſieged, that they immediately ſurrendered.

The Engliſh nobility, alarmed at theſe diſturbances, began to fortify their reſpective caſtles, and to garriſon them with their own vaſſals, or with ſoldiers of fortune, who flocked to them from all quarters. But as the barons could not procure them ſubſiſtence, they had recourſe to rapine, ſo that England ſoon became a ſcene of violence and devaſtation. Stephen, finding that the laws were incapable of curbing his licentious nobility, determined to make his own power the meaſure of his conduct; and to violate all thoſe conceſſions, which he himſelf had made on his acceſſion to the throne, as well as the antient and eſtabliſhed privileges of his ſubjects.

The earl of Glouceſter was ſo agitated at beholding the miſerable ſituation of his country, that he determined to attempt a revolution. Accordingly, he ſettled with his friends the meaſures neceſſary to be taken in forming a powerful inſurrection, retired to the continent, ſent the king a defiance, renounced his allegiance, and upbraided him with the breach of thoſe conditions, which he had engaged to perform when he received the regal dignity.

A. D. 1138. The tranquillity of Stephen was now greatly interrupted by David king of Scotland, who entered England at the head of a powerful army, in defence of his niece's title to the throne, and penetrated into Yorkſhire, committing the moſt horrid devaſtations in all the country through which he paſſed. The fury of his maſſacres and ravages enraged the northern nobility, who determined to aſſemble their followers, and repel the army of thoſe cruel invaders.

David was no ſooner informed of this reſolution, than he retreated with his army, and beſieged Norham, a caſtle belonging to the biſhop of Durham. After a ſhort ſiege the caſtle was taken, and the biſhop refuſing to renounce his allegiance to Stephen, the Scottiſh monarch ordered it to be totally deſtroyed.

This ſucceſs ſo elated David, that he detached William, his grand nephew, at the head of a conſiderable army, into Yorkſhire, in order to attack the van of the Engliſh army, which was advanced to Clithero in Lancaſhire. William was ſo ſucceſsful, that he ſurpriſed this body of the Engliſh forces, cut great numbers of them to pieces, took ſome priſoners, and put the remainder to flight.

While William was employed in this buſineſs, David laid ſiege to the caſtle of Wark, the garriſon of which had carried off his proviſions, and routed ſeveral of his parties; but the fortreſs proving too ſtrong to be taken by aſſault, and hearing of the ſucceſs of his arms at Clithero, he left ſome of his officers to continue the ſiege, and advanced at the head of his army to York, intending to give the enemy battle, as ſoon as he was joined by the detachment under William. He accordingly entered the biſhopric of Durham, and laid the whole country waſte with fire and ſword; and being now joined by all his forces, found himſelf at the head of a very conderable army.

Though the Engliſh had been reinforced by a ſtrong body of horſe, ſent by the king, under the command of Bernard de Baliol, yet they were far inferior to the Scots in numbers, and therefore continued to act on the defenſive. They were ſoon after joined by ſeveral noblemen from the counties of Nottingham and Derby, and continued their march as far as Northallerton, where all the aſſociated barons agreed to ſtand and fall by one another; and in confirmation of this reſolution, they raiſed the famous ſtandard, which conſiſted of the maſt of a ſmall veſſel, erected on a wheel carriage, and having on the top of it a ſilver crucifix, while the pole was decorated with the banners of Beverley, St. Wilfred, St. Peter and St. John.

The Engliſh were drawn up in ſuch a manner as to ſurround this ſacred ſtandard; and the front was compoſed of pikemen and archers intermixed, to receive the firſt ſtroke of the enemy. The Scotch army was alſo drawn up in order of battle, and the Galloway-men, who were deſcended from the antient Britons, placed in the front line. The ſecond line, compoſed of a body of knights and archers, together with the militia of Cumberland and Tweedale, was commanded by the prince of Scotland; and the third, which conſiſted of Scotch Highlanders, and the forces of Lothian and Murray, was headed by the king himſelf.

The charge was begun by the Galloway-men, who fell with ſuch fury on the ſecond line of the Engliſh, that they at firſt gave way to their impetuoſity; but being ſupported by the firmneſs of the reſt of their body, and deriving great advantages from their armour in a cloſe engagement, they galled the enemy with continual flights of arrows, in ſuch terrible a manner, that having loſt their two leaders, Ulgric and Donald, they were ſo intimidated, that they fled with the greateſt precipitation.

Irritated at this, the prince of Scotland marched up to the attack, at the head of the ſecond line, and fell upon the enemy with ſo much fury, that he pierced to the rear of the Engliſh army, but met with ſuch reſiſtance, by the cloſing of the ſeparated troops on every ſide, that it was with the utmoſt difficulty he retreated. A total route of the Scottiſh forces now enſued; and the king of Scotland, with his ſon, were left to maintain their ground, attended only by their own guards. They made a very reſolute reſiſtance, and for ſome time maintained the field againſt the united efforts of the enemy. But finding it in vain any longer to reſiſt the victorious Engliſh, the king made the beſt diſpoſition he could of his few remaining followers, and retired to Carliſle, where he continued for ſome days inconſolable, imagining he had left his ſon dead on the field of battle; but that prince, after breaking through a great body of the Engliſh, made his eſcape, and ſoon after repaired to his father at Carliſle. The loſs of the Scots in this engagement is ſaid to have been no leſs than 10,000, but that of the Engliſh is not mentioned.

When Stephen received information of this victory, and of the conduct of his generals, he was ſo well pleaſed, that he conferred on William, earl of Albermarle, the additional title of earl of Yorkſhire, and beſtowed the earldom of Dorſetſhire on Robert de Ferraris, theſe two noblemen having particularly diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the late engagement.

The king of Scotland, determined to perſevere in the buſineſs he had undertaken, renewed his incurſions, and took the caſtle of Wark, after an obſtinate defence made by the garriſon. The miſeries ſuffered by the inhabitants of the northern counties, induced Albert, biſhop of Oſtia, the pope's legate, to interpoſe his good offices for bringing about a peace between the two kingdoms: but all he could obtain was a truce for a few months, during which interval Stephen had leiſure to attend to the tranſactions in Normandy, where the friends of the empreſs, encouraged by the late commotions, had taken up arms, and were making great preparations for invading England. Stephen, therefore, found it neceſſary to ſend a body of troops over to Normandy, under the command of the earl of Mellent, and William de Ypres; but the two generals ſoon found that the enemy was too ſtrong for them to hope for ſucceſs, if they came to extremities. The defection, indeed, was ſo general, that the city of Rouen was the only place of importance that was left in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh.

It muſt be here obſerved, that Stephen, at the beginning of his reign, had granted liberty to all his ſubjects to build and fortify caſtles on their own eſtates. The great barons, particularly the biſhops, together with all thoſe who were ſecretly in the intereſt of the empreſs, made uſe of this indulgence, to multiply their caſtles to ſuch a degree, that Stephen found they had, in a manner, garriſoned the kingdom againſt himſelf.

The biſhop of Saliſbury had built two ſtrong caſtles, one at Sherborne, another at the Devizes, and had laid the foundation of a third at Malmſbury. The biſhop of Lincoln, nephew to the biſhop of Saliſbury, had alſo raiſed a ſtrong fortreſs at Newark.

The king now ſaw his error, and had recourſe to unpopular meaſures to correct it. He reſolved to begin with deſtroying the caſtles of the clergy, who, by their function, ſeemed leſs entitled than the barons to ſuch military ſecurities.

He did not wait long for a favorable opportunity of carrying his intentions into execution. A quarrel happened between the followers of the biſhop of Saliſbury, and thoſe of the earl of Britany, in which ſome of the latter were killed. In conſequence of this, the prelate was ſummoned before the council, to anſwer for the riotous behaviour of his men, who had been the aggreſſors. The biſhop obeyed the ſummons, and repaired to the council attended by his two nephews, Alexander, biſhop of Lincoln, and Nigel, biſhop of Ely. On their appearance, the king inſiſted on their making ſatisfaction for a breach of the peace within the verge of his own court. The biſhops abſolutely refuſed to comply; upon which the king ordered them to deliver up their caſtles, as a ſecurity for their future behaviour, and ordered their perſons to be taken into ſafe cuſtody. The biſhop of Ely had, however, the good fortune to eſcape, and immediately repaired to the caſtle of the Devizes, which he determined to defend till the laſt extremity. But William de Ypres, being ſent againſt the fortreſs, at the head of a powerful army, carried with him the two other biſhops. On his arrival before the caſtle, he cauſed a gallows to be erected in ſight of the garriſon, threatening to hang up both the prelates, unleſs the caſtle was immediately ſurrendered. This menace had the deſired effect; the fortreſs was ſurrendered, and the prelates were obliged to purchaſe their liberties, by delivering their other caſtles, and ſubmitting totally to the will of their opponents.

The whole body of the clergy were greatly alarmed at theſe proceedings. The principal ſecurity of that order, the privilege enjoyed by prelates of not being tried in the king's courts, was attacked. But the perſon who reſented it moſt was, Henry biſhop of Wincheſter, the king's brother, now armed with a legatine commiſſion, from whence he conceived himſelf an eccleſiaſtical ſovereign, equally powerful with the civil.

This prelate aſſembled a ſynod at Wincheſter, in order to vindicate the privileges of the church, which he pretended were now openly violated. In this aſſembly, he, forgetting the ties of blood, which connected him with the king, complained of the impiety of Stephen's meaſures, who had employed violence againſt the dignitaries of the church, inſtead of waiting for the ſentence of a ſpiritual court, by whom alone, he affirmed, they could lawfully be tried and condemned, if their conduct had merited cenſure or puniſhment.

The charge being thus exhibited, the ſynod ſent a ſummons to the king, requiring him to appear before them, and juſtify his conduct. Stephen, well knowing the conſequences of eccleſiaſtical cenſures, ſent Aubrey de Vere, to plead his cauſe before that aſſembly. That nobleman enlarged upon the inſolence and offences of the biſhop of Saliſbury, and the ſuſpicions he lay under of favoring the enemies of the crown. He gave ſeveral inſtances of his diſaffection, which, he ſaid, amounted to more than ſuſpicion: nor was his contempt of the great nobility forgotten. Aubrey alſo revived the famous diſtinction made by the conqueror, who ſeized Odo, as a peer of the court, not as a prelate of the church. But the ſynod refuſed to try the cauſe, or examine their conduct, till thoſe caſtles, of which they had been diſpoſſeſſed, were reſtored to them. Aubrey replied, that the biſhops were not allowed caſtles by the canons of the church; that they were repugnant to their functions, as the preachers of peace, and could be conſidered only as the ſanctuaries of diſloyalty, and the aſylums of rebellion.

This ſpirited anſwer ſo exaſperated the clergy, that they ſeemed determined to pronounce an eccleſiaſtical anathema againſt the king and his adherents; and the biſhop of Saliſbury appealed to the pope. But Aubrey, who came prepared for all events, reſolutely declared, that the firſt perſon who ſhould preſume to pronounce any ſpiritual interdict againſt his ſovereign, ſhould never live to behold the fruits of his inſolence; and that whoever dared to carry any appeal to the pope ſhould never again enter the kingdom. The aſſembly were ſo intimidated at this anſwer, that they began to reflect on the conſequences of laying a powerful kingdom under a ſpiritual interdict, without the knowledge of the pope: they were well acquainted with Stephen's reſolute ſpirit, and therefore dreaded, that their perſeverance might ſo highly exaſperate him, as to render both their functions and perſons unſafe. Theſe conſiderations prevented affairs from coming to extremity between the crown and the mitre; and the ſynod was diſſolved, without pronouncing any eccleſiaſtical cenſures.

This difference with the biſhops, however, had fatal effects upon Stephen's government. He principally owed the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh crown to them; and the great barons, who eſpouſed the intereſt of the empreſs, were now encouraged into more open declarations of their deſigns. The people were alſo greatly diſcontented at this quarrel, which, added to the grievances they had laboured under, now produced almoſt a general diſaffection.

A. D. 1139. The empreſs, availing herſelf of this opportunity, and ſecretly encouraged by the legate himſelf, landed in England, with Robert earl of Glouceſter, and a retinue of an hundred and forty knights. She took up her reſidence in Arundel-caſtle, whoſe gates were opened to her by Adelais, the queen dowager, now married to William de Albini earl of Suſſex. The empreſs had hitherto made no public declaration, either of her own or her ſon's demands, upon the crown of England; but as her pretenſions were no ſecret, Stephen uſed every precaution in his power to prevent her intentions from being executed. He inſtantly marched with his army againſt the caſtle of Arundel. But the queen dowager, diſconcerted at his expedition, and being in no condition to ſuſtain a ſiege, ſent a meſſage to the king, aſſuring him, that ſhe was in no reſpect acceſſary to the landing of the empreſs, and that ſhe only entertained her from a reſpect to her birth and quality, augmented by a friendſhip long ſubſiſting between them.

Stephen readily accepted the queen's apology; and ordered, that the empreſs ſhould be ſafely conducted to any place in his dominions ſhe might chuſe for her reſidence. Briſtol was named on the part of the empreſs; and the king accordingly ſent his own brother, and Walleran earl of Mellent, to conduct her ſafely to that city, with an eſcort ſuitable to her quality. The earl attended her to Calne, in Wiltſhire, and the biſhop continued with her till the arrival of Robert, earl of Glouceſter, who came with a body of forces to her aſſiſtance.

The empreſs had no ſooner reached Briſtol, than ſhe openly declared her title, and aſſerted her claim to the crown of England, requiring all her ſubjects to come and pay their allegiance. This produced the deſired effect; the people flocked to her from every quarter, and ſeemed to vie with each other in duty and affection. But what was ſtill of more conſequence to her intereſt, was the acquiſition of Miles, high conſtable of England, who abandoned the party of Stephen, and declared for the empreſs. This nobleman was then in poſſeſſion of the caſtle and city of Glouceſter, one of the moſt important fortreſſes in the kingdom, as it commanded all the adjacent country to the borders of Wales. He had alſo great intereſt with many powerful noblemen, and was poſſeſſed of immenſe riches, which he freely gave the empreſs, for the ſupport of her intereſt and family. His example was ſoon after followed by many other barons; by which means, the party of the empreſs became ſo formidable as to be able to contend with Stephen for that crown, which he had ſo manifeſtly uſurped.

The military events that happened during the courſe of this year are of ſuch little conſequence in themſelves, and related in ſo confuſed a manner, both with reſpect to time and place, that they neither afford inſtruction or entertainment. We ſhall therefore paſs them over, and only obſerve, that the war was ſpread in every quarter of the kingdom, and that thoſe turbulent barons, who had already, in a great meaſure, ſhaken off the reſtraint of government, having now obtained the pretence of a public cauſe, carried on their devaſtations with redoubled fury, exerciſed the moſt implacable vengeance on each other, and ſet no bounds to their oppreſſions over the people. The caſtles of the nobility were become receptacles of licenſed robbers, who ſallying forth day and night, committed the moſt cruel ravages on the open country, the villages, and even on many of the cities; put their captives to the torture, in order to make them diſcover their treaſures; ſold their perſons into ſlavery, and ſet fire to their houſes, after pillaging them of every thing valuable. The fierceneſs of their diſpoſition leading them to commit wanton deſtruction, their rapacity was fruſtrated of its purpoſe, and the property and perſons, even of the eccleſiaſtics, generally ſo highly revered, were, at laſt, from neceſſity, ſubject to the ſame outrages, which had laid waſte the reſt of the kingdom. The land was left untilled, the implements of huſbandry deſtroyed or abandoned, and a dreadful famine, the natural conſequence of theſe diſorders, affected equally both parties, and reduced the inhuman ſpoilers, as well as the defenceleſs people, to the moſt abject ſtate of diſtreſs.

To remove the farther progreſs of theſe horrid devaſtations, in the following year, 1140, recourſe was had to negotiation, and treaties between the contending parties were frequently made, and as frequently broken. At laſt an event happened, which gave a new turn to political cabals. Ralph, earl of Cheſter, who had lately married the daughter of the earl of Glouceſter, was now firmly attached to the empreſs. This nobleman, aſſiſted by his half brother, William de Roumara, ſurprized the caſtle of Lincoln: upon which the citizens, who adhered to Stephen, invited the king to aſſiſt them in retaking it. The king readily accepted the invitation, and immediately advanced to beſiege the fortreſs.

The earl of Cheſter, apprized of the king's deſign, and finding himſelf in no condition to maintain a ſiege, left his counteſs in the caſtle, and repaired to his eſtate on the borders of Wales, in order to ſolicit aſſiſtance from the Welſh princes. He alſo applied to the duke of Glouceſter, and it was determined in the council of the empreſs, to come to a deciſive battle with Stephen, who was now carrying on the ſiege of Lincoln-caſtle.

A. D. 1141. Stephen having been informed of the enemy's intentions, determined to meet the forces of the empreſs in the open field Accordingly he raiſed the ſiege of the caſtle, drew off his troops, and put them in battle array.

The king's army was inferior in number to that of the empreſs, who depended chiefly on the Welſh, a people deſpiſed by Stephen. The army of the empreſs was divided into four bodies. The firſt was compoſed of Welſh, and headed by two of their princes; the earl of Cheſter led the ſecond, which was compoſed of his own tenants: the third conſiſted wholly of perſons whom Stephen had outlawed, and ſeized on their eſtates; and the fourth, compoſed of foreign mercenaries, and Engliſh forces, who had joined the empreſs, was led by the earl of Glouceſter.

Stephen alſo divided his army into four bodies; one of which was commanded by himſelf, another by the earl of Mellent, a third by William de Ypres, and the fourth by Allen duke of Britany.

The two armies being met, the battle was begun by William de Ypres, who attacked the Welſh at the head of his diviſion with ſuch vigor, that they were ſoon thrown into diſorder. At the ſame time, the diviſion of the outlaws fell with equal fury on the diviſion commanded by the duke of Britany, who, though ſupported by the earl of Mellent and his cavalry, was totally routed.

In the mean time, the earl of Cheſter, obſerving the diſorder of the Welſh, detached a body of forces to their relief. This aſſiſtance entirely changed the fortune of the day in favor of the empreſs. A total rout of the cavalry and the diviſion under de Ypres enſued; and that able general himſelf, together with the brave Albemarle, earl of Yorkſhire, who had alſo a poſt in the ſame diviſion, was obliged to abandon the field of battle.

The fortnne of the day now intirely depended on Stephen's own diviſion, which ſtill continued unbroken, and animated by his preſence and example, oppoſed the repeated attacks of the enemy. Armed with a battle-ax, and fearleſs of danger, he led them on, and performed wonders in his own perſon. Alone he was irreſiſtible, and excited admiration even in his enemies; but borne down by numbers, which preſſed him on every ſide, he was at length obliged to ſubmit. But even in this deſperate ſtate he refuſed to ſurrender to any ignoble hand: he called out for the earl of Glouceſter: the earl quickly appeared, and admiring the valor, while he was touched with the misfortune, of his enemy, he received the royal priſoner into his protection. The earl had too great a ſoul to treat Stephen with diſreſpect, he paid him every honour due to the character of royalty, while he continued in his cuſtody. This treatment was far different to that which Stephen received from the empreſs, for he was no ſooner delivered up to her than ſhe ordered him to be thrown into priſon.

Stephen's captivity threw a univerſal dejection over his party; and Maud muſt have remained the ſole and undiſputed miſtreſs of the Engliſh crown, had not her good fortune been blaſted by that impotence of mind which proſperity alone diſcovers. Tho' patient under misfortunes, her temper was froward and peeviſh, and her diſpoſition tyrannical. She endeavoured to arrive at power, that ſhe might be arbitrary; and ſought the crown that ſhe might exerciſe an uncontrouled and deſpotic authority. She was, however, convinced, that it was neceſſary to gain the confidence of the clergy, in order to ſecure ſucceſs, and therefore neceſſary to ſubmit, in appearance, before ſhe could ſecure the ſceptre of royatly.

The conduct of the legate had been, for ſome time, very ambiguous; and ſhewed that his intentions were rather to humble than ruin his brother. She therefore treated him with the greateſt reſpect, and had recourſe to every art to fix him in her intereſt. She held a conference with him in an open plain near Wincheſter; where ſhe promiſed upon oath, that if he would acknowledge her for his ſovereign, recognize her title as the ſole deſcendant from the late king, and return to the allegiance which both himſelf and the reſt of the clergy had ſworn to her, he ſhould, in return, be ſole miniſter, and diſpoſe of all vacant biſhopricks, and abbies, at his own pleaſure.

Theſe offers were too powerful to be rejected by the ambitious legate, who promiſed the empreſs his allegiance, on the conditions ſhe had propoſed. Accordingly the next day the empreſs was conducted to the cathedral church of Wincheſter in ſolemn proceſſion, the legate leading her by the right, and the biſhop of St. David's by the left hand, attended by a long train of nobility, both ſpiritual and temporal. The empreſs being ſeated, the legate denounced curſes againſt all her enemies, and poured out bleſſings upon her friends; excommunicated ſuch as were rebellious, and granted abſolutions to all that were obedient to her.

Though the empreſs had thus gained the protection of the legate, yet there was another important matter to be effected in order to ſecure her the throne; and this was to prevail on Theobald, archbiſhop of Canterbury, to recognize her title. This prelate, from a conſcientious ſcruple relative to the legality of ſwearing fealty to two competitors for the crown, had abſented himſelf from the conference held between Maud and Henry. This behaviour of the primate could not fail of giving uneaſineſs to Maud's party, and it was determined to gain the archbiſhop over to their intereſt. Accordingly, the court removed to the monaſtery of Wilton, where the legate required the attendance of Theobald, aſſuring him that ſuch arguments would be offered, as could not fail of removing effectually all his preſent ſcruples. The archbiſhop obeyed the ſummons of the legate; but when he was deſired to acknowledge the empreſs Maud as ſovereign of England, he declared that his conſcience would not permit him to comply, until Stephen, the ſovereign to whom he had already ſworn allegiance, ſhould abſolve him from his oath, and leave him at liberty to follow his own inclinations. He therefore requeſted permiſſion to viſit the unfortunate Stephen, in order to receive from his own mouth the anſwer that was to regulate his future proceedings. This requeſt was readily complied with, and the prelate, attended by moſt of the clergy, and a great number of the laity, repaired to Briſtol, where they found the monarch ingloriouſly fettered, like a common malefactor. Oppreſſed with the weight of his misfortunes, and knowing the conſequence of a refuſal in his preſent condition muſt be fatal, Stephen conſented to diſpenſe with the primate's fealty, and gave both him and the nobles who attended him, free liberty to comply with the neceſſities of the times. This conceſſion, which the exigence of circumſtances forced from Stephen, was conſidered as an act of free-will, and the archbiſhop ſo readily acquitted his conſcience, that immediately on his return, he joined the legate, and ſwore allegiance to Maud.

The only hopes the captive king now had depended upon the diſobliging imprudence and haughtineſs of the empreſs, which ſoon after gave her enemies advantages they could never have expected, either from their arms or their councils. She was, however, ſo deſirous of inſuring the attachment of the clergy, that ſhe was willing to receive the crown from their hands: and inſiſted on aſſembling an eccleſiaſtical council for that purpoſe. Accordingly, a general aſſembly of the clergy was ſummoned by the legate, who, well knowing that their importance would be greatly diminiſhed if they did not act unanimouſly, omitted nothing in his power to bring them over to the party of the empreſs. The night before the aſſembly met, the legate applied to ſeveral of the members, who were the moſt likely to make the greateſt oppoſition, and had the addreſs to perſuade them to revoke their former ſentiments.

All neceſſary precautions being thus taken, the ſeſſion was opened by a ſpeech from the legate, who, addreſſing himſelf to the aſſembly, told them, that in the abſence of the empreſs, Stephen, his brother, had been permitted to reign, and, previouſly to his aſcending the throne, had ſeduced them by many fair promiſes, of honoring and exalting the church, of maintaining the laws, and of reforming abuſes: that it grieved him to obſerve how much that prince had been, in every particular, wanting to his engagements; public peace was interrupted, crimes were daily committed with impunity, biſhops were thrown into priſon, and forced to ſurrender their poſſeſſions, abbies were put to ſale, churches were pillaged, and the moſt enormous diſorders prevailed in the adminiſtration: that he himſelf, in order to procure a redreſs of thoſe grievances, had formerly ſummoned the king before a council of biſhops; but inſtead of inducing him to amend his conduct, he had rather offended him by that expedient: that however miſguided that prince might be, he was ſtill his brother, and the object of his affections; but he could not help regarding his intereſts as much ſubordinate to thoſe of his heavenly father, who had now rejected him, and delivered him into the hands of his enemies: that it principally belonged to the clergy to elect and ordain kings; he had therefore ſummoned them together for that purpoſe; and having invoked the divine aſſiſtance, he now pronounced Matilda or Maud, the only deſcendant of Henry, their late ſovereign, the rightful heir to the Engliſh crown.

After the legate had finiſhed his harangue, he acquainted the aſſembly that he had taken care to ſummons the city of London, whoſe influence on public affairs was, at leaſt, equal to that of the greateſt noblemen, to ſend deputies to the council, and had furniſhed them with paſſports for that purpoſe: that he ſhould therefore ſuſpend the buſineſs till the next day, when he again expected their attendance.

The citizens of London were the only people capable of checking the preſumption of this aſſembly. Stephen had endeared himſelf to them by the openneſs of his conduct, by his royal qualities, and the virtues of his queen Matilda; and they ſtill retained that affection for him which is conſiſtent with the duties of loyal ſubjects.

When the city deputies entered the council, they were required not to give their opinion, but to ſubmit to the decrees of the ſynod. They were not, however, ſo paſſive; but on the contrary, inſiſted that their king ſhould be releaſed out of priſon. The legate anſwered, with all the contempt of pontifical arrogance, that it did not become the Londoners, who were regarded as noblemen in England, to take part with thoſe barons, who had baſely forſaken their maſter in battle; with thoſe by whoſe advice he had diſhonored the holy church, and who joined the citizens only to defraud them of their money.

The deputies finding all their oppoſition would be vain, left the aſſembly, fully determined to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to ſubvert ſuch meaſures as might be decreed by the ſenate againſt their king. But all their reſolutions proved abortive, and they were at length obliged to comply with the neceſſities of the times, and ſubmit to the empreſs, whoſe authority, by the prudent conduct of earl Robert, ſeemed to be eſtabliſhed over the whole kingdom.

Stephen's queen, ſeconded by many of the nobility, petitioned for the liberty of her huſband; and offered, that if her requeſt was granted, he ſhould renounce the crown, and retire into a convent. The legate deſired that his nephew, prince Euſtace, might inherit Boulogne, with the other patrimonial eſtates of his father; and the Londoners applied for the eſtabliſhment of king Edward's laws, inſtead of thoſe of Henry, which they conſidered as grievous and oppreſſive.

Theſe petitions were all peremptorily rejected by the empreſs, whoſe ambition ſeemed to be moſt gratified when ſhe had the opportunity by her power of perſecuting thoſe whom policy and humanity ſhould have directed her to protect. Theſe rebuffs, however, were productive of diſagreeable conſequences to herſelf: the haughty prelate (who had probably never been ſincere in complying with Maud's government) was ſo exaſperated at her refuſing the requeſt he had made, that availing himſelf of the ill humour excited by this imperious conduct, he ſecretly inſtigated the Londoners to a revolt; and a conſpiracy was accordingly formed for ſeizing the perſon of the empreſs. This deſign, however, was not kept ſo ſecret but the empreſs obtained ſome intelligence of it, on which ſhe retired haſtily to Glouceſter, in order to have recourſe to the counſel of the earl of Hereford, being diſguſted with her brother the earl of Glouceſter, who had adviſed her to purſue conciliating meaſures, contrary to her arbitrary inclinations After ſtaying here a few days, ſhe went to Oxford, where ſhe ordered a general rendezvous of her troops, and ſummoned together all thoſe who had profeſſed themſelves her adherents.

While things were in this ſituation, the earl of Glouceſter repaired to Wincheſter, with a view of bringing about a reconciliation between the legate and Maud; but all his endeavours proving abortive, he returned to Oxford, where he found the empreſs preparing to ſet out at the head of her army, with a deſign of reducing the legate to reaſon. She was attended by the earl of Hereford, and expected the arrival of the earl of Cheſter, who had promiſed to march to her aſſiſtance; but he had privately made his peace with the legate and the royal party. She, however, repaired with her army to Wincheſter; but the biſhop found means to eſcape, and having aſſembled all his followers, he joined his force to that of the Londoners, and Stephen's mercenary troops, who had not yet evacuated the kingdom. With theſe reinforcements he marched againſt the empreſs, took the city of Wincheſter, and beſieged Maud in the caſtle. Before he reached that fortreſs he had been joined by the earl of Cheſter, who now openly declared in favor of Stephen. The ſiege of the caſtle was preſſed with remarkable vigor, and the empreſs ſoon reduced to great extremities. But as nothing but famine could force her army to ſurrender, her generals applied their whole attention to ſecure a communication with the adjacent country. For this purpoſe they detached a ſtrong party to ſeize and fortify the monaſtery of Warwell, which lay about ſix miles from Wincheſter. But William de Ypres, who had continued faithfully attached to Stephen's fortune, advancing at the head of a body of troops drove them from the monaſtery into the church, where, refuſing to ſurrender, he ſet fire to it, and every ſoul periſhed in the flames.

The caſtle was now become quite deſtitute of proviſions; and the generals of the empreſs, fearing the conſequence, thought no time was to be loſt in making the beſt retreat in their power. The diſpoſition was made by the earl of Glouceſter, whoſe chief care was the preſervation of his ſiſter's perſon. Accordingly he drew up his forces, and ſent off the empreſs with the main body under the command of earl Reginald his brother; while he himſelf, at the head of no more than two hundred choſen followers, engaged to make good their retreat, and give the empreſs ſufficient time for effecting her eſcape.

As ſoon as the king's troops perceived the flight of the empreſs, they attacked the rear of her army, where the earl commanded in perſon; and it was chiefly owing to the courage and example of this nobleman, aſſiſted by the king of Scotland, who ſerved under him as volunteer, that ſo ſmall a body of men made a vigorous reſiſtance till the empreſs had time to reach the caſtle of Luggerſhal in Wiltſhire, when each was obliged to take care of his own ſafety. The Scot eſcaped by the fidelity of David Oliphant; but the earl of Glouceſter was taken priſoner.

The empreſs finding it impoſſible to make any reſiſtance in the caſtle of Luggerſhall, dreſſed herſelf in the habit of a countryman, and fled on horſeback to the caſtle of the Devizes. But the legate was no ſooner informed of this flight, than he diſpatched thither a body of horſe to ſcour the adjacent country, and prevent her eſcape, till the main body of the army ſhould arrive to beſiege the caſtle. The empreſs was now reduced to the moſt dangerous ſituation, and in order to avoid being taken priſoner, ſhe was obliged to continue her flight to Glouceſter, where ſhe was joined by Miles, earl of Hereford, who had long been violently attached to her intereſt.

The earl of Glouceſter was carried back to Wincheſter, and preſented to Matilda, Stephen's conſort, who from the noble principles of generoſity and gratitude, treated him with all the reſpect due to his rank and merit; at the ſame time ſhe had recourſe to every method in her power to bring him over to Stephen's party; but the earl continuing inflexible to the cauſe he had embraced, was, at laſt, ſent priſoner to the caſtle of Rocheſter.

Though this nobleman was only a ſubject, yet he was as much the life and ſoul of his own party as Stephen was of the other: and the empreſs, ſenſible of his merit, conſented to exchange the priſoners upon equal terms. The earl was accordingly brought to Wincheſter, to which city the king alſo repaired on his obtaining his liberty. Stephen was a ſtranger to that jealouſy ſo common to thoſe who diſpute for empire, and therefore held a familiar and friendly diſcourſe with the earl; after which they took leave of each other, but with open proteſtations on both ſides, of each continuing his utmoſt endeavours to diſtreſs the other's intereſt by his ſword.

In the beginning of the year 1142, both parties prepared to carry on the civil war with greater vigor than ever: but it was eaſily foreſeen, that while the empreſs, by whoſe proud and arbitrary conduct, all the advantages gained by her friends had been loſt, continued at the head of her party in England, they could never hope for ſucceſs. A general meeting of her adherents was therefore ſummoned, to meet at the Devizes, where it was agreed, that Geoffrey Plantagenet, huſband to the empreſs, ſhould be requeſted to ſend over the young prince Henry, that he might appear at the head of his partizans in England. The earl of Glouceſter accordingly went over to Normandy, which, during Stephen's captivity, had ſubmitted to the earl of Anjou. The earl ſucceeded in his commiſſion, and accordingly brought over the young prince with him to England.

Stephen in the mean time had ſurprized the caſtle of Wareham in Dorſetſhire, taken the city of Oxford, and beſieged the caſtle, whither the empreſs had retired for ſafety. . But on the landing of the earl of Glouceſter, affairs put on a more pleaſing aſpect; he again reduced the cattle of Wareham, took poſſeſſion of the iſland of Purbeck, and advanced at the head of an army to raiſe the ſiege of Oxford caſtle. Stephen had for ſome time preſſed the ſiege with the greateſt vigor, but the inclemency of the ſeaſon, the winter being now far advanced, had ſo reduced his army, that he had not troops ſufficient to ſurround the place. The empreſs took the advantage of this and eſcaped to Wallingford, where ſhe was ſoon after joined by the earl of Glouceſter: and Stephen, after having reduced the caſtle, retired to London, where he was received amidſt the acclamations of the people.

A. D. 1147. From the time of the eſcape of the empreſs from Oxford, nothing material happened between the two contending parties; a few caſtles were taken, and ſome ſkirmiſhes happened between detachments from each army, but nothing deciſive. This year was, however, marked with an event of the utmoſt conſequence to the empreſs. The earl of Glouceſter,, the principal ſupport of her cauſe, died of a fever, and was buried at Briſtol. In this accompliſhed nobleman, the empreſs loſt the only perſon that deſerved her intire confidence, perhaps the only one that ſerved her without views of intereſt. He was prudent, intrepid, generous and ſincere; an enemy to tyranny, an enemy to injuſtice, an enemy to deceit. He was beloved by his friends, beloved by his ſoldiers, and beloved by his country. His death was lamented by the good and the virtuous, and even Stephen himſelf dropped a tear of reſpect to his memory.

The death of this gallant nobleman gave a mortal blow to the party of the empreſs. She ſaw it would be impoſſible for her to contend any longer for the crown. Her troops deſerted, her friends acted with coolneſs, and every thing indicated a ſad reverſe of fortune. She wiſely prevented the blow that was aimed at her liberty, by paſſing over to the continent, and leaving Stephen in the quiet poſſeſſion of the throne.

A. D. 1150. Geoffrey Plantagenet, the huſband of Maud, now perceived his end approaching; and deſirous of ſettling the ſucceſſion of his dominions on the ſureſt foundation, inveſted young Henry with the honors and revenues of his duchy. In conſequence of which the prince, immediately after his death, took poſſeſſion of the duchy of Normandy, as alſo of the province of Anjou and Maine. About the ſame time he alſo contracted a marriage, by which he acquired a great acceſſion of power, and became very formidable to his rival. Eleanor, the daughter and heireſs of William duke of Guienne, and earl of Poictou, had been married ſixteen years to Lewis VII. king of France, and had attended him in a cruſade, which that monarch commanded againſt the infidels: but having there loſt the affections of her huſband, and even fallen under ſome ſuſpicions of gallantry with a handſome Saracen, Lewis, more delicate than politic, produced a divorce from her, and even reſtored to her thoſe rich provinces, which ſhe had annexed, by her marriage, to the crown of France. Young Henry, neither diſcouraged by the inequality of years, nor by the reports of Eleanor's gallantry, made his addreſſes to that princeſs, and married her in ſix weeks after her divorce, by which he attained poſſeſſion of all her dominions as her dowry.

A. D. 1152. Stephen had imprudently involved himſelf in a quarrel with the pope, at a time when his crown tottered on his brow. The holy father had, indeed, given him ſufficient reaſon for his reſentment. He had ſummoned a council to meet at Rheims; but inſtead of permitting Stephen, or even the church of England, to elect the five deputies required, the pope nominated them himſelf. Stephen complained loudly of this breach of national privilege; but Eugenius, who then filled the papal chair, regarded not his remonſtrances. Enraged at this inſult, the king refuſed them permiſſion to attend; and the pontiff, in revenge for this interpoſition, laid the kingdom under an interdict. By this ſentence all the offices of religion were ſuſpended; the churches ſhut up, and the dead were not ſuffered to be interred in conſecrated ground. An univerſal terror ſpread through the nation; and it became neceſſary to make ſubmiſſions to the pope, in order to procure a reverſion of the ſentence, which was at length happily effected.

A. D. 1153. The great power which prince Henry had acquired produced ſuch effects on his party in England, that they formed themſelves into confederacies, and determined to exert themſelves in defence of the lawful heir to the Engliſh crown.

Stephen, not imagining that this ſpirit of party could have any effect on his intereſt, and deſirous of inſuring the crown to Euſtace, required the archbiſhop of Canterbury to anoint that prince as his ſucceſſor. But the primate, to the aſtoniſhment of the king, refuſed to comply, and to avoid the violence and revenge of Stephen, made his eſcape to the continent. This flight rendered the king's attempt to ſecure the ſucceſſion in his family abortive, it being then conſidered that the archbiſhop of Canterbury poſſeſſed an unalienable right to crown the kings of England.

The archbiſhop's refuſal of anointing the king's ſon his ſucceſſor, ſtill more animated the party of Henry, and meſſengers were ſent to that prince, requeſting his preſence in England. Henry, readily liſtening to their importunities, immediately embarked, and landed on the 6th of January, 1154, at the head of a very ſmall body of troops; but their number was ſoon increaſed by the greater and moſt reſpectable part of the nobility in the kingdom.

Stephen ſaw the gathering ſtorm, and laboured aſſiduouſly to break its force. The ſeverity of the ſeaſon had no effect to leſſen his ardor. He marched, at the head of his forces, to meet the duke of Normandy; but the badneſs of the roads ſo greatly retarded his progreſs, that Henry made himſelf maſter of ſeveral ſtrong caſtles before Stephen could afford the garriſons the neceſſary relief. At laſt the two armies met in the neighbourhood of Wallingford, and made preparations for deciding, by a general action, the great conteſt for the Engliſh crown. But the nobles, unwilling to ſheathe their ſwords in the bowels of their countrymen, interpoſed their authority: a ceſſation of arms was proclaimed at the head of both armies, and ſoon after a general peace took place between the contending princes; by which it was ſtipulated, that Stephen ſhould enjoy the crown during his life, and that Henry ſhould ſucceed him as lawful heir by hereditary right.

The chief perſon that appeared dejected on this occaſion was Euſtace, Stephen's ſon, who eaſily foreſaw that there could be no agreement between his father and a prince of Henry's ambitious temper, but what muſt be greatly to his prejudice. His late and near proſpect of being raiſed to the throne, embittered his reflections. He had warmly expoſtulated with his father not to aſſent to the terms ſtipulated; but Stephen, though far from being deficient of parental affection, was obliged to give way to the neceſſities of the times. Filled with rage and deſpair, Euſtace left the army and retired into Cambridgeſhire, where he took the field at the head of an independent body of troops, reſolving to lay the whole country waſte, without even ſparing the moſt ſacred edifices. But he did not long continue to exerciſe theſe acts of cruelty; for he died ſoon after at St. Edmundſbury, and was buried at Feverſham, near his mother, the excellent Matilda, who had paid the great debt of nature about three months before.

As ſoon as the treaty between the two princes was properly ratified, the barons did homage to Henry as lawful heir to the crown; and they both repaired to London, that Henry might receive the fealty of the citizens. They were received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy by the people, who now hoped they ſaw a final period to all their miſeries; and Henry ſoon after embarked for Normandy.

Stephen being, by this reconciliation, freed from all apprehenſions of an enemy, employed himſelf to remove the ſufferings of the people, and heal the wounds of his bleeding country. He reformed many abuſes; he iſſued ſeveral wiſe and ſalutary edicts, and gave many ſtriking inſtances of his great abilities and love of juſtice. In a word, he ſeemed determined to devote the remainder of his days to the eaſe and benefit of his ſubjects; to purſue every method for ſecuring their properties, protecting their perſons, and diffuſing through the whole kingdom univerſal harmony and undiſturbed repoſe. But while he was employed in theſe offices of juſtice and humanity, he was ſeized with a diſorder called the illiac paſſion, of which he died on the 25th of October 1154, in the 50th year of his age, and in the 19th of his reign.

He was buried in the abbey church of Feverſham, which he had founded himſelf, and where the remains of his wife and ſon had been ſo lately depoſited.

Stephen was certainly, both in his perſon and qualities, the moſt amiable of all the Norman princes that had enjoyed the crown of England. He poſſeſſed, in a very remarkable manner, the talent of gaining mens affections; and the chief blemiſh he had was giving too great a looſe to ambition, of which he retained a very ample ſhare.

He was, however, a prince of great fortitude, courage, activity, prudence and generoſity. He harboured not the paſſion of revenge, and malevolence ſeems to have been a ſtranger to his breaſt. He diſpenſed juſtice impartially to his ſubjects, and cheriſhed the virtue of forgiveneſs. In a word, he was poſſeſſed of ſo many amiable virtues, that had he aſcended the throne by right of inheritance, and lived in more peaceable times, his name would have been tranſmitted to poſterity in much fairer characters than hiſtorians have thought themſelves authorized to give it:

> Or had kind fortune, in this vale of ſtriſe,
> Doom'd him to figure but in private life;
> Clear had each ray of ſocial merit ſhone,
> Obſcur'd by clouds that hover round a throne.

Stephen had three ſons and two daughters by his wife Matilda, or Maud, who was the daughter of Euſtace, earl of Boulogne, by Mary, ſiſter to Matilda, queen of Henry I.

Baldwin, his eldeſt ſon, was born in the reign of Henry I. but died an infant.

Euſtace, his ſecond ſon, and heir apparent of both him and his wife Matilda, was created earl of Boulogne when his father was made king, that dignity being the inheritance of his mother. He married Conſtantia, ſiſter of Lewis VII. king of France, and daughter of Lewis the Fat. He died on the 10th of Auguſt, in the year 1153.

William, his youngeſt ſon, married Iſabella, daughter and heir of William Warren, the third earl of Surry. After his father's death king Henry II. made him a knight, reſumed thoſe honors that he held of the crown, and reſtored him to all that his father had before he was king, namely, the honors of Boulogne, Surry and Mortaigne. He died without iſſue in the month of October 1160.

Matilda, Stephen's eldeſt daughter, was born before he was king, and died in her infancy.

Mary, the youngeſt, was a nun and abbeſs of the monaſtery of Rumſey in Hants, from whence ſhe was privately taken by Matthew, younger ſon of the earl of Alſace; and after cohabiting together ten years, they were divorced by ſentence of the pope, and the lady obliged to return to her monaſtery, where ſhe continued during the remainder of her life.

Beſides theſe, Stephen had two natural ſons, named William and Gervaſe. The former of theſe has been by ſome miſtaken for the ſame William that was earl of Boulogne; while others will have it that Stephen had no other ſon named William but the lawful one. The beſt authority we have to adjuſt this matter is from William earl of Boulogne himſelf, who, in an antient charter of his ſtill extant, not only mentions this William as a witneſs, but at the ſame time calls him his brother.

Gervaſe, Stephen's ſecond natural ſon, was begotten on a gentlewoman named Damiſetta, and born in Normandy. His father brought him over to England in the year 1140, and ſoon after made him abbot of Weſtminſter, which he retained for twenty years. He died in the year 1169, and was buried in Weſtminſter-abbey.

The moſt remarkable occurrences that happened in Stephen's reign were the following:

On the day he landed to take upon him the ſovereignty of England, there fell a moſt dreadful ſtorm of thunder and lightning, which being in the winter ſeaſon was conſidered by the people as an omen of thoſe troubles which afterwards attended the reign of their new monarch.

In his fourteenth year there fell ſo much rain in the ſummer ſeaſon, that all the fruits of the earth were deſtroyed, and a dreadful famine enſued, which laſted for ſome time, till relief could be obtained from foreign countries.

On the 9th of December, in the ſame year, began a very ſevere froſt, that continued till the 9th of February following, in which time the river Thames was entirely frozen over, ſo as to admit a ſafe paſſage not only for people, but alſo for horſes and carriages.

On the 21ſt of March 1140, there happened a prodigious eclipſe of the ſun, by which it was ſo dark, that candles were lighted at noon day, and ſeveral ſtars were ſeen near the ſun. This ſtruck a univerſal terror in the people, many of whom imagined a final diſſolution was at hand; which is a proof of the little progreſs the ſciences had made in this iſland at that period.

The hiſtory of learning, during Stephen's reign, is very ſhort and defective. The numerous rebellions and civil wars that deſolated the kingdom, diſturbed the repoſe of the ſtudious, and prevented the generality of the muſes from taking up their abode in Britain. The little learning that ſubſiſted was confined to the cloiſter, and chiefly employed in eccleſiaſtical controverſies, that had no other tendency than that of ſetting the nation in a flame, and exalting the authority of the mitre above the power of the crown; of rendering eccleſiaſtics independent of the laws of civil government, and of placing the obſervance of ſuperſtitious ceremonies above the practice of pure morality. A few, indeed, there were, who employed ſome part of their time in the ſtudy of hiſtory and the antiquities of their country, and to whoſe labours we are indebted for our knowledge of the tranſactions of theſe uncultivated ages. Their names and various productions are as follow:

Florence, a monk of Worceſter, (often called Florentinus Baronius) who compoſed a chronicle of the world, from the Creation, to the year 1118. He lived but a ſhort time after he had executed this performance, but his Chronicle was continued 50 years farther by another monk of the ſame monaſtery.

Alured, or Alfred, a prieſt of the college of Beverley, of which he was likewiſe treaſurer. This author, who was contemporary with the former, was born in the north of England, and educated at Cambridge. He appears to have been a writer of genius and abilities; but his works have ſuffered greatly by ignorant tranſcribers. He began his hiſtory during the difference between Henry I. and archbiſhop Anſelm. In his time no perſon was thought properly accompliſhed, who did not make the Britiſh hiſtory his ſtudy. This writer died in the year 1136.

Eadmerus, an author of ſenſe and gravity: he was cotemporary with Alfred, and intimately connected with the famous Anſelm, archbiſhop of Canterbury. He wrote the hiſtory of William I. William II. and Henry I. His works may be admitted as impartially written, eſpecially when we conſider that he was a profeſſed advocate for the papal authority.

William of Malmeſbury, ſo called from his being a monk and librarian of the college of Malmeſbury in Wiltſhire. This writer is deſervely placed at the head of all the Engliſh hiſtorians of his time. His ſentiments are bold and manly; his ſtyle nervous and elegant; far ſuperior to what might have been expected from the barbarous age in which he lived. His chief work is intituled, "De geſtis Anglorum," written in five books, with an appendix in two more, which he calls "Hiſtoriæ novellæ."

Theſe contain a judicious collection of whatever was to be found on record from the arrival of the Saxons till the reign of king Stephen. This writer died in the year 1142,

Simeon of Durham was a monk and preceptor of that place. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his indefatigable care and aſſiduity in collecting the monuments of Engliſh learning that had eſcaped the ravages of the Danes. He flouriſhed in the reign of Henry I. and Stephen.

The moſt diſtinguiſhed compoſition, however, of this age is that called the Saxon Chronicle, which begins with the birth of Chriſt, and ends with the death of Stephen. From the variety of ſtyle, and other circumſtances, it is evident that theſe annals were compoſed by different writers, and at various periods of time. Their authenticity, however, has ever been indiſputable, eſpecially with regard to the wars between the Anglo-Saxons and Britons; and they have been the foundation of all our hiſtories to the Norman conqueſt.-----An accurate edition of this celebrated Chronicle, with an elegant tranſlation, were publiſhed at Oxford in 1692, by Dr. Gibſon, afterwards biſhop of London.

BOOK VI.

From the Acceſſion of Henry II. to the Death of Henry III.

SECTION I.

HENRY II. SURNAMED PLANTAGENET.

NOTWITHSTANDING Stephen had, a ſhort time before his death, been very vigilant in endeavouring to reſtore peace and tranquillity to England, yet the troubles in which the nation had for a long time been involved were far from being intirely ſuppreſſed. The calamities, indeed, which he had juſt removed, rendered the moſt diſtant proſpect of peace ſo agreeable, that the people ſtrove to outvie each other in demonſtrating their attachment to Henry, who aſcended the throne with the important advantages of an indiſputable title, and an elevated reputation.

Henry, at the time he received intelligence of Stephen's death, was engaged in beſieging a caſtle on the frontiers of Normandy; but fearleſs of the efforts of William, the ſon of Stephen, who was too contemptible to form a party, he continued the ſiege till the garriſon ſurrendered. As ſoon as this was accompliſhed he embarked for England, where he landed on the 8th of December 1154, and was received by the nobility amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people. On the 19th of the ſame month he was crowned at Weſtminſter, together with his queen Eleanor, by Theobald, then archbiſhop of Canterbury.

After the ceremony of his coronation was over, he retired to the abbey of Bermondſey, with an intention, as he pretended, of ſpending his Chriſtmas there, but in reality, to concert ſuch meaſures as might be moſt conducive to the intereſt and tranquillity of his people.

A. D. 1155. The firſt diſplay that Henry gave of his good wiſhes for the welfare of his country was, by diſmiſſing all thoſe mercenary ſoldiers, who had committed infinite diſorders in the kingdom. Theſe he ſent abroad, together with their leader, William de Ypres, the great friend and confident of Stephen. He then revoked all the grants made by his predeceſſors, and even thoſe which neceſſity had extorted from the empreſs his mother: and that princeſs, who had reſigned her rights in favor of Henry, made no oppoſition to a meaſure ſo neceſſary to ſupport the dignity of the crown. He repaired the coin which had been ſhamefully debaſed during the late confuſions, and took proper meaſures for preventing a return of the like abuſes. He likewiſe, in order to preſerve a proper authority to the laws, demoliſhed all the caſtles that had been erected ſince the reign of Henry I. which had become the ſanctuaries of robbers and diſturbers of the peace, retaining only a few on account of their advantageous ſituation for the defence of the kingdom.

Having taken theſe neceſſary precautions, he formed a council to aſſiſt him in the weighty concerns of government. The principal of theſe were Theobald, archbiſhop of Canterbury, Thomas Becket, archdeacon of the ſame ſee, lately made chancellor, and Robert, earl of Leiceſter, high juſticiary of the kingdom.

Matilda, the king's mother, being a princeſs of natural ſagacity, improved by experience, was declared preſident of this council, by the advice of which, Henry convened a general aſſembly or parliament, where he cauſed the barons to take the oath of allegiance to his two ſons, Henry and William, though then in a ſtate of infancy. He alſo reſtored the laws of Edward the Confeſſor, confirmed the charter granted by Henry I. his grand-father, and made ſeveral regulations to the intereſt and welfare of the realm.

Theſe meaſures reflected great reputation on the new government, and ſo conciliated the affections of the people, that Henry enjoyed the crown in uninterrupted tranquillity. But a ſtate of inactivity was not agreeable to the inclination of Henry, and the conqueſt of Ireland ſoon employed his thoughts. A bull from pope Adrian was obtained for that purpoſe; but this expedition was poſtponed, according to ſome hiſtorians, becauſe the empreſs Matilda, who was now in England, diſapproved of it.

A. D. 1156. In the beginning of this year Henry embarked for Normandy, in order to oppoſe the attempts of his brother Geoffrey, who, during his abſence, had made an incurſion into Anjou and Maine, and taken poſſeſſion of a conſiderable part of theſe provinces, to which he pretended a right. On the king's appearance, the people returned to their allegiance; and Geoffrey, finding it would be in vain to contend with the ſuperior power of his brother, reſigned his claim for an annual penſion of a thouſand pounds. But, at the ſame time, Geoffrey took poſſeſſion of the county of Nantz, which the inhabitants, who had expelled count Noel, their prince, put into his hands.

When Henry had thus ſettled his affairs in Normandy, he returned to England, where he found that the reſtleſs Welſh had made ſeveral cruel invaſions during his abſence. On this occaſion Cadwalader, brother to Owen, one of the princes of Wales, applied to Henry for protection, and encouraged him to revenge the inſults of the Welſh, by invading their country. Henry accordingly marched at the head of a powerful army to Cheſter, where he received advice, that Owen had advanced as far as Baſingweark to meet him. Henry immediately reſolved to attack the Welſh prince, and accordingly ſet out, at the head of a detachment, conſiſting of the flower of his army, to give him battle; but in his march through a thick wood, he was attacked by the enemy, and the Engliſh, being pent up on every ſide, by eminences poſſeſſed by the Welſh, were very roughly handled. In the midſt of this confuſion, Henry de Eſſex, hereditary ſtandard-bearer, being ſeized with a panic, let the royal ſtandard drop from his hands, and betook himſelf to flight, exclaiming that the king was ſlain. But Henry ſoon appeared in perſon, rallied his troops, and brought them off with great honor, though, from the advantageous ſituation in which Owen had placed himſelf, he was obliged to retire to Rutland caſtle.

A. D. 1157. In the beginning of the ſpring, Henry again marched with his forces againſt the Welſh prince, and having experienced the danger of paſſing through moraſſes and unknown foreſts, ordered the woods to be cut down, and the roads to be opened, marching with the utmoſt caution, and ſending out parties to reconnoitre the country as they paſſed. By theſe means, he proceeded to Snowdon without interruption, where Owen and his barons, finding themſelves unable to oppoſe his progreſs, ſued for peace, ſwore fealty, delivered hoſtages, and reſtored all the caſtles and lands they had taken during the reign of Stephen.

Soon after the king's return from this expedition, Henry de Eſſex was accuſed, by Henry de Montfort, of treaſon and cowardice. As the fact was notorious, the accuſed had no other defence than that of ſingle combat, in which he was vanquiſhed by his accuſer. The king, however, thought proper to ſave his life, which was now forfeited, but confiſcated his eſtate, and ordered him to be ſhut up in a monaſtery during the remainder of his life.

A. D. 1158. The king's happineſs was this year increaſed by his queen being delivered of a prince, who was baptized by the name of Richard, and afterwards ſucceeded him on the throne. And the following year his family was farther increaſed by the birth of a fourth ſon named Geoffrey, on which occaſion he and his queen were again crowned at Worceſter. At this ſolemnity the king and queen laid their crowns on the altar, and ſolemnly ſwore never to wear them again; and this is ſuppoſed to have aboliſhed the cuſtom of the kings wearing their crowns at the celebration of great feſtivals, as we do not find any inſtances of it in the ſucceeding reigns.

Geoffrey, the king's brother, who had lately taken poſſeſſion of Nantz, dying about this time, Henry, though he had no other title to that county, than the voluntary ſubmiſſion or election of the inhabitants, laid claim to the territory as devolved to him by hereditary right, and went over to ſupport his pretenſions by force of arms. Conan, duke or earl of Britany, pretended that Nantz had been lately ſeparated by rebellion from his principality, to which of right it belonged; and accordingly, on the death of Geoffrey, took poſſeſſion of the diſputed territory. Henry, in order to prevent Lewis the French king from interpoſing in this controverſy, paid him a viſit; and ſo allured him by careſſes and civilities, that an alliance was contracted between the two monarchs, and they agreed that young Henry, heir to the Engliſh crown, ſhould be betrothed to Margaret of France, though the former was only five years of age, and the latter ſtill in her cradle. Secure from meeting with any interruption from France, Henry now advanced at the head of his army into Britany; and Conan, deſpairing of ſucceſs againſt ſo powerful an enemy, delivered up the county of Nantz to the Engliſh monarch. But this incident procured Henry ſtill greater advantages than the ſurrender of Nantz. Conan, harraſſed by the turbulent diſpoſition of his adherents, was deſirous of procuring the ſupport of ſo powerful a monarch; and accordingly betrothed his daughter and only child, yet an infant, to Geoffrey, the king's third ſon, who was then of the ſame tender years.

A. D. 1159. The acquiſitions thus obtained, were far from ſatisfying the ambitious temper of Henry, who now reſolved to carry into execution his grand project of entering the city of Tholouſe, with all its dependencies. Philippa, mother to his queen Eleanor, was the only iſſue of William IV. count of Tholouſe; and ſhould have inherited his dominions, had not that prince, deſirous of preſerving the ſucceſſion in the male-line, conveyed the principality to his brother, Raymond de St. Giles, by a contract of ſale, which, in that age, was regarded as fictitious and illuſory. By this means the county of Tholouſe came to be diſputed between the male and female heirs; and the one or the other, as opportunities favored their pretenſions, had obtained poſſeſſion. Alphonſo, the ſon of Raymond, was the reigning ſovereign; and on Henry's reviving his wife's claim, had recourſe for protection to the king of France. Lewis himſelf, when married to his wife, had aſſerted the juſtice of her claim, and, in conſequence, demanded poſſeſſion of Tholouſe; but his ſentiments changing with his intereſt, he now determined to defend, by his power and authority, the title of Alphonſo. Henry was therefore convinced that nothing but a powerful army could ſupport his pretenſions.

The feudal conſtitution required that each military tenant ſhould attend the prince, with a certain number of his vaſſals. But Henry, convinced from experience, that an army compoſed of ſuch troops was very untractable and undiſciplined, levied upon his vaſſals in Normandy and other provinces, remote from Tholouſe, a ſum of money inſtead of their ſervice; and this commutation, by reaſon of the great diſtance, was ſtill more advantageous for his Engliſh vaſſals. He therefore impoſed a ſcutage of three pounds on every knight's fee, a condition, which though unuſual, perhaps the firſt to be met with in hiſtory, the military tenants willingly paid; and with this money Henry hired an army that was more under his command, and on whoſe ſervice he could place a more certain dependance.

Beſides theſe precautions, Henry had taken care to gain over to his party, Berenger, count of Barcelona, and Trincavel, count of Niſmes. Aſſiſted by theſe princes he invaded the county of Tholouſe; and after taking Verdun, Caſtlenau, and other places, he beſieged the capital of the province, and was likely to ſucceed in his attempt, when Lewis, advancing before the main body of his army, threw himſelf into the place, with a ſmall reinforcement. Henry was urged by ſome of his miniſters to proſecute the ſiege, take Lewis priſoner, and impoſe his own terms in the pacification; but this he rejected, declaring that he would not attack a place defended by Lewis in perſon. He accordingly raiſed the ſiege, and a treaty of peace was ſoon after concluded between the two monarchs.

A. D. 1160. This peace, however, was but of ſhort continuance: ambition ſoon diſſolved the bands of amity. Henry's eldeſt ſon had, for ſome time, been affianced to Margaret, the daughter of Lewis, and it was agreed, by the marriage treaty, that the princeſs ſhould have the city of Giſors with part of Norman Vexin, for her portion; and that theſe places ſhould remain in the cuſtody of the Knights Templars, till the marriage was celebrated. Deſirous of obtaining the poſſeſſion of thoſe valuable places, Henry prevailed upon the cardinals Piſa and Pavia to grant him a ſynodical decree, diſpenſing with the nonage of the parties. The nuptials were immediately celebrated, though the prince was but ſeven, and the princeſs only three years of age; and the Templars, conſidering themſelves as free from their engagements, delivered up the caſtle of Giſors and the other places aſſigned as Margaret's dower to Henry.

It is little to be wondered at that ſuch conduct as this ſhould greatly exaſperate Lewis. His firſt reſentment fell upon the Templars, to whom the cuſtody of the caſtle had been committed, and who were baniſhed from his dominions. This would certainly have been ſucceeded by a war between the two monarchs, had it not been for Pope Alexander III. who, deſirous of preventing the effuſion of human blood, interpoſed, and brought about a reconciliation. Alexander, who the preceding year had been driven from Rome, by the anti-pope Victor IV. had retired into France, Lewis as well as Henry having acknowledged him for the true ſucceſſor of St. Peter, and the pontiff in return was deſirous of bringing about a peace between the two princes, who were equally his friends. The contending monarchs met his holineſs at the caſtle of Torci on the Loire. They immediately diſmounted to receive him, and each of them holding one of the reins of his bridle walked on foot by his ſide, and in this manner conducted him into the caſtle. Such was the ſuperſtitious bigotry of the times!

This year William, earl of Blois, ſon to king Stephen, died in his return from the expedition of Tholouſe, in which he had accompanied the king.

A. D. 1162. Henry had been now ſo long in Normandy, that his affairs in England required his preſence. He accordingly embarked, and landed at Southampton, where he was received by all the nobility, both ſpiritual and temporal, with great demonſtrations of joy. Soon after his arrival, he began to execute a project which he had a long time before concerted. The clergy had, for ſeveral years, been making gradual advances on the prerogative of the crown, and their power was now arrived to ſuch an amazing height, that it became doubtful, whether the king, or the archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſhould be conſidered as the head of the kingdom. Henry had, for ſome time, determined to ſtop the rapid courſe of eccleſiaſtical ambition; but the mild character, and advanced age of Theobald, archbiſhop of Canterbury, together with his merit, in refuſing to place the crown on the head of Euſtace, the ſon of Stephen, prevented Henry, during the life time of that prelate, from taking any meaſures againſt the multiplied encroachments of the clergy. That obſtacle was, however, now removed, the biſhop having, ſome time ſince, paid the debt of nature, and Thomas-a-Becket, the chancellor of ſtate and prime miniſter, placed in the archiepiſcopal ſee.

Henry now flattered himſelf with poſſeſſing a long ſeries of peace and tranquillity; but he was greatly deceived, and his life rendered unhappy by the very perſon who owed his whole fortune to his bounty. This was the celebrated Thomas-a-Becket, lately promoted to the ſee of Canterbury, whoſe conduct ſet the nation in a flame, and rendered abortive the ſcheme that Henry had formed for confining the eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction within proper bounds, and of repreſſing the licentiouſneſs of the clergy.

As this perſon makes a conſiderable figure in the preſent reign, we ſhall be particular in deſcribing the riſe and progreſs of his power, with the conduct he exerciſed after the various emoluments to which he was raiſed.

This famous eccleſiaſtic was the ſon of a citizen of London, and had ſpent his youth in the ſtudy of the civil and canon law at Boulogne. He was poſſeſſed of very ſingular talents, and had a ſpirit not to be daunted even by the frowns of royalty. He had been raiſed by Theobald, archbiſhop of Canterbury, to conſiderable preferments in the church, and on Henry's acceſſion to the crown, was recommended to him by that primate as a perſon worthy of his confidence and favor. Henry accordingly promoted him to ſeveral places of truſt, and ſoon after to that of chancellor, one of the firſt civil offices in the kingdom. After obtaining that high poſt, Becket was made provoſt of Beverly, dean of Haſtings, and conſtable of the Tower: he was put in poſſeſſion of the honors of Eye and Berkham, two large baronies, which had eſcheated to the crown; and, to complete his grandeur, he was entruſted with the education of prince Henry, the king's eldeſt ſon, and heir apparent to the crown.

The pomp of his retinue, the ſumptuouſneſs of his furniture, the luxury of his table, and the munificence of his preſents, were conformable to theſe great preferments, or rather exceeded any thing which England had before ſeen in any ſubject. A great number of knights were retained in his ſervice; the greateſt barons were proud of being received at his table; his houſe was a place of education for the chief nobility; and the king himſelf frequently condeſcended to take part of his entertainments. As his way of life was ſplendid and opulent, ſo his amuſements and occupations were gay and ſprightly. He employed himſelf, at leiſure hours, in hunting, hawking, gaming, and horſemanſhip; he expoſed his perſon in ſeveral military actions; he carried over, at his own expence, ſeven hundred knights to attend the king in his wars at Tholouſe; in the ſubſequent wars on the frontiers of Normandy, he maintained during forty days, twelve hundred knights, and four thouſand of their train; and, in an embaſſy to France, with which he was entruſted, he aſtoniſhed that court with the number and magnificence of his retinue.

Theobald, the late archbiſhop of Canterbury, being a ſtranger to ambition, had, like his immediate predeceſſor, lived in a good correſpondence with the ſtate, and all great points of controverſy between the royal and eccleſiaſtical powers, had lain rather dormant than explained. Becket had always behaved ſo little like a churchman, that Henry never imagined he would revive the controverſy, eſpecially as the former was well acquainted with the king's intention of retrenching, or rather of confining, within the antient bounds, all eccleſiaſtical privileges.

Becket, however, was no ſooner inveſted with this high dignity, which rendered him, during life, the ſecond perſon in the kingdom, with ſome pretenſions of aſpiring to be the firſt, than his demeanor and conduct were both altered. He now endeavoured to reretrieve the character of ſanctity, which he had, in a great meaſure, loſt, by his buſy and oſtentatious courſe of life. Without conſulting the king, he immediately returned into his hands the commiſſion of chancellor, pretending, that he intended now to attach himſelf ſolely to the exerciſe of his ſacred function. He affected the greateſt auſterity, and moſt rigid mortification. He wore ſackcloth next his ſkin, which, by his affected care to conceal, was neceſſarily the more remarked by all the world. His uſual diet was bread, his drink water, which he rendered ſtill farther unpalatable, by an infuſion of bitter herbs. He daily, on his knees, waſhed the feet of thirteen beggars, whom he afterwards diſmiſſed with preſents. He gained the affection of his monks by his frequent charities to the convents and hoſpitals. Every perſon who made profeſſion of ſanctity was admitted to his converſation, and returned full of panegyrics on the humility, as well as the piety and mortification of the holy primate.

A. D. 1163. Becket, having by this conduct obtained the general applauſe of the people, determined to oppoſe the meaſures formed by Henry to reſtrain the eccleſiaſtical power: in the commencement of which he endeavoured to intimidate the king by the intrepidity and boldneſs of his enterprizes. He ſummoned the earl of Clare, a nobleman of great intereſt and reputation, to ſurrender the barony of Tunbridge, which had formerly belonged to the archbiſhopric of Canterbury, but had been in the poſſeſſion of the family of that nobleman ever ſince the conqueſt. Becket alledged, that it was not in the power of any of his predeceſſors, to alienate lands in prejudice of the church. But the earl having received his eſtate from the crown, diſregarded the ſummons. The primate went ſtill farther, and claimed, upon the ſame principle, from the king himſelf, the cuſtody of the caſtle and tower of Rocheſter. He alſo claimed the right of preſenting to all the vacant churches belonging to the tenants who held of the archbiſhopric. In conſequence of this claim, the primate preſented one Lawrence, a prieſt, to the church of Eynesford; but the incumbent was violently expelled by William de Eynesford, a military tenant of the crown, and patron of the living in queſtion. The archbiſhop, who acted both as judge and party, in ſpiritual courts, excommunicated Eynesford, who complained to the king of the injury he had received, without the previous conſent of the ſovereign. The king immediately ſent the primate orders to abſolve the complainant: but received for anſwer, that it did not belong to him to command him, either to abſolve or excommunicate any perſon. Nor would he ſubmit to obey the royal mandate, till Henry was obliged to have recourſe to menaces.

Theſe proceedings were preludes to an open rupture between the king and archbiſhop, which was daily enlarged from various circumſtances. During the late reign a great number of perſons, abſolutely unqualified for the function, in order to enjoy the protection of the church, had received holy orders, through the indulgence and venality of the biſhop; and theſe, having no benefices, belonged to no dioceſe, in conſequence of which, not being ſubject to any juriſdiction, they committed the moſt flagrant enormities with impunity.

This perverſion of eccleſiaſtical power excited the reſentment of the whole nation, who had endeavoured, without ſucceſs, to ſuppreſs it. Henry himſelf had long determined to put an end to theſe atrocious diſorders, by puniſhing the offenders with the utmoſt ſeverity; and a circumſtance now offered that gave him an opportunity of putting his deſign into execution.

A clergyman of inferior rank, having debauched the daughter of a gentleman in the county of Worceſter, was ſeized by the enraged father, whom the villain baſely murdered. The king inſiſted on the aſſaſſin's being tried in the ſecular court, but Becket, interpoſing his prerogative, objected, and committed him to the biſhop's priſon. The nobility, alarmed at this exceſs of inſolence, told the king, that unleſs preventive meaſures were immediately taken, his authority would be totally diſannulled, and the clergy uſurp abſolute deſpotiſm throughout the whole kingdom.

The king, therefore, to ſtem this growing evil, ſummoned an aſſembly of the prelates at Weſtminſter; and after enumerating the diſorders that daily reſulted from the perverſion of eccleſiaſtical power, and the iniquity of ſpiritual courts, inſiſted, that for the future, one of his judges might aſſiſt at the trial of every offender, where life was immediately concerned; and that every murderer (if of the church) ſhould be degraded from his prieſthood, and conſigned over to ſecular puniſhment. But the prelate alledged, in oppoſition to the remonſtrances of his ſovereign, the immunities of the church, and roundly aſſerted, in the hearing of the whole convocation, that a clergyman ought not to be put to death for any crime whatever.

Though the aſſembly endeavoured to ſet forth the evil conſequences that muſt ariſe from the admittance of ſuch a doctrine, the archbiſhop continued to enforce and vindicate it; ſo that their deliberations proved ineffectual, and they returned to the council without coming to any reſolution. The king, exaſperated at their obſtinacy, demanded, whether they would obſerve the laws and cuſtoms of the crown? to which the archbiſhop replied, in the name of the reſt, that they would obey them in all points, that did not infringe on the rights of their order.

The king, diſſatisfied with this evaſive anſwer, inſiſted on an abſolute compliance with the conſtitutional laws of the realm, and on the clergy perſiſting to refuſe, he left the aſſembly incenſed, and retired immediately to Woodſtock. The biſhops, alarmed at the abrupt departure of the king, began to reflect on their preſent critical ſituation. They knew the power of the archbiſhop at the court of Rome, nor were they inſenſible of the importance of a king, eſtabliſhed on the Engliſh throne, maſter of large revenues, and poſſeſſed of a powerful armament; they therefore thought it prudent to make their intereſt as barons, and to pay a proper obedience as prelates.

Various endeavours were uſed to bend the inſolent and haughty prelate; but he withſtood them all; till at length, Robert de Melun, his domeſtic chaplain, and Philip, abbot of Eleemoſina, ſent over by the pope in quality of a legate a latere, to compromiſe their differences, prevailed on him to conform to the king's pleaſure. He then viſited the king at Woodſtock, retracted the offenſive reſervation, and promiſed on the faith of an honeſt man, to maintain the ſtricteſt adherence to the laws and cuſtoms of the kingdom.

A. D. 1164. The king, in order to prevent any future infringement on the civil eſtabliſhment of the realm, aſſembled a general council of the prelates and nobility at Clarendon, in which the famous conſtitutions called by that name, were enacted into laws, the ſubſtance of which are as follow:

That all ſuits relative to preſentations, ſhall be preferred to the deciſion of the king's court; that all crimes committed by clergymen ſhall be cognizable in the king's court, without infringing on the eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction; but a clerk on conviction, ſhall forfeit his privilege, and the protection of the church; that no biſhop or other clergyman ſhall quit the realm, without obtaining the king's licence, nor procure that licence, without previous ſecurity, for abſtaining from every thing prejudicial to the king and kingdom during his abſence; that excommunicated perſons ſhall be exempted from oath, or giving ſecurity for remaining in the place of their reſidence; but at the ſame time be obliged to comply with the judgment of the church, in order to obtain abſolution; that accuſation ſhall be brought againſt no lay perſon in the eccleſiaſtical court without legal and reputable evidence in preſence of the biſhop; and if the perſon arraigned ſhould be ſuch as nobody would venture to accuſe, the ſheriff, at the inſtance of the biſhop, ſhould oblige twelve reputable men of the neighbourhood to declare upon oath what they knew of the matter: that no tenant in capite, or miniſterial officers of the king, ſhould be excommunicated, or his lands laid under an interdict, without the concurrence of the king, and in his abſence, of his juſticiary: that appeals in eccleſiaſtical cauſes ſhould be made from the archdeacon to the biſhop, from the biſhop to the archbiſhop, and laſtly to the king, to be determined by his precept in the court of the archbiſhop, biſhop, but to proceed no farther without the king's conſent; that all ſuits between laymen and eccleſiaſtics about tenures, ſhould be tried before the king's juſticiary, by the verdict of twelve reputable men, and if the tenure ſhould be found Frank Almoine, the ſuit ſhould be referred to the eccleſiaſtical court; but if a lay fee determined in the king's court, unleſs both parties hold of the ſame lord, whether ſpiritual or temporal, in which caſe the ſuit ſhould be tried in his court; but the perſon ſeized of the tenement in queſtion, ſhould not, on account of ſuch verdict, be diſſeized till the determination of the ſuit: that any tenant of the king's demeſnes, ſummoned by the archbiſhop or biſhop, to anſwer for a miſdemeanor, that ſhould fall under their cognizance, might, for contempt of ſuch ſummons, be interdicted from divine ſervice, but not excommunicated till he ſhould be reſigned to that ſentence by the king's officer, in default of making proper ſatisfaction: that all archbiſhops, prelates and clergymen, where dignities and benefices ſhould depend on the king in capite, ſhould hold their poſſeſſions, as baronies, appear before the king, juſtices and miniſters, to anſwer the duties of their tenure, obſerve and perform all the royal cuſtoms, rights and ſervices, and like other barons ſit as judges in the king's court, until ſentence ſhould begin to be pronounced for the loſs of life or limb, and then they ſhould be at liberty to withdraw: that the king ſhould enter into poſſeſſion of all vacant ſees, abbeys and priories, of royal patronage and foundation, and that in filling up theſe vacancies, the chapter or convent ſhould be aſſembled, the election made in the chapel royal with the king's conſent, and the perſon elected ſhould, before his conſecration, do homage, and ſwear fealty to the king, as his liege lord of life, limb, and terrene honor, ſaving his order: that any nobleman, oppoſing or rejecting the legal deciſions of the eccleſiaſtical court, ſhould be compelled to ſubmit by the king's authority; and any perſon refuſing to ſtand to the award of the king's court, ſhould be proſecuted by the eccleſiaſtical authority, till the king's award ſhould receive ſatisfaction: that goods and chattels forfeited to the king, ſhould belong to his majeſty, whether found within or without the precincts of the church: that the king's court ſhould try all ſuits for debts due upon oath, ſolemn promiſe, or otherwiſe contracted; and that the ſons of copyholders ſhould not be ordained, without the conſent of the lord of the manor, in which they were born.

Theſe articles were conſidered by the aſſembly as containing the genuine ſenſe of the prelates and nobility of England, touching the ſubordination of the eccleſiaſtical to the civil power; but when, for their greater ſecurity, the prelates were deſired to affix their ſeals to them, Becket refuſed, and affected remorſe for having aſſented to articles, which, on reflection, he conſidered as dangerous encroachments on the prerogative of the church.

The pope, in order to prevent an open rupture between the king and the primate, ſent over the archbiſhop of Rouen, with a commiſſion to compromiſe the difference between them; but the king would hearken to no propoſals, unleſs the pope would conſent to confirm by bull, the conſtitutions of Clarendon; and in order to effect this, he ſent over one of his domeſtic chaplains, to ſolicit a grant of legation from his holineſs in favor of Roger archbiſhop of York: this the pontiff refuſed, but complimented the king with the offer of that power, on condition of its not being exerciſed to the prejudice of the primate.

Henry, however, was not to be caught with this bait; he declined the offer, and at the ſame time took care to expreſs himſelf in ſuch terms in relation to Becket, whenever the pope's ambaſſador was preſent, that it was generally apprehended by all Becket's friends, that the king was bent upon his ruin.

The archbiſhop, alarmed at this, applied to Henry for leave to go on a viſit to pope Alexander, whoſe advice he pretended to want in regard to ſome church affair, but was refuſed; whereupon he embarked privately on board a veſſel at Romney, in order to make his eſcape over to France; but being put back by contrary winds, he went to Woodſtock, where the king then reſided, in hopes of being able to mollify him; but Henry was by this time ſo thoroughly incenſed againſt him, that he refuſed him audience, and he was obliged to depart without an interview.

Though Henry was ſenſible that the late behaviour of Becket had ſubjected him to the moſt rigorous puniſhment that inſulted majeſty could inflict, yet he choſe to proceed againſt him by the moſt conſtitutional meaſures; he therefore called a new council at Northampton, about the beginning of October 1164, at which no leſs than four impeachments were preferred againſt the turbulent and haughty prelate.

The firſt was for contumacy, in not having appeared at the king's court in perſon, to anſwer a writ brought againſt him, by John, mareſchal of the exchequer, who had ſued the primate in the archiepiſcopal court for ſome lands belonging to the manor of Pagham; and who, thinking the determination illegal, had appealed from thence to the king's court for juſtice. The archbiſhop, ſtanding upon his defence, was convicted, and a fine levied on him of 500l.

The ſecond article was, his having embezzled 300l. he had received of the iſſues of the honors of Eye and Berkhamſtead. In anſwer to this article he alledged, that he had laid out a greater ſum in the repairs of royal caſtles, and wanted to wave the proſecution, becauſe he was not cited to the council on that account; but the king denying his firſt allegation, and demanding immediate judgment, he agreed to refund the money.

The third charge brought againſt him was for 500 marks which he had borrowed from the king. The archbiſhop pleaded, that he was unprepared to anſwer upon thoſe charges; but this plea was over-ruled, and Becket obliged to give ſecurity for the payment.

The laſt charge was of much greater importance, and of a more complicated nature than either of the other three. He was required to give in an account of his adminiſtration while chancellor, and to pay the balance due from the revenues of all the biſhoprics, abbies, and baronies, which had, during that time, been ſubjected to his management. This was a charge that affected the whole body of the clergy. The prelates now ſaw their error; but they had gone too far to retreat. They were, however, greatly alarmed, and ſeemed well diſpoſed to join their archbiſhop. The primate anſwered, that it could not be expected he could come prepared to anſwer a charge of this complicated nature, as he had received no intimation of it in his ſummons; but promiſed to give the king ſatisfaction, if a proper time was allowed him for that purpoſe. The king inſiſted upon ſecurity; and Becket deſired leave to conſult his ſuffragans in a caſe of ſuch importance to the church in general, and to himſelf in particular. This requeſt was granted, and he accordingly retired to his lodgings.

He ſpent the whole night in cloſe conſultation with his ſuffragans, but had the mortification to find that he could not engage them in the ſame plan of refractorineſs and diſobedience with himſelf; on the contrary, they adviſed him to ſubmit to the king. Thus diſappointed, he had recourſe to another artifice; he pretended to be taken violently ill, and when the king ſent ſome of the temporal lords to demand of him peremptorily whether he would abide by the determination of the king's court, he returned for anſwer, that if he was better he would attend the king and his court on the morrow.

Accordingly the next day he repaired thither, but with a firm reſolution, inſtead of giving any account of his ſtewardſhip, to inſiſt on the privileges of the church; and thinking that ſome religious ſolemnity might attract the notice of the people in his favor, he propoſed to walk to the court bare-footed, attired in his pontifical robes, and to carry in his hand the croſs of Canterbury. His clergy, however, diſſuading him from this deſign, he laid aſide his pall and mitre, and wearing his other ſacred veſtments, with the cope above them, the croſs being carried before him, proceeded in that manner, on horſeback, to the king's court. When he came into the outer court he alighted, and taking the croſs into his own hand, proceeded thus into the king's chamber, where he ſat down, holding his croſs out before him.

Every perſon preſent was ſtruck with aſtoniſhment at his inſolence and folly; the biſhops in particular were aſhamed and confounded; they told him, that it looked as if he came prepared to ſet the whole kingdom in a flame, and to put his ſovereign at open defiance: they repreſented to him the ill conſequences of ſuch vain-glorious and inſulting conduct, and tried to perſuade him to deliver the croſs to the biſhop of Hereford, who offered to carry it for him; but this was all in vain, for the haughty prelate would not comply. At length the archbiſhop of York, no longer able to bear with his obſtinate inſolence, told him, that notwithſtanding the croſs was in his hand, he would find that the king carried much ſharper weapons. Becket replied, it was true, the king's weapons could kill the body, but his deſtroyed the ſoul.

This anſwer, which ſeemed to threaten the king and the court with excommunication, was carried to Henry, then ſitting in an inner chamber, who was ſo provoked at ſuch a traiterous menace, that he ſent for all the nobles and prelates to attend him, and complained loudly of Becket's intolerable inſolence in entering his court in ſuch a preſumptuous manner. The whole council joined in condemning this inſtance of his pride; and the prelates gave the king to underſtand that the archbiſhop had notified to them his intent of appealing to the pope for protection.

Henry, willing to avoid a rupture with the pontiff, though at the ſame time deſirous of puniſhing the inſolence of the prelate, remonſtrated himſelf with Becket concerning his conduct, and reminded him that he had aſſented to the articles of Clarendon. Becket replied, that the cauſe of God and the church had rendered his conſent to thoſe articles of no force; and that he put himſelf under the protection of the Roman pontiff, the ſupreme head of the church, to whom he appealed againſt the ſentences that either had or might be pronounced againſt him, and ſtrictly inhibited his ſuffragans not to join in any enterprize contrary to the immunities of the church.

The barons were ſo exaſperated at this, that they determined to commit him to priſon; but Becket refuſed to hear the ſentence pronounced, left the aſſembly abruptly, and retired, with his croſs erect before him, to the monaſtery of St. Andrews.

A few days after Becket ſent three biſhops to aſk a licence and ſafe-conduct for his departure: this, however, was denied, and the prelate, fearful of being arreſted, retired privately in the night, attended only by two ſervants, and eſcaped to the continent. He was received by Lewis, king of France, and pope Alexander, who was then at the court of that monarch, with every mark of reſpect and eſteem. By the patronage of the former he lived with the utmoſt magnificence in the monaſtery of Pontigni, and the latter prepared to iſſue bulls to revenge his diſgrace.

As ſoon as Henry was informed of the eſcape of Becket, he immediately diſpatched a very reſpectable embaſſy to the pope, to ſolicit the depoſition of the primate: but the pope was inflexible; he refuſed the offer, and the ambaſſadors immediately returned to their maſter. On their arrival, Henry ſummoned an aſſembly of the nobles, where it was determined to ſequeſter all the poſſeſſions of the ſee of Canterbury, together with all the revenues of the churches, chapels, and rents of the clergy, who adhered to Becket; and all the primate's relations and domeſtics, both clergy and laity, were baniſhed the kingdom.

Henry was now greatly alarmed at the troubles excited in Germany and Italy by the thunder of the Vatican; and therefore paſſed over to the continent, in order, if poſſible, by a perſonal conference with the pope, to prevent an interdict being laid on the kingdom. An interview was accordingly propoſed, and it was agreed that Becket ſhould not be preſent. The archbiſhop was alarmed at this excluſion; he feared that the pope, on hearing a fair account of the whole proceedings, would withdraw his protection, and abandon him to the vengeance of an enraged monarch. He therefore ſuggeſted to his holineſs, "that he might be impoſed upon by the fluent and plauſible ſpeeches of Henry, unleſs he himſelf was preſent to interpret their meaning by what he knew of the inward ſentiments of his heart." The weak pontiff liſtened to this artful ſuggeſtion of the prelate; he gave up his own infallibility to depend upon that of Becket, and inſiſted on the archbiſhop's being preſent at the interview. Henry diſdained to ſubmit to this propoſal, and immediately embarked for England.

As it was now reaſonable to ſuppoſe that the pope would exert all his power in favor of Becket, Henry took every precaution he could project to render the attempt abortive. He prohibited all his ſubjects, under ſevere penalties, from receiving any mandates either from his holineſs or the archbiſhop, and from making any appeals to them. Becket, on the contrary, uſed all his efforts to oppoſe the meaſures of Henry; he thundered out anathemas againſt his enemies, and at laſt denounced the ſentence of excommunication againſt all that adhered to the conſtitutions of Clarendon; and abſolved every one from the oaths which they had taken to obſerve them.

A. D. 1167. The diſpute between Henry and the archbiſhop ſtill continuing with great rigor, Lewis, king of France, interpoſed his good offices to bring about an accommodation. Becket declared he was ready to put an end to all diſputes; and to ſubmit to the king, ſaving his honor, the poſſeſſions of the church, and the the rights of others. At laſt an interview was agreed on, and Becket met the kings of France and England at a village in the neighbourhood of Paris; but the primate was ſo unreaſonable and haughty, that Lewis was perſuaded it would be impoſſible to bring about an agreement. Henry, deſirous of a pacification, ſaid to Lewis, "There have been many kings of England, and there have alſo been many archbiſhops of Canterbury; let Becket act towards me with the ſame ſubmiſſion which the greateſt of his predeceſſors have paid to the leaſt of mine, and I ſhall be ſatisfied." But Becket refuſed to acquieſce in ſo reaſonable a propoſal. Lewis was, or at leaſt ſeemed to be, diſguſted, and the two kings departed without taking leave of the archbiſhop; but the correſpondence and friendſhip between the monarch of France and the prelate was ſoon after renewed.

A. D. 1168. Becket, by various artful ſtratagems, was now in greater favor than ever with the courts of Rome and France, and excommunications ſucceeded each other with ſuch amazing rapidity, that the king had hardly a ſervant about his perſon, who was not under an interdict.

tribunal of Rome, ſhook the fortitude of Henry and his miniſters; and ſeveral conferences ſucceeded each other, in order to terminate this unhappy diſpute. In a fourth treaty, when all the terms were adjuſted, and when the primate expected to be introduced to the king, and to receive the kiſs of peace, which was uſual for princes to give in thoſe times, and which was conſidered as a ſure pledge of forgiveneſs, Henry refuſed him that honor, upon pretence, that during his anger, he had made a raſh vow never to give the prelate ſuch a teſtimony of his friendſhip. This formality ſerved among ſuch jealous ſpirits to prevent the concluſion of the treaty; and though the difficulty was attempted to be removed, by a diſpenſation from the pope, yet Henry could not be prevailed upon to depart from the reſolution he had formed.

A. D. 1170. At length, however, all difficulties were removed, and a treaty was ſigned between the king and the prelate, who was permitted to return to his see on the following conditions. He was not required to give up any of the rights of the church, or reſign any of thoſe pretenſions which had been the ground of the controverſy: all thoſe queſtions were to be buried in oblivion; but that Becket and his adherents ſhould, without making farther ſubmiſſions, be reſtored to all their livings, and that even the poſſeſſors of ſuch benefices as depended upon the ſee of Canterbury, and had been filled during the primate's abſence, ſhould be expelled, and Becket have full liberty to ſupply the vacancies. In return for theſe conceſſions, which intrenched ſo deeply on the honor and dignity of the crown, Henry reaped only the advantage of ſeeing his miniſters abſolved from the ſentence of excommunication denounced againſt them, and of preventing the interdict, which, if theſe hard conditions had not been complied with, was ready to be laid upon all his dominions.

The affairs of England rendering it neceſſary for Henry to return home, he endeavoured to guard againſt all accidents on the continent during his abſence; and for this purpoſe viſited the chief caſtles in his dominions, obliging all his ſubjects without exception, who had not yet ſworn fealty and allegiance, to make their ſubmiſſions. This being accompliſhed, he ſet ſail for England about the beginning of March; but happening to be overtaken in his paſſage by a violent ſtorm, was in the moſt imminent danger of his life. He, however, happily eſcaped, but ſeveral of his ſhips were loſt, and between four and five hundred of his retinue periſhed.

Henry, a few days after his arrival in England, ſummoned a parliament, or great council of the nation, to meet at Windſor. In this aſſembly the kingdom was divided into circuits; and certain earls, knights, and clergymen, appointed commiſſioners, to make a progreſs through theſe diviſions, in order to take cognizance of all abuſes committed by the ſheriffs, bailiffs, and other inferior officers. This inquiſition produced the moſt ſalutary effects; the ſubject was eaſed of many exactions, various grievances were redreſſed, and peace eſtabliſhed in every part of the kingdom.

Though theſe acquiſitions were of conſiderable importance, yet Henry had a ſtill greater object in view; and this he thought proper to conceal till the very moment of its execution, leſt the turbulent primate ſhould find means to render the whole abortive. He had not forgot the little regard the Engliſh had paid to their oaths of eventual fealty in the caſe of his mother, and was therefore determined not to ſubject his own children to the ſame misfortune, by placing the crown on the head of Henry, his eldeſt ſon, then in the ſixteenth year of his age. He accordingly adjourned the national aſſembly from Windſor to London. No perſon, not even the young prince himſelf, was acquainted with the real intention of Henry. The aſſembly was, however, remarkably full, in order to receive the report of the commiſſioners. As ſoon as the report was read, Henry related to them the reſolution he had formed with regard to the coronation of his ſon, and was pleaſed to find it received with univerſal approbation. The only difficulty conſiſted in finding a prelate who was properly authorized to perform the ceremony. It was generally underſtood to be a prerogative peculiar to the archbiſhop of Canterbury; but on this occaſion it was performed by Roger, archbiſhop of York, who had lately been inveſted with a legatine authority for Scotland; together with a bull, which granted him the eventual priviledge of crowning the king of England, an immunity which ſome of his predeceſſors had formerly enjoyed. Accordingly that prelate, aſſiſted by the biſhops of London and Durham, placed the crown upon the head of young Henry; and immediately after the ceremony, William king of Scotland, his brother David, and all the earls, barons, and frank-tenants of England did him homage.

The younger Henry was of a haughty and imperious diſpoſition, and a ſtranger to generoſity and gratitude. His father, deſirous of diſplaying, before this auguſt aſſembly, every mark of paternal love and diſtinction for his favourite ſon, ſerved the firſt diſh at his table with his own hands, ſaying, with an endearing ſmile, "You may now boaſt, my ſon, of "being as honorably ſerved as any monarch upon "earth." But the ſoul of young Henry was too haughty to make a proper return to this engaging condeſcenſion in a parent. He turned to the archbiſhop of York, and whiſpered, with a contemptuous ſneer, "That he thought it no great degradation for the ſon "of a petty count to ſerve the heir of a great king." Henry heard not the ungenerous reflection of his ſon; he was yet a ſtranger to his ingratitude.

This coronation, however, gave great offence to the king of France, becauſe his daughter Margaret, who had a ſhort time before been married to the young prince, was not crowned with her huſband. Henry therefore promiſed Lewis that the ceremony ſhould be ſoon repeated, and his daughter receive both the crown and the royal unction, together with her huſband.

Becket highly reſented the invaſion that had been made on his office; but Henry endeavoured to appeaſe him, by aſſuring him, that beſides receiving the acknowledgments of Roger, archbiſhop of York, and the other prelates, for the ſeeming affront put upon the ſea of Canterbury, he ſhould, as a farther ſatisfaction, recover his rights by officiating in the ſucceeding coronation. But this ſubmiſſion was far from quieting the violent ſpirit of Becket. Elated by the victory he had ſo lately obtained over his ſovereign, he applied to the court of Rome for powers ſufficient to make all his enemies feel the weight of his vengeance.

Henry was now returned to Normandy, and Becket was preparing for his journey to England, in order to take poſſeſſion of his dioceſe, and light up afreſh the torch of civil diſſention in his country. On his arrival in England, he met the archbiſhop of York, and the biſhops of London and Saliſbury, who were on their journey to the king in Normandy; and immediately notified to the archbiſhop the ſentence of ſuſpenſion, and to the two biſhops that of excommunication, which, at his ſolicitation, the pope had pronounced againſt them. Reginald de Warren and Gervan de Cornhill, two itinerant juſticiaries, who were making their circuit in Kent, aſked, on hearing of this bold attempt, whether he meant to bring fire and ſword into the kingdom? but the primate, heedleſs of the reproof, proceeded, in the moſt oſtentatious manner, to take poſſeſſion of his dioceſe. In all the towns through which he paſſed, he was received with the ſhouts and acclamations of the people. The clergy and laity of all ranks came out to meet him, and celebrated his triumphant entrance with hymns of joy. Elated with this triumph, he launched the ſpiritual thunders againſt Robert de Broc, and Nigel de Sackville, with many of the moſt conſiderable prelates and miniſters, who had aſſiſted at the coronation of the young prince.

In the mean time, the archbiſhop of York, and the prelates of London and Saliſbury, continued their journey to Normandy, where they threw themſelves at Henry's feet, complaining of the violent proceedings of Becket. Henry immediately perceived, that the dangerous conteſt, between the civil and ſpiritual powers, muſt now come to a ſpeedy and deciſive iſſue, and was thence thrown into very violent agitations. The archbiſhop of York remarked, that while Becket lived, the king could never hope to be in ſafety, nor his kingdom in peace. Upon this Henry gave a looſe to his indignation, and cried out aloud, in all the anguiſh of affronted majeſty, that he was unhappy in having ſupported a number of ungrateful, indolent cowards, who had not the courage to vindicate his honor from the inſults it ſuffered from one haughty, bigotted prieſt. Four gentlemen of his houſhold, viz. Reginald Fitz-Urſe, William de Traci, Hugh de Moreville, and Richard Brito, conſidered theſe paſſionate expreſſions to be at once a hint for Becket's death, and a reproach upon themſelves, who had been brought up in the king's ſervice. They immediately communicated their thoughts to each other, bound themſelves ſolemnly by an oath, to perpetrate the primate's deſtruction, and ſecretly withdrew from court. But ſome menacing expreſſions, which they dropped at their departure, gave a ſuſpicion of their deſign, and the king immediately diſpatched a meſſenger after them, with expreſs orders not to attempt any thing againſt the perſon of the primate. Theſe orders, however, arrived too late to prevent the execution of their fatal purpoſe: they had all ſailed, in different ſhips, landed ſoon after in England, and arrived about the ſame time at Saltwood, near Canterbury. Here they were joined by ſeveral of Henry's ſervants, whom they knew were firmly attached to his intereſt; and their party ſtrengthened by ſeveral perſons, whom the primate had excommunicated for the moſt frivolous offences.

In the mean time, the archbiſhop conducted himſelf in a very oſtentatious manner, and took every opportunity of increaſing his popularity, by magnificent progreſſes through different parts of the country, where he was very diligent in affecting to appear as a martyr for the church. Young Henry, who thoroughly hated him, immediately, upon hearing he intended to come to his court, ſent him an expreſs order to reſide at Canterbury; which the prelate, who well knew the diſpoſition of the young prince, and thoſe in the adminiſtration, unwillingly obeyed. But to make the beſt uſe of his time he did not fail, by repeated ſermons, to animate the people againſt his enemies, and to expoſe the dangers to which he was daily liable for the cauſe of the church.

It was but a ſhort time before Becket had occaſion for all his patience and fortitude. The four gentlemen, who had conſpired againſt him, came with their party to Canterbury. They went to the archbiſhop's palace, and having got admittance to the apartment where he was, firſt expoſtulated with him, and then pleaded the king's commiſſion for what they did. They earneſtly requeſted him to take off the ſentence of ſuſpenſion and excommunication, which he refuſing, they attempted to make him priſoner in the king's name: but Becket, who was a man of undaunted reſolution and courage, made ſo forcible a reſiſtance, that the noblemen, thinking themſelves in danger, thought proper to diſpatch him.

The circumſtances attending Becket's death are variouſly related by different writers; but thoſe that appear the moſt to be depended on, are the following, which we have borrowed from the works of a gentleman who took great pains to collect them: “ The four knights, ſays he, after having landed privately at Dover, raiſed a pretty large company of men, partly of the king's officers, and partly of thoſe whom the archbiſhop had excommunicated. When they had done this, they made all the haſte they could to Canterbury, where being arrived on the 30th of December in the afternoon, they entered the palace, came into the archbiſhop's chamber, and there ſat down without ſpeaking a word; till the archbiſhop aſking them the occaſion of their coming, one of them (Fitz-urſe by name) told him, That they came from beyond ſea, with a meſſage from the king: upon which the archbiſhop commanded his domeſtics to withdraw; but when the other ſaid, That he deſired all there preſent ſhould hear, they ſtaid in the room. Then Fitz-urſe, in the name of the reſt, delivered his meſſage, the ſubſtance of which was, That he had as good have taken the crown from the king his maſter's head, as thus to excommunicate the biſhops, and then refuſe them abſolution. But the archbiſhop ſaid, He was ſo far from taking the crown from the king's head, that he wiſhed with all his heart he could put another on (God's honor and his own ſoul being ſtill ſafe;) and that, not himſelf, but the pope, had excommunicated and ſuſpended their biſhops, and it was not in his power to abſolve them. They anſwered, It was all one as if he had done it, ſince it was done by his procurement. To which the archbiſhop replied, That indeed he was much obliged to the pope for thus vindicating the injury done to God, as well as to himſelf: then making a large recital of all the wrongs he had received, he appealed to themſelves as witneſſes, whether the king had not granted him leave to proceed by eccleſiaſtical cenſures againſt thoſe who had diſturbed the peace of the church; nor could he paſs it by, without betraying his paſtoral charge. At which they all cried out, That they were never witneſſes of any ſuch thing; and called to the monks and others there preſent, to ſecure him on the king's behalf; and that, if he eſcaped, he ſhould be required at their hands. So preſently going out, the archbiſhop, following them to the door of the outward room, ſaid, No, I come not hitherto to fly, I value not your threatenings. To which they replied, They are not bare threats, and ſo you ſhall find. Then going out of the abbey, they brought thoſe of their guard into the court, whom they had before left at the gates while they talked with the archbiſhop: but, during the time that they were gone away, the monks, hearing that the knights with their men were returning, would fain have perſuaded the archbiſhop (being near veſpers) to go along with them into the church; but he being unwilling, they were at laſt forced to haul, rather than lead, him thither, through a private door out of the cloiſters, which was broken open on purpoſe to let him in. He had not been there very long, and was but juſt got upon the ſteps of the high altar, when the four knights returned again, being now armed; and finding the doors of the monaſtery ſhut, they broke a window, and Roger de Broc getting in, opened the doors to them; and he being their guide, they entered the church by the ſame way the archbiſhop had before; yet would not he permit the other door to be faſt at all, ſaying, It was the church, and all men were free to enter into it; God's will be done. As ſoon as they came in, they cried out, Where is the archbiſhop? where is the traitor? He coming down from the ſteps of the altar, to a pillar not far off, ſaid, Here am I, no traitor, but a prieſt. They then laid hands on him, to try if they could pull him out of the church, that (as they afterwards confeſſed) they might either kill him without, or carry him away priſoner; but when they could not eaſily get him from the pillar, Reginald Fitz-urſe came up nearer; to whom the archbiſhop ſaid, I have done thee many favors, and doſt thou, who oweſt me faith and homage, now come to kill me? The former then laying hold of the archbiſhop's cope, ſaid, Thou ſhalt go forth, for that now thou ſhalt die: but he, pulling it out of his hand, anſwered, I will not go out. Then the other cried, Fly. No, replied he, I will never fly; but I command you, in the name of God, and under an anathema, that you do none of mine any harm. He then thruſt that knight from him, calling him Pimp! at which he being much provoked, ſtepped back, and ſeeing his companions behind him, he ſtruck at the archbiſhop with his ſword, and wounded him in the crown of the head, where it was ſhaven; the archbiſhop, ſeeing his time was come, cried out, Lord, I commend myſelf, and the cauſe of the church of God, to St. Mary, St. Dennis, and all the ſaints patrons of his church. Then another of the knights wounded him in the ſame place, to the very brain. The archbiſhop falling on the pavement, the reſt ſtruck him on the head ſtill in the ſame place; and one of them, Richard Brito, cut off a piece of his ſkull, where the reſt had already began. Then another of their followers, called Hugh the all-clerk (for he was a ſub-deacon) not content with what had been done, ſet his foot upon the biſhop's neck, and with his ſword's point flung the brains and blood about the pavement, crying out, Let us now be gone, he will riſe no more. So that all of them hitting him (which was very ſtrange) in the ſame place, all his brains fell upon the ground. When they ſaw he was dead, they went out in great triumph at the ſame door they came in; and, in the mean time, their accomplices without, breaking open the doors and locks, plundered the apartments of the archbiſhop, and took away the charters and monuments belonging to the church. As ſoon as the people heard of it, they all grievouſly lamented him, and running thither, deſired to ſee his body, dipping their fingers in his blood, and therewith making the ſign of the croſs on their foreheads. The monks afterwards laid the corpſe before the high altar, where it remained all night; but as ſoon as it was day, hearing that the murderers intended to return and abuſe the body, they ſhut up the church doors, and putting it in a ſtone coffin, buried it privately in a vault adjoining to the place where he was killed."

Such was the tragical end of Thomas Becket, archbiſhop of Canterbury, a prelate of the moſt imperious and inflexible ſpirit. He fell a victim to his own pride, and obſtinacy in a cauſe which he fancied juſt, and in which he was guided by the moſt deſtructive prejudices. Unable to bear the leaſt contradiction, and fond of directing affairs of every kind, he treated all that oppoſed him with a virulence of behaviour, and a ſeverity of vengeance, which neither ſuited the character of a chriſtian biſhop, or a decent member of ſociety. When he had any point to gain, he advanced without ſcruple the moſt infamous falſhoods, and vouched them as truths under the ſanction of the moſt ſacred oaths. Such, however, was the blind ſuperſtition of thoſe days, that notwithſtanding all this and his having been publicly condemned as a traitor by all the lords ſpiritual and temporal, yet he was canonized and revered as a martyr, about two years after his death. This was done by order of pope Alexander, who alſo, by a bull directed to all the clergy and people of England, appointed the 30th of December to be kept annually as a feſtival, in commemoration of Becket's martyrdom.

But to return to our narration. The conſpirators, after the fact, reflecting on the nature and conſequences of it, retired to the caſtle of Knareſborough in Yorkſhire, belonging to Hugh de Moreville, where they continued near a year without converſing with any ſtranger whatever. At length, tired with their ſolitude, and in obedience to the king's command, they ſubmitted to the pope's judgment, repaired to Rome, and afterwards made a pilgrimage to Jeruſalem to expiate their offence.

A. D. 1171. Henry was greatly affected at the death of Becket. He dreaded the conſequences of the papal thunder, and knew that his enemies would exert all their influence with the pontiff to launch the flaming bolt of interdiction on his dominions. He feared the ſpiritual much more than the temporal ſword. He diſpatched a ſplendid embaſſy to Rome, to clear him of all ſuſpicion of being concerned in the death of Becket, and to avert the thunders of the vatican. Alexander, at firſt, refuſed an audience to Henry's ambaſſadors; but by the proper diſtribution of large ſums among the members of the ſacred college, the intention of Henry was fully anſwered. The pope, however irritated againſt Henry, contented himſelf with iſſuing general denunciations againſt the principals and accomplices of Becket's murder. The archbiſhop of Sens, who had always been an implacable enemy to the Engliſh monarch, laid an interdict upon all the French provinces ſubject to Henry; but the pope prevented the conſequences that might have reſulted from that ſentence. Two cardinals were ſent with legatine powers into Normandy, in order to examine into the king's conduct with regard to the murder of Becket, and a conference was opened at Avaranches, where Henry and his eldeſt ſon aſſiſted, together with all the clergy of Normandy. After long debates the whole affair was ſettled, and all differences between Henry and the pope were terminated.

A. D. 1172. Henry, having now no enemy to fear, determined to put in execution a ſcheme he had ſome years before projected for obtaining a conqueſt of Ireland. Adrian IV. who at that time filled the papal chair, deſirous of augmenting the power and revenue of the holy ſee, encouraged Henry to purſue the plan he had formed, and granted him a bull with ample privileges. But the diſturbances that happened between Becket and the king had prevented the latter from putting his deſign into execution.

Before we proceed any farther, it will be neceſſary to give the reader ſome account of theſe people, the conqueſt of whom was attempted upon the ſlighteſt foundations, and effected with an eaſe that borders almoſt upon romance.

The Iriſh at this time were ſo unpoliſhed as to be little better than ſavages: they were even ignorant of agriculture; no traces of the arts were found among them; they were deſtitute of laws, of manners, and of learning. The iſland was divided into a number of ſmall principalities, each governed by its own prince, but all forming a political confederacy, though they exerciſed perpetual violences againſt each other. They were incapable of making any defence againſt regular forces; but it was no eaſy matter to unite them into one body or nation, and govern them by wholeſome laws. Ferocious by nature, and fond of liberty, they oppoſed every attempt to civilize them; and, like the antient Britons, when attacked by a ſuperior force, fled to their foreſts, mountains and caverns, for ſafety.

A circumſtance now happened which gave Henry a favorable opportunity of claiming the pretended title he had derived from the bull of Adrian. Dermot, one of the petty kings of Ireland, being driven out of his dominions by a neighbouring chief, whoſe wife he had carried off, applied to the Engliſh monarch for aſſiſtance to recover his territories. Henry liſtened to the Iriſh chief, and empowered him to levy troops in England. He alſo gave a general leave to his ſubjects to aſſiſt the prince in perſon, but declined to embark himſelf in the enterprize. The romantic notions of valor that then prevailed, excited the ambition of ſeveral of the Engliſh barons to aſſiſt the Iriſh prince. Among theſe, Richard, earl of Striguel, ſurnamed Strongbow, called by ſeveral of our hiſtorians Richard earl of Pembroke, was the chief. That nobleman, whoſe ambition was boundleſs, enjoyed ſeveral large eſtates in Wales, where his tenants were numerous, and the ſituation of his territories very convenient for paſſing over into Ireland. Strongbow undertook to aſſiſt the Iriſh chief, on condition of his giving him his daughter in marriage, and leaving him his dominions. Accordingly theſe adventurers, at the head of a ſmall body of troops, landed in Ireland, defeated very numerous armies of the wild Iriſh; and, not content with recovering the territories of Dermot, meditated the reduction of the whole iſland.

Henry, being informed of the great progreſs the barons had made, was jealous of their ſucceſs, and deſirous of acquiring the honor of being the conqueror of Ireland, he paſſed over in perſon, at the head of a powerful army; but the Iriſh were already conquered; there remained nothing for him but to receive the ſubmiſſion of a vanquiſhed people. Henry, without the effuſion of a ſingle drop of blood, became maſter of Ireland in leſs time than would have been neceſſary to travel over it. Moſt of the tributary princes attended his court at Dublin, and ſwore allegiance to the Engliſh monarch. The clergy, who had laboured to render their country ſubject to England ever ſince Adrian had iſſued a bull for that purpoſe, met in a general aſſembly at Waterford, where they ſigned their ſubmiſſion, and delivered the inſtruments to Henry, who tranſmitted them to Rome; and Alexander, pleaſed with acquiring ſo conſiderable an addition of power and intereſt to the ſee of Rome, readily confirmed the title.

Henry now flattered himſelf with enjoying a ſeries of happineſs and tranquillity; but theſe expectations ſoon proved deceitful. His children produced a ſource of the moſt ſevere diſquietude. Henry, his eldeſt ſon, a prince of a very haughty and inſolent temper, was weary of bearing the royal title without authority. He had married Margaret, daughter to Lewis king of France; and the ceremony of his coronation had been repeated, in order that his conſort might be included in the ſolemnity. He had alſo been permitted to pay a viſit to his father-in-law, and continued ſome time at the court of France. Lewis, ever attentive to excite commotions in England, took the opportunity of kindling the flames of domeſtic diſcord in the family of Henry, by perſuading the prince, that in conſequence of the ceremony of the coronation, he was intitled to an immediate poſſeſſion of a part of the dominions of his father.

Imperious by nature, and full of this extravagant idea, young Henry returned to England, and demanded from his father, either the kingdom of England, or the duchy of Normandy. Henry was aſtoniſhed at this unexpected requeſt, and began to fear that his hopes of happineſs were built on a chimerical foundation. He endeavoured to convince his ſon of the extravagance of his demand; and painted in proper colours the folly of a requeſt which could only tend to weaken the power of his family, and, ultimately, his own authority. But his endeavours were in vain; the prince diſcovered the higheſt diſcontent, blended with inſolence, at his father's refuſal; retired to France, and put himſelf under the protection of Lewis, whoſe deſire of leſſening the power of Henry had given riſe to this domeſtic diſcord. But the diſobedience of his eldeſt ſon was not the only misfortune that diſturbed the happineſs of Henry. His queen, Eleanor, encouraged Richard and Geoffrey to follow the example of their brother, fly to the court of France, and inſiſt upon being put into actual poſſeſſion of the territories aſſigned them by their father.

Some hiſtorians impute this undutiful conduct of the queen to her jealouſy of the king's amour with the fair Roſamond, daughter of lord Clifford. But whatever might be her motive, it is certain that ſhe perſuaded her ſons Richard and Geoffrey to eſcape into France, and attempted to follow them diſguiſed in man's apparel: before, however, ſhe could accompliſh her deſign, ſhe was taken in that diſguiſe, and committed to cloſe cuſtody, when ſhe was confined many years as the principal cauſe of the whole conſpiracy.

A. D. 1173. The French king was not the only monarch that conſpired againſt Henry. William, king of Scotland, followed young Henry to France, under pretence of renewing the league that had long continued between the Scottiſh and French nation; but in reality to concert proper meaſures for diſtreſſing the king of England. Several of the moſt powerful barons alſo, both in England and Normandy, joined in the unnatural alliance for ſupporting the unreaſonable claim of an undutiful ſon, on the dominions of an indulgent parent.

Henry, alarmed at the departure of his ſon, demanded him from the court of France, but received a very inſolent anſwer. He now found himſelf ſurrounded with innumerable difficulties, from which nothing but the moſt prudent and at the ſame time reſolute policy could poſſibly extricate him. The deſertion of many of his powerful barons gave him reaſon to fear, that his own ſubjects would deſert him in the day of battle; and he was therefore determined to have recourſe to foreign mercenaries for aſſiſtance. He accordingly took twenty thouſand Brabanders, all of them veteran troops, into his pay, and by his liberality attached them firmly to his perſon and fortunes. Theſe Brabanders, ſometimes called Routiers, and Colleraux, were a kind of banditti, or freebooters, who lived upon plunder; they infeſted, at that time, all the ſtates of Europe, defied the cenſures of the church, and engaged in the ſervice of any prince who could pay them punctually. But though they were mercenaries by profeſſion, yet, when well paid, no troops could behave with greater fidelity: and though accuſtomed to plunder, yet, in time of action, they were rigid obſervers of military diſcipline.

Reduced to this dangerous and diſagreeable ſituation, Henry had recourſe to the court of Rome; and though ſenſible of the danger attending the interpoſition of eccleſiaſtical authority in temporal diſputes, applied to the pope, as his ſuperior lord, to excommunicate his enemies, and by theſe cenſures, to reduce to obedience his undutiful children, whom he found ſuch a reluctance to puniſh by the ſword of the civil magiſtrate. Well pleaſed to exert his power in ſo plauſible a cauſe, Alexander iſſued the bulls required of him: but it was ſoon found, that theſe ſpiritual weapons had not equal force, as when employed in a ſpiritual controverſy; and that the clergy were very negligent in ſupporting a ſentence, which had not the leaſt tendency to promote the immediate intereſt of their order.

But Henry was far from placing his whole dependence on the ſpiritual arm of the Roman pontiff; his own abilities, and the powerful aſſiſtance of his foreign forces, rendered him ſuperior to all his enemies. His virtues never ſhone with ſo much luſtre as in this alarming criſis. The ſight of impending dangers animated him with freſh courage. Bleſt with the moſt aſtoniſhing preſence of mind, and wholly a ſtranger to fear, he viewed, with the moſt intrepid coolneſs, the many dangers with which he was ſurrounded, and planned the moſt prudent meaſures to render them all abortive.

The operations of the confederate princes were begun by Richard, who repaired into Guienne, and excited the greater part of the inhabitants to take up arms againſt his father. Geoffrey ſtirred up a rebellion in Britany, and put himſelf at the head of the inſurgents. Normandy was invaded by the king of France, aſſiſted by the earls of Flanders, Boulogne, and Blois. The Scottiſh monarch led an army into the northern parts of England. And the earl of Leiceſter, landed in Eſſex at the head of a large body of Flemiſh troops, to excite an inſurrection among the Engliſh.

The ſoul of Henry now towered above misfortunes. He ſaw his dangers; but was not intimidated. He had taken ſuch precautions in providing for the defence of the frontiers, that the French monarch, after loſing the greater part of his army, was obliged to abandon the enterprize. Ten thouſand Brabanders, ſent by Henry into Britany, defeated the rebels, and obliged them to return to their duty. The army of Leiceſter was routed at St. Edmundſbury, in Suffolk, and above 10,000 Flemings ſlain on the ſpot. Henry advanced at the head of his army againſt the inſurgents in Guienne, retook the places they had ſeized, and obliged them to lay down their arms, and ſubmit to his authority.

A. D. 1174. The Scottiſh army having threatened deſolation to England, Henry haſtened over to defeat their intentions. He landed at Southampton, and in order to gain the affections of his people, ſubmitted to an act of humiliation, which all the power of the church could not impoſe upon him. He knew the powerful effect of ſuperſtition over the minds of the vulgar; he knew that many ridiculous ſtories which had been propagated of Becket's miracles were firmly believed by a weak and bigotted people; and that he himſelf lay under very ſevere ſuſpicions of being acceſſary to his death: he therefore determined to remove every ſhadow of complaint, by joining in the reigning devotions of the times. He ſet out immediately for Canterbury, and as ſoon as he perceived the cathedral, though three miles diſtant, he alighted from his horſe, and walked barefoot to the tomb of the ſaint; proſtrated himſelf before the ſhrine of Becket, continued the whole day in prayer, and watched all night the holy relicks. When the morning appeared he aſſembled a chapter of the monks, diſrobed himſelf before them, put ſcourges into their hands, and preſented his bare ſhoulders to the diſcipline and laſhes of theſe eccleſiaſtics. He afterwards made a ſolemn proceſſion to all the altars in the cathedral; and, retiring to the ſhrine of the canonized prelate, made an offering of forty pounds per annum to ſupport a number of lamps kept continually burning before his tomb. Henry was deſirous of acquiring the affections of a ſuperſtitious people, and he was ſenſible that a ſecret penance, however ſevere, would not have produced thoſe ſalutary effects that were naturally to be expected from one of ſo public a nature.

Henry had left the cathedral but a ſhort time before he received advice that a deciſive victory had been obtained over the Scottiſh army, and their king taken priſoner. Such remarkable ſucceſs was immediately attributed to the protection of the ſaint; and this opinion ſpreading through the whole kingdom, tended greatly to ſoften and repreſs the ſpirit of rebellion. Many of his reſtleſs barons were, however, ſtill in arms, and Henry marched immediately to chaſtiſe them, and reſtore that peace to his kingdom which their unnatural rebellion had deſtroyed. He firſt inveſted the caſtle of Framlingham, belonging to Hugh Bigod, one of the moſt powerful of the Engliſh malecontents. Bigod was too well acquainted with the diſpoſition of Henry to attempt defending his fortreſs to extremities; he opened a negotiation, and obtained his pardon on condition of delivering up his caſtles of Framlingham and Bungay. The biſhop of Durham, who had effected an entire independence, delivered up the caſtles of Norham and Alverton. The officers of the earl of Leiceſter followed the biſhop's example; they gave up the caſtles of Montſorrel, Groby and Leiceſter. Mowbray delivered up the caſtle of Thirſk, and the earl of Ferrers thoſe of Stotville and Duſelde.

While Henry was thus ſucceſsful in ſuppreſſing the rebellion in England, the French king had laid ſiege to Rouen, and was now joined by the earl of Flanders. This reinforcement enabled the French monarch to puſh the ſiege with great vigor; and he flattered himſelf with being able to make himſelf maſter of the place before the arrival of Henry. He was, however, deceived. The garriſon made a noble defence, and Henry landed before Lewis could ſubdue even the outworks. The preſence of the Engliſh monarch ſtruck the enemy with terror; the ſiege was immediately raiſed; and the combined forces fled with the utmoſt precipitation, leaving all their baggage and ſtores in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh monarch.

Both ſides were now ſufficiently tired of the war, and a conference was propoſed by Lewis for bringing about a general peace. This propoſition was readily approved of by Henry's firſt and third ſon, as alſo by the Engliſh monarch himſelf; but the impetuous Richard, ſecond ſon to Henry, was ſtill in arms in Poictou, committing acts of hoſtility on all the inhabitants who favored the intereſt of his father, and refuſed to come to any accommodation but upon his own terms. Exaſperated at his obſtinacy, the younger Henry, with the king of France, gave him up to the reſentment of his father, to whom they ſwore, not to give any diſturbance, while he reduced this ſtubborn youth to reaſon. Richard, depending upon the ſupport of the French king and his brother, was amazed, when he found himſelf deſerted by both. Reduced to this dangerous ſituation, he delivered up all the caſtles he had taken, and fell immediately at his father's feet. He had no reaſon to repent of the ſtep he had taken: his father received him with the ſame parental affection as if he had never offended.

A conference was now agreed to be held between Tours and Amboiſe, where all the three ſons made ample ſubmiſſions to their father, who pardoned them, together with all their adherents.

William, king of Scotland, was the greateſt ſufferer of all the parties that eſpouſed the cauſe of the young princes. Henry the elder delivered from confinement, without exacting any ranſom, above nine hundred knights, whom he had taken priſoners; but it coſt William the antient independency of his crown as the price of his liberty. He ſtipulated to do homage to Henry, as his liege lord, for Scotland, and all his other dominions: he engaged that all the barons and nobility of his kingdom ſhould alſo do homage; that the biſhops ſhould ſwear fealty; that both ſhould ſwear to adhere to the king of England againſt their native prince, if the latter ſhould break his engagements; and that the fortreſſes of Edinburgh, Stirling, Roxborough and Jedborough, ſhould be delivered into Henry's hands as ſecurities.

This ſevere and humiliating treaty was executed in its full rigor. The Scotch king releaſed from his confinement, brought up all his barons, prelates, and abbots; and they all did homage to Henry in the cathedral church of York, and acknowledged him and his ſucceſſors for their ſuperior lord. Nor did the Engliſh monarch reſt ſatisfied even with this. He engaged the king and the ſtates of Scotland to make a perpetual ceſſion of the fortreſſes of Berwick and Roxborough, and to allow the caſtle of Edinburgh itſelf to remain for a limited time in his hands. This was the firſt great aſcendant which England obtained over Scotland, and indeed the firſt important event, which had paſſed between theſe kingdoms.

A. D. 1176. Henry now applied himſelf to cultivate the arts of peace, and gain the affection of his Engliſh ſubjects. He ſummoned a general council of the barons and prelates at Northampton, at which the laws of Edward the Confeſſor were revived, to the univerſal ſatisfaction of the people: and in order to carry thoſe laws into execution, he cauſed the kingdom to be divided into ſix parts, and aſſigned to each three itinerant juſtices. Henry alſo reſtored the barons, who had joined his rebellious ſons, to their eſtates. But as he had learned from experience the danger of ſuffering ſo many caſtles to ſubſiſt in the very heart of his kingdom, he ſeized many of them into his own hands, and demoliſhed others.

A. D. 1177. Henry, by theſe and many other wiſe regulations, became the favorite of his people. All Europe, from hating and dreading, now began to admire and revere him. His abilities were ſuperior to envy; his power was guarded beyond inſult; and his clemency now made more conqueſts in peace, than his arms had ever done in war. His people were protected, contented and happy.

A. D. 1179. Lewis, the French king, now worn out with years, was deſirous of reſigning his crown to Philip his ſon; but that young prince falling ill, on the day appointed for his coronation, his father, contrary to the advice of his council, undertook a pilgrimage for his recovery to the ſhrine of Thomas-a-Becket. He was very cloſely watched, during his ſtay in England, by Henry the elder, who, out of ſeeming reſpect, ſcarcely left his perſon; and Lewis, after ſtaying four days at Canterbury, and paying moſt religiouſly his devotions to ſaint Thomas, returned to his own country.

While Lewis was ſettling his ſucceſſion, Henry the elder was regulating his government. He had for ſome time made it a rule, to be directed by the advice of his parliament, and felt the good effects of this conduct in the proſperous condition, both of his own revenue, and the circumſtances of his people. For England was, at this time, in perfect tranquillity; the people were well affected to the government, becauſe the government was directed by law. Henry ſaw, that the troubles of his predeceſſors had been occaſioned by a contrary conduct; and was ſoon ſenſible, that a king of England, directed by his people, can aſk nothing for the advancement of his glory and power, which will not be granted. Richard de Lacy had been long his firſt miniſter; not diſtinguiſhed by his power, but his authority; not by the affections of his maſter, but by the veneration of the people; not by pre-eminence in dignity, but by painfulneſs in office. He had always the courage to remonſtrate ſeverely, when the king aimed at any arbitrary act of government; and Henry had ever the virtue to continue the miniſter, however his pride or paſſion might have been diſguſted with the man. He found the effects of his ſalutary counſels, and that the eaſieſt and ſureſt method to preſerve his own power, was to ſecure the people's rights. But Lacy was now ſtooping under the weight of years and fatigue, and therefore choſe to retire, as a canon regular, into an abbey at Lewes, of his own founding. Henry, upon the reſignation of this able miniſter, held a great council of his ſtates at Windſor, where he made a new partition of the judges circuits all over England, dividing the whole into four parts, and aſſigned proper judges to each.

Lewis, the French king, a ſhort time after his return home, was ſeized with an apoplectic diſorder, of which he died in a few days, and left his crown to his ſon Philip, a young but ambitious and politic prince, who ſoon ſhewed his intentions of taking every opportunity that offered whereby he could leſſen the power of the Engliſh monarch.

A. D. 1180. Henry ſtill applied himſelf to the due adminiſtration of juſtice in England. He appointed Ralph de Glenville, who had been a very uſeful aſſiſtant to Ricard de Lacy, both in war and peace, to be juſticiary of all England. This celebrated lawyer adhered ſtrictly to the laws of Edward the Confeſſor, as they were collected in the reign of William the firſt. To this great man, is likewiſe attributed a treatiſe upon the laws and cuſtoms of England, ſo celebrated among our lawyers. But however that be, it muſt be owned, that the Engliſh government never made ſo noble a figure as it did now; the courts of juſtice began to proceed by forms favorable to the ſubject, without being inconvenient for the government, and too ſtrong to be broken through, even by the hand of power itſelf. The public money, which had been remarkably adulterated, was now recoined; and the laws ſtrictly put in execution againſt all falſifiers, or debaſers of the current ſpecies, which was put under the inſpection of Philip Amayri, a native of Tours.

A. D. 1182. Henry was deſtined to experience all the calamities that can ariſe from undutiful children. Young Henry (who was at this time with his queen at the court of France) renewed his pretenſions, again unſheathed the ſword of rebellion againſt his father, and was protected by Philip in his unnatural deſigns.

The diſobedient intentions of this young prince, were, however, ſoon fruſtrated; for while he was preparing to commence hoſtilities, he was ſeized with a violent fever at Martel, a caſtle in the neighbourhood of Limogn. Finding himſelf paſt all hopes of recovery, he diſpatched a meſſenger to his father, intreating the favor of a viſit, that he might die with the ſatiſfaction of having procured the forgiveneſs of a parent he had ſo groſsly offended. Henry, however, fearful of truſting himſelf in the power of thoſe about the perſon of his ſon, refuſed to viſit him; but ſent one of his prelates, together with a ring, as tokens of his bleſſing and pardon. The biſhop found him tottering on the brink of eternity; and received his dying requeſt, that his father would forgive his undutiful behaviour; that he would pay his knights and attendants their ſalaries; and pardon the barons of Guienne, whom he had excited to rebellion. The biſhop promiſed to relate his requeſts to his father. He faithfully performed his promiſe; but before any anſwer could be returned, the prince paid the debt of nature, on the 11th of June, in the 28th year of his age.

A. D. 1185. In the beginning of this year Heraclius, patriarch of Jeruſalem, arrived in England, attended by the grand maſters of the knights templars and hoſpitallers, as an embaſſy from Baldwin king of Jeruſalem, to ſolicit the aſſiſtance of Henry againſt the infidels in the Holy Land. The patriarch preſented the Engliſh monarch with the keys of the holy ſepulchre, in token of their deſire of placing the crown of the holy city on his head. Henry, however, refuſed the offer, but promiſed to give the Chriſtians all the aſſiſtance that laid in his power.

It was now ſuppoſed that the two ſons of Henry (Richard and Geoffrey) had entirely laid aſide all rebellious intentions againſt their father. The Engliſh monarch, however, found himſelf miſtaken; for, in the year 1187, Richard, diſguſted at a deſign formed by his father of ſettling Guienne upon John, his youngeſt brother, departed the kingdom, and prepared to ſeize by force thoſe dominions which he thought belonged ſolely to himſelf. His brother Geoffrey demanded of his father that Anjou ſhould be annexed to his duchy of Britany. This demand was abſolutely refuſed by Henry; on which Geoffrey repaired immediately to the court of France, to ſolicit aſſiſtance againſt his father: but before Philip had given any anſwer to his requeſt, Geoffrey was killed in a tournament at Paris.

By the death of this prince, Henry was delivered from the enterprizes of the moſt vicious of his ſons. Geoffrey was a prince in whom pride, diſſimulation, and perfidy were equally united. No principle of honor could bind, no precept of religion could reſtrain, that headlong prince. He was acquainted with every vice, and for that reaſon was generally diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of "The child of perdition."

A ſhort time after Geoffrey's death, Henry received advice, that the city of Jeruſalem was taken by the valiant and politic Saladine, ſultan of Egypt; and that Guy de Luſignan, the laſt prince that ſwayed the ſceptre of that kingdom, was in the hands of the infidels. This melancholy intelligence rekindled at once the ardour and enthuſiaſm of the warriors of Europe. Philip and Henry, for a time, ſuſpended their quarrels, and vied with each other in their readineſs to ſuccour Paleſtine. They both took the croſs; and both ordered, that ſuch of their ſubjects as did not chuſe to engage in the cruſade, ſhould pay the tenth part of their revenues and moveable effects to defray the expence of the armament. This impoſt was called "Saladine's tax." The clergy were the chief people that objected to this tax, and inſiſted that they ought to be excepted, notwithſtanding they were the principal inſtigators of theſe religious enterprizes.

A. D. 1188. The king of France, by his conduct, ſoon evinced how much more deſirous he was of enlarging his own dominions than of recovering Paleſtine; he took advantage of a quarrel that happened between Richard, and Raymond count of Thoulouſe; he led his army into Berry, burnt Mount Richard, and took ſeveral towns in Auvergne. Henry upbraided him with this flagrant breach of faith. He had not only ſworn to ſuſpend all hoſtilities till the cruſade was over, but alſo to undertake the protection of Henry's foreign dominions.

Henry, enraged at the proceedings of the French king, went immediately into Normandy, and put himſelf at the head of a powerful army. His ſon Richard, who had taken ſome umbrage at Philip, joined him; and the great ſucceſs they met with ſoon obliged Philip to ſolicit a conference, which was accordingly held, and terminated by a reconciliation between the contending monarchs.

A. D. 1189. Peace was no ſooner reſtored between Philip and Henry, than the former ſecretly and treacherouſly brought over young Richard to his party, and he once more unſheathed the ſword againſt his father. Henry's mighty genius was now checked under that of Philip and Richard; for thoſe two princes ſoon made themſelves maſters of many diſtinguiſhed places belonging to Henry, who haſtily left England in order to ſtop their farther depredations.

The two kings now became greater enemies than ever. Philip, elated with the ſucceſs he had met with, advanced into Maine, and made a feint as if he intended to proceed in his route to Tours; but turning ſhort, he attacked the city of Mans, which was abandoned by Henry, who, on this occaſion, ſeems to have loſt all his ſpirit with his fortune; for though the city was well provided for defence, he declined ſtanding a ſiege, and ordered Simon de Tours to ſet fire to the ſuburbs, but the flames ſoon catched the city and reduced the whole to aſhes. While every thing was, by this incident, thrown into confuſion, Philip defeated a party poſted by Henry to guard the bridge or break it down, and forced his way with the fugitives, into the city itſelf. This heightened the panic which had before ſeized Henry's army, and before they had time to recover themſelves, were charged with great fury by the French. Henry himſelf fled with the utmoſt precipitation, at the head of ſeven hundred horſe, leaving his infantry to be cut to pieces by the enemy. Some battalions of Welſh, who generouſly made a ſtand, ſuffered moſt upon this occaſion. Henry himſelf narrowly eſcaped falling into the hands of the French; but being better mounted than his purſuers, he paſſed a ford through which they did not venture to follow him, and reached, with a few followers, the caſtle of Chinon. As the principal deſign of the French was to ſeize the royal perſon, they had neglected to follow thoſe who had fell off from Henry's retinue during the purſuit. Theſe therefore rallying themſelves, entered the caſtle of Mans, which ſtill held out. In the mean time Henry fortified himſelf in the caſtle of Chinon, where he had conſiderable treaſure.

The two princes, Philip and Richard, returned to Mans, and ſoon made themſelves maſters of the caſtle, as they had before of the city; and the other caſtle of Maine likewiſe fell in a ſhort time into their hands. They next marched into Tourain, and by the help of a great drought, which had rendered the river Loire very low, they took the city of Tours. This was followed by the reduction of all that country; ſo that Philip and Richard were now maſters of all Tourain and Main; while Henry, after fortifying Chinon, retired to Saumur. It is probable that even his perſon might have fallen into their hands, had not the neutral princes, who were feudatories to the crown of France, thought it high time to interpoſe. Accordingly the earl of Flanders, the duke of Burgundy, and the archbiſhop of Rheims, applied to Henry, and after making him ſenſible of the deſperate ſituation of his affairs, prevailed on him to conſent to an accommodation. The place appointed for holding the conference lay between Tours and Araſie. Several pretenſions and claims were here to be ſettled. Henry had undertaken the cruſade. The diſappointment of his fulfilling this engagement had irritated the court of Rome to a high degree, and was, perhaps, one of the principal ſources of his calamity. But he was now too old, and too diſpirited, to undertake the expedition in perſon. As the performance of this was held ſacred by Philip and Richard, both of them young men, and very deſirous of acquiring military glory, it was therefore reſolved, that Richard ſhould perform in perſon, the vows of his father. The other articles of this treaty were all of them left to the arbitration of the king of France, who ſeems to have acted with great moderation. It was agreed that Richard ſhould receive the oath of homage and fealty of all his ſubjects, both in England and his foreign dominions; that Henry ſhould pay twenty thouſand marks to the king of France, as a compenſation for the charges of the war; that his own barons ſhould engage to make him obſerve this treaty by force, and in caſe of his violating it, ſhould promiſe to join Philip and Richard againſt him; and that all his vaſſals, who had entered into a confederacy with Richard, ſhould receive an indemnity for their offence.

When Henry reflected on the diſadvantageous and humiliating treaty he had ſigned, his mortification was ſo ſharp that he could hardly bear it. But how much more was his unhappineſs increaſed, when, on demanding a liſt of thoſe barons, to whom he was to grant a pardon for their connexions with Richard, he found at the head of them the name of his ſon John, who had always been his favorite, whoſe intereſt he had ever anxiouſly at heart, and who had even, on account of his aſcendency over him, excited the jealouſy of Richard.

The wretched Henry, already overloaded with cares and ſorrows, finding this laſt diſappointment of his domeſtic tenderneſs, broke out into expreſſions in the utmoſt deſpair, curſed the day in which he received his miſerable being, and beſtowed on his ungrateful and undutiful children, a malediction, which he could never be prevailed upon to retract. The more his heart was diſpoſed to friendſhip and affection, the more he reſented the barbarous return which his ſons had ſucceſſively made to his paternal care; and this finiſhing blow, by depriving him of every comfort in life, quite broke his ſpirits, and threw him into a lingering fever, of which he ſoon after expired, at the caſtle of Chinon, near Saumur, in the fifty-ſeventh year of his age, after reigning thirty-four years, ſeven months, and four days.

No ſooner had the breath left the royal body, than Henry's corpſe was treated in the like indecent manner with that of his great grandfather, the conqueror of England, and even with ſtill more aggravating circumſtances; for his ſervants, after rifling his wardrobe and treaſures, ſtripped the royal corpſe naked, in which indecent manner it continued, till one of the pages, leſs brutal than the reſt, threw over it a ſhort mantle. In this condition, it was viſited by his natural ſon Geoffrey, who alone had behaved dutiful towards him, and who attended the corpſe to the nunnery of Fontevrault, where it lay in ſtate in the abbey-church. The next day Richard, who came to viſit the dead body of his father, and who, notwithſtanding his criminal conduct, was not altogether deſtitute of generoſity, was ſtruck with horror and remorſe at the ſight; and, as the aſſiſtants obſerved, that, at that very inſtant, blood guſhed out of the mouth and noſtrils of the corpſe, he exclaimed, according to a vulgar ſuperſtition, that he was his father's murderer; and expreſſed, though too late, a deep ſenſe of that undutiful behaviour, which had ſo greatly contributed to the death of an indulgent parent.

Such was the end of Henry II. one of the moſt illuſtrious princes of his time, both for greatneſs of genius and extent of dominions. He was of a middle ſtature, ſtrong, and well proportioned; his countenance was lively and engaging; his converſation affable and pleaſing; his elocution eaſy, perſuaſive, and always at command. He loved peace, but poſſeſſed both bravery and conduct in war; he was provident without timidity; ſevere in executing juſtice without rigor; and temperate without auſterity. He preſerved an almoſt uninterrupted ſtate of health, and, at the ſame time, kept himſelf from corpulency, to which he was ſomewhat inclined, by an abſtemious diet, and frequent exerciſe, particularly hunting. When the affairs of his kingdom permitted him to enjoy leiſure, he had always recourſe to books, or the converſation of learned and ingenious men. His palace was a kind of academy, and his table a ſchool, where the moſt obſtruſe points of government and learning were debated. Nor was his reading of that wordy and uſeleſs kind, which forms the pedant; to letters he joined erudition, to erudition knowledge. His affections, as well as his enmities, were warm and durable; and his long experience of the ingratitude and infidelity of men, never deſtroyed the natural ſenſibility of his temper, which diſpoſed him to friendſhip and ſociety. He was wiſe in council, moderate in proſperity, and firm in adverſity. Not ſatisfied with forming good and wholeſome laws, he took care to ſee them executed with the greateſt punctuality: for this purpoſe he made frequent progreſſes through all the different parts of his dominions, inſpecting the behaviour of his officers and magiſtrates, and ſeverely puniſhing thoſe, who were either negligent or unjuſt in the performance of their duty. In a word, he was the king, the prieſt, and the father of his people.

Henry had five legitimate ſons by his queen Eleanor, namely,

William, his eldeſt ſon, who died an infant in the ſecond year of his father's reign.

Henry, his ſecond ſon, who when a child was married to Margaret, daughter of the king of France. He died a ſhort time before his father.

Richard, born at Oxford in 1157, and ſucceeded his father on the throne.

Geoffrey, who was born the year following, and was, in right of Conſtance his wife, earl of Britany and Richmond; by whom he had a daughter Eleanor, and a poſthumous ſon called Arthur.

John, (ſurnamed Lackland, on account of the little proviſion made for him during his father's life) who mounted the throne on the death of his brother Richard.

King Henry had likewiſe three daughters, viz.

Maud, or Matilda, the eldeſt, born in the year 1156, who was married to Henry duke of Saxony in 1167; but ſhe died ſoon after her father.

Eleanor, born in 1162, and married to Alphonſo king of Caſtile, in 1176.

Joan, or Joanna, born in 1165, and married to William ſurnamed the Good, king of Sicily, in the year 1177.

Henry, beſides his lawful iſſue, had two natural ſons by his miſtreſs Fair Roſamond, viz.

William Longue Eſpee, to whom Richard I. gave the earldom of Saliſbury, with Ela, daughter and heireſs of William d'Evreux. And Geoffrey, who was firſt biſhop-elect of Lincoln in 1174, and continued ſo till 1181; and in the reign of his brother Richard, he was elected archbiſhop of York.

The moſt remarkable occurrences that happened in the reign of Henry II. were as follow;

In 1176, London-bridge was begun to be built with ſtone by Peter Coleman, a prieſt. The king contributed to the advancement of ſo good a work; and the archbiſhop of Canterbury gave 1000 marks towards it. The courſe of the river Thames was, for the time, turned another way by a trench dug for that purpoſe, beginning at Batterſea and ending about Rotherhithe. The bridge was about thirty-three years in building.

In the twenty-third year of his reign he laid the foundation of Warwick-caſtle.

In the following year the Jews obtained permiſſion to have a burial-ground near every town where they dwelt. Before, they had but one in England, which was at London.

In 1185 there happened a violent earthquake, which threw down many churches in various parts of England; and at the ſame time there was almoſt a total eclipſe of the ſun.

SECTION II.

RICHARD I. SURNAMED COEUR DE LION.

NOTWITHSTANDING the little affection Richard had ſhewn for his father during his life, yet he was no ſooner informed of his death, than he teſtified a deep contrition for his paſt conduct. At the firſt ſight of the dead body of the king he felt the whole force of the ſtings of a guilty conſcience, and exclaimed, that he had been the means of haſtening his father's death. He now ſaw in a very different point of light the ſervices of his pretended friends, who had inſtigated him to draw the ſword of rebellion, and lift his hand againſt the life of an indulgent parent. Theſe he diſcharged from his ſervices, and inſtead of rewarding, as they expected, loaded them with reproaches. He looked with contempt on the courtiers who had baſely deſerted the intereſt of their maſter, and gave his confidence to thoſe who had ſerved his father with zeal and fidelity. Happy would it have been for himſelf, and happy for his people, had theſe prudent meaſures flowed entirely from wiſdom and virtue: but it ſoon appeared, that Richard was governed only by the ſallies of paſſion; his conduct was founded on no ſettled principles; he formed no regular plan for the government of his people.

Richard, at the time of his father's death, was on the continent, where he ſtayed near ſix weeks to ſettle his affairs in that quarter; which plainly evinced that he was not under any of thoſe apprehenſions about the ſucceſſion in England, which he had, during his father's life-time, ſo often uſed as a pretext for his refractorineſs and rebellion.

Richard's firſt act of regal power while on the continent was, the releaſing of his mother from her confinement, and beſtowing on her the adminiſtration of affairs in England during his abſence. He remembered not the unnatural part ſhe had acted in arming children againſt their father, and ſacrificing the lives of thouſands at the altar of jealouſy.

As popularity was of the utmoſt conſequence to Richard's views, Eleanor had orders to begin her adminiſtration with an act of general indemnity. The priſons now gave up their captives, and the laws their forfeits.

The nature of this indemnity leads us to the knowledge of many particular acts of oppreſſion, into which Henry's government had degenerated during the latter part of his reign. For Richard's orders were, That all treſpaſſers upon foreſt laws ſhould be ſet at liberty; and that all who were out-lawed for miſdemeanors in foreſts, ſhould be freed from their forfeits, and have liberty to return home. But what is ſtill more remarkable, it appears that Henry and his miniſters had, contrary to law, or the conſtitution of England, committed a great many to priſon, where they either lay without any trial, or, if tried, were likely to be condemned on falſe evidence. All theſe had their liberty, and none were confined but thoſe who had been the vile inſtruments of their perſecution.

This ſtep had the deſired effect on the people; and Eleanor exerted herſelf ſo warmly in favor of Richard, that ſhe ſecured for him the oaths of allegiance from all orders of the ſtate; ſo that nothing was wanting but his preſence to have them properly ratified.

Richard, having ſettled his affairs on the continent, embarked at Barfleur, and ſoon after landed in England, where he was received by the people with great demonſtrations of joy. On his arrival he proceeded to Wincheſter, where he continued to reſide till the 2d of September, when he repaired to London, and was ſolemnly crowned at Weſtminſter the following day.

The ceremony was performed by Baldwin, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and celebrated with great magnificence; but it gave riſe to a ſcene of the moſt horrid barbarity. The expeditions to the Holy Land, and the cruelties inflicted on the chriſtians by the infidels, had filled the minds of the people with a kind of enthuſiaſtic madneſs. Whatever had even the moſt remote connection with this ſpiritual warfare, was ſufficient to ſet the whole nation in a flame. The Jews had long been a deſpiſed people, and the ſufferings of the Chriſtians at Jeruſalem now raiſed the hatred of the people againſt them to the higheſt pitch. Richard knew this, and prudently iſſued a proclamation, forbidding any of them to appear at Weſtminſter during the ceremony of the coronation. That deſpiſed people had long endeavoured, by their aſſiduous application to traffick, to compenſate for the infamy with which they were treated. But their riches, inſtead of procuring them favor, excited the avarice, as much as their religion did the fury of the people. Deſirous of obtaining the protection of the new monarch, the Hebrews collected among themſelves a very conſiderable ſum of money, which they were deſirous of preſenting to Richard on the day of his coronation. Several of the moſt eminent among them were accordingly ſelected; and, thinking their buſineſs a ſufficient exemption from the general prohibition, waited at the gates of Weſtminſter-hall to tender him their preſent, and their compliments of congratulation. The ſight of theſe Jews, and their diſregard of the royal mandate, awakened in the people all the fury of reſentment. A tumult was immediately excited, and the poor defenceleſs Hebrews torn in pieces by the populace. But this ſacrifice was far from ſatisfying the fury of the multitude; they entered the city, and maſſacred all the Jews that fell into their hands, plundered their houſes, and laid them in aſhes. The conflagration and carnage continued the whole night, notwithſtanding all the endeavours of the chief juſticiary to appeaſe the tumult. Several thouſands of theſe unfortunate people fell a ſacrifice to the enthuſiaſtic fury of a deluded multitude.

The king was ſo incenſed againſt the authors of this inhuman tragedy, that he cauſed ſeveral of the principal leaders of the tumult to be put to death, as a warning and terror to others. He alſo publiſhed an edict, ſtrictly forbidding any inſult to be offered to the Jews, whom he declared to be equally under his immediate protection with the reſt of his ſubjects.

During the life of the late king, Richard had expreſſed the utmoſt jealouſy of his brother John, whom he conſidered as a very dangerous rival. But either this paſſion was now totally annihilated, or abſorbed in political conſiderations; for immediately after his coronation, he laviſhed his favors on a brother who deſerved not his confidence. He granted him the eſtate of William Peppetel, the caſtles of Marlborough, Luggerſhal, Le Pec, Balſover, Lancaſter, Nottingham, Tikhill, and Wallingford, with all the honors and foreſts annexed to them. Nor were theſe thought ſufficient by the imprudent Richard ; he gave him alſo the earldoms of Cornwall, Devon, Dorſet, Somerſet, Nottingham, Derby, Lancaſter, and Glouceſter.

This generoſity in Richard was at once profuſe and dangerous ; but his zeal againſt the infidels opened another, and more fruitful ſource of misfortunes. He had, a ſhort time before his acceſſion, taken the croſs from the hands of the archbiſhop of Tours, and was now determined to make an expedition to the Holy Land in perſon. He was, indeed, more a ſoldier than a devotee ; and, to gratify his paſſion for military glory, and gather laurels in the fields of Paleſtine, he ſcrupled not to ſacrifice at once the intereſt of his crown, and the welfare of his people.

His whole attention was now engroſſed with forming ſchemes for raiſing money to defray the neceſſary expences of the expedition. He had already ſeized upon his father's treaſures ; and the biſhop of Ely happening to die without a will, Richard confiſcated his eſtate, which was very conſiderable. He laid the moſt rigorous impoſts on the people ; he expoſed the crown lands to ſale ; and even diſpoſed of the great ſeal of England to William Longchamp, his firſt miniſter. Ralph de Glenville, chief juſticiary, expoſtulated with Richard on theſe proceedings, at once ſo derogatory to his own dignity, and oppreſſive to the ſubject. The king replied, "That he would ſell the city of London itſelf, if he could find a purchaſer." This anſwer ſhocked the upright juſticiary ; he was alarmed for his country, and remonſtrated freely with the king on the conſequences that muſt attend ſuch precipitate meaſures. But Richard would not ſubmit to admonition; he ſo highly reſented the liberty taken by the juſticiary, that he deprived him of his poſt, and committed him to priſon ; nor would he ſuffer him to be releaſed, till he purchaſed his freedom at the price of fifteen thouſand pounds. At the ſame time, he ſold the poſt of juſticiary to the biſhop of Durham for a thouſand marks. He obtained a bull from pope Clement, empowering him to diſcharge from the cruſade all who were unable to undertake the expedition ; and excuſe others who were unwilling to undergo the fatigues, on paying a proportional ſum of money. The king of Scotland purchaſed, for ten thouſand marks, his right of ſuperiority over that kingdom, together with the important fortreſſes of Roxburgh and Berwick ; acquiſitions of the greateſt conſequence ever made by his father.

In ſhort, Richard heſitated at nothing, however infamous, whereby he might raiſe money to anſwer his intended purpoſes. Beſides the means already uſed, he inſtituted offices of inquiſition into the enquiry of magiſtrates ; not for reformation, but oppreſſion. The innocent and the guilty ſuffered in common, and nothing but paying large ſums into the king's coffers gave ſafety to the one, or indemnity to the other. Such were the arts by which this brave, but ill-fated and worſe-judging prince, reduced the patrimony of the crown, exhauſted the ſubſtance of his people, and proſtituted the juſtice of his country, merely to procure a temporary ſupply for venting his religious rage, and ſatisfying his unbounded vanity.

While Richard was accumulating treaſures to defray the expences of the expedition, the clergy were zealouſly labouring to procure him ſoldiers. The pulpits reſounded with the great merit of ſerving in the holy war. The confeſſors enjoined no penances but what tended to promote the grand deſign of recovering Paleſtine out of the hands of the infidels, and freeing the Chriſtians in that country from the dreadful burdens laid upon them by the declared enemies of the goſpel. The people were fired with enthuſiaſm ; the army ſoon became numerous ; nor was there an officer or ſoldier but what furniſhed himſelf with common neceſſaries, either from his own ſtock, or by the aſſiſtance of thoſe who were equally zealous as himſelf.

The ſame caprice and unaccountable ſpirit of deſpotiſm that had directed Richard in amaſſing treaſure, directed him alſo in the choice of perſons to conduct the adminiſtration of affairs during his abſence. He conſulted not his council, nor liſtened to the voice of the people. Longchamp, biſhop of Ely, and Pudſey, biſhop of Durham, were conſtituted regents of the kingdom. The former was a Norman of mean extraction, of a dangerous character ; and being inveſted with a legatine commiſſion, he ſeemed to be armed with authority for the deſtruction of England.

A. D. 1190. Richard having thus provided, as he thought, for the ſafety of his kingdom, paſſed over to the continent, and met Philip of France at Gue de St. Remi. Here the two monarchs ſettled finally their joint proceedings in the intended expedition. They appointed the firſt place of their rendezvous to be in the plains of Vezelay, on the borders of Burgundy. And it was alſo determined, in order to prevent the calamities which had hitherto attended all the cruſades, to conduct their armies to Paleſtine by ſea, to carry proviſions with them, and by means of their naval power, to maintain an open communication with their own ſtates, and with all the weſtern parts of Europe.

Every thing being ſettled in this conference, Richard, after receiving his pilgrim's ſtaff at Tours, repaired to Vezelay, where he met the king of France, and where they reviewed their armies, amounting to an hundred thouſand men ; a formidable force, animated by two warlike monarchs, provided with every thing which their ſeveral dominions could afford, and not to be overcome but by their own miſconduct, or the unſurmountable obſtacles of nature.

Here the two monarchs reiterated their promiſes of mutual friendſhip, pledged their faith, not to invade each others dominions, during the cruſade, exchanged the oaths of all their barons, and prelates to the ſame effect, and ſubjected themſelves in the moſt ſolemn manner, to the penalty of interdicts and excommunications, if they ever violated this public and religious engagement. It was ſo agreed between them, that in caſe either of them died during the cruſade, the other was to ſucceed to the command of his army, and become maſter of his treaſures, in order to carry on the war with ſucceſs againſt the infidels.

While theſe things were tranſacting on the continent, Longchamp was employed in raiſing farther ſupplies for his maſter ; who had but a ſhort time departed the kingdom, before the Jews were threatened with a general maſſacre. Mad with enthuſiaſm, and exaſperated at the cruelties exerciſed on the Chriſtians in Paleſtine, the people were perſuaded it was a meritorious act to extirpate every perſon who refuſed to believe the doctrines of the goſpel. Reaſon and humanity pleaded in vain ; the unfortunate Hebrews were deſtined to deſtruction. The maſſacre began at Lynn, where theſe diſtreſſed people were murdered, and their houſes burnt to the ground. A ſimilar fate attended thoſe who reſided at Stamford, Norwich, St. Edmundſbury, and Lincoln. But the moſt bloody perſecution raged at York, where five hundred men, beſides women and children, fell a ſacrifice to the barbarous fury of religious zeal. The deſpiſed Hebrews, dreading the fate of their brethren, prevailed upon the governor to admit them into the caſtle ; hoping, by that means, to avert the ſtorm of popular fury, which threatened their deſtruction. They were fatally deceived : the bigotted multitude ſurrounded the caſtle, and attacked the works with the utmoſt violence. The Jews offered to purchaſe the liberty of retiring at the price of all their riches; but they pleaded in vain! the ear of bigotry was deaf to the voice of compaſſion. Driven to deſpair, and finding it impoſſible to defend the place againſt ſuch multitudes of enemies, they murdered their wives and children; and after throwing the dead bodies over the walls upon the populace, they ſet fire to the houſes, and periſhed in the flames. Longchamp made a ſtrict but fruitleſs inquiry after the authors of this horrid tumult. The laws wanted power to curb the licentiouſneſs of a ſuperſtitious people.

The two princes on the continent now divided their armies, and each proceeded with all expedition to the Holy Land. Philip took the road to Genoa, and Richard that to Marſeilles, their reſpective fleets having received inſtructions to rendezvous at theſe ports. Richard waited eight days at Marſeilles, when his fleet not arriving, he hired twenty gallies, and ten large veſſels, on board which he embarked for Meſſina in Sicily, leaving orders for the whole fleet to follow him with all expedition. This order was punctually obeyed, the fleet ſoon reached Meſſina, where they found the king of France with his whole navy, ready to join them. But contrary winds and other accidents occaſioned ſo long a delay, that they were obliged to winter at Meſſina. This delay proved fatal to the enterprize, by laying the foundation of animoſities, which could not afterwards be removed.

It was not, indeed, reaſonable to expect that two kings, in the flower of youth, haughty and violent, ambitious, valiant, competitors in power, and rivals in honor, would long continue to act in conſort, and ſacrifice their own paſſions to the intereſt of the cruſade. Could this, indeed, have been effected, the intention had been anſwered, and the Holy Land intirely recovered from the infidels. But it ſoon appeared that a mutual harmony was not to be expected; the torch of diſcord was lighted up by the hand of jealouſy, and threatened both armies with deſtruction. The power of Richard filled the breaſt of Philip with malignity, who could not behold, without envy, the forces of his vaſſal ſo much ſuperior to his own.

Tancred, the king, or rather tyrant, of Sicily, trembled for his dominions. He knew that his deſpotic adminiſtration had excited the hatred of his people, and dreaded the conſequences of their putting themſelves under the protection of either of theſe powerful princes. He therefore determined to ſow the ſeeds of animoſity between them; and prevent, by their diſcords, any application being made by the Sicilians. Richard had long been affianced to Alice, the ſiſter of Philip; and the princeſs had been ſent, when very young, to the court of England. The conſummation of this marriage, which had been delayed on various pretences, had furniſhed Philip with reaſons for quarrelling with Henry II. but the matter at this time ſeemed to be forgotten. Tancred revived the contention, by inſinuating to Philip, that his honor was concerned in the marriage of his ſiſter, and that there was room ſufficient to ſuſpect the ſincerity of Richard. Philip, alarmed at the ſuggeſtions of Tancred, immediately demanded that Richard ſhould conſummate the nuptials; but the Engliſh monarch furniſhed proofs that Alice had been with child by Henry. Philip was amazed; but thought it more prudent to bury in ſilence the diſhonour of his family, than inſiſt any farther on the performance of his rival's engagement.

Both princes now made preparations for the continuation of their voyages; but queen Eleanor arriving with the princeſs Berangera, daughter to Sanchez, king of Navarre, to whom Richard was afterwards married, he determined on this account to make a longer ſtay in Sicily; upon which Philip, being inceſſantly importuned by the Chriſtians of Paleſtine to come to their aſſiſtance, took leave of Richard, who attended him to the ſea-ſide, and the two monarchs expreſſed the greateſt terms of friendſhip on their parting.

Queen Eleanor gave her ſon a faithful account of the ſtate of affairs in England. Longchamp, diſdaining to have a colleague of equal authority, had thrown the biſhop of Durham into priſon, and governed the nation by his ſole authority, with all the ſtate and tyranny of a deſpotic monarch.

The king was now convinced of his error, in appointing a perſon of ſuch mean extraction to direct the affairs of government. He ſigned a charter, appointing a council, without whoſe concurrence Longchamp was not to act. This charter Richard ſent to England by the archbiſhop of Rouen and the earl of Stiguel. But Longchamp was ſo confirmed in his power, that it was thought proper to conceal it from him for ſome time, and the only perſon informed of the commiſſion, was the king's brother.

A circumſtance, however, ſoon happened, which univerſally exaſperated the nobility, clergy, and people againſt this imperious miniſter. Geoffrey, the king's natural brother, had, ſome time before Richard's departure for the Holy Land, been elected into the ſee of York; but ſome diſputes ariſing between them, Geoffrey had promiſed his brother not to reſide in England during his abſence in Paleſtine. Queen Eleanor, however, having procured a diſpenſation of his promiſe, Geoffrey paſſed over into England to take poſſeſſion of his ſee. Longchamp ordered him to be arreſted; but the archbiſhop having received intelligence of his deſign, fled to the monaſtery of St. Martin, and took ſanctuary in the church. The regent's officers paid no regard to the ſanctity of the place; they dragged him from the altar in his ſacerdotal robes, and committed him to Dover caſtle.

All ranks of people looked on theſe proceedings in the moſt deteſtable light. The clergy were particularly alarmed. The biſhop of Lincoln excommunicated all concerned in this ſacrilegious violence, and the ſentence was confirmed in a general convocation held at Reading. The biſhops even threatened the kingdom with an interdict, if Geoffrey was not immediately releaſed. The regent was now ſufficiently alarmed, and Geoffrey was ſet at liberty. But this did not ſatisfy the people: it was determined to put a final period to the deſpotic adminiſtration of Longchamp. A general aſſembly of the nobles and prelates was aſſembled at Reading, where the king's charter was read, and the legate ſummoned to attend. He promiſed to aſſiſt at the conference; but conſcious that his actions would not bear inſpection, he fled to London, and ſhut himſelf up in the Tower. He ſoon found that it would be impoſſible to defend the fortreſs any length of time, and therefore ſubmitted to appear before the great council of the nation, where he was deprived of his poſts; and finding himſelf deſerted by thoſe who had baſked in the ſun-ſhine of his greatneſs, he paſſed over to the continent, in order to apply to the pope for redreſs. The great ſeal of England was given to Walter, archbiſhop of Rouen, a perſon of great prudence, modeſty and integrity. He always conſulted his colleagues in the affairs of government; and, by his prudent management, reſtored peace and tranquillity to the kingdom.

Every thing being now ready for Richard's departure, he left Meſſina on the 10th of April, his fleet conſiſting of 150 ſail of large ſhips, and 53 well armed gallies. Queen Eleanor returned to England, but Berangera, and his ſiſter the queen dowager of Sicily, attended him on the expedition.

Before Richard could reach the coaſt of Syria, a dreadful ſtorm aroſe, which ſeparated his fleet, and ſtranded three of his largeſt ſhips on the iſland of Cyprus. Iſaac, the emperor or tyrant of that iſland, though a profeſſor of the chriſtian religion, was ſo far from aſſiſting theſe diſtreſſed ſoldiers, who were paſſing into Aſia to defend the perſecuted followers of their common maſter, that he uſed them in a very cruel manner, and committed them to priſon.

Exaſperated at this ungenerous treatment, Richard, who had taken ſhelter in the harbours of Candia, ſent a meſſenger to the tyrant, demanding that his ſubjects ſhould be ſet at liberty, and their effects reſtored. Iſaac, however, inſtead of complying with ſo reaſonable a demand, returned an inſolent anſwer. On this, Richard immediately ſailed to Cyprus, landed his forces, and totally routed the tyrant's army. Iſaac, whom a ſingle ſtroke of adverſity humbled in the duſt, laid his crown at the feet of Richard, who ſent him, in ſilver chains, to Tripoli; and Richard, by the general conſent of the people, was placed on the throne of Cyprus.

While Richard was at Cyprus, he was married to Berangera, and they were both crowned at Limiſſo, the capital of the iſland. Soon after the ceremony was performed, Richard embarked for Paleſtine, carrying with him the daughter of the Cyprian prince. In his paſſage he took a very large ſhip belonging to Saladine, having on board proviſions and military ſtores for the garriſon of Acre, together with a reinforcement of 1500 men.

The Engliſh army landed time enough to ſhare in the glory of taking Acre. Since the arrival of Philip the ſiege had been carried on with great vigor; and the appearance of Richard inſpired the aſſailants with freſh courage.

Richard was welcomed to the chriſtian camp by Philip in perſon; and it was determined to preſs the ſiege of Acre with the utmoſt vigor. They alſo agreed that when the French monarch attacked the town, the Engliſh ſhould guard the trenches; and when the Engliſh prince conducted the aſſault, the French ſhould provide for the ſafety of the aſſailants.

By this conjunctive determination, the moſt amazing acts of valor were every day performed, and the beſieged ſoon reduced to the utmoſt extremity. Saladine, finding it impoſſible to ſuccour the city, gave the garriſon leave to ſurrender. The articles of capitulation were accordingly ſigned, and the city delivered up to the cruſaders, together with 500 chriſtian priſoners.

Richard and Philip, elated with this ſucceſs, formed the deſign of marching directly to Jeruſalem, in order to wreſt that city out of the hands of the Infidels. Every thing was ready for the march of the army, and the hopes of the cruſaders were raiſed to the higheſt pitch, when a diſſention aroſe between the two chiefs, and fruſtrated all thoſe pleaſing expectations. The prodigious valor of Richard during the ſiege of Acre, his liberality to the ſoldiers, and the magnificence he diſplayed on every occaſion, procured him the hearts of the cruſaders, and filled the breaſt of Philip with malignant jealouſy. He, however, concealed his paſſion, till a diſpute, which now happened between Guy of Luſignan, and Conrade, marquis of Montſerrat, relative to the crown of Jeruſalem, gave him an opportunity of expreſſing his reſentment. Richard eſpouſed the pretenſions of the former, and Philip thoſe of the latter. During this conteſt, which in reality had nothing more than an empty title for its object (that city not being yet in the hands of the cruſaders) ſeveral ſharp meſſages paſſed between them; and Richard complained that Philip obſtructed the progreſs of the confederate army; adding, that he was ready to ſacrifice every perſonal conſideration to the intereſt of the cauſe they had undertaken.

It ſoon appeared, however, that Philip was now determined to abandon the enterprize; but, aſhamed to avow his real motives, he had recourſe to artifice and deception. He pretended, that the climate of Paleſtine did not agree with his conſtitution, and therefore deſired Richard would permit him to return. The moſt ſolemn promiſe having been made between them not to abandon the expedition without their joint conſent; Richard, after exacting from him the moſt dreadful oath, that he would not attempt any thing againſt his dominions, but, on the contrary, protect and defend them to the utmoſt of his power, conſented to his departure, and even furniſhed him with two of his beſt ſhips for carrying him and his retinue to Europe.

Philip left the command of his army to the duke of Burgundy; and after giving him public orders to pay the ſame obedience to the king of England as to himſelf, he ſailed for his own dominions, to which he certainly ought not to have returned without bringing with him new acquiſitions of glory. Nor was Philip the only perſon who deſerted the enterprize; multitudes followed his example; ſo that the numerous army of the Chriſtians was very greatly reduced.

The aſpiring Richard, after being thus deſerted by Philip, determined to attempt ſome enterprize worthy the name of the leader of the Chriſtian armies. He accordingly made a general attack upon Saladine's camp; but met with ſo noble a reſiſtance, that he was obliged to retreat with conſiderable loſs. This check, however, made no change in Richard's reſolutions: that martial ſpirit, which formed his ruling paſſion, ſupported him under every misfortune. He determined to march from Acre to Joppa, and fortify all the places that fell into his hands. Saladine poſted himſelf in the road, at the head of an army of three hundred thouſand men, to oppoſe his paſſage. The martial ſoul of Richard glowed at this opportunity of ſignalizing his courage. He was alſo perſuaded, that by defeating the army of Saladine, he ſhould open to himſelf a free paſſage to Jeruſalem, and, perhaps, make himſelf maſter of that famous city in a ſhort interval of time.

Both armies prepared for a general engagement, which was to decide the fate of thouſands, and, poſſibly, of Paleſtine itſelf. The right wing of the Chriſtian army was commanded by James d'Aveſnes, the left by the duke of Burgundy; while Richard in perſon led the center, or main body. Saladine had concealed part of his troops on the right behind ſome hills, which covered them from the ſight of the Chriſtians. On this body of reſerve he placed his greateſt hopes of victory; and therefore, without altering his poſition, waited the attack of the enemy, who began the action with their right wing. The Saracens ſupported the ſhock with great reſolution; and, by the ſuperiority of their numbers, put that body into great diſorder. Their leader, James d'Aveſnes, was ſlain, in endeavouring to rally his broken troops, and lead them once more againſt the infidels. The duke of Burgundy, at the head of the left wing, made a furious attack upon the right of the enemy. The Saracens, for ſome time, ſupported themſelves with great reſolution; but on receiving orders from Saladine to retreat as they fought, the duke was deceived, and followed them a conſiderable way beyond the body of the army. Saladine perceiving that his left wing ſtood firm, and that the duke of Burgundy was ſeparated from the reſt of the army, ordered the body that lay concealed behind the hills to move forward. Theſe troops deſcending the eminences in prodigious numbers, ſurrounded the dukes forces, and made a dreadful ſlaughter.

The fate of the Chriſtian army now depended on the valor and conduct of Richard. He had been very ſucceſsful where he had made his attacks; and though he met with a ſtout reſiſtance, had compelled the troops that oppoſed him to retreat in diſorder. He was ſtill purſuing the broken forces, when he was informed of the diſorder of his right wing, and the danger of his left. He immediately gave over the purſuit; and marching to the duke of Burgundy's aſſiſtance, fell upon the victorious troops of Saladine with ſuch impetuoſity, that he ſoon wreſted from them the palm of victory, which they thought they had obtained. Richard, on this occaſion, performed the moſt aſtoniſhing acts of valor; and thoſe who before were filled with envy, were now ſtruck with admiration. He is ſaid to have met the famous Saladine, and to have diſmounted that celebrated leader, who muſt have fallen into the hands of the Engliſh monarch, had not the Saracens uſed more than common efforts to reſcue him from his dangerous ſituation. But however that be, the valor of Richard entirely changed the fortune of the day, and Saladine was obliged to reinforce his right wing with part of his victorious troops on the left. This motion, which cauſed ſome diſorder in that part of the Saracen army gave the right wing of the Chriſtians time to recover themſelves; and finding the oppoſition they had before met with to grow weaker and weaker, they quickly rallied; and falling with the utmoſt fury on the Saracen troops that oppoſed them, forced them to ſeek their ſafety in a precipitate flight.

Notwithſtanding the enemy, who was very ſuperior in number, now directed their whole force againſt the Engliſh monarch, yet Richard ſtill maintained the battle with the moſt diſtinguiſhed intrepidity. He would, however, in all probability, have been overpowered, had not his right wing advanced to his aſſiſtance. The Saracens, finding themſelves attacked in flank by a freſh body of forces, began to give way; nor was it in the power of Saladine, though he exerted his utmoſt endeavours, to rally them. The Chriſtians took advantage of the diſorder, and preſſed the Saracens with ſo much vigor, that they betook themſelves to flight, and above 50,000 of the infidels were left dead on the field of battle.

This defeat threw the Saracens into the utmoſt conſternation: they abandoned the maratime cities of Aſcalon, Cæſarea, and Joppa, after demoliſhing the fortifications. Richard marched directly to Joppa, where he ſtaid ſome time to repair the fortifications; that if he ſhould be obliged to retreat, he might have a ſecure port to embark his forces for Europe.

While Richard continued at Joppa, he frequently amuſed himſelf with hunting in the neighbourhood, attended only by a few of his intimate friends. As he was one day returning from the chace, with only ſix perſons in his train, he alighted from his horſe, laid himſelf down under a tree, and fell aſleep. He was, however, ſoon rouſed by the approach of a ſmall party of Saracen horſe, paſſing by the place. Richard immediately mounted his horſe; and as the Saracens were few in number, purſued them to ſome diſtance. The enemy pretended to fly before him, but artfully drew him into an ambuſcade, where he was ſuddenly ſurrounded by a ſquadron of horſe. He defended himſelf for a conſiderable time with great bravery, without the leaſt thought of retreating, notwithſtanding the prodigious diſparity of numbers. But even the valor of Richard would have been exerted in vain, had not one of his attendants, by a remarkable preſence of mind, ſaved him from the impending danger. Four of his attendants were already ſlain, when William Deſpreaux, the only ſurviving friend of Richard, cried out, in the Saracen language, "Hold! "I am the king of England!" Every eye was now directed to Deſpreaux; and thoſe who were engaged with Richard immediately left him, that they might have a ſhare in ſeizing the perſon they imagined to be the Engliſh monarch. This ſtratagem gave Richard an opportunity of eſcaping from the enemy. Deſpreaux did not diſcover himſelf till he came before Saladine; when falling at his feet, he ingenuouſly confeſſed the deception he had made uſe of to ſave his maſter. Saladine commended his fidelity, and treated him with the utmoſt reſpect; but ſenſible that Richard would never ſuffer a perſon who had ſo ſignally aſſiſted him to remain in confinement, demanded ten Saracen emirs, or princes, in exchange for ſo faithful a ſervant.

When Richard had finiſhed repairing the fortifications at Joppa, he began his march towards Jeruſalem, fully determined to wreſt that famous city out of the hands of the Infidels. Saladine drew up his army on the plains of Rama, to oppoſe his paſſage. A ſecond battle enſued, and Saladine was a ſecond time defeated. Nothing now oppoſed his march to Jeruſalem; but the Knights Templars, who were in the intereſt of Philip of France, and therefore envious of the glory which Richard muſt obtain by the conqueſt of the Holy City, perſuaded the Engliſh monarch to lay aſide his deſign till the enſuing ſpring, and take up his winter quarters at Aſcalon. Richard, who ſuſpected not the real motive of the knights, followed their advice, marched directly to Aſcalon, and repaired the fortifications which Saladine's forces had demoliſhed.

During theſe tranſactions in Paleſtine, Philip of France made uſe of every inſidious art to blacken the character of Richard, and, if poſſible, make himſelf maſter of his dominions on the continent. He firſt attempted to carry an open war into Normandy; but the French nobility refuſed to follow him in the invaſion of a ſtate they had ſworn to protect. The pope alſo, who was the general guardian of all princes that had taken the croſs, threatened him with eccleſiaſtical cenſures. He was therefore obliged to deſiſt from his enterprize, and have recourſe to ſecret policy and intrigue.

While he was thus employed in ſecretly undermining the fortunes of Richard, the news of that prince's victories filled every corner of Europe; and when compared to Philip's own behaviour, in deſerting the popular cauſe he had undertaken, ſhone with double luſtre. His envy, therefore, prompted him to tarniſh that fame which he could not equal; and he accordingly embraced every pretence of throwing the moſt violent and moſt improbable calumnies on the king of England.

A. D. 1192. The contention which had ſome time before commenced between Guy de Luſignan and Conrade, relative to the crown of Jeruſalem, was now revived; and the duke of Burgundy refuſed to act any longer in conjunction with the Engliſh. The French troops retired into places of ſafety, and paſſed their time in luxury and indolence. Still deſirous of making himſelf maſter of Jeruſalem, the great object for which the cruſade had been undertaken, Richard put an end to the diſpute, by declaring Conrade king of Jeruſalem. But at the ſame time, he indemnified Guy for the loſs of a nominal, by preſenting him with a real crown. He beſtowed upon him the kingdom of Cyprus. Pleaſed with obtaining the honor he had ſo long deſired, Conrade, who was now at Tyre with his fleets, made preparations for joining the Chriſtian army at Aſcalon. But before he could embark, he was ſtabbed in the ſtreets of that city by two aſſaſſins ſent for that purpoſe by a Saracen prince, generally ſtiled The Old Man of the Mountains. The ſubjects of that chief eſteemed aſſaſſination meritorious, when ſanctified by his mandate: they courted death, were it even in the extremities of Europe, in the execution of his orders. The prince juſtified this cruel proceeding, ceeding, in a letter he wrote to the duke of Auſtria, ſome time after; and declared, that the marquis fell by the poniards of his ſoldiers, in revenge for his having put to death one of his merchants, whoſe ſhip was forced into Tyre by a ſtorm.

The progreſs of the Chriſtian army was for ſome time obſtructed by the death of the marquis; but his widow being ſoon after married to Henry, count of Champagne, that nobleman was, in her right, declared king of Jeruſalem; and, at his inſtances, the French conſented to join the army of Richard, who immediately marched towards the capital of Paleſtine, which he was determined to beſiege. But juſt as he reached the neighbourhood of that city, he fortunately met the caravan paſſing from Babylon to Jeruſalem. The whole conſiſted of three thouſand camels, and four thouſand mules, loaded with the rich merchandize of the Eaſt, and eſcorted by ten thouſand horſe. The Saracens no ſooner perceived the Chriſtian army than they began to retreat; but Richard, at the head of five thouſand cavalry, attacked them with ſuch fury, that they were put to flight, and the whole caravan fell into the hands of the Chriſtians. Richard, who was equally generous and brave, diſtributed the whole booty, which was very conſiderable, among the ſoldiers.

Richard, immediately after this ſucceſsful incident, marched his army to the neighbouring eminences, from the ſummits of which they had a fair proſpect of the celebrated city of Jeruſalem, and the reduction of which was the great object of all their labour and toil. But when Richard thought himſelf ſure of conqueſt, and of putting a glorious period to the expedition, his hopes were rendered abortive by diviſions among the leaders of the confederate army. It was urged, in a council of war, that the ſcarcity which then reigned in the neighbouring countries, would render it difficult, if not impoſſible, to procure proviſions neceſſary for their ſubſiſtence. Theſe reaſons were far from convincing Richard; he was determined to beſiege the city, which was now almoſt deſtitute of troops, the greater part of the garriſon having been drawn out to reinforce the army of Saladine. The duke of Burgundy, perceiving it would be impoſſible to divert Richard from his purpoſe, and envious of the glory which the Engliſh monarch would acquire by the reduction of Jeruſalem, ſeparated his forces from the allied army, and marched directly to Tyre. The duke of Auſtria followed the example of the French general, and abandoned Richard at a time when fortune offered them the palm of victory.

The deſire of reducing Jeruſalem was ſtill the darling paſſion of Richard's ſoul. He even ſubmitted to ſolicit the aſſiſtance of the duke of Burgundy, and the king of Jeruſalem himſelf undertook the office of ambaſſador. But every attempt was made in vain. Steady to his purpoſe of depriving Richard of the glory of taking the capital of Paleſtine, the duke refuſed to join the Chriſtian army, under pretence of his having no authority to expoſe the troops of his maſter in ſuch deſperate ſervice. The Engliſh monarch was therefore obliged to abandon the enterprize, and accordingly marched his army to Acre. But he had hardly reached the neighbourhood of that city, before advice arrived that Saladine had taken Joppa, and was preſſing the ſiege of the caſtle with ſo much fury, that the garriſon muſt ſurrender, unleſs ſpeedily relieved.

Richard, who never abandoned his ſoldiers in diſtreſs, ordered his army to march to the relief of Joppa; while he himſelf, at the head of a ſmall body of choſen troops, embarked at Acre, and reached Joppa ſome time before his army. The name of Richard was terrible to the Infidels: he fell immediately on the beſiegers with ſuch irreſiſtible fury, that the Saracens, who were very ſlightly armed for defence, abandoned the enterprize, and retreated with the utmoſt precipitation.

Notwithſtanding this ſucceſs, yet it was impoſſible for Richard, aſſiſted only by a handful of followers, to defeat the numerous armies of Saladine, and carry his victories to the gates of Jeruſalem. At the ſame time, the enthuſiaſm of the cruſaders began to yield to time and fatigue: they were now more deſirous of viſiting their own country than the capital of Paleſtine. Richard was no ſtranger to their wiſhes, and therefore determined to ſeize this favorable opportunity of coming to an accommodation with Saladine. Accordingly, a truce was concluded between them; by which it was ſtipulated, that Acre, Joppa, and other ſea-port towns of Paleſtine ſhould remain in the hands of the Chriſtians, and that every one of that religion ſhould have liberty to perform his pilgrimage to Jeruſalem unmoleſted. This truce was concluded for three years, three months, three weeks, three days, and three hours; a magical number, which had probably been deviſed by the Europeans, and which was ſuggeſted by a ſuperſtition well ſuited to the object of the war.

Saladine did not long enjoy his mighty empire: he died at Damaſcus ſoon after the concluſion of the truce with the princes of the cruſade; and it is worth remembering, that before he expired, he ordered his winding ſheet to be carried as a ſtandard through every ſtreet of the city; while a crier went before, and proclaimed with a loud voice, "This is all that "remains to the mighty Saladine, the conqueror of "the eaſt." By his laſt will, he ordered charities to be diſtributed to the poor, without diſtinction of Jew, Chriſtian or Mahometan.

The truce being thus ſigned, no buſineſs of ſufficient importance remained to detain Richard any longer in Paleſtine: he therefore determined to haſten with all expedition to England, where his preſence was abſolutely neceſſary, to regulate the affairs of government. Knowing that it would be impoſſible to paſs through France, he embarked on board a large veſſel bound for the iſle of Corfu. He ſailed from thence in order to land on the coaſt of Italy; but was unfortunately ſhipwrecked near Raguſa in the gulph of Venice. He knew the danger of croſſing ſo large an extent of territory with his attendants, and therefore diſguiſed himſelf in the habit of a pilgrim, intending to travel through Germany, as the ſafeſt way, to his own dominions. He was unable, however, to conceal himſelf from the piercing eye of curious enquiry. Some German officers, who had ſerved under the duke of Auſtria at the ſiege of Acre, knew the royal pilgrim, and gave their maſter the pleaſing information. Leopold, rejoiced at having it in his power to retaliate the affronts he had received from Richard in the Holy Land, cauſed him to be ſeized in the night, at a village near Vienna, and ſent him in chains to the emperor Henry VI. with whom, for the preſent, we ſhall leave this great but captive monarch.

We have already obſerved, that Longchamp was obliged to quit England for his mal-adminiſtration. Practiſed in the paths of vice, and a ſtranger to every ſentiment of juſtice, he exerted all his abilities to excite the reſentment of the Roman pontiff againſt the Engliſh. He repreſented them as a rebellious generation, ready to trample upon the ſpiritual authority of St. Peter's ſucceſſors; and that their proceedings againſt him were nothing more than a prelude of attempts of a much higher nature, the deſtruction of the pontifical dignity. Caleſtine III. who now filled the papal chair, was alarmed for his power. Without making any inquiry into the truth of Longchamp's report, he furniſhed the prelate with letters to the Engliſh biſhops, commanding them to excomommunicate prince John, and all who were con- ned in the deprivation of the late chancellor. But people of England no longer trembled at the al thunder; they had learned to diſtinguiſh be- en fanaticiſm and a reaſonable ſubmiſſion to the ers of the church: they firmly defended the con- ution of their country, and looked with contempt the flaming bolt of ſpiritual tyranny.

This oppoſition, however, though virtuous in its ure, was exerted in defence of a perſon who me- d not the care of the Engliſh. John never upled to trample upon the laws of equity and reli- n, when impelled by his own intereſt. Ambitious power, and careleſs of the means by which he at- ed it, he exerted all his abilities to pave his way he crown, ſhould any accident happen to his bro- r during his abſence. He was, indeed, ſenſible t he had no claim either to the ſceptre of England, the foreign dominions of Richard, while Arthur, ke of Britany, ſon to his elder brother Geoffrey, ed; and therefore had recourſe to every artifice depriving the legal heir of his juſt rights, and rping a throne to which he had no pretenſions. He ited Longchamp, whom he had formerly baniſhed m the kingdom, to return, hoping, that by joining ir intereſt, they ſhould be able to diſtreſs an ad- niſtration that had ſo nobly defended the liberties England.

Pleaſed with the acquiſition of ſo powerful a pro- ctor, the biſhop landed in England, and diſpatched meſſenger with the news of his arrival. But the iniſtry were not to be intimidated; they informed e prelate, that unleſs he immediately left the king- m, they would ſeize his perſon as a traitor. Long- amp, whom vice had rendered timorous, waited not e conſequences; he embarked directly, and re- rned to the continent.

Soon after his departure, the news of Richard's priſonment reached England, and cauſed a general nſternation. John conſidered it as a very fortu- te event, and determined to improve it to his own vantage. He paſſed over into France, and threw mſelf into the arms of Philip, the ſworn enemy of s brother. Queen Eleanor, on the other hand, erted herſelf in the cauſe of Richard; and conjured e council to take every precaution to prevent the tal conſequences that might attend this alarming ac- dent.

A. D. 1193. In conſequence of the alliance rmed between John and Philip, the latter invaded ormandy; and by the treachery of John's emiſſaries ade himſelf maſter, without oppoſition, of ſeveral rtreſſes, Neuf-chatel, Neufle, Giſors, Pacey, and vrée: he ſubdued the counties of Eu and Aumale; nd advancing to the ſiege of Rouen, he threatened put all the inhabitants to the ſword, if they dared make the leaſt reſiſtance. Fortunately, Robert arl of Leiceſter, appeared in this critical moment; gallant nobleman, who had acquired great honor uring the cruſade, and who, being more ſucceſsful an his maſter in finding his paſſage homewards, took n him the command of Rouen, and by his preſence nd example, infuſed freſh courage into the diſmayed Normans. Philip was repulſed in every attack; the me of his vaſſals ſervice expired; and he conſented o a truce with the Engliſh regency, on condition of is being paid twenty thouſand marks, for the ſecurity f which four caſtles were put into his hands.

During theſe tranſactions, the unfortunate Richard as ſuffering, in a German priſon, every kind of inſult nd indignity. A warrior, who, at the head of his rmy, made even the mighty Saladine tremble, was ow treated with contempt by a petty prince of the mpire. He was brought before the diet, and ac- uſed of ſeveral crimes, which had no exiſtence but in the malignant minds of his enemies. He juſtified himſelf with an eloquence that confounded his perſecutors, and covered them with confuſion. He remonſtrated againſt the ungenerous treatment he had met with from thoſe whom he had reſcued from the power of the Infidels before Acre; and complained, that after demonſtrating his zeal in the cauſe of Chriſtianity, he had been confined in a priſon, and experienced a treatment hardly proper for ſlaves, in a country that had expreſſed the utmoſt ardour for the cruſade.

Pope Celeſtine III. now interpoſed in favor of Richard, threatening to lay the whole empire under an interdict, if Richard was not releaſed. The princes of the diet were aſhamed of the emperor's conduct, and loudly declared, that they could not ſuffer the Germanic body to be ſtained with the imputation of violating the laws of nature and nations, by detaining in priſon, without any juſt cauſe, the perſon of a great king, who had ſo nobly ventured his life in the cauſe of Chriſtianity. The emperor was alarmed, and offered to ſet Richard at liberty; but demanded one hundred and fifty thouſand marks, about three hundred thouſand pounds of our preſent money, for his ranſom; of which one hundred thouſand were to be paid before he was releaſed from priſon, and hoſtages delivered for the payment of the remainder.

No ſooner was this demand known in England, than every method was put in practice for raiſing the enormous ſum. Twenty ſhillings were levied on every knight's fee, and the money already paid into the treaſury applied to purchaſe the liberty of a prince, who had ſo nobly reſiſted the power of the Infidels. The churches and monaſteries melted down their plate; the nobles, biſhops, and abbots, paid a fourth part of their annual revenues, and the parochial clergy a tenth of their tythes. William, king of Scotland, contributed two thouſand marks towards the king's ranſom. The neceſſary ſum being thus raiſed, queen Eleanor, and Walter, archbiſhop of Rouen, paſſed over to the continent, paid the money to the emperor and the duke of Auſtria; and Richard was ſet at liberty, in preſence of the archbiſhop of Mentz and Cologne, and moſt of the German nobility.

Richard very fortunately eſcaped the perfidy of the emperor. Ambaſſadors from Philip of France arrived ſoon after his deliverance, offering prodigious advantages, if the emperor would confine the Engliſh monarch one year longer. The baſe ſoul of Henry embraced the offer, and diſpatched meſſengers to arreſt Richard, and bring him back to the Imperial court. But his treacherous deſigns were rendered abortive by the agility of Richard, who embarked at the mouth of the Schelde, and loſt ſight of the German ſhore before the emperor's meſſengers arrived at Antwerp. Philip was aſtoniſhed when he heard that Richard was ſet at liberty; and wrote a letter to John in the following terms: "Take care of yourſelf; "the devil is broke looſe."

A. D. 1194. On Richard's arrival in England, he was received by his ſubjects with the utmoſt demonſtrations of joy and affection. They beheld with rapture a prince, who had ſuffered ſuch a dreadful captivity, after ſo nobly defending the Chriſtians, and cauſing the name of an Engliſhman to be revered in nations before unacquainted with the appellation. This endearing behaviour of the people baniſhed from the mind of Richard the idea of all the indignities he had experienced during his impriſonment; all his alarms, his fatigues, and his ſufferings, were buried in oblivion. He ſeemed even deſirous of wiping off the ignominy of his captivity, by ordering the ceremony of his coronation to be repeated. He ſoon after declared his intention of making a reſumption of all the crown revenues, and annulling all the contracts he had made before his departure for the Holy Land. He alledged, that the purchaſers had already indemnified themſelves by the profits of the eſtates; that neceſſity had compelled him to make theſe grants; that the money had been ſpent in an expedition favored both by the clergy and laity; and that therefore it was unjuſt the crown ſhould bear the whole burden.

Theſe reaſons were unneceſſary; none diſputed the juſtice of this reſumption. All the purchaſers gave up the poſſeſſions they had obtained from the king, and ſeemed to vie with each other who ſhould be the firſt to make the required ſurrender.

Richard now called a parliament at Northampton, at which he demanded juſtice againſt his brother John, and his principal abettor, Hugh, biſhop of Coventry. They were both cited to appear within forty days, and anſwer the charge exhibited againſt them. They refuſed, however, to obey the ſummons; on which John was attainted of high treaſon, and the prelate was ordered to be tried by the biſhops in the king's court.

A. D. 1195. Richard, ſince his arrival in England, had formed the reſolution of ſeeking ample vengeance on the perfidious Philip, king of France. A monarch leſs paſſionate and haughty than Richard, could not have been eaſily prevailed upon to pardon the deteſtable conduct of that prince. Richard raiſed a powerful army and paſſed over into Normandy, determining to execute the moſt dreadful revenge againſt the faithleſs Philip, who, contrary to the moſt ſolemn oaths, and in defiance of all laws, both human and divine, had invaded his territories, and endeavoured to prolong the time of his captivity. But the hoſtilities between two ſuch powerful monarchs, thoroughly exaſperated againſt each other, produced no memorable events. A few caſtles taken, a few ſtraggling parties ſurpriſed, and a rencounter of horſe, form the principal actions of this campaign. The only action of any conſequence happened at Fretteval, between the French and Engliſh cavalry, when the former were totally routed; and Philip loſt his chartulary, or regiſter of charters, which he always carried with him, containing the ſeveral particulars of the revenues of the prince, a liſt of his vaſſals, and the ſtate of the ſlaves and freemen. This misfortune obliged Philip to make a new regiſter, in which his prerogatives were rather increaſed than diminiſhed.

During this war, prince John, who was deſtitute both of honor and integrity, deſerted the king of France, as he had formerly done his brother. Having invited to dinner all the officers of the garriſon of Evreaux, where he commanded, he cauſed them to be maſſacred, put the whole garriſon to the ſword, and delivered up the place to the king of England, of whom he craved pardon for his offences. Queen Eleanor interceded, and the king received him into favor. “I forgive him,” ſaid Richard, “and hope to forget his injuries as eaſily as he will my clemency.”—This pardon, however, extended only to his life; it being ſome time after before he was reſtored to his eſtates.

A. D. 1196. Richard now formed an alliance with the counts of Flanders, Tholouſe, Boulogne, Champaigne, and other conſiderable vaſſals of the crown of France, imagining that by theſe means he ſhould have an opportunity of ſtriking a ſevere blow on his rival. But he ſoon experienced the inſincerity of theſe princes, and was unable to make any impreſſion on that kingdom, while governed by a prince of ſo much vigor and activity as Philip.

About this time the duke of Auſtria, having cruſhed his leg by a fall from his horſe at a tournament, was ſeized with a fever; and finding his end approaching, was ſtruck with remorſe for his cruel behaviour to Richard. An entire reſtitution was not in his power; but he ordered, by his will, that all the Engliſh hoſtages ſhould be ſet at liberty, and the king's ranſom remitted. The duke's ſon refuſed to obey his father's orders, but by the interpoſition of the clergy he was obliged to ſubmit, and they were fully diſcharged.

Richard, to ſupport his military expeditions againſt Philip, was obliged to load the Engliſh with taxes, which excited a univerſal complaint among the people; and the great talents of Hubert, the chief juſticiary, were hardly ſufficient to prevent the general diſcontent from becoming of the moſt ſerious conſequence.

Every day produced ſome freſh diſturbance, which were greatly facilitated by the harangues of one William Fitz-Oſbert, a perſon of mean birth, and ſtill meaner appearance. He was a lawyer by profeſſion, but pretended to be the advocate of the poor; and in order to render himſelf ſtill more remarkable, he ſuffered his beard to grow to an enormous length, from which circumſtance he acquired the appellation of Longbeard. He was continually exciting the ſpirit of reſentment in the poor againſt the rich, by the moſt inflammatory ſpeeches; pretending there was a colluſion among the great to eaſe themſelves of the load of public taxes, and throw the whole weight on the ſhoulders of the labouring people, who were conſidered in no better light than that of beaſts of burden. Theſe inſinuations produced the deſired effect; the fury of the people was raiſed to a height bordering upon madneſs; and a tumult enſued in St. Paul's church, where ſeveral perſons loſt their lives, and many others were dangerouſly wounded.

Hubert, the juſticiary, was ſo alarmed at this dangerous inſurrection, that he ordered Longbeard to appear before him; but he was ſo far from obeying the ſummons, that he killed the officer who delivered the citation. The more rational part of his followers were ſtruck with horror at this inhuman action: they abandoned the pretended advocate for the rights of the people, and a few of the loweſt of the rabble only now followed Longbeard. He ſaw the deſertion of the greater part of his advocates, but continued, for ſome days, to rob and murder his fellow-citizens with great barbarity. It was now time for the government to interpoſe, in order to prevent an open rebellion. A ſtrong party of ſoldiers were accordingly ſent into the city, with ſtrict orders to apprehend the incendiary, dead or alive. The rioters were ſtruck with terror, and retired, with Longbeard at their head, to the church of St. Mary-le-bow, where they ſhut themſelves up, hoping that a general inſurrection would be excited in their favor. They were deceived; the citizens ſaw their error, abandoned the wretch, who had deceived them, to puniſhment. Longbeard, however, refuſed to ſurrender; and being driven from the body of the church, he retreated, at the head of his followers, into the ſteeple, from whence they diſcharged a ſhower of ſtones, darts, and other miſſiles, on the heads of his aſſailants. Unwilling to expoſe the lives of his ſoldiers to the attacks of a company of deſperadoes, the officer cauſed a large quantity of wet ſtraw to be carried into the body of the church, and ſet on fire. The ſmoke effectually put an end to all oppoſition; and the inſurgents, to avoid ſuffocation, ſurrendered at diſcretion. Longbeard was ſentenced to be drawn at a horſe's tail through the principal ſtreets of the city, and afterwards to be hung in chains: but this ſentence was altered, and he, with nine of his principal accomplices, were hanged at Tyburn.—Such was the ſuperſtitious veneration the people had for this man, and ſo devoted were they to his memory, that they ſtole the gibbet, conſidering the wood as a ſacred relick; and they even pretended that many miracles were performed by it.

A. D. 1197. Theſe commotions, together with the king's abſence, and his engagements in foreign wars, encouraged the Welſh to invade the Engliſh dominions.

RICHARD I.
Mortally wounded by an Arrow from a Croſs Bow dominions. Rees, prince of ſouth Wales, collecting a conſiderable number of forces, laid ſiege to the town and caſtle of Caermarthen, which he took, and laid in aſhes. Roger Mortimer and Hugh Say, two noblemen of the greateſt intereſt in theſe parts, attempted to check his progreſs, but were themſelves, routed with great loſs. The caſtles of Culn, Radnor and Payn then fell into the hands of Rees; but the laſt was delivered to its owner, William de Brouſe, on certain conditions. The progeſs of the Welſh drew the regent himſelf into the field, at the head of a powerful army. But the Welſh were wiſe enough not to hazard a battle, ſo that all Hubert could do was to take a few of their caſtles, which, as ſoon as the ſeaſon obliged Hubert to retire, fell again into the hands of the Welſh.

While theſe things were tranſacting in England, Richard marched his army into Auvergne and Berry, where he poſſeſſed himſelf of ſeveral places, which were ſoon after retaken by Philip. But John, who had for ſome time been harraſſing the people of Beauvois, being now reinforced by a conſiderable body of Brabanders, advanced to the very gates of the city. Peter de Dreux, biſhop of Beauvois, was a prince of the blood royal of France; he had ſpent more time in the field than in the college, and diſdaining to be inſulted at the gates of his own capital, ſallied out, at the head of a choſen number of forces, in order to drive the enemy from their poſts. In this attempt, however, he failed, for his army was totally defeated, and himſelf taken priſoner.

John knew that Richard mortally hated the biſhop, and therefore ſent him to his brother, to be diſpoſed of as he ſhould think proper. Richard immediately gave orders that he ſhould be conveyed to a dark dungeon in Rouen, and loaded with irons. Soon after ſeveral of the biſhop's friends interceded with Richard for a mitigation of the prelate's ſentence. "You yourſelves," ſaid the king, "ſhall be judges of my reaſons for this ſeverity. When I was taken priſoner in Germany, the emperor treated me, at firſt, with good manners and civility; but within a few days arrived the biſhop of Beauvois. Next morning he had his audience of the emperor, and a few hours after, I was chained like a ſlave, and more irons heaped upon my limbs, than a horſe could have carried. Can you therefore condemn me for treating the biſhop in the ſame manner?" This ſilenced all the prelate's advocates; but the pope ſoon after, demanded his liberty, and claimed him as his ſon. The king ſent his holineſs the coat of mail which the prelate had worn in battle, and which was all beſmeared with blood; replying to the pontiff, in the terms employed by Jacob's ſons to their father, "This have we found: know whether it be thy ſon's coat or not." This laconic anſwer put a ſtop to the interceſſion of his holineſs, who replied, "that the coat ſent by the king did not belong to a ſon of the church, but to a ſon of the camp; therefore Richard was at liberty to treat the priſoner as he thought proper." The prelate, thus abandoned, was obliged to purchaſe his liberty at the price of 10,000 marks.

Philip, finding no advantage could be gained over the Engliſh monarch by arms, and being weary of a war which exhauſted his country, applied to pope Innocent III. who then filled the papal chair, to employ his good offices in bringing about a peace with Richard. The pope readily complied with his requeſt; and ſent cardinal Peter into France, to act as mediator between the contending parties. A negotiation was accordingly begun, and a conſiderable progreſs made in a treaty for a durable peace; when the death of Richard put a final period to the labours of the pontiff.

A. D. 1199, Vidomar, viſcount of Limoges, became poſſeſſed of a very conſiderable treaſure, which was found by a peaſant plowing a field in his lordſhip. Vidomar ſent a part of this treaſure to Richard, who, not being ſatisfied, demanded the whole, as ſuperior lord of the ſoil. The viſcount not readily complying with his demand, Richard, at the head of his Brabanders, inveſted the caſtle of Chaluz near Limoges, where the nobleman reſided. The garriſon, terrified at the preſence of Richard, offered to ſurrender, upon aſſurance that their lives and perſons ſhould be ſafe. But Richard refuſed to grant them any capitulation, declaring his intention was to take the place by ſtorm, and hang up the whole garriſon. This declaration rendered the beſieged deſperate, and they reſolved to ſell their lives as dear as poſſible. Soon after Richard, accompanied by Marcadée, the leader of the Brabanders, approached the caſtle in order to reconnoitre its ſituation and avenues, when one Bertram de Gourdon, armed with a croſs bow, took aim at the king, and pierced his ſhoulder with an arrow. Richard inſtantly mounted his horſe, and returning to his quarters, gave orders that Marcadée at the head of his Brabanders ſhould begin the aſſault, and after taking the place, hang up all the garriſon, except the perſon who had given him the wound. Theſe orders, however barbarous, were punctually executed; and Bertram reſerved as a farther victim to Richard's reſentment.

The wound which Richard received was not of itſelf dangerous; but the ſurgeon by his prepoſterous treatment, rendered it mortal. Richard, ſenſible that his life was drawing towards a period, ſent for Gourdon, and, on his approach, ſaid, "Wretch, what injury did I ever do to you, that you ſhould endeavour to deprive me of my life?" "What have you done to me," replied the priſoner coolly: "you killed, with your own hands, my father and my two brothers; and myſelf you intended to have hanged. I am now in your power; you may ſatisfy your revenge: I ſhall ſuffer all the tortures you can inflict with pleaſure, provided I can enjoy the ſatisfaction of knowing I have given a mortal wound to a tyrant, who has been ſo long a nuiſance to the world."

Richard, ſtruck with remorſe at the boldneſs and juſtneſs of this reply, ordered the priſoner to be ſet at liberty, and a ſum of money to be given him; but Gourdon falling ſoon after into the hands of Marcadée, he ordered him to be flead alive, and afterwards hanged.

Richard did not long ſurvive the death of Gourdon; for the mortification encreaſed ſo faſt, that he paid the debt of nature on the 6th of April, in the 10th year of his reign, and the 42d of his age. He died without iſſue.

A few hours before he reſigned his breath, he made his will, in which he deviſed his kingdom, with all his other dominions, to his brother John, to whom he had been for ſome time perfectly reconciled; reſerving the reſt for alms for the poor, and legacies among his domeſtics. It is ſaid that the archbiſhop of Rouen, preſuming upon the privilege which a death-bed gives to clerical intruſion and inſolence, adviſed Richard, with whom he had ſeveral ſharp diſputes, to put away his three daughters, "Daughters! replied the king, why you know I have none." "Yes, ſaid the prelate, you have three, Pride, Covetouſneſs, and Luxury." Then, ſaid Richard, that I may diſpoſe of them where I know they will be cheriſhed, I leave my pride to the Knights Templars, my Covetouſneſs to the Ciſtercians, and my luxury to the Prelates."

Such was the death of Richard I. who, in perſonal bravery and proweſs, excelled all the princes of that age; from whence he obtained the ſurname of Cœur de Lion, or Lion's-heart. War was to him a paſtime, and danger a ſpur to freſh atchievements. In his perſon he was ſtrong and well proportioned; his arms were long; his eyes blue and full of vivacity; his hair was of a yellowiſh colour, his countenance fair and comely, and his mein grand, noble and truly majeſtic. Few perſons were poſſeſſed of a greater ſhare of underſtanding, a more ſolid judgment, or more perſuaſive eloquence: he had a ready wit, and was maſter of a delicate keen vein of ſatire, the latter of which qualification was evinced in the famous repartee he made to the archbiſhop of Rouen, when on his death-bed.

The private character of this monarch has been ſo variouſly pourtrayed by different writers, that it is very difficult to ſay any thing on that head with tolerable conſiſtency. He ſeems, like moſt other great men, to have had a mixture of ſhining qualities and deſtructive vices. His ingratitude and want of filial affection are unpardonable. He was proud, haughty, ambitious, choleric, cruel and vindictive: he was at once meanly avaricious and idly profuſe. During his reign the people were burthened with ſeveral very heavy taxes; but then it cannot be ſaid that he hoarded up his money like a covetous miſer, for he employed the chief of it in defraying the expences of a war, which, however ridiculous it may appear in modern times, was certainly held laudable in that period.

Upon the whole, Richard's inveterate enemies muſt confeſs, that had he lived longer, the natural rivals of this country, the French, would never have been able to extend their territories as they afterwards did; nor would England have been reduced to the miſerable ſtate in which ſhe appeared under the reign of his ſucceſſor.

Richard in the ſhield of his coat of arms, bore three lions paſſant guardant; which bearing has been ever ſince continued by the Engliſh monarchs.

In his reign coats of arms came alſo to be hereditary in families. Theſe owe their origin to the badges, which knights and other military perſons, painted, for diſtinction-ſake, on their ſhields or banners, in thoſe expeditions into the eaſt, called the cruſades.

The other remarkable occurrences in this reign were as follow: In the firſt year of king Richard, A. D. 1189, the citizens of London obtained the liberty of being governed by two bailiffs, or ſheriffs; and alſo to have a mayor for their principal governor. The two firſt ſheriffs, or bailiffs, were Henry Cornhell and Richard Ryner; and the firſt mayor, Henry Fitz-Alwin, who continued in that office upwards of twenty-five years.—See Harriſon's Hiſtory and Survey of London, p. 26 and 698.

On Midſummer-eve, in the ſecond year of this king's reign, the ſun was eclipſed for three hours, and the ſtars were ſeen in the heavens at ten o'clock in the forenoon.

In the 5th, 6th and 7th years of his reign, there were ſuch great dearths in England and France, that a quarter of wheat was ſold for almoſt twenty ſhillings, a ſum equal to ſix pounds of the preſent money.

It was during this reign that the citizens of London firſt divided themſelves into corporations, or, as they are now called, companies.

SECTION III.

JOHN, SURNAMED LACKLAND.

ACCORDING to the will of the late king, the crown of England fell to his brother John; but his right to it was not by that means rendered indiſputable. Two important queſtions occurred relative to the point of ſucceſſion, both of which could not be eaſily ſolved; becauſe, from the time of the Conqueror to the preſent period, there had not been any law enacted, by which the right of ſucceſſion could be aſcertained. The firſt of theſe queſtions was, whether, according to law, Arthur duke of Bretagne, as repreſenting his father, Geoffrey, elder brother to John, had not a prior right to his uncle, being one degree nearer? The ſecond was, whether, in caſe the law favored the nephew, Richard had a power to diſpoſe of his dominions at pleaſure?---It is evident from theſe circumſtances, that had this matter been ſubmitted to a judicial deciſion, it would have been attended with great and almoſt inſuperable difficulties.

John, however, regardleſs of any objection that might ariſe with reſpect to his title, determined to maintain it; and being then on the continent, he diſpatched Hubert, archbiſhop of Canterbury to England, to concert meaſures with queen Eleanor and Geoffrey Fitz-Peters, chief juſticiary, in order to ſupport his intereſt.

While John was employed on the continent in taking poſſeſſion of Richard's treaſures, reducing the town of le Mans, which had eſpouſed Arthur's claim, and obtaining the ducal coronet of Normandy, his friends exerted themſelves for his intereſt in England, where they exacted the oath of fealty in his behalf from the citizens, burghers, corporations, and military tenants of the crown; but the prelates and nobility, tenacious of their liberties, retired to their caſtles, which they fortified and ſupplied with a ſufficient ſtock of proviſion.

The archbiſhop of Canterbury and his colleagues were ſo zealous in the cauſe of John, that they ſummoned the nobility and prelates to an aſſembly at Northampton, when they painted the generoſity and munificence of the prince in ſuch colours, that they at length prevailed on them to follow the example of the reſt of the nation, which they accordingly did by taking the oath of fealty to his perſon and government.

John, being informed of theſe proceedings, and having ſettled his affairs on the continent, embarked for England, and landed at Shoreham on the 25th of May 1199, from whence he immediately proceeded to London. He was received with univerſal joy by the people, and two days after his arrival was crowned at Weſtminſter by Hubert archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the preſence of a numerous aſſembly of the principal nobility and clergy.

On the day of his coronation he inveſted William Mareſchall, Geoffrey Fitz-Peters, and William de Ferrers with the dignities of earls, the firſt of Pembroke, the ſecond of Eſſex, and the third of Derby. Hubert archbiſhop of Canterbury was at the ſame time time made chancellor; Roger de Lacy had the caſtle of Pontefract; and other barons were favored with the like marks of honor and emoluments.

John, having ſettled his affairs in England, reſolved to paſs over to Normandy, where his preſence was now become neceſſary, in order to oppoſe the progreſs of Philip. He had no ſooner arrived on the continent than Philip propoſed a truce, which John, notwithſtanding the depredations made by Philip, readily aſſented to; and a conference was appointed to be held between the two kings for concluding a definitive treaty.

In the interim an event happened that gave a terrible blow to the proſpects with which the king of England had flattered himſelf. The earl of Flanders, John's moſt uſeful ally, having gotten intelligence of the negociation entered into by that prince with the French court, thought he could no longer, with ſafety to himſelf, depend upon an ally of ſo fickle a diſpoſition: he plainly foreſaw that he ſhould be abandoned, by the propoſed treaty of peace, to the reſentment of his incenſed ſovereign the king of France, whoſe vaſſal he was for the greateſt part of his dominions; he therefore ſent his counteſs to Paris with full powers to negociate a peace with Philip, and ſhe ſucceeded ſo well, that a perfect reconciliation was compleated; the conſequence of which was, that the reſt of the confederacy, depairing of ſucceſs after the defection of ſo principal a member, made their ſubmiſſion likewiſe.

This change of circumſtances, and the fear he had of Arthur, whoſe right to the crown gave him continual uneaſineſs, made John reſolve to agree to a peace with the king of France, however diſhonorable the terms. Accordingly a conference was held, between Andely and Gaillon, in the month of January 1200; at which the following preliminaries were agreed on as the baſis of a definitive treaty. That Lewis, ſon to Philip, ſhould marry Blanch, daughter to Alphonſo, king of Caſtile, and niece to John. That the latter ſhould with her give up the earldom and city of Evreux, together with his claim to all the places poſſeſſed by Philip in Normandy at the time of Richard's death, and thirty thouſand marks of ſilver. John alſo engaged not to interfere in the affairs of Germany, nor to give any manner of aſſiſtance to his nephew Odo, either in men or money.

The definitive treaty was ſoon after concluded; and nine barons of the king of France, and the ſame number of the king of England, were appointed guarantees: theſe ſwore on each ſide, that if their ſovereign violated any article of the treaty, they would declare themſelves againſt him, and embrace the cauſe of the injured monarch.

While the above treaty was in hand John became a captive to the charms of Iſabella, daughter and heireſs of Aymar, count of Angouleſme, one of the moſt celebrated beauties of the age. His queen, the heireſs of the Glouceſter family, was ſtill alive; and Iſabella was betrothed to Hugh earl of Marche. The nuptials, indeed, on account of her tender age, had never been conſummated; but ſhe had ſome time been delivered into the hands of that nobleman. So many difficulties ſeemed to form an unſurmountable barrier to John's deſtructive paſſion; but he diſdained to ſubmit to the laws of his country, though founded on the ſolid baſis of virtue. Under pretence of conſanguinity, he, by ſome means or other procured a divorce, and perſuaded Aymar to carry off his daughter, whom he ſoon after married. The pope was highly exaſperated at theſe irregular proceedings; but John regarded neither the thunder of the vatican, nor the reſentment of the earl whom he had ſo materially injured.

John now returned with his new conſort to England, when they were both ſolemnly crowned at Weſtminſter by the archbiſhop of Canterbury; ſoon after which the king ſet out on a progreſs, with his young queen, to the borders of Scotland.

A. D. 1201. The proud and impolitic John was not poſſeſſed of the art of conciliation. He took no care to ſoften the reſentment of the earl of Marche; but on the contrary conſidered even the moſt diſtant advances towards ſubmiſſion as a diſgrace to royalty.

During his journey to Scotland he held many courts, at which great numbers, who had treſpaſſed againſt the foreſt laws, were ſummoned, and rigorouſly fined. This occaſioned great diſcontent among the people, who by the charter of Henry II. thought themſelves exempted from thoſe arbitrary foreſt laws that had been introduced by the Norman line, and reſtored to their privilege of hunting.

The earl of Marche was no ſtranger to the miſunderſtanding that now ſubſiſted between John and his Engliſh ſubjects; and thinking this a ſeaſonable opportunity, he, with his brother the count d'Eu, excited commotions in Poictou and Normandy.

When John was informed of theſe proceedings, he ſummoned his barons to aſſiſt him in quelling the inſurgents; but they refuſed to attend him into Normandy, unleſs he would confirm their privileges. The aſſociation, however, was not yet ſufficiently eſtabliſhed for them to ſupport their noble reſolution. The threatenings and power of royalty engaged the greater part of them to ſubmit, and John paſſed over into Normandy at the head of an army more than ſufficient to reduce the inſurgents; but he purſued no prudent methods: he advanced claims that gave univerſal diſcontent, and added daily to the public grievances. The barons complained to the king of France, as ſuperior lord; and that prince inſiſted upon John's doing them juſtice. The latter promiſed to redreſs all the grievances that were founded on juſtice; but he kept not his word even in the moſt trifling particular. His vaſſals, deſpiſed, offended, and reduced to deſpair, once more applied to Philip; he received their appeal, and began to exert his authority, in order to prevent their oppreſſion. John again promiſed to do them juſtice, and again broke his engagements; ſo that his conduct rendered him at once both odious and contemptible.

Prince Arthur, alarmed at the conſequences that were likely to ariſe from the conduct of his uncle, determined to ſeek ſecurity in an union with Philip and the diſcontented barons; and accordingly joined the French army, which had already begun hoſtilities. Philip received him with great affection, gave him his daughter in marriage, and promiſed to ſupport him againſt the king of England.

A. D. 1203. The progreſs of the French forces had been ſo remarkably rapid, that John was now deſirous of putting a period to the military operations; but Philip was ſo exaſperated, that he openly declared he would not ſheath the ſword of war, unleſs John would ſubmit to reſign all his tranſmarine dominions to his nephew prince Arthur.

John, however, was far from ſubmitting to ſuch humiliating conditions: he determined to defend his territories to the laſt extremity; but ſtill preſſed Philip for an accommodation upon more reaſonable terms.

Young Arther gave ſeveral inſtances of his courage and intrepidity; but he wanted prudence to conduct military expeditions with ſucceſs. He knew that queen Eleanor was a ſworn enemy to his intereſt, and was therefore deſirous of ſecuring her perſon. She reſided in the caſtle of Mirable, the fortifications of which were in a ruinous condition, and the garriſon too few to make any long reſiſtance. Arthur determined to embrace the firſt opportunity of attacking the caſtle, and being placed by Philip at the head of two hundred knights, he precipitately led his ſmall body of forces againſt Mirabel. The caſtle was taken at the firſt aſſault, but the queen, with the greater part of the garriſon, retired into the tower, and made a gallant defence.

The danger of his mother rouſed John from the couch of indolence; he marched at the head of an army of Engliſh and Brabanders, attacked the camp of Arthur, put his army to flight, and took the young prince, together with the earl of Marche, and moſt of the revolted barons, priſoners. The greater part of the captives were ſent over to England, but Arthur was ſhut up in the caſtle of Falaiſe, and afterwards removed to the citadel of Rouen.

After this victory John retired in triumph into Normandy, and Philip abandoned the ſiege of Arques on his approach. Succeſs is often the deſtruction of the timorous and bloody tyrant; it rendered John the execration of mankind. He was a ſtranger to the gentle feelings of compaſſion, and poſſeſſed not the virtue of magnanimity. He conſidered young Arthur as an eternal bar to his ambition; and imagined that he could never be truly happy till he commenced aſſaſſin.

A ſhort time after this, accounts were received that the young prince was no more, and no one doubted his having fallen by the treacherous mode of aſſaſſination. The crime was certain, but the manner of its being executed was doubtful. The moſt authentic account we have of the murder of this prince, is the following, as given by D'Argentrié, in his Hiſt. de Bretagne: " John, ſays that hiſtorian, leading his nephew after him like a lamb to the ſlaughter, brought him from Rouen to Cherbourg, that the infernal deed might be executed with more privacy. There, late in the evening, followed only by a few friends, he mounted his horſe, and leaving his attendants, ordered the prince to ride on before him. In this manner they paſſed along the ſea-ſide, till a place was diſcovered fit for the bloody purpoſe: it was a high cliff hanging over the ſea. John immediately ſpurred his horſe cloſe to the ſide of that of Arthur, and laying hold of one of the reins of the bridle, ſtabbed the young prince ſeveral times through the body, while the terrified victim cried in vain for mercy. Having finiſhed the infernal deed, he threw the body over the precipice into the ſea."

Other writers ſay that John aſſaſſinated the young prince in the priſon at Rouen, and threw his body into the Seine. But in whatever manner the horrid action was performed, all Europe juſtly accuſed John of the murder; and from that moment the deſpiſed king retained a very precarious authority over both the people and the barons of his dominions. The Britons, enraged at this deteſtable tranſaction, which had put a final period to all their pleaſing hopes, waged implacable war againſt him, and put themſelves in a proper poſture to revenge the murder of their prince.

The wretched Conſtantia, mother to Arthur, preſented to the court of peers in France a petition ſigned by all the barons in Britany, requeſting that ſome puniſhment might be inflicted on the inhuman tyrant for the murder of her ſon. Philip ordered John to be ſummoned before his court; but when the day of hearing came, he appeared only by his deputies, the biſhop of Ely and Hubert de Burg. Their buſineſs was to demand from Philip a ſafe conduct for their maſter to the French court. " He " may come in peace," ſaid Philip, with a ſtern and ſevere countenance. " But may he return in peace," replied the biſhop of Ely. " Yes," anſwered Philip, " if the ſentence of his peers will give him " leave." The ambaſſadors ſufficiently perceived the inſidious tendency of this expreſſion, and inſiſted upon a clearer explanation, and on the king's granting the ſafe conduct required. Great difficulties, and, at laſt, an abſolute denial enſued; and Philip ſwore, by all the ſaints of France, " That " he ſhould return no otherwiſe than according to " the ſentence of the court." The biſhop then told Philip, " That John was to be conſidered as king of " England, as well as duke of Normandy; and the " barons of England would not permit their king to " riſque his life, or, at leaſt, his liberty, at the " French court, even though he ſhould agree to it " himſelf." Philip's anſwer to this was both ready and juſt. " If, my lord," ſaid he, " the duke of " Normandy's ambition led him to acquire a higher " title, ought I, who am his lord, to loſe his allegiance " as my vaſſal? What is it to me, that he has " acquired the crown of England?" The ambaſſadors did not attempt to anſwer Philip; indeed his remarks were unanſwerable upon the principles of the the feudal law. The court therefore proceeded to paſs ſentence, which was as follows: " That John, " duke of Normandy, not regarding the oath he " had taken to Philip his lord, and being a homager " of the crown of France, had, within the ſigniory " of that crown, murdered his elder brother's ſon, " who was alſo a homager of the ſame; therefore " the ſaid John is declared a traitor; and, as an enemy " to the crown of France, he is adjudged to forfeit " all his ſigniories which he held by homage, and " re-entry into the ſame is ordered to be made by " force."

Philip took the neceſſary meaſures to put the ſentence in execution: a more favourable event could not have happened for annexing to the crown of France ſo many conſiderable fiefs, which, during ſeveral centuries, had been diſmembered from it. His vaſſals were in no condition to oppoſe his intention: the inhuman action of John ſilenced all oppoſition, and carried his victorious arms into Normandy. Nor was the hatred which the inhabitants of that duchy bore to the French of any great conſequence: it formed but a feeble obſtacle to the rapidity of Philip's conqueſts.

The count of Alençon, who had been one of John's moſt ſtrenuous advocates, deſerted him, and delivered up all the places under his command to the French monarch, who now ſeparated his army. Exaſperated at the deſertion of ſo powerful a vaſſal, John determined to take Alençon, and immediately inveſted the place. Philip ſaw himſelf expoſed to the diſgrace of ſuffering the capital of his new ally to be wreſted from him. Fortunately a tournament was now held at Gatinois, and the fertile genius of Philip furniſhed him with an expedient for obtaining a powerful aſſiſtance. He repaired to the tournament, and pointed out the plains of Alençon, as the proper field for diſplaying their military talents, and inflicting on a baſe parricide the puniſhment due to his crimes. The knights vowed to chaſtiſe the aſſaſſin; and marched immediately to the relief of the beſieged. John fled at their approach; and never more made any attempt to defend his dominions. He even affected to be unconcerned at the ſucceſs of Philip. " Let him go on," ſaid the puſillanimous monarch, " I ſhall retake in one day what it has coſt him years to acquire."

Though John thus relinquiſhed the temporal, yet he was deſirous of employing the ſpiritual ſword in this quarrel. Pope Innocent III. whoſe protection he ſolicited, was pleaſed with any opportunity of exerting the authority he had aſſumed over the princes of Europe. He wrote to Philip, commanding him to put a final period to the war, and conclude a peace with the king of England. But Philip, inſtead of paying obedience to the pontiff, diſclaimed the temporal authority he challenged over kings, and, regardleſs of the emergencies, purſued his conqueſts with the greateſt vigour.

A. D. 1204. The moſt able as well as truſty general John had in his ſervice was Richard de Lacy, conſtable of Cheſter, who defended Chateau Galliard for a whole year with the greateſt firmneſs and intrepidity. The fortreſs was remarkable for its ſtrength, and Philip was obliged to ſubdue it by famine. The intrepid governor, after having repulſed every attempt, and ſupported with remarkable patience all the miſeries of famine, was at laſt ſubdued by a ſudden attack in the night, and taken priſoner with his whole garriſon. Philip, who knew how to reſpect valor even in an enemy, treated him with the utmoſt civility; and allowed him the whole city of Paris for the place of his confinement.

Philip found but little difficulty in poſſeſſing himſelf of the other towns and fortreſſes in Normandy. The inhabitants of Rouen, indeed, at firſt determined to defend the capital; but finding all reſiſtance would be in vain, they gave it up, and the French monarch took poſſeſſion of the city. The other towns followed the example of the capital, and Philip enjoyed the honor of re-annexing to the crown of France one of the fineſt provinces in the kingdom, which had been diſmembered from it near three centuries.

A. D. 1205. John, finding it needleſs to make any farther efforts in oppoſing Philip, embarked for England; where he had no ſooner arrived, than, in order to cover the diſgrace of his conduct, he exclaimed loudly againſt his barons, who, he pretended had deſerted his ſtandard in Normandy; and extorted from them, in a very arbitrary manner, a ſeventh part of all their moveables, as a puniſhment for their offences. Not long after, he forced them to grant him a ſcutage of two marks and a half on each knight's fee, in order to enable him to make an expedition into Normandy; but he did not attempt to execute the ſervice.

A. D. 1206. The governor of Britany being at this time jealous of the rapid progreſs made by his ally the French king, promiſed to join the Engliſh monarch with all his forces. John embraced the offer, returned abroad with a conſiderable army, and landed at Rochelle; from whence he marched to Angiers, which he took and reduced to aſhes. But the approach of Philip, at the head of his army, diſconcerted all his ſchemes: he immediately made propoſals of peace, and fixed the place of interview with the enemy; but inſtead of keeping his engagement, he privately withdrew with his army, embarked at Rochelle, and returned to England with diſgrace. Philip was ſurprized, on coming to the place of conference, to find that John had embarked for England ſome days before. However, by the mediation of the pope, a truce for two years was concluded between the two monarchs.

A. D. 1207. An event now happened in England that engaged the attention of the whole nation, and ſhook the very pillars of the ſtate. Pope Innocent III. had carried the papal uſurpations much higher than any of his predeceſſors. Not contented with endeavouring to extend the authority of the Roman pontiff over all the potentates of Europe, he was ambitious of reducing the eccleſiaſtics themſelves to the ſame degree of ſervitude. He pretended, that the diſpoſal of all benefices juſtly belonged to the ſucceſſors of St. Peter; and that they had a right to employ all the revenues of the church whenever the intereſt of the papal ſee demanded aſſiſtance.

The imprudence of the monks of Canterbury ſoon furniſhed him with an opportunity of carrying theſe pretenſions into execution. Theſe monks enjoyed the privilege, on the death of a primate, to name a ſucceſſor; but it was uſual, before they filled an office of ſuch importance, to obtain the king's conſent; and it was alſo generally allowed, that the ſuffragan biſhops had voices in the election. There are, however, times, when the moſt ſacred rights are uſurped by unthinking men, who, in order to promote their own intereſt, make no difficulty of having recourſe to the moſt extraordinary methods.

On the death of Hubert, archbiſhop of Canterbury, which happened about the cloſe of the preceding year, the junior monks met clandeſtinely on the very night of his deceaſe, and choſe Reginald their ſubprior, for his ſucceſſor; inſtalled him in the archiepiſcopal throne before midnight, and, having enjoined him in the ſtricteſt ſecrecy, ſent him immediately to Rome, to ſolicit the confirmation of his election. But the vain prieſt no ſooner landed in Flanders, than he diſcovered the whole ſecret, which coming to the ears of the ſuffragan biſhops of Canterbury, and the elder monks of Chriſt-church, who had all voices in this election, they were highly exaſperated; the king, whoſe prerogative was alſo concerned, concurred with the eccleſiaſtics, and deſired them to proceed immediately to a new election, recommending, at the ſame time, John de Gray, biſhop of Norwich, as a very proper perſon for that important office. The monks of Chriſt-church met accordingly, without conſulting the ſuffragan biſhops, and the election of that prelate was accordingly made, without a ſingle contradictory vote; for the junior monks, aſhamed of their conduct, and diſguſted with the levity of Reginald, who had broke his engagement, were deſirous of ſetting aſide his election, and accordingly concurred in raiſing the biſhop of Norwich to the archiepiſcopal throne. In the mean time Reginald reached Rome, but found the pope determined not to confirm his election, till he had received more ſatisfactory intelligence. While the matter thus continued in ſuſpence, the ſuffragans of the dioceſe of Canterbury ſent a ſtrong remonſtrance to the court of Rome, complaining of the invalidity of both elections, as they were both carried on without their privity or conſent. Glad of an opportunity of humbling at once the king and biſhops of England, the pope had recourſe to very trifling excuſes, without giving any direct anſwer to the monks, who had been ſent to Rome, by the king and biſhop of Norwich. At laſt, he declared both elections void; but added, that the convent of Chriſt-church had undoubtedly the power of electing an archbiſhop, ſolely in themſelves, though they had been irregular in raiſing Reginald to the archiepiſcopal throne. He therefore deſired, that they would immediately proceed to a new election; and, as there were then at Rome, a ſufficient number to elect an archbiſhop, he deſired they would not loſe a moment's time, and let their choice fall upon cardinal Stephen Langton, an Engliſhman, and a divine of great eminence. The monks were ſtartled at this new and inſolent doctrine. They repreſented, that it had been ever underſtood, that the king had a right of being conſulted on the choice of an archbiſhop; but their remonſtrance was in vain: Innocent continued firm to his purpoſe, and they were all of them, excepting Elias de Bainfield, who nobly withſtood the inſolent demand, obliged to ſubmit to the pope's order, and chuſe the perſon nominated by his holineſs.

However bigotted the pope might be to the Roman ſee, yet he was not inſenſible that this flagrant uſurpation muſt of courſe excite the reſentment of the Engliſh court. He therefore wrote a very mollifying letter to John; ſent him a preſent of four golden rings, ſet with precious ſtones, the value of which he endeavoured to enhance, by explaining the many myſteries they implied. He deſired him to obſerve, with the moſt ſerious attention, the form, the matter and the colour of theſe rings. "The form," ſaid the pope, " is round, repreſenting eternity,

“ which has neither beginning nor end; and hence
“ you ought to learn your duty of aſpiring from “ earthly to heavenly objects, from things temporal
“ to things eternal. The number Four being a “ ſquare, denotes ſteadineſs of mind, which neither “ proſperity nor adverſity can ſubvert, fixed for ever
“ on the ſolid baſis of the four cardinal virtues. The “ matter, which is gold, the moſt precious of metals, “ ſhadows out wiſdom, the moſt precious of all ac-
“ compliſhments, and juſtly preferred by Solomon
“ to riches, power, and all exterior attainments.
“ The verdure of the emerald repreſents Faith; the “ blue colour of the ſapphire, Hope; the redneſs of “ the ruby, Charity; the ſplendor of the topaz,
“ Good Works.”

This explanation, which, in that age, was greatly admired, though it appears extremely ridiculous in our's, produced not the deſired effect. John was enflamed with the utmoſt rage, and threatened the moſt exemplary vengeance againſt all that had been concerned in the late colluſive election. But when he heard that the monks of Canterbury, dreading the vengeance of the court of Rome, were inclined to ſupport the choice, his paſſion knew no bounds. He immediately diſpatched two reſolute knights, whoſe violent tempers were equal to the ferocity of their manners, to expel the monks from their convent. They performed their orders with the greateſt punctuality; and the fathers were obliged to ſeek their ſafety in a precipitate flight, leaving the knights in full poſſeſſion of every thing belonging to them.

Theſe violences gave the moſt ſecret ſatisfaction to the pope, who was convinced that ſhould they be purſued John muſt infallibly ſink in the conteſt. The pope followed not John's example; he had recourſe to the ſofter arts of perſuaſion, till he found the thunder of the vatican produce the deſired effect. He wrote a very conciliating letter to John, beſeeching him not to oppoſe the determination of his ſpiritual father, who was continually labouring for his eternal happineſs. He deſired him to reflect on the conſequences that attended a ſimilar oppoſition in his father Henry; and begged him not to reſiſt the church of God, nor perſecute any longer, that cauſe for which the holy martyr St. Thomas ſacrificed his life, and who was now ſo juſtly venerated by the people.

John, however, was firm to his purpoſe; and had his principles of reſiſtance been founded on the ſolid baſis of virtue, his behaviour would have merited the higheſt applauſe. But the vices of John had rendered him contemptible; he could not hope to be ſupported by his ſubjects. The pope knew this, and determined to perſevere. He commanded the biſhops of London, Ely, and Worceſter to expoſtulate with him, and if he perſevered in his diſobedience, to threaten the kingdom with an interdict.

This inſolent behaviour of the pontiff exaſperated John almoſt to madneſs. He ſwore that if the pope preſumed to pronounce the ſentence, he would put out the eyes, and cut off the noſes of all the Roman clergy he could find in his dominions. In vain were all the perſuaſions of the biſhops to mitigate his fury; he wrote a letter to the pope, telling his holineſs, that he looked upon his proceedings as an inſult upon royalty; that his own kingdom furniſhed a ſufficient number of clergymen, eminent at once for their learning and piety, without ſuffering thoſe of a foreign ſeminary to be intruded upon him; that he was determined to maintain the election of the biſhop of Norwich to the utmoſt extremity; and concluded with telling the pontiff, that if he refuſed to do him juſtice in this particular, he would prohibit all commerce between his ſubjects and the Roman ſee.

Theſe threats had but little effect on the pope: he knew the animoſity that ſubſiſted between John and his people, and therefore, without any heſitation, thundered out the dreadful ſentence of interdiction againſt the kingdom.

This cenſure had all the requiſites for exciting a popular commotion. The ruin of the people was involved in the puniſhment of the king. The exterior parts of religion immediately ceaſed: the altars were ſtripped of their ornaments; the images, the croſſes, the ſtatues of ſaints, and all the holy relicks were laid upon the ground. The churches were ſhut againſt the laity, and divine ſervice was ſuppreſſed. Even the ſacraments were no longer adminiſtered but to dying perſons; nor were the dead ſuffered to be buried in conſecrated ground. The ſevereſt penances were commanded, and every kind of entertainment ſtrictly prohibited.

It is little to be wondered at, that the whole nation ſhould be alarmed at theſe ſevere injunctions; and that every perſon in the kingdom ſhould exert all his power to avert ſuch dreadful calamities. But John was not to be moved with tears and ſupplications. He oppoſed, with the moſt obſtinate inflexibility, every attempt to remove the ſcourge, and reſtore tranquillity to his dominions. He puniſhed, with the utmoſt rigour, all who ſubmitted to the orders of the pope, whether biſhops, monks or ſecular clergy. Some of the eccleſiaſtics, indeed, diſregarded the cenſure of the Roman pontiff. The Ciſtertian order continued to perform divine ſervice publicly; the biſhops of Wincheſter and Norwich followed their examples, and ſeveral of the moſt eminent divines openly preached againſt thoſe proceedings, which they called unjuſt and unwarrantable. An exertion of prudent vigor therefore might have diſſipated the tempeſt: but John liſtened not to the voice of reaſon; he followed the dictates of his headſtrong paſſions, which led him to the brink of a precipice that threatened his deſtruction.

A. D. 1210. Though England had now laboured a conſiderable time under the ſevere cenſure of the pope, yet John was ſo far from taking any meaſures which might either remove that, or in any way tend to the happineſs of his people, that he became more tyrannical than ever: his cruelties increaſed in the ſame proportion with the danger of his government. The clergy were the particular objects of his fury. He ſeized upon their temporalities, drove them from their monaſteries, and inflicted on them every kind of indignity: he endeavoured to retaliate on them the ſufferings of himſelf and his people. But his deſpotiſm was not confined to the clergy, the laity alſo felt the weight of his oppreſſion. He not only enforced the foreſt laws, which had always excited troubles and diſtreſs, but likewiſe ordered all the mounds of his foreſt to be levelled, that his deer might range at large, to the inexpreſſible diſtreſs of the huſbandmen.

In ſhort, ſo inconſiſtent were the meaſures of this infatuated prince, that even while he had recourſe to theſe violent oppreſſions, he felt the crown totter on his head, and had recourſe to the moſt extraordinary ſtretch of power to enforce the obedience of his barons. He compelled them to give him hoſtages for their good behaviour and fidelity. The greater number complied with his demand; but when the king's meſſengers came to the caſtle of William de Barouſe, a nobleman of great power in the Marches of Wales, his lady replied, “ That ſhe would never truſt her ſon to the care of a prince, who had imbrued his hands in the blood of his own nephew.” Barouſe, who knew the cruel temper of John, and that the ſarcaſm of his wife would never be pardoned, fled, with his family, into Ireland. But the place of their retreat was ſoon known, and John gave a looſe to his cruelty. He ſhut up the lady and her ſon in priſon, where they were ſtarved to death; the nobleman himſelf was obliged to have recourſe to flight, leaving all his eſtates and property to the mercy of his inhuman and tyrannic ſovereign.

A. D. 1211. John had long expected that the pope would iſſue againſt him the dreadful ſentence of excommunication, which he now ſincerely wiſhed to avert. He therefore diſpatched the abbot of Beaulieu on an embaſſy to Rome, to effect, if poſſible, a reconciliation with the pontiff. In conſequence of this cardinal Langton was immediately ordered to repair to England; but John's propoſals not being equal to what the pope demanded, the Cardinal broke off the conference abruptly and returned to the continent.

The haughty pontiff, tranſported with rage at the ill ſucceſs his legate had met with, excommunicated John, and abſolved all his ſubjects from their oaths of allegiance. This eccleſiaſtical thunderbolt was really terrible, becauſe the pope gave the kingdom of England to Philip of France, a prince who wanted neither power nor inclination to aſſert his claim. The pontiff did more, he promiſed him the remiſſion of all his ſins, if he ſucceeded in the reduction of England. He even granted the ſame indulgences on account of this expedition, as had been given to thoſe who went into Aſia to recover the Holy Land from the infidels. The facinating luſtre of the Engliſh diadem wholly changed the opinion of Philip. He did not now tell his holineſs, that the pope had no right to give away crowns. His own kingdom had been interdicted ſome years before, and he himſelf excommunicated by this very pope, for attempting to marry another wife. He then aſſerted the independence of his crown, and declared theſe papal cenſures inſolent and abuſive. He ſeized the temporalities of every eccleſiaſtic in France who had proved himſelf ſo bad a ſubject as to obey the pope: but he thought quite differently, when he ſaw himſelf commiſſioned with the execution of a bull, which was to put England into his poſſeſſion. He took again to his bed that very princeſs, whoſe divorce had been the cauſe of ſo many excommunications, and devoted himſelf intirely to execute the ſentence of Rome. He employed a whole year in building one hundred and ſeventy ſhips, and in raiſing and diſciplining the fineſt army ever ſeen in France.

Notwithſtanding John's ſubjects had reaſon to look on him with deteſtation, yet from the natural enmity the Engliſh bore the French; from the horror the people had conceived againſt the pope's arbitrary proceedings, and from the aſſiſtance of the extenſive prerogatives of the crown, John was enabled to raiſe and keep together, during ſeveral weeks, an army of ſixty thouſand men, at the head of which he advanced towards Dover, to meet the prince who had tried and condemned him in France, and was now coming to dethrone him in England.

Had theſe troops been united in affection to their prince, and animated with a becoming zeal for the defence of their country, John would have had nothing to fear. He might have bid defiance to the thunder of the vatican, aſſiſted by the whole power of the French monarch. but the caſe was very different: the people were guided by ſuperſtition, and regarded their king with horror, as a perſon anathematized by the ſupreme head of the church. At the ſame time, the barons, beſides lying under the ſame prejudices, had been long diſguſted with his tyranny, and many of them were ſuſpected of holding a treaſonable correſpondence with the enemy. Theſe circumſtances conſidered, the moſt fatal conſequences were naturally to be expected from the French invaſion.

A. D. 1213. The artful pontiff was, however, too well acquainted with the temper and ſpirit of John, not to foreſee, that the court of Rome would reap much greater advantages by trying lenitives once more, than puſhing him into abſolute deſpair. For this purpoſe he gave, in open conſiſtory, a commiſſion to Pandolf, and the exiled biſhops to repair to England, and there to fulminate in perſon his ſpiritual cenſures. He alſo gave him private inſtructions how to behave, in caſe John ſhould repent, and deſire to make ample ſatisfaction.

Thus armed with the power of making a dangerous war, or a ſtill more dangerous peace, the legate took leave of the court of Rome, and repaired with the exiled Engliſh biſhops to Paris. They found Philip very buſy in making preparations for his expedition into England, and immediately ſent over two knights templars to deſire an interview with John at Dover, which was readily granted.

The legate having informed Philip, that it was neceſſary for him to publiſh the pope's ſentence in John's dominions, repaired to England, where he laid before him every motive that had any tendency to ſooth, or terrify him into compliance. He repreſented to him the numerous army collected by Philip for invading England: he obſerved, that, beſides the troops he had already procured, ſupplies were expected from every prince in Chriſtendom, who conſidered him as an avowed excommunicated rebel, and his crown as forſeited, by the pope's ſentence. He added, that it was publicly known in France, that Philip had received an invitation from the principal nobility of England, who had promiſed to join him upon his landing.

The puſillanimous John, terrified at the alarming intelligence of the rebellious diſpoſition of his nobility, and dreading the power of the French monarch, yielded at diſcretion, and ſubſcribed to all the conditions which Pandolf was pleaſed to impoſe upon him. He promiſed, among other articles, that he would ſubmit himſelf entirely to the judgment of the pope; that he would acknowledge Langton for primate; that he would reſtore all the exiled clergy and laity, who had been baniſhed on account of the conteſt; that he would make them full reſtitution for their goods, and compenſation for all damages, and inſtantly conſign eight thouſand pounds in part of payment; and that every one outlawed or impriſoned, on account of their adherence to the pope, ſhould immediately be received into grace and favour. Four barons joined with the king, in ſwearing to this ignominious treaty.

But this ignominy, however great, was far from being equal to what John had yet to ſuffer; he was to drain the cup of ſubjection to the lees. The artful Pandolf refuſed to open at once the ſcroll of abjection, leſt it ſhould drive him to deſpair, and by that means diſappoint the ambitious views of the Roman pontiff. But having now procured a treaty, by which the king had ſubmitted to the moſt ſhameful terms, Pandolf thought he might venture to go one ſtep farther. Accordingly, he propoſed that John ſhould reſign his kingdom to the church. He perſuaded the king, that there was no other way, by which he could ſo effectually diſappoint the French invaſion, as by putting himſelf under the immediate protection of the holy ſee. John, lying under the agony of preſent terror, made no ſcruple of ſubmitting to the propoſal of Pandolf. He paſſed a charter, by which he ſaid, that, not conſtrained by fear, but of his own free will, for the remiſſion of his own ſins, and thoſe of his family, he reſigned England and Ireland to God, to St. Peter and St. Paul, and to pope Innocent and his ſucceſſors in the apoſtolic chair. He agreed to hold theſe dominions as feudatory of the church of Rome, by the annual payment of a thouſand marks; ſeven hundred for England, and three hundred for Ireland. At the ſame time he ſtipulated, that if he, or his ſucceſſors, ſhould ever preſume to infringe or revoke this charter, they ſhould inſtantly, except upon admonition, forfeit all right to their dominions.

This agreement being ſigned, and the fifteenth of May appointed for this humiliating ceremony, John did homage to Pandolf as the pope's legate, with all the mortifying rites which the feudal law required of the vaſſals before their liege lord and ſuperior. He came diſarmed into the preſence of the legate, who was ſeated on a throne; he flung himſelf on his knees before him; he lifted up his hands, and put them within thoſe of Pandolf; he ſwore fealty to the pope, paid part of the tribute, which he owed for his kingdom, as the patrimony of St. Peter, and preſented Pandolf with his crown and ſceptre.

The proud legate, elevated by this ſupreme triumph of ſacerdotal power, could not forbear diſcovering extravagant ſymptoms of joy and exultation: he trampled on the money, which was laid at his feet, as an earneſt of the ſubjection of the kingdom: an inſolence which, however offenſive to all the Engliſh, no perſon, except the archbiſhop of Dublin, ventured to take notice of. But though Pandolf had brought the king to ſubmit to theſe baſe conditions, he ſtill refuſed to take off the excommunication and interdict, till an eſtimation ſhould be taken of the loſſes ſuffered by the eccleſiaſtics, and full compenſation and reſtitution ſhould be made them.

Theſe humiliating circumſtances, however great they were, could not altar John's diſpoſition to tyranny. One Peter Pomfret, a hermit, had foretold, that the king ſhould, this year, loſe his crown; and for that raſh prophecy, he had been, for ſome time, confined in Corſe-caſtle. The day fixed being now paſſed, the prophet was dragged out of priſon, and hanged as an impoſtor at Wincheſter: though the hermit pleaded, that his prophecy was fulfilled, and that the king had loſt the royal and independent crown, which he formerly wore.

As ſoon as Pandolf had executed his ſecret commiſſion in England, he paſſed over to the continent, where Philip was waiting for him, every thing being ready for the armament to put to ſea. The legate immediately repaired to the prince's court, and informed him that he was no longer permitted to make a deſcent upon England, now become a fief to the Roman church; and that John was under the protection of the holy ſee.

Philip, at once ſurpriſed and incenſed at this declaration, treated the legate as an impoſtor. He told him, that he had made theſe preparations at an immenſe expence, at the preſſing inſtances of the pope; and therefore, that no contrary orders, nor even all the threats of the Vatican, ſhould now deter him from proſecuting his deſign. He immediately ſummoned a general council, wherein he painted the pope's inſiduous proceedings in the moſt glaring colours, and deſired their advice with regard to proſecuting the deſign againſt England. They all expreſſed their abhorrence of the pope's duplicity, and the greater part declared for making the intended deſcent.

The earl of Flanders not only diſſented from the general opinion, but declared ſtrongly againſt it. He boldly told Philip, that his expedition againſt England was inconſiſtent with juſtice, and the law of nations, as none of his anceſtors ever pretended any claim to that kingdom. Exaſperated at this remonſtrance, Philip ordered the earl to quit his dominions, and immediately turned the armament he had raiſed for an expedition into England, againſt Flanders. But William, earl of Saliſbury, at the head of an Engliſh fleet fitted out to guard the channel, fell with ſuch fury on the French tranſports, that one hundred of them were ſunk, and three hundred taken. Philip perceiving that the total deſtruction of his ſhips was inevitable, ſet fire to the reſt, as the only method to prevent their falling into the hands of the Engliſh.

At the ſame time that this fatal ſtroke blaſted all Philip's grand projects, it did not a little animate the ſpirits of John. As he was aſſured of the pope's aſſiſtance he was reſolved to purſue the advantage he had obtained over Philip, and endeavour to recover his loſt dominions. With this view he ſummoned all his barons, knights and vaſſals to attend him at Portſmouth; but the barons ſent him word they could not comply with his ſummons ſo long as he continued under a ſtate of excommunication.

To remove this obſtacle, John wrote a very preſſing letter to Langton, beſeeching him to come with all expedition, and give him abſolution; aſſuring him that he would, to the utmoſt of his power, love, defend and maintain the church and clergy againſt all their adverſaries; that he would re-eſtabliſh the wholeſome laws of his predeceſſors, particularly thoſe of king Edward; and that he would annul all oppreſſive edicts, and judge every man according to juſtice and equity.

The prelate liſtened to John's requeſt, and, on the above conditions, gave him abſolution in the cathedral church of Wincheſter, in the preſence of the principal nobility and clergy of the kingdom.

A. D. 1214. John having thus removed the grand object that impeded the execution of his intentions, determined now to carry on the war againſt Philip with the moſt unremitting vigor; but when he came to the teſt, it was evident he wanted both courage and prudence to lead an army againſt ſo powerful an enemy. He, however, beſieged a caſtle near Angiers; but the approach of an army, under the command of prince Lewis, excited all his natural timidity. He raiſed the ſiege with the utmoſt precipitation, leaving behind him all his tents, machines, and baggage. A few days after, advice arrived, that Philip had defeated, at Bovines, the emperor Otho, who had entered France at the head of one hundred and fifty thouſand Germans. This victory eſtabliſhed for ever the reputation of Philip, and put a final period to all John's hopes of a conqueſt: he therefore relinquiſhed every farther attempt, and returned home with diſgrace.

Peace, however, was far from being eſtabliſhed in England. Though the feudal government, ſince the Norman conqueſt, had ſet bounds to the ſovereign authority, the prerogatives of the crown had been very greatly extended. The Engliſh nobility were now determined to aſſume the ſame privileges which thoſe of ſimilar rank enjoyed in the other kingdoms of Europe. The charter paſſed by Henry I. renewed by Stephen, and confirmed by Henry II. had flattered the people with liberty, without communicating to them any real advantages; the form appeared lovely, but it was deſtitute of ſubſtance. The articles had never been executed on the part of the crown, and the whole was now nearly forgotten. The barons were rouſed from the couch of indolence by the debauchery, the meanneſs, the violence, and the tyranny of John. Both clergy and laity joined in oppoſing the tyrant of their country. Archbiſhop Langton became the head of a faction. The promiſe the king had made at the time he received abſolution, furniſhed the primate with pretences for a revolt. He aſſembled the barons; he produced a charter of Henry I. which he had fortunately found in the library of a monaſtery, and exhorted them to join firmly in inſiſting on a renewal and ſolemn confirmation of that contract of privileges.

Pleaſed with the opportunity of ſetting bounds to the royal authority, and of procuring a poſitive declaration of the rights of Engliſhmen, the barons took an oath to adhere firmly to each other; planned meaſures for forcing the king to grant their requeſt, ſhould he be diſpoſed to refuſe it; and agreed to meet at London ſoon after Chriſtmas, to put their deſigns into execution.

A. D. 1215. The barons performed their promiſe, and at the time appointed repaired to London, where they demanded of the king a renewal of Henry's charter, and a confirmation of the laws of Edward the Confeſſor.

The king, alarmed at their number, zeal, and unanimity, promiſed to give them a poſitive anſwer at Eaſter. In the mean time he laboured, with the utmoſt aſſiduity, to gain the clergy over to his intereſt, by making them the moſt laviſh conceſſions. He gave them a charter, by which he granted to them the election to all benefices; reſerving only the right of a conge d'elire, and to ſubjoin a confirmation of the election, but declaring, that if either of theſe were delayed, the choice ſhould nevertheleſs be deemed valid. At the ſame time, he implored the aſſiſtance of the pope, and vowed to lead an army into Paleſtine, not doubting but he ſhould receive from the church that protection which ſhe had granted to every prince engaged in thoſe pious expeditions. It was the intereſt of Innocent to protect his vaſſal, in order to ſecure his ſubmiſſion. But the Engliſh clergy, weary with the deſpotiſm of the Roman court, and who regretted the loſs of thoſe privileges which the pontiff treated with contempt, openly profeſſed their zeal for the liberty of the people. This encouraged the barons to proceed with alacrity; and though they expected to have the pope, as well as the king, to contend with, they did not deſpair of ſucceſs; they determined to procure a charter of liberties, or periſh in the glorious attempt.

The time being now nearly arrived, when John was to give a poſitive anſwer to the demand of the barons, he ſent to them and deſired to have a ſchedule of the different articles of their pretenſions. The barons immediately prepared the writing requeſted; and advanced in a body to Brackley, within fifteen miles of Oxford, where the court then reſided, and ſent the ſchedule by the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the earl of Pembroke. The king read the demands of the barons, and burſt into the moſt furious paſſion, aſking, "Why they did not alſo demand his "crown?" Swearing, that he would never grant them liberties which muſt reduce the king to the ſtation of a ſlave.

This anſwer was immediately communicated by the primate to the diſcontented barons, who, without heſitation, elected Robert Fitz-Walter their general, under the title of "The Mareſchal of the army of "God, and of the Holy Church." They ſtaid not for any farther anſwer from John, but immediately began hoſtilities. They publiſhed a proclamation, inviting the reſt of the nobility to join them in this national cauſe. They advanced towards London, and entered the capital without oppoſition. Almoſt all the nobility now joined the ſtandard of the barons; and John was left at Odiham, in Surry, with the poor retinue of only ſeven knights. He made ſeveral attempts to elude the blow. He offered to refer the whole diſpute to the pope, and ſign any charter that his holineſs ſhould approve. This was refuſed. He then propoſed to empower eight barons to ſettle the conteſt, four of them to be choſen by himſelf, and four by the inſurgents. But this offer was alſo rejected. John now perceived that all oppoſition would be in vain: he ſaw himſelf abandoned by his ſubjects, and was obliged to conſent to the demands of the barons.

A conference was now appointed to be held between the king and his barons at Runnemede, between Windſor and Staines, a place which has, ever ſince, been extremely celebrated on account of this great event. The two parties encamped ſeparately, like open enemies; and, after a debate of a few days, the king, with a facility which was ſomewhat ſuſpicious, ſigned and ſealed the charter required of him.

This famous deed, commonly called Magna Charta, or the Great Charter, granted and ſecured very important liberties and privileges to every order of men in the kingdom, to the clergy, to the barons, and to the people.

This important writing being juſtly conſidered as the foundation of Engliſh liberty, we ſhall here preſerve a faithful tranſlation of it.

MAGNA CHARTA; or, The Charter of Liberties, granted by King John to his Subjects, in the Year 1215.

"JOHN, by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy and Aquitaine, and earl of Anjou; to the archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, earls, barons, juſticiaries of the foreſts, ſheriffs, governors, officers, and to all bailiffs, and other his faithful ſubjects, greeting. Know ye, that we, in the preſence of God, and for the health of our ſoul, and the ſouls of all our anceſtors and heirs, and to the honor of God, and the exaltation of the Holy Church, and amendment of our kingdom, by advice of our venerable fathers, Stephen, archbiſhop of Canterbury, primate of all England, and cardinal of the holy Roman church; Henry, archbiſhop of Dublin: William, biſhop of London; Peter of Wincheſter; Jocelin of Bath and Glaſtonbury; Hugh of Lincoln; Walter of Worceſter; William of Coventry; Benedict of Rocheſter, biſhops: and maſter of Pandolf, the pope's ſub-deacon and antient ſervant; brother Aymeric, maſter of the temple in England; and the noble perſons William Mareſchal, earl of Pembroke; William earl of Saliſbury; William earl of Warren; William earl of Arundel; Alan de Galloway, conſtable of Scotland; Warin Fitz-gerald, Peter Fitz-herebert; and Hubert de Burgh, ſeneſchal of Poictou; Hugo de Neville; Matthew Fitz-herebert; Thomas Baſſet; Alan Baſſet; Philip de Albiney; Robert de Ropele; John Mareſchal; John Fitz-Hugh; and others our liege-men, have, in the firſt place, granted to God, and by this our preſent charter, confirmed for us and our heirs for ever.

I. "That the church of England ſhall be free, and enjoy her rights intire, and her liberties inviolable. And we will have them ſo to be obſerved, that it may appear from hence, that the freedom of elections, which was reckoned chief and indiſpenſable to the Engliſh church, and which we granted and confirmed by our charter, and obtained the confirmation of from pope Innocent III. before the diſcord between us and our barons, was granted of mere free will; which charter we ſhall obſerve, and do will it to be faithfully obſerved by our heirs for ever.

II. "We have alſo granted to all freemen of our kingdom, for us and our heirs for ever, all the under written liberties, to have and hold them and their heirs, of us and our heirs.

III. "If any of our earls, or barons, or others, who hold of us in chief by military ſervice, ſhall die, and at the time of his death, his heir ſhall be of full age, and owe a relief, he ſhall have his inheritance by the antient relief; that is to ſay, the heir or heirs of an earl, for a whole earl's barony, by an hundred pounds; the heir or heirs of a knight, for a whole knight's fee, by an hundred ſhillings at moſt; and whoever oweth leſs, ſhall give leſs, according to the antient cuſtom of fees."

IV. " But if the heir of any ſuch ſhall be under age, and ſhall be in ward," (his lord ſhall not have the wardſhip of him, nor his land, before he hath received his homage; and after ſuch heir ſhall be in ward, and attain to the age of one and twenty years) " when he comes of age, he ſhall have his inheritance without relief, or without fine." (Yet ſo that if he be made a knight while he is under age, nevertheleſs the lands ſhall remain in cuſtody of the lord, until the aforeſaid time.)

V. " The warden of the land of ſuch heir, who ſhall be under age, ſhall not take of the land of ſuch heir, other than reaſonable iſſues, reaſonable cuſtoms, and reaſonable ſervices; and that without deſtruction and waſte of the tenants or effects" (upon the eſtate.) " And if we ſhall commit the guardianſhip of thoſe lands to the ſheriff, or any other who is anſwerable to us for the iſſues of the land; and if he ſhall make deſtruction and waſte upon the wood-lands, we will compel him to give ſatisfaction, and the land ſhall be committed to lawful and diſcreet tenants of that fee, who ſhall be anſwerable for the iſſues to us, or to him to whom we ſhall aſſign them. And if we ſhall give or ſell to any one the wardſhip of any ſuch lands, and if he makes deſtruction or waſte upon them, he ſhall loſe the wardſhip itſelf, which ſhall be committed to two lawful and diſcreet tenants of that fee, who ſhall in like manner, be anſwerable to us as aforeſaid."

VI. " But the warden, ſo long as he ſhall have the wardſhip of the land, ſhall keep up the houſes, parks, warrens, ponds, mills and other things pertaining to the land, out of the iſſues of the ſame land; and ſhall reſtore to the heir, when he becomes of age, his whole land, ſtocked with ploughs and carriages, according as the time of wainage ſhall require, and the iſſues of the land can reaſonably bear." (And all theſe things ſhall be obſerved in the cuſtodies of vacant archbiſhopricks, biſhoprics, abbies, priories, churches, and dignities which appertain to us; except that theſe wardſhips are not to be ſold.)

VII. " Heirs ſhall be married without diſparagement, ſo as that before matrimony ſhall be contracted thoſe who are neareſt in blood to the heir ſhall be acquainted with it."

VIII. " A widow, after the death of her huſband, ſhall forthwith, and without difficulty have her marriage and inheritance; nor ſhall ſhe give any thing for her dower, or her marriage, or her inheritance, which her huſband and ſhe held at the time of his death: and ſhe may remain in the manſion-houſe of her huſband forty days after his death; within which time her dower ſhall be aſſigned." (If it was not aſſigned before, or unleſs the houſe ſhall be a caſtle; and if ſhe departs from the caſtle, there ſhall forthwith be provided for her a complete houſe, in which ſhe may decently dwell, till her dower be to her aſſigned, as hath been ſaid; and ſhe ſhall, in the mean time, have her reaſonable eſtover, that is, competent maintenance, out of the common revenue. And there ſhall be aſſigned to her for her dower, the third part of all her huſband's lands which were in his lifetime, except ſhe were endowed with leſs at the church door.)

IX. " No widow ſhall be diſtrained to marry herſelf, ſo long as ſhe has a mind to live without a huſband. But yet ſhe ſhall give ſecurity that ſhe will not marry without our aſſent, if ſhe holds of us; or without the conſent of the lord of whom ſhe holds, if ſhe holds of another."

X. " Neither we, nor our bailiffs, ſhall ſeize any land or rent for any debt, ſo long as there ſhall be chattles of the debtor's upon the premiſes, ſufficient to pay the debt," (and the debtor be ready to ſatisfy it.) " Nor ſhall the ſureties of the debtor be diſtrained, ſo long as the principal debtor is ſufficient for the payment of the debt."

XI. " And if the principal debtor ſhall fail in the payment of the debt, not having wherewithal to pay it," (or will not diſcharge when he is able,) " then the ſureties ſhall anſwer the debt, and, if they will, they ſhall have the lands and rents of the debtor, until they ſhall be ſatisfied for the debt which they paid for him; unleſs the principal debtor can ſhew himſelf acquitted thereof, againſt the ſaid ſureties."

XII. " If any one have borrowed any thing of the Jews, more or leſs, and dies before the debt be ſatisfied, there ſhall be no intereſt paid for that debt, ſo long as the heir is under age, of whomſoever he may hold; and if the debt falls into our hands, we will take only the chattels mentioned in the charter or inſtrument."

XIII. " And if any one ſhall die indebted to the Jews, his wife ſhall have her dower, and pay nothing of that debt; and if the deceaſed left children under age, they ſhall have neceſſaries provided for them, according to the tenement, or real eſtate of the deceaſed, and out of the reſidue the debt ſhall be paid; ſaving, however, the ſervice of the lord. In like manner let it be with the debts due to other perſons than Jews."

XIV. " No ſcutage, or aid, ſhall be impoſed in our kingdom, unleſs by the common council of our kingdom, except for ranſoming our perſon, and making our eldeſt ſon a knight, and once for marrying our eldeſt daughter; and for theſe there ſhall be paid only a reaſonable aid."

XV. " In like manner it ſhall be concerning the aids of the city of London; and the city of London ſhall have all its antient liberties, and free cuſtoms, as well by land as by water."

XVI. " Furthermore, we will and grant, that all other cities, and boroughs, and towns," (and barons of cinque ports) " and ports, ſhall have all their liberties and free cuſtoms; and for holding the common council of the kingdom concerning the aſſeſſments of their aids, except in the three caſes aforeſaid."

XVII. " And for the aſſeſſing of ſcutages, we ſhall cauſe to be ſummoned the archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, earls, and great barons of the realm, ſingly by our letters."

XVIII. " And furthermore, we ſhall cauſe to be ſummoned in general, by our ſheriffs and bailiffs, all others who hold of us in chief, at a certain day, that is to ſay, forty days before their meeting at leaſt, and to a certain place; and in all letters of ſuch ſummons, we will declare the cauſe of the ſummons."

XIX. " And ſummons being thus made, the buſineſs ſhall proceed on the day appointed, according to the advice of ſuch as ſhall be preſent, although all that were ſummoned come not."

XX. " We will not, for the future, grant to any one that he may take aid of his own free tenants, unleſs to ranſom his body, and to make his eldeſt ſon a knight, and once to marry his eldeſt daughter; and for theſe there ſhall only be paid a reaſonable aid."

XXI. " No man ſhall be diſtrained to perform more ſervice for a knight's fee, or other free tenement, than is due from thence."

XXII. " Common pleas ſhall not follow our court, but ſhall be holden in ſome certain place; trials upon the writs of novel diſſeiſin, and of mort d'anceſtor, and of darreine preſentment, ſhall not be taken but in their proper counties, and after this manner. We, or, if we ſhall be out of the realm, our chief juſticiary, ſhall ſend two juſticiaries through every county four times a year, who, with four knights, choſen out of every ſhire by the people, ſhall hold the ſaid aſſizes in the county, on the day, and at the place appointed."

XXIII. "And if any matters cannot be determined on the day appointed for holding the aſſizes in each county, ſo many of the knights and freeholders as have been at the aſſizes aforeſaid, ſhall be appointed to decide them, as is neceſſary, according as there is more or leſs buſineſs. (Aſſizes of darreigne preſentment to churches ſhall be always taken before the juſticiaries of the bench.)

XXIV. "A freeman ſhall not be amerced for a ſmall fault, but according to the degree of the fault; and for a great crime, in proportion to the heinouſneſs of it, ſaving to him his contenement; and after the ſame manner a merchant, ſaving to him his merchandiſe.

XXV. "And a villain (of any other than our own) ſhall be amerced after the ſame manner, ſaving to him his wainage, if he falls under our amerciament; and none of the aforeſaid amerciaments ſhall be aſſeſſed but by the oath of honeſt men of the neighbourhood. (Of the country.)

XXVI. "Earls and barons ſhall not be amerced but by their peers, and according to the degree of the offence.

XXVII. "No eccleſiaſtical perſon ſhall be amerced for his lay-tenement, but according to the proportion of the others aforeſaid, and not according to the value of his eccleſiaſtical benefice.

XXVIII. "Neither a town, nor any tenement, ſhall be diſtrained to make bridges over rivers, unleſs that anciently and of right they are bound to do it. (No river, for the future, ſhall be embanked, but what was embanked in the time of king Henry, our grandfather.)

XXIX. "No ſheriff, caſtellan, coroner or other our bailiffs, ſhall hold pleas of the crown.

XXX. "All counties, hundreds, wapentakes, and trethings, ſhall ſtand at the old ferm, without any increaſe, except in our demeſne manors.

XXXI. "If any one holding of us a lay-fee, dies, and the ſheriff, or our bailiff, ſhew our letters-patent of ſummons concerning the debt due to us from the deceaſed, it ſhall be lawful for the ſheriff, or our bailiff, to attach and regiſter the chattels of the deceaſed found upon his lay-fee, to the value of the debt by the view of lawful men, ſo as nothing be removed until the whole debt be paid; and the reſt ſhall be left to the executors, who are to fulfil the will of the deceaſed. And if there be nothing due from him to us, all the chattels ſhall remain to the deceaſed, ſaving to his wife and children their reaſonable ſhares.

XXXII. "If any freeman ſhall die inteſtate, his chattels ſhall be deſtributed by the hands of his neareſt relations and friends, by view of the church, ſaving to every one his debts, which the deceaſed owed to him.

XXXIII. "No conſtable or bailiff of our's ſhall take corn, or other chattels, of any man, (who is not of the town where the caſtle is) unleſs he preſently gives him money for it, or hath reſpite of payment by the good will of the ſeller. (But if he be of the ſame town, he ſhall pay him within forty days.)

XXXIV. "No conſtable ſhall diſtrain any knight to give money for caſtle-guard, if he himſelf will do it in his own perſon, or by another able man, in caſe he cannot do it through any reaſonable cauſe.

XXXV. "And if we lead him, or ſend him into the army, he ſhall be free from ſuch guard, for the time he ſhall be in the army, by our command, (For the fee for which he did ſervice in the army.)

XXXVI. "No ſheriff or bailiff of our's, or any other, ſhall take horſes or carts of any for carriage, but by the good-will of the ſaid freeman. (Without paying according to the rate antiently appointed; that is to ſay, for a cart and two horſes, ten-pence a day; and for a cart with three horſes, fourteen-pence a day.)

XXXVII. "Neither ſhall we, or our bailiffs, take any man's timber for our caſtles, or other uſes, unleſs by the conſent of the owner of the timber. (No demeſne cart of any eccleſiaſtical perſon, or knight, or any lady, ſhall be taken by our officers.

XXXVIII. "We will retain the lands of thoſe that are convicted of felony only one year and a day, and then they ſhall be delivered to the lord of the fee.

XXXIX. "All wares, for the time to come, ſhall be put down in the rivers of Thames and Medway, and throughout all England, except upon the ſea-coaſt.

XL. "The writ, which is called Præcipe, for the future, ſhall not be made out to any one of any tenement, whereby a freeman may loſe his court.

XLI. "There ſhall be one meaſure of wine, and one of ale, throughout our whole realm, and one meaſure of corn; that is to ſay, the London quarter; and one breadth of dyed cloth, and ruſſets, and haberjects; that is to ſay, two ells with the liſt. As to weights, they ſhall be as the meaſures.

XLII. "From henceforward, nothing ſhall be given or taken for a writ of inquiſition of life or limbs; but it ſhall be granted gratis, and not denied.

XLIII. "If any one holds of us by fee-farm, or ſocage, or burgage, and holds lands of another by military ſervice, we will not have the wardſhip of the heir, or land, which is of another man's fee, by reaſon of what he holds of us by fee-farm, ſocage, or burgage; nor will we have the wardſhip of the fee-farm, ſocage, or burgage, unleſs the fee-farm is bound to perform military ſervice.

XLIV. "We will not have the wardſhip of an heir, nor of any land which he holds of another by military ſervice, by reaſon of any petit-ſerjeanty he holds of us, as by the ſervice of giving us knives, arrows, or the like.

XLV. "No bailiff, for the future, ſhall put any man to his law, (nor to an oath) upon his ſingle word, without credible witneſſes produced to prove it.

XLVI. "No freeman ſhall be taken, or impriſoned, or diſſeized, (of his freehold, or liberties, or free cuſtoms) or outlawed, or baniſhed, or any ways deſtroyed; nor will we paſs ſentence upon him, or commit him to priſon, unleſs by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.

XLVII. "We will ſell to no man, we will deny no man, nor delay juſtice.

XLVIII. "All merchants (unleſs they be publickly prohibited) ſhall have ſafe and ſecure conduct to go out of, and to come into England, and to ſtay there, and to paſs as well by land as by water; for buying and ſelling by the ancient and allowed cuſtoms, without any evil tolls, except in time of war, or when they are of any nation at war with us.

XLIX. "And if there be found any ſuch in our land in the beginning of the war, they ſhall be attached, without damage to their bodies or goods, until it may be known unto us, or our chief juſticiary, how our merchants are treated in the nation at war with us; and, if our's be ſafe there, the others ſhall be ſafe in our dominions.

L. "It ſhall be lawful, for the time to come, for any one to go out of our kingdom, and return ſafely and ſecurely by land or by water, ſaving his allegiance to us, unleſs in time of war, by ſome ſhort ſpace for the benefit of the realm, except priſoners and outlaws, according to the law of the land, and people in war with us, and merchants who ſhall be in ſuch condition as is above mentioned.

LI. “ If any man holds of any eſcheat, or of the honor of Wallingford, Nottingham, Bulloign, Lancaſter, or of other eſcheats which are in our hands, and are baronies, and dies, his heir ſhall give no other relief, and perform no other ſervice to us, than he would to the baron, if the barony were in poſſeſſion of the baron; we will hold it after the ſame manner the baron held it. (Nor will we, by reaſon of ſuch barony or eſcheat, have any eſcheat or wardſhip of any of our men, unleſs he that held the barony or eſcheat held of us in chief elſewhere.)

LII. “ Thoſe men who dwelt without the foreſt, from henceforth ſhall not come before our juſticiaries of the foreſt upon common ſummons, but ſuch as are impleaded, or are pledges for any that were attached for ſomething concerning the foreſt. (No country-court, for the future, ſhall be holden but from month to month; and where there uſed to be a greater interval, let it be ſo continued. Neither any ſheriff, nor his bailiff, ſhall keep his turn in the hundred oftener than twice in a year, and only in the accuſtomed place, that is once after Eaſter, and once after Michaelmas; and the view of franked-pledge ſhall be held after Michaelmas, without occaſion, and ſo that every one ſhall have his liberties, which he had, and was wont to have, in the time of king Henry, our grandfather, or ſuch as he obtained afterwards. But the view of frank-pledge ſhall be ſo made, that our peace may be kept, and that the tything be full as it was wont to be. And the ſheriffs ſhall not ſeek occaſions, but ſhall be content with what the ſheriff was wont to have for making his view in the time of king Henry our grandfather. For the time to come it ſhall not be lawful for any man to give his land to a religious houſe, ſo as to take it again, and hold it of that houſe. Nor ſhall it be lawful for any religious houſe to receive land, ſo as to grant it him again of whom they received it, to hold of him. If any man for the future ſhall ſo give his land to a religious houſe, and be convicted thereof, his gift ſhall be void, and the land ſhall be forfeited to the lord of the fee. Scutage, for the future, ſhall not be taken as it was uſed to be taken in the time of king Henry our grandfather; and that the ſheriff ſhall oppreſs no man, but be content with what he was wont to have. Saving to the archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, priors, templars, hoſpitallers, earls, barons, knights, and all others, as well eccleſiaſtics as ſeculars, the liberties and free-cuſtoms which they had before: theſe being witneſſes, &c.)

LIII. We will not make any juſticiaries, conſtables, ſheriffs or bailiffs, but ſuch as are knowing in the law of the realm, and are diſpoſed duly to obſerve it.”

LIV. “ All barons, who are founders of abbies, and have charters of the kings of England for the advowſon, or are entitled to it by antient tenure, may have the cuſtody of them, when vacant, as they ought to have.”

LV. “ All woods that have been taken into the foreſts” (by king Richard our brother) “ in our time ſhall forthwith be laid out again,” (unleſs they were our demeſne woods,) “ and the ſame ſhall be done with the rivers that have been taken or fenced in by us, during our reign.”

LVI. “ All evil cuſtoms concerning foreſts, warrens, and foreſters, warrenners, ſheriffs and their officers, rivers and their keepers, ſhall forthwith be enquired into in each county, by twelve knights ſworn of the ſame ſhire, choſen by creditable perſons in the ſame county, and upon oath; and within forty days after the ſaid inqueſt, be utterly aboliſhed, ſo as never to be reſtored.” (No freeman, for the future, ſhall give or ſell any more of his land, but ſo that, out of the reſidue, the ſervice due to the lord of the fee may be ſufficiently performed.)

LVII. “ We will immediately give up all hoſtages and writings delivered unto us by our Engliſh ſubjects, as ſecurity for their keeping the peace, and yielding us faithful ſervice.”

LVIII. “ We will entirely remove from our bailiwics the relations of Gerard de Athyes, ſo as that, for the future, they ſhall have no bailiwic in England. We will alſo remove Engelard de Cygony, Andrew, Peter, and Gyon, from the chancery; Gyon de Cygony, Geoffrey de Martin, and his two brothers, Philip Mark and his two brothers, and his nephew Geoffrey, and their whole following.”

LIX. “ And as ſoon as peace is reſtored, we will ſend out of the kingdom all foreign ſoldiers, croſs-bow men, and ſtipendiaries, who are come with horſes and arms, to the prejudice of our people.”

LX. “ If any one has been diſpoſſeſſed or deprived by us, without the legal judgment of his peers, of his lands, caſtles, liberties, or rights, we will forthwith reſtore them to him; and if any diſpute ariſes upon his head, let the matter be determined by the five and twenty barons, hereafter ſpoken of for the preſervation of the peace.

LXI. “ As for all thoſe things, of which any perſon has, without the legal judgment of his peers, been diſpoſſeſſed or deprived, either by king Henry our father, or our brother king Richard, and which we have in our hands, or are poſſeſſed by others, and we are bound to warrant and make good, we ſhall have a reſpite, till the term uſurally allowed the cruiſes; excepting thoſe things about which there is a plea depending, or whereof an inqueſt hath been made by our order, before we undertook the cruſade. But when we return from our pilgrimage, or if we do not perform it, we will immediately cauſe full juſtice to be adminiſtered therein.”

LXII. “ The ſame reſpite we ſhall have for diſafforeſting the foreſts, which Henry our father, or our brother Richard hath afforeſted; and for the wardſhip of the lands which are in another's fee, in the ſame manner as we have hitherto enjoyed thoſe wardſhips, by reaſon of a fee held of us by knight's ſervice; and for the abbies founded in any other fee than our own, in which the lord of the fee ſays he has a right; and when we return from our pilgrimage, or if we ſhould not perform it, we will immediately do full juſtice to all the complainants in this behalf.”

LXIII. “ No man ſhall be taken, or impriſoned, upon the appeal of a woman, for the death of any other perſon than her huſband.”

LXIV. “ All unjuſt and illegal fines made with us, and all amerciaments impoſed unjuſtly, and contrary to the law of the land, ſhall be entirely forgiven, or elſe left to the deciſion of the five and twenty barons hereafter mentioned, for the preſervation of the peace, or of the major part of them, together with the aforeſaid Stephen, archbiſhop of Canterbury, if he can be preſent, and others whom he ſhall think fit to take along with him: and, if he cannot be preſent, the buſineſs, notwithſtanding, ſhall go on without him. But ſo, that if one or more of the foreſaid five and twenty barons be plantiffs in the ſame cauſe, they ſhall be ſet aſide, as to what concerns this particular affair, and others choſen in their room, out of the ſaid five and twenty, and ſworn by the reſt to decide that matter.”

LXV. “ If we have diſſeiſed or diſpoſſeſſed the Welſh of any lands, liberties, or other things, without the legal judgment of their peers, they ſhall be immediately reſtored to them. And if any diſpute ariſes upon this head, the matter ſhall be determined in the Marche, by the judgment of their peers; for tenements in England, according to the law of England; for tenements in Wales, according to the law of Wales; for tenements of the Marche, according to the law of the Marche; the ſame ſhall the Welſh do to us and our ſubjects."

LXVI. "As for all thoſe things, of which any Welſhman hath, without the legal judgment of his peers, been diſſeiſed or deprived, by Henry our father, or our brother king Richard, and which we either have in our hands, or others are poſſeſſed of, and we are obliged to warrant it, we ſhall have reſpite till the time generally allowed the cruiſes; excepting things about which ſuit is depending, or whereof an inqueſt has been made by our order, before we undertook the cruſade. But when we return, or if we ſtay at home without performing our pilgrimage, we will immediately do them full juſtice, according to the laws of the Welſh, and of the parts before-mentioned."

LXVII. "We will, without delay, diſmiſs the ſon of Llewellin, and all the Welſh hoſtages, and releaſe them from the engagements they have entered into with us for the preſervation of the peace."

LXVIII. "We ſhall treat with Alexander, king of Scots, concerning the reſtoring his ſiſter and hoſtages, and his right and liberties, in the ſame form and manner as we ſhall do to the reſt of our barons of England; unleſs by the charters which we have from his father, William, late king of Scots, it ought to be otherwiſe; and this ſhall be left to the determination of his peers in our court."

LXIX. "All the aforeſaid cuſtoms and liberties which we have granted to be holden in our kingdom, as much as it belongs to us towards our people of our kingdom, as well clergy as laity, we ſhall obſerve, as far as they are concerned, towards their dependents."

LXX. "And whereas, for the honor of God, and the amendment of our kingdom, and for quieting the diſcord that has ariſen between us and our barons, we have granted all the things aforeſaid; willing to render them firm and laſting, we do give and grant our ſubjects the under-written ſecurity; namely, that the barons may chuſe five and twenty barons of the kingdom, whom they think convenient, who ſhall take care, with all their might, to hold and obſerve, and cauſe to be obſerved, the peace and liberties we have granted them, and, by this our preſent charter, confirmed. So as that, if we, our juſticiary, our bailiffs, or any of our officers, ſhall in any circumſtance fail in the performance of them towards any perſon, or ſhall break through any of theſe articles of peace and ſecurity, and the offence is notified to four barons, choſen out of the five and twenty fore-mentioned, the ſaid barons ſhall repair to us, or our juſticiary, if we are out of the realm, and laying open the grievance, ſhall petition to have it redreſſed without delay; and, if it is not redreſſed by us, or, if we ſhould chance to be out of the realm, if it is not redreſſed by our juſticiary, within forty days, reckoning from the time it has been notified to us, or to our juſticiary, if we ſhould be out of the realm, the four barons aforeſaid ſhall lay the cauſe before the reſt of the five and twenty barons; and the ſaid five and twenty barons, together with the community of the whole kingdom, ſhall diſtrain and diſtreſs us all the ways poſſible; namely, by ſeizing our caſtles, lands, poſſeſſions, and in any other manner they can, till the grievance is redreſſed according to their pleaſure, ſaving harmleſs our own perſon, and the perſons of our queen and children: and when it is redreſſed, they ſhall obey us as before."

LXXI. "And any perſon whomſoever in the kingdom, may ſwear that he will obey the orders of the five and twenty barons aforeſaid, in the execution of the premiſes, and that he will diſtreſs us jointly with them, to the utmoſt of his power; and we give public and free liberty to any one that ſhall pleaſe to ſwear to them, and never ſhall hinder any perſon from taking the ſame oath."

LXXII. "As for all thoſe of our ſubjects, who will not, of their own accord, ſwear to join the five and twenty barons, in diſtraining and diſtreſſing us, we will iſſue our order to make them take the ſame oath, as is aforeſaid."

LXXIII. "And if any one of the five and twenty barons dies, or goes out of the kingdom, or is hindered any other way, from carrying the things aforeſaid into execution, the reſt of the ſaid five and twenty barons may chuſe another in his room, at their own diſcretion, who ſhall be ſworn in like manner as the reſt."

LXXIV. "In all things that are committed to the execution of theſe five and twenty barons, if, when they are all aſſembled together, they ſhould happen to diſagree about any matter, or ſome of them, when ſummoned, will not, or cannot come, whatever is agreed upon, or enjoined, by the major part of thoſe who are preſent, ſhall be reputed as firm and valid, as if all the five and twenty had given their conſent; and the foreſaid five and twenty ſhall ſwear, that all the premiſes they ſhall faithfully obſerve, and cauſe with all their power to be obſerved."

LXXV. "And we will not, by ourſelves, or by any other, procure any thing, whereby any of theſe conceſſions and liberties be revoked and leſſened; and if any ſuch thing be obtained, let it be null and void; neither ſhall we ever make uſe of it, either by ourſelves, or any other."

LXXVI. "And all the ill-will, anger, and malice, that hath ariſen between us and our ſubjects, of the clergy and laity, from the firſt breaking out of the diſſenſion between us, we do fully remit, and forgive. Moreover, all treſpaſſes occaſioned by the ſaid diſſenſion, from Eaſter, in the ſixteenth year of our reign, till the reſtoration of peace and tranquillity, we hereby entirely remit to all, both clergy and laity, and, as far as in us lies, do fully forgive."

LXXVII. "We have moreover granted them our letters patent teſtimonial of Stephen, lord archbiſhop of Canterbury, Henry, lord archbiſhop of Dublin, and the biſhops aforeſaid, as alſo of maſter Pandolf, for the ſecurity and conceſſions aforeſaid."

LXXVIII. "Wherefore we will and firmly enjoin, that the church of England be free, and that all men in our kingdom have and hold all the foreſaid liberties, right and conceſſions, truly and peaceably, freely and quietly, fully and wholly, to themſelves and their heirs, of us and our heirs, in all things and places for ever, as is aforeſaid."

LXXIX. "It is alſo ſworn as well on our part, as on the part of the barons, that all the things aforeſaid ſhall faithfully and ſincerely be obſerved."

"Given under our hand, in the preſence of the witneſſes above named, and many others in the meadow called Runnemede, between Windeleſore and Staines, the fifteenth day of June, in the ſeventeenth year of our reign.

The above tranſlation of this remarkable charter is taken from an original manuſcript now in the Britiſh Muſeum: But the paſſages incloſed between parentheſes are taken from the copy given by Matthew Paris.

This charter is more noble and extenſive than any other inſtrument of its kind in the world. It decides all diſputes, removes all doubts, with regard to the compact between the king and his people; for here that contract is not underſtood only, but expreſſed; not looſely implied, but poſitively ſtipulated: it was obtained not by repreſentation, but by the collected body of the Engliſh nation.

Complaints had been for a long time made againſt the foreſt laws; and the Engliſh barons were determined not to omit ſo favourable an opportunity of removing, for the future, the cauſes which gave riſe to an infinite number of vexatious ſuits. Accordingly they inſiſted upon the king's ſigning another charter, by which the rights of the people would be aſcertained. This he alſo complied with, and as it is a matter of very conſiderable importance, we ſhall likewiſe give an accurate tranſlation of it, which we have borrowed from an original manuſcript in the Britiſh Muſeum.

The CHARTER of FORESTS, granted by king John to his ſubjects in the year 1215.

"JOHN, by the grace of God, king of England, &c. Know ye that, for the honor of God, and the health of our ſoul and the ſouls of all our anceſtors and ſucceſſors, and for the exaltation of holy church, and for the amendment of our kingdom, we have of our free and good will, given and granted, for us and our heirs, theſe liberties hereafter ſpecified, to be had and obſerved in our kingdom of England for ever.

I. "Imprimis, all the foreſts made by our grandfather, king Henry, ſhall be viewed by honeſt and lawful men; and if he turned any other woods into foreſts, to the damage of him whoſe wood it was, it ſhall forthwith be laid out again and disforeſted. And if he turned his own proper wood into foreſt, they ſhall remain ſo, ſaving the common of paſture and other things in the ſaid foreſt, to ſuch as were formerly wont to have it.

II. "Is the LII. and LV. of the Great Charter put into one chapter.

III. "The archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, earls, barons, knights, and free tenants who have woods in foreſts, ſhall have their woods as they had them at the time of the firſt coronation of our grandfather king Henry, ſo they ſhall be diſcharged for ever of all purpreſtures, waſtes, and aſſarts made in thoſe woods, after that time to the beginning of the ſecond year of the coronation; and thoſe who, for the time to come, ſhall make waſte, purpreſture, or aſſarts in thoſe woods without our licence, ſhall anſwer for them.

IV. "Our inſpectors, or viewers, ſhall go through the foreſt, to make inſpection, as was wont to be at the time of the firſt coronation of our ſaid grandfather, king Henry, and not otherwiſe.

V. "The inquiſition or view, for lawing of dogs which are kept within the foreſt, for the future, ſhall be when the view is made; that is, every three years, and then ſhall be done by the view and teſtimony of lawful men, and not otherwiſe. And he whoſe dog at ſuch time ſhall be found unlawed, ſhall be fined three ſhillings, and for the future no bail ſhall be taken for lawing. But ſuch lawing ſhall be according to the common aſſize, namely, the three claws of the dog's fore foot ſhall be cut off, or the ball of the foot taken out. And from henceforward dogs ſhall not be lawed, unleſs in ſuch places where they were wont to be lawed in the time of king Henry, our grandfather.

VI. "No foreſter, or bedal, for the future, ſhall make any ale-ſhots, or collect any ſheaves of corn, or hay, or any kind of grain, or lambs, or pigs, nor ſhall make any gathering whatſoever, but by the view and oath of twelve inſpectors; and when they make their view, ſo many foreſters ſhall be appointed to keep the foreſts as they ſhall reaſonably think ſufficient.

VII. "No ſwainmote, for the time to come, ſhall be holden in our kingdom oftener than thrice a year; that is to ſay, in the beginning of the fifteen days before Michaelmas, when the agiſters come to agiſt the demeſne woods; and about the feaſt of St. Martin, when our agiſters are to receive their pannage; and in theſe two ſwainmotes the foreſters, verdurers, and agiſters, ſhall meet, and no other by compulſion or diſtreſs: and the third ſwainmote ſhall be holden in the beginning of the fifteen days before the feaſt of St. John Baptiſt, concerning the fawning of our dogs, and at this ſwainmote ſhall meet the foreſters and verdurers, and no other by compulſion.

VIII. "And furthermore, every forty days throughout the year, the verdurers and foreſters ſhall meet to view the attachments of the foreſts as well of vert as of veniſon, by preſentment of the foreſters themſelves; and they who committed the offences ſhall be forced to appear before them: but the aforeſaid ſwainmotes ſhall be holden but in ſuch counties as they are want to be holden.

IX. "Every freeman ſhall agiſt his wood in the foreſt at his pleaſure, and ſhall receive his pannage.

X. "We grant alſo, that every freeman may drive his hogs through our demeſne woods, freely and without impediment, and may agiſt them in his own woods, or elſewhere, as he will: and if the hogs of any freeman ſhall remain one night in our foreſts, he ſhall not be troubled ſo as to loſe any thing for it.

XI. "No man, for the time to come, ſhall loſe life or limb for taking our veniſon; but if any one be ſeized and convicted of taking veniſon, he ſhall be grievouſly fined if he hath wherewithal to pay; and if he hath not, he ſhall lie in our priſon a year and a day; and if after that time, he can find ſureties, he ſhall be releaſed; if not, he ſhall abjure our realm of England.

XII. "It ſhall belawful for every archbiſhop, biſhop, earl, or baron, coming to us by our command, and paſſing through our foreſt, to take one or two deer, by view of the foreſter, if preſent; if not, he ſhall cauſe a horn to be ſounded, leſt he ſhould ſeem to do this privately: alſo, in their return, it ſhall be lawful for them to do the ſame thing.

XIII. "Every freeman, for the future, may erect a mill in his own wood, or upon his own land which he hath in the foreſt; or make a warren, or a pond, a marle-pit or ditch, or turn it into arable, without the covert in the arable land, ſo as it be not to the detriment of any neighbour.

XIV. "Every freeman may have in his woods ayries of hawks, ſparrows, falcons, eagles, and herons; and they ſhall have likewiſe the honey which ſhall be found in their woods.

XV. "No foreſter, for the future, who is not a foreſter in fee, paying rent for his office, ſhall take cheminage; that is to ſay, for a cart two-pence during half a year, and for the other half year two-pence; and for a horſe that carries burdens, for half a year a half-penny, and for the other half year a half-penny; and then only of thoſe who come as buyers out of their bailiwick, to buy underwood, timber, bark, or charcoal, to carry it to ſell in other places where they will; and for the time to come, there ſhall be no cheminage taken for any other cart, or carriage-horſe, unleſs in thoſe places where anciently it was wont and ought to be taken: but they who carry wood, bark, or coal, upon their backs to ſell, though they get their livelihood by it, ſhall for the future pay no cheminage for paſſage through the woods of other men: no cheminage ſhall be given to our foreſters, but only in our own woods.

XVI. "All perſons outlawed for offences committed in our foreſts, from the time of king Henry our grandfather, until our firſt coronation, may reverſe their oulawries without impediment; but ſhall find pledges, that for the future, they will not forfeit to us in our foreſt.

XVII. "No caſtellan or other perſon ſhall hold pleas of the foreſt, whether concerning vert or veniſon; but every foreſter in fee ſhall attach pleas of the foreſt, as well concerning vert as veniſon, and ſhall preſent the pleas, or offences, to the vendurers of the ſeveral counties; and when they ſhall be enrolled and ſealed under the ſeals of the vendurers, they ſhall be preſented to the chief foreſter, when he ſhall come into thoſe parts to hold pleas of the foreſt, and ſhall be determined before him.

XVIII. "And all the cuſtoms and liberties aforeſaid, which we have granted to be holden in our kingdom, as much as belongs to us towards all our vaſſals of our kingdom, as well laics as clerks, ſhall obſerve as much as belongs to them towards their vaſſals."

Such were the two famous charters ſigned by king John at Runnemede. The barons, however, knew that it was not enough to procure theſe charters; they were well acquainted with the proud, vindictive, and inconſtant diſpoſition of John, from whence they wiſely judged that he would embrace the firſt opportunity of renouncing theſe articles of compulſion, if not farther reſtricted to the obſervance of them: they therefore inſiſted on his conſenting that twenty-five of their own number ſhould be choſen to ſee the charter duly obſerved. Theſe were to be diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of Conſervators of the Liberties of the People; and four of them were empowered to demand reparation within forty days from him or his juſticiary, in caſe of the infringement of any article or articles: and if ſuch reparation ſhould be neglected, or not made, then this committee of four were to give notice of the ſame to the reſt, who, with the community of the nation, might ſeize his caſtles, lands and poſſeſſions, until ſatisfaction ſhould be obtained.

John made not the leaſt oppoſition to theſe ignominious proceedings. He ſubmitted with great ſeeming tranquillity to the moſt humiliating indignity; and even ſent writs to his ſheriffs, ordering them to oblige every perſon to ſwear obedience to the conſervators, on pain of having all their eſtates ſeized, and all their chattels ſold within a fortnight after refuſal.

Notwithſtanding, however, all this ſeeming deſire of acting in conformity to the articles of the great charter, John never intended to obſerve that treaty any longer than the neceſſity of the times obliged him. He only bowed beneath the ſtorm that roared around him; and as ſoon as the threatning blaſt was over, determined to reſume the power he had loſt. He was principally encouraged in this deſign by the foreign mercenaries he kept about his perſon. They inſinuated, that it was ſhameful for a king to make any conceſſions to his ſubjects, and that no compact, extorted by the force of rebellion, could be binding. Theſe inſinuations coincided exactly with the king's opinion, and determined him to make one attempt to ſhake off the yoke of compulſion, ſo galling to his mind. He became ſullen and melancholy, ſeparated himſelf from the company of his courtiers, and at laſt retired privately by night, attended only by ſeven of his friends, into the Iſle of Wight, where he meditated the moſt fatal vengeance againſt his enemies. He ſecretly ſent abroad his emiſſaries to haſten the embarkation, and increaſe the number of his foreign mercenaries; and to invite the rapacious Brabanders into his ſervice, by the proſpect of ſharing the ſpoils of England, and reaping the forfeitures of ſo many opulent barons, who had incurred the guilt of rebellion, by riſing in arms againſt him. At the ſame time, he diſpatched a meſſenger to Rome, in order to lay before the pope, the great charter, which he had been compelled to ſign, and to complain before that tribunal of the violence uſed by his barons.

Innocent III. conſidering himſelf as feudal lord of the kingdom, was incenſed to the laſt degree at the behaviour of the barons, and ſwore by St. Peter, that the injury they had done their king ſhould not go unpuniſhed. He accordingly iſſued a bull, in which, from the plenitude of his apoſtolic authority, he annulled the whole charter, as unjuſt in itſelf, as obtained by compulſion, and as derogatory to the dignity of the holy ſee. He prohibited the barons from exacting the obſervance of it: he even prohibited the king himſelf from paying any regard to it: he abſolved him and his ſubjects from all oaths, which they had been conſtrained to take for that purpoſe: and he denounced a general ſentence of excommunication againſt every one who ſhould perſevere in maintaining ſuch treaſonable and iniquitous pretenſions.

But the thunder of the Vatican, in temporal affairs, had now loſt great part of its force; and the pope had the mortification to ſee even Langton, whom he himſelf had placed on the archiepiſcopal throne of Canterbury, refuſe to promulgate his cenſures. Exaſperated to the higheſt degree at this oppoſition in a prelate he expected would have exerted his utmoſt power to promote the intereſt of the holy ſee, the pope ſuſpended Langton from the exerciſe of his functions. But this act of papal vengeance did not produce the deſired effect; the clergy, with the primate at their head, as well as the nobility and people, diſcovered a noble ardour to preſerve that liberty and independence they had with ſo much difficulty obtained.

John's emiſſaries on the continent had been very ſucceſsful, and had engaged a powerful army, principally compoſed of ſoldiers of fortune, in the ſervice of their maſter. They were all veteran troops, and ready to venture their lives in any cauſe to gain an independent fortune; beſides which they were farther animated by John's having promiſed them the eſtates of his turbulent barons.

As ſoon as John received advice of the embarkation of theſe forces, he ventured to throw off the maſk: he recalled all the liberties he had granted to his ſubjects; declared the great charter null and void, and the barons, who had extorted that inſtrument from him, rebels and traitors. His foreign forces landed at Dover; and John, putting himſelf at their head, ſeemed determined to ſatiate his cruelty. He marched to Northampton, reducing the whole country through which he paſſed to a ſmoaking deſart. The ravenous and barbarous mercenaries, incited by a cruel and enraged prince, were let looſe againſt the eſtates, tenants, manors, houſes, and parks of the barons. Every thing was levelled in the duſt; and cruelties, ſuch as would ſhock even ſavages themſelves, were practiſed on the innocent inhabitants.

Moſt of the northern barons, unable to reſiſt the power of the mercenaries, and having little reaſon to expect mercy ſhould they fall into the hands of the king, fled before him with their wives and families, and ſolicited the protection of Alexander king of Scotland.

John followed them into that kingdom, and in his way burnt ſeveral towns, particularly Haddington and Dunbar: but receiving advice that Alexander had raiſed a numerous army, and was advancing to give him battle, he thought proper to retreat, well knowing that a defeat muſt prove fatal. He had made himſelf maſter of moſt of the caſtles in England, and now determined to beſiege London, the only place of conſequence that held out in ſupport of independence.

A. D. 1216. The barons, now driven to deſpair, had recourſe to a moſt deſperate expedient: they applied to the court of France for protection, and offered to acknowledge Lewis, eldeſt ſon to Philip, for their ſovereign, if he would aſſiſt them with a body of forces againſt their enraged monarch. Though the ſenſe of the common rights of mankind, the only rights which are indefeaſible, might have juſtified them in their depoſition of the king; they declined inſiſting before Philip, on a pretenſion, which is in general ſo unfavourably received among ſovereigns, and which ſounds harſhly in the ears of royalty. They affirmed that John was incapable of poſſeſſing the crown, by reaſon of the attainder paſſed upon him during his brother's reign; though that attainder had been reverſed, and Richard had even, by his laſt will, declared him his ſucceſſor. They pretended that he was already legally depoſed by the ſentence of the peers of France, for the murder of his nephew, though that ſentence could not poſſibly regard any thing but his tranſmarine dominions, which alone he held in homage to that crown. But they affirmed, more plauſibly, that he had already depoſed himſelf by doing homage to the pope, changing the nature of his ſovereignty, and reſigning an independent crown for a fee or vaſſalage under a foreign power.

The crown of England was too rich a prize to be neglected; and Philip accordingly accepted the offer made to his ſon. The pope's legate menaced him with interdicts and excommunications, if he invaded the patrimony of St. Peter, or attacked a prince who was immediately under the protection of the holy ſee; but as Philip was aſſured of the obedience of his own vaſſals, his principles were changed with the complexion of the times; and he now as much diſregarded the papal cenſures, as he formerly pretended to pay reſpect to them. But though Philip beheld with contempt the menaces of the pope, he had his ſcruples reſpecting the fidelity of the Engliſh barons, with regard to their engagements, and the danger of intruſting his ſon and heir in the hands of perſons, who might, on any caprice or neceſſity, make peace with their native ſovereign, by ſacrificing a pledge of ſo much value. He therefore exacted from the barons twenty-five hoſtages, of the nobleſt birth in the kingdom; and having obtained this ſecurity, he ſent over a ſmall army to the relief of the confederates, and promiſed that his ſon, at the head of a more numerous body of forces, ſhould follow with all convenient expedition.

In the mean time John, informed of the engagements entered into between the nobility and the French court, reſolved to take all the advantages which the ſuperiority of his arms over thoſe of the barons had given him. Accordingly he laid ſiege to the caſtle of Colcheſter, which he took in a few days; and ſoon after the caſtle of Hedingham, belonging to the earl of Oxford, fell into his hands. Theſe ſucceſſes encouraged him to think of forming the ſiege of London. At the ſame time he ordered a fleet of ſixty-five ſail to block up the mouth of the river Thames. But London was, at that time, ſo powerful and populous, that the inhabitants boldly threw open their gates, and defied the king to attack their city. Savory de Malleon, however, one of his mercenary generals, advancing with a party too near the walls, was deſperately wounded, and his men being cut to pieces by the Londoners, he, himſelf, narrowly eſcaped being taken priſoner. Soon after, the Londoners equipped and manned the ſhips which lay in the river Thames, and falling down upon John's fleet, ſunk or took moſt of them.

The northern barons animated at the ſucceſs of the Londoners, reſumed their courage, and taking the field in a body, laid ſiege to York, and obliged the garriſon to purchaſe a truce till Whitſuntide, at the expence of a thouſand marks.

The war now raged with as great fury as ever. But John, dreading the effects of Lewis's landing, marched down to the ſea-coaſts, where he took all imaginable precautions to diſappoint the expectations of his enemy, by putting every place in a proper poſture of defence. He even preſſed all the ſhips in the ſea-ports, oppoſite to France, into his ſervice, and manning them with the greateſt expedition, reſolved to fight Lewis in his paſſage to England; but while they were waiting for the appearance of the enemy, a violent ſtorm happened, which either ſunk or daſhed to pieces, the greater part of his fleet. Soon after this misfortune, Lewis landed in the Iſle of Thanet.

The arrival of Lewis put a final period to John's ſucceſs. The greater part of his foreign troops, who were chiefly natives of France, now deſerted him, declaring that they could not fight againſt the heir of their lawful ſovereign. When Lewis landed, John was encamped near Dover; but inſtead of endeavouring to attack the enemy, before the French forces could be joined by the barons, he retreated to Wincheſter. Conſcious guilt and jealous diſtruſt benumbed all the faculties of his ſoul, and diſarmed him at the very inſtant he ſtood in need of more than common reſolution.

The courage of Lewis was ſo heightened by the unmanly fears of John, that he marched to London without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition. He entered the city amidſt the acclamations of the people; and the barons and citizens immediately ſwore fealty to him; while the prince, in return, ſolemnly promiſed to reſtore all their eſtates, and confirm the antient privileges of the kingdom.

Notwithſtanding the great ſucceſs Lewis hitherto met with, yet many difficulties ſtill remained to be ſurmounted, before he could make himſelf maſter of England. Moſt of the maritime places were in the intereſt of John, who had favoured the ſea-ports with many valuble privileges, and made many excellent regulations with regard to the marine. This was an alarming circumſtance to Lewis, who conſidered his being maſter of ſome convenient harbour as a matter of the laſt importance. Deſtitute of that advantage, his receiving reinforcements from the continent would be rendered very precarious; nor would even his own retreat, in caſe of a reverſe of fortune, be ſecure. He therefore attempted to make himſelf maſter of Dover; but his enterprize was rendered abortive; the caſtle defied his power. He therefore carried his arms into the inland parts of Kent and Suſſex, which he reduced with great facility. But William de Coldingham, at the head of a thouſand archers, retiring into the wilds and faſtneſſes of that country, ſupported himſelf againſt all the power of the French army.

In the mean time John was not idle. He fortified and furniſhed with proviſions ſeveral ſea-ports; flattering himſelf that the bolt of papal thunder, which was now ready to be launched againſt Philip and his ſon, would defeat all their ſchemes, and reſtore him to the quiet poſſeſſion of the Engliſh crown. In this, however, he was miſtaken. Innocent, indeed, fulminated the ſentence of excommunication againſt both, but the effect fell far ſhort of John's ſanguinary expectations. The French biſhops declared the excommunication of Philip void, and Lewis paid little regard to the papal cenſure. He was more deſirous of procuring a proper ſea-port than of guarding againſt the effects of Innocent's ſentence. He therefore once more led his army to Dover, and inveſted that important fortreſs. But Lewis found the attempt more difficult than he imagined. Hubert de Burgh, the governor, was a brave and vigilant officer, and being at the head of a reſolute garriſon, made ſuch furious ſallies upon the French army, that Lewis was obliged to remove his camp to a conſiderable diſtance from the walls. Aſhamed, and enraged at this diſappointment, Lewis firſt attempted to work upon Hubert's tenderneſs, by threatening to put to death his brother Thomas, whom he had taken priſoner. This proving ineffectual, he endeavoured to corrupt him with gold; and both theſe expedients failing, he threatened to put the whole garriſon to the ſword, in caſe he ſhould take the caſtle. But Hubert, equally proof againſt every attempt, continued to defend the place with ſo much vigor, that Lewis was at laſt obliged to change the ſiege into a blockade.

Lewis was greatly alarmed at this miſcarriage, and his fears were conſiderably heightened on finding that his barons appeared leſs active in his ſervice: but he was too haughty to conciliate their eſteem by careſſes, and wanted prudence to foreſee the conſequences of his neglect. He did not even endeavor to conceal his diſguſt; he excluded them from his councils and confidence; and inſtead of reſtoring the nobility to their honors and eſtates, he beſtowed all his favors upon his own countrymen. The barons now ſaw their error, in calling in a foreign force to their aſſiſtance; the people complained of the oppreſſions exerciſed by their new maſters; and every thing wore the appearance of freſh diſturbances.

About the ſame time it was rumoured, that the viſcount of Melun, one of Lewis's courtiers, fell dangerouſly ill, and perceiving himſelf tottering on the brink of eternity, he ſent for ſome of his friends among the Engliſh barons, to warn them of their danger. He told them that Lewis had formed the deteſtable deſign of exterminating them with all their families, and beſtowing their eſtates and titles on his foreign favorites. This report, whether true or falſe, acted powerfully on the Engliſh barons, and was of infinite prejudice to Lewis. The earl of Saliſbury, and ſeveral others of the principal nobility determined, if poſſible, to elude the force of the ſtorm which threatened their deſtruction. They ſent private information to John of their intention of joining his army, and obtained a promiſe of a free pardon.

John, animated with the hopes of being joined by his nobility, exerted himſelf in collecting an army, and determined to bring on a deciſive battle with the invader of his country. But in marching over the waſhes from Lynn into Lincolnſhire, at an improper time of the tide, the ſea ruſhed in upon him with ſuch violence and rapidity, that he loſt the greater part of his forces, together with all his treaſure, baggage and regalia, he himſelf eſcaping with difficulty. He reached Swineſhead-abbey, but the great fatigues he had undergone, and the conſtant hurry and perturbation of his ſpirits, added to the affliction he felt at his late irreparable misfortune, threw him into a violent fever. Next day, being unable to ride, he was carried in a litter to the caſtle of Sleford, and from thence to Newark, where, finding his end approaching, he ordered his will to be drawn up, by which he appointed his ſon Henry, then a child, to ſucceed him. The ſame night, the 18th of October, 1216, he died, in the 51ſt year of his age, and the 18th of his reign.

His body was carried to Worceſter, according to his own order, and buried, with little funeral pomp, in the cathedral of that city, where his tomb, with his image on it, as big as life, is ſtill to be ſeen, but without any inſcription.

The character of this prince is little more than a complication of vices, equally mean and odious; ruinous to himſelf, and deſtructive to his people. The irreſiſtible ſtream of his paſſion for pleaſure broke into the pale of private honor. His ſubjects, who were wounded in ſo tender a point, found, perhaps, their reſentment of public grievances ſharpened by perſonal injury. One exceſs brought on another, till at laſt, government itſelf became a blank, and civil order ceaſed. John had many opportunities of retrieving his affairs; but he is a diſtinguiſhed inſtance of the fatal conſequence of wanting a good name. The horror which the public entertained for Arthur's death had more effect in driving him from his French dominions, than all the power of Philip; nor was he ever able to avail himſelf of the many favourable circumſtances that afterwards offered. He ſeems to have valued power only as it gave him an opportunity of doing miſchief with greater ſecurity. Years added nothing to his experience, though they encreaſed his paſſions, which were always violent. He tried both extremes of fortune, and behaved ignominiouſly in both. Difficulties never inſpired reflection, nor adverſity moderation; yet, under difficulties, he was exquiſitely ſenſible, and in adverſity infinitely dejected. He had ſtarts of every thing but goodneſs; he was profited by nothing but compulſion. The treaſure he amaſſed was ſpent without dignity, and his favors were beſtowed without judgment. He was not deſtitute of abilities, though nothing called them ſo effectually into action as neceſſity or revenge: in the former he found wonderful reſources; and to gratify the latter, he often broke through his favourite indolence.

But while we deplore thoſe vices which made him the ſcourge of that people over whom he had unjuſtly uſurped the rule, and for which, in the end, he was ſo ſeverely puniſhed, let us not forget to mention the few laudable tranſactions of his reign, by which the nation received ſeveral diſtinguiſhed benefits. He eſtabliſhed the form of civil government in London, by granting the citizens liberty and authority to chuſe to themſelves yearly a mayor, which office before continued during life: he likewiſe gave them leave to chuſe a common-council of the moſt ſubſtantial citizens, and to elect and deprive their ſheriffs at pleaſure. He was the firſt who coined ſterling money, introduced the laws of England into Ireland, and granted the Cinque Ports thoſe liberties they now enjoy. He made ſeveral excellent regulations for fitting out a navy on any ſudden emergency, and on all occaſions ſteadily ſupported the dignity of the Engliſh flag.

In John we have an admirable inſtance that ſome good may be produced even from the greateſt apparent evil. The reign of this prince, wicked and miſerable as it certainly was, gave occaſion to thoſe excellent charters which form the baſis of the Engliſh conſtitution. His tyranny firſt prompted the barons to aſſert, and his ſloth and indolence afterwards enabled them to obtain, thoſe ineſtimable rights and privileges, which are at once the glory and ſafeguard of Engliſhmen.

John left two legitimate ſons behind him, Henry, born on the firſt of October, 1207, and now only nine years of age, and Richard, born on the ſixth of January 1209. Beſides theſe, he had three daughters, Jane, married to Alexander, king of Scots; Eleanor, married firſt to William Mareſchal the younger, earl of Pembroke, and then to Simon Montfort, earl of Leiceſter, and Iſabella, married to the emperor Frederic II. All theſe children were born to him by Iſabella of Angouleſme, his ſecond wife. Beſides theſe, he had many illegitimate children; but none of them were ſufficiently diſtinguiſhed to deſerve a place in hiſtory.

The moſt remarkable occurrences that happened during this prince's reign, were as follow:

In the ſecond year of his reign French wine was ſold in England for 20s. per tun. Afterwards people were allowed to ſell red wine for 6d. per quart, and white for 8d.

In his 5th year died Peter of Colechurch, who began to build London-bridge with ſtone, and was buried in the chapel under that bridge.

On the 10th of July, in the year 1212, great part of London was burnt: the fire began in Southwark, and having conſumed the church of St. Mary Overy, ſpread to the bridge; and, whilſt great numbers of people ran, ſome to behold, others to quench the flames, the houſes at the other end of the bridge took fire, ſo that the multitude being thus encloſed, many were forced to leap into the Thames, whilſt others, crowding into the boats that came to their relief, were the cauſe of their own deſtruction, the boats and people ſinking together. Near 3000 perſons periſhed by this melancholy accident, ſome by water and others by fire.

HENRY III. SURNAMED of WINCHESTER.

On the death of John, the crown of England fell, by lineal ſucceſſion, on his eldeſt ſon Henry, a child only nine years of age, who was conſequently unable either to judge for himſelf, or to manage the reins of government, unleſs by the direction of others.

Fortunately for the young prince, as well as for the kingdom, the military command was at this time inveſted in William Mareſchall, earl of Pembroke, who, from his office, was likewiſe at the head of the ſtate. This nobleman was poſſeſſed of fidelity, prudence, and fortitude; and ſeemed born to ſupport the languiſhing conſtitution of his country. Knowing the diſtracted ſtate of the kingdom, he ſeized the helm of government, and managed it with ſuch an equal proportion of virtues and abilities, that at length he weathered the tempeſt, and brought the national veſſel ſafely into port.

The firſt ſtep he took towards this deſirable end was, to endeavour to reſtore a mutual confidence between the throne and the great barons. This was, indeed, an eſſential point; for, notwithſtanding that Lewis was already in poſſeſſion of the metropolis, and the better half of the kingdom, and was, moreover, ſupported by all the power of France, yet, ſuch had been the folly and imprudence of his own conduct, that the affections of the nobles were in a great meaſure alienated from him, and they remained attached to his party more through fear than regard.

The earl, well apprized of this diſpoſition in the barons, and being himſelf ſtrongly zealous for the hereditary rights of blood, called a council of the barons at Glouceſter, whither all repaired who were in the intereſt of the royal family. As ſoon as the members were ſeated, the earl entered the aſſembly, leading young Henry in his hand. Perceiving the barons were pleaſed at the ſight of the prince, the earl thus exclaimed, "Behold your king!" Theſe words occaſioned a ſhort pauſe, after which Pembroke thus addreſſed the aſſembly:

"My dear friends and countrymen,

"Though we juſtly oppoſed the father of this young prince, on account of his wicked and miſtaken conduct; yet this child is guiltleſs of his father's errors; and as the puniſhment of offences ought only to be inflicted on their authors, it would be unjuſt for us to make the ſon bear the iniquity of his father. It is our duty and intereſt to forget our animoſities, and in compaſſion to his tender years, unite to ſupport him on the throne of his anceſtors. Let us exert our utmoſt efforts to drive Lewis and all his followers out of this oppreſſed country. By this noble, this generous action, we ſhall ſave our kingdom from becoming the reproach of its neighbours, and break the yoke of a debaſing and foreign ſlavery."

This addreſs, which carried conviction with it to the hearts of the barons, had the deſired effect. The earl of Cheſter, indeed, ſtated an objection relative to their having called over Lewis; but it was ſoon over-ruled by recapitulating that prince's conduct ſince his arrival in England; and it was generally agreed that his arbitrary and tyrannical behaviour had diſſolved all ties that might otherwiſe have bound thoſe who had invited him to their aſſiſtance; and the aſſembly with one voice called out, "Let Henry "be made king!"

The coronation was accordingly ſolemnized at Glouceſter, on the eve of the 28th of October, 1216, in preſence of Gualo, the pope's legate, and a few of the barons, by the biſhops of Wincheſter and Bath, the archbiſhop of Canterbury being then at Rome. Before the crown was placed on his head, he took the accuſtomed oath; after which it was thought neceſſary that he ſhould ſwear fealty to the pope, and renew that homage to which his father had already ſubjected the kingdom. The prelates, earls, barons, and all thoſe who were preſent, next ſwore fealty and allegiance to the new king; and the following day they came to a reſolution to appoint the earl of Pembroke the king's guardian, and regent of the kingdom.

The firſt ſtep the new regent took was, to ſend circular letters, notifying Henry's coronation, to all the barons and communities of the kingdom, and promiſing a general amneſty to all thoſe who ſhould return to their obedience, and peaceably acknowledge Henry III. for their ſovereign.

This prudent meaſure, and the known probity of the regent, had the deſired effect upon many of the barons who ſtill adhered to Lewis. They reflected, that the cauſe which induced them to take up arms no longer exiſted; that oppoſition was now unnatural rebellion; and that the only method they could purſue with propriety, was that of making their peace with their lawful ſovereign. The pope's legate greatly aſſiſted in bringing about this deſirable effect. He cauſed the ſentence of excommunication to be thundered from the pulpit of every church in the kingdom againſt Lewis and his adherents. This cenſure, however deſpiſed in the firſt tranſports of reſentment, many of the barons who ſtill adhered to Lewis, wiſhed, in the moments of cool reflection, to be diſannulled, and they, by that means, re-admitted into the boſom of the church.

In the mean time Lewis was employed in carrying on the ſiege of Dover, having made a vow not to abandon the undertaking till he was maſter of the place. The obſtinate defence, however, of that important place, the fidelity of the ſea-port towns to the royal family, the viſible decline of the affection of the barons, and the proſperous condition of Henry's affairs, rendered the French prince more jealous jealous than ever of the Engliſh nobility. He now exacted from them an oath of abjuration of John's family. This oath was taken by ſome through fear, by others through policy; but was diſregarded by all. Lewis was ſoon ſenſible of this; he perceived he had now little more to truſt to for ſucceſs than his own ſword: the excommunications againſt him and his adherents, thundered every day from every pulpit, heightened his apprehenſions, and weakened his intereſt. He therefore again attempted to corrupt the fidelity of Hubert de Burgh, the intrepid governor of Dover-caſtle. He informed him of John's death, and tempted him with whatever the ambition of a ſubject could deſire; but all his offers were rejected; and Hubert declared that he would defend the caſtle as long as one of the garriſon was left alive. At laſt Lewis, deſpairing of ſucceſs, raiſed the ſiege, and marched to London.

A ſhort time after this Lewis advanced to Hertford, and made himſelf maſter of the caſtle. From hence he proceeded, with all the fury of diſappointed ambition, to St. Alban's, which he threatened with deſtruction; but he was at laſt prevailed upon to ſpare the town and abbey, though not without exacting a very ſevere compoſition for that indulgence. And as the clergy, in general, were extremely active in the cauſe of young Henry, Lewis deſtroyed all their poſſeſſions that fell in his way. They were, however, ſufficiently revenged; for, by their means, the French became every day more and more the deteſtation of the people. And ſo ſucceſsful were their endeavours to diſtreſs the French party, that Lewis was obliged to accept of a truce during the Chriſtmas holidays.

This ceſſation of hoſtilities was of infinite ſervice to the protector: he wrote letters in the king's name to all the male-content barons; in which he repreſented to them, that whatever jealouſy and animoſity they might have entertained againſt the late king, a young prince, the lineal heir of their antient monarchs, had now ſucceeded to the throne, without ſucceeding either to the reſentment or principles of his predeceſſor: that the deſperate expedient they had employed, of calling in a foreign potentate, had happily for them, and happily for the nation, failed of entire ſucceſs; and it was ſtill in their power, by a quick return to their duty, to reſtore the independence of their country, and to ſecure that liberty, for which they ſo zealouſly contended: that as all paſt offences of the barons were now buried in oblivion, they ought, on their part, to forget their complaints againſt their late ſovereign, who, if he had been any wiſe blameable in his conduct, had left to his ſon the ſalutary warning, to avoid the paths, which had led to ſuch fatal extremities: and that having now obtained a charter for their liberties, it was their intereſt to demonſtrate, by their conduct, that ſo valuable an acquiſition was not incompatible with their allegiance, and that the rights of the king and people, ſo far from being hoſtile and oppoſite, might mutually ſupport and ſuſtain each other.

Theſe conſiderations, enforced by the character of conſtancy and fidelity, which Pembroke had always maintained, produced ſo happy an effect on the barons, that the greater part of them began ſecretly to negotiate with the protector, and many of them openly avowed their attachment to the young king.

A. D. 1217. Lewis now began to find that his party and intereſt declined daily: the war was very expenſive, and could be ſupported only by draughts from France. The protector's whole aim was, to gain leiſure from the tumults of war, in order to give the Engliſh an opportunity to reflect. He knew their genius to be averſe to the French; and that if he could, by repeated acts of generoſity and clemency, inſpire the people with a confidence in the government, his maſter's authority would be ſoon eſtabliſhed in every part of the kingdom. This diſpoſition, together with the inceſſant endeavours of the court of Rome to ſerve the royal family, had ſo powerful an effect, that Lewis conſented to another truce, which was to laſt till after Eaſter. During this ceſſation of arms, Lewis found himſelf obliged by his father, who durſt no longer reſiſt the ſolicitations of the pope, to return to France. He accordingly ſet out for that kingdom about the middle of January, intending to make a ſhort tour to Paris, as well to avert the thunder of the Vatican, as to procure a ſupply of men and money.

The abſence of Lewis furniſhed the regent with a favourable opportunity of making freſh levies, and uſing his intereſt and endeavours to bring over the moſt conſiderable of the barons to the royal cauſe; and ſo effectually did this worthy ſubject labour in his reconciliatory plan, that, beſides the earls of Saliſbury, Arundel and Warren, he had the pleaſure to ſee Hugh de Lacy, and William the young earl of Mareſchall, his own ſon, who till then had been one of the moſt zealous partiſans of France, return to their allegiance, and ever after remain faithful to their duty. In a word, the number of thoſe who quitted Lewis's party during the truce was ſo great, that the loſs was not made good by all the ſupplies he could muſter in France to reinforce his army.

The Cinque ports likewiſe declared in favor of Henry, and fitted out a ſquadron of ſhips, with which they way-laid and attacked Lewis in his return; but, after a ſmart ſkirmiſh, he got ſafe, with the loſs of a few ſhips only, to Sandwich. This inſtance of diſaffection, however, incenſed him ſo highly, that, in revenge, he burnt the town of Sandwich, as being one of the Cinque ports; and having made another unſucceſsful attack on Dover-caſtle, he marched with his troops towards London, whither he arrived on the very day the truce expired.

The firſt conſiderable act of hoſtility was began by the regent, who detached a body of forces, under the earls of Lincoln and Albermarle, to inveſt Mount Sorrel, in Leiceſterſhire, the garriſon having committed the moſt dreadful ravages in the neighbourhood of the caſtle. Lewis, who knew the conſequence of that fortreſs, detached an army of ſix hundred knights and twenty thouſand infantry, under the command of the count de la Perche, a marſhal of France, to raiſe the ſiege. Upon his approach, the Engliſh, who were too weak to venture a battle, retired to Nottingham; and the count, confident from the ſuperiority of his numbers, reſolved to attack the caſtle of Lincoln.

This circumſtance greatly alarmed the regent: the caſtle of Lincoln was a place of too much conſequence to loſe, without making one effort for its relief. A ſummons was therefore iſſued by the protector to all the king's tenants, ordering them to join the royal army at Newark upon Trent. The pope's legate not only excommunicated Lewis by name, but alſo declared, that all who embarked in defence of Henry ſhould be intitled to the ſame privileges as thoſe who undertook a cruſade. He himſelf aſſumed the croſs, and the biſhops and barons drew the temporal ſword. This zeal of the clergy was of the utmoſt ſervice to the royal cauſe: the people flocked with the utmoſt alacrity to the Protector's ſtandard, inſpired with a kind of enthuſiaſtic ardor which ſeldom fails of ſucceſs; and Pembroke had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing himſelf at the head of a noble and reſolute army, inflamed with the deſire of being led againſt an excommunicated enemy.

Such was the expedition uſed by the regent in his march, that he had advanced almoſt in ſight of the enemy before they had notice of his approach. They had all along hoped to take the caſtle before an army could be aſſembled ſtrong enough to oppoſe them. Surprized to find the regent ſo cloſe to them, the French general called a council of war, in which, after much debate ariſing from a difference of opinions, it was reſolved to make one deciſive aſſault upon the caſtle, (the garriſon of which was by this time reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs,) and to act on the defenſive againſt Pembroke's forces. Theſe meaſures proved the deſtruction of the French army. Fulk de Briant, ſoon after, found means to enter the caſtle by a poſtern-gate, at the head of a choſen body of French archers, and made ſeveral ſallies to amuſe the beſiegers; while the royal army vigorouſly attacked one of the gates of the city, carried it by ſtorm, and entered the place ſword in hand. The French perceived their danger, and made a noble defence; but the freſh troops continuing to pour in through the avenue, a total rout enſued. The count of Perche was killed in the ſtreets, having refuſed quarter, though offered ſeveral times, and moſt of the French troops fell with him.

When Lewis was informed of this defeat, he was ſtruck with the moſt inexpreſſible conſternation. He immediately left Dover, ſhut himſelf up in the capital, and diſpatched a courier to his father for aſſiſtance. Philip, who was deſirous of averting the cenſure of the pope from his own kingdom, refuſed to engage openly in the defence of his ſon; but permitted Blanch, his daughter-in-law, the wife of Lewis, to raiſe a powerful body of troops, and to provide a fleet of ſhips for tranſporting them into England. But they landed not in that kingdom: the French ſhips were met by the Engliſh on the coaſt of Kent, and totally defeated.

This defeat gave the finiſhing ſtroke to all Lewis's hopes in this kingdom; and, to add a greater weight to the misfortunes that crowded in upon him, he now beheld the regent, at the head of an irreſiſtible army, in the neighbourhood of London, and himſelf blocked up in that city, without the ſmalleſt hope of relief. The people, no longer overawed by the ſuperiority of foreign maſters, now gave a free vent to their expreſſions of diſlike to him and his conduct. The chief barons of his alliance were ſhut up in priſons after their defeat at Lincoln; the reſt had either openly abandoned his party, or, by being in the ſame predicament with himſelf, continued about his perſon more through inability to go elſewhere, than out of any real affection to him or his cauſe. The whole nation reſounded with the peals of eccleſiaſtical thunder hurled againſt him from the Vatican; and he now remained in a foreign country, hated, deſpiſed, and cut off from all means of changing the complexion of his fate.

Thus circumſtanced, nothing remained but to ſeek by ſubmiſſion that ſafety which he had in vain tried to acquire by force. Lewis, accordingly, offered to conclude a peace with the Protector, by which he promiſed to evacuate the kingdom, on condition of his adherents being re-eſtabliſhed in their honors and fortunes. The terms were accepted; and Lewis returned to the continent, with the mortification of having ſeized a ſceptre he was unable to keep.

Excluſive of the articles of treaty, Lewis promiſed, and firmly engaged himſelf, to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to perſuade his father Philip to reſtore to Henry all his rights on the continent; and if he failed in this mediation, to do it himſelf as ſoon as he ſhould become poſſeſſed of the crown of France.

The greateſt ſufferers among all Lewis's adherents were the clergy. Nothing was ſtipulated for them in the treaty of peace: they were left entirely to the mercy of the pope, whom they had ſo highly offended, and who ſeized with eagerneſs this favourable opportunity to wreak his vengeance on them for their diſobedience. Many of them were depoſed, and many ſuſpended; ſome were baniſhed; and all who eſcaped puniſhment were obliged to purchaſe their pardon by paying large ſums of money to the legate; ſo that the pope by theſe means became poſſeſſed of immenſe treaſure. But Innocent lived not long to enjoy the fruits of his interpoſition in favor of young Henry. He paid the debt of nature ſoon after the departure of Lewis from England, and was ſucceeded in the papal chair by Honorius III.

A. D. 1218. The rage of civil war being now appeaſed, the Protector applied himſelf to the ſalutary meaſures of improving that peace his prudence and victories had ſo happily brought about. He procured a new charter of liberties, but it differed in ſeveral particulars from that of John. The full privilege of elections in the clergy, and the liberty of going out of the kingdom without firſt obtaining the royal conſent, were not confirmed in the charter of Henry, becauſe the ſtate had already experienced the inconveniencies ariſing from them. The obligation by which John had reſtrained himſelf from buying aids and ſcutages, without the conſent of the great council of the nation, was alſo omitted in this inſtrument. The barons perceived that no aids, unleſs they were evidently reaſonable, could be levied upon men who had arms in their hands, and who were able to repel any acts of violence. Nor did he content himſelf with granting anew the privileges that had been enjoyed in the preceding reign; he cauſed writs, in the king's name, to be iſſued to the ſheriffs of the different counties, commanding them to lay open all foreſts, agreeable to the intention of the charter granted for that purpoſe by king John; and ſome time after, he ſent the chief juſticiary of the foreſts on a circuit through the kingdom, to ſee that the orders were fully executed, and the bounds of the foreſts diſtinctly marked. At the ſame time, orders were given to demoliſh all the new caſtles that had been erected ſince the beginning of the diſputes between the late king and his barons.

A. D. 1219. While the earl of Pembroke was thus exerting his utmoſt abilities to reſtore peace and happineſs to the king and his people, death put a final period to his labours and his life. The nation ſuffered an irreparable loſs in the death of this great man, whoſe valour, integrity and prudence had broke the yoke of foreign ſlavery, and reſtored the liberties of Engliſhmen. He died about the middle of March, and his body was depoſited in the church of the Knights Templars (now the Temple Church) where his effigy, in a coat of mail, is ſtill to be ſeen.

This great man was ſucceeded by William de Roches, biſhop of Wincheſter; and Hubert de Burgh, the gallant defender of Dover-caſtle, was created chief juſticiary of the kingdom. The councils of the latter were conformable to his character, that of a great, a prudent, and a virtuous man. They were for ſome time followed; and had he poſſeſſed the authority of Pembroke, the nation would not have ſo greatly regretted the loſs of that eminent patriot. His power, however, was not ſufficient to repreſs the licentiouſneſs of the barons, who were too ſtrong to be reſtrained by laws under a minority; and whoſe rapacity induced them to uſurp the demeſnes of the crown, as well as the poſſeſſions of their weaker neighbours. Hence revolts were multiplied, and the government was perpetually employed in reducing inſurrections.

A. D. 1222. Theſe diſturbances rouſed the dying ſpirit of faction in the minds of thoſe who were not well affected to the government. Lewis had ſtill a party in the kingdom, eſpecially among the meaner claſs of the citizens of London, while the clergy and inhabitants of Weſtminſter were intirely in the intereſt of the royal family of England. The animoſity of theſe two oppoſite parties, firſt appeared at a wreſtling match, held at the hoſpital of St. Maud, in the neighbourhood of the capital, where the Londoners came off victorious. The ſteward of Weſtminſter, finding himſelf and his followers foiled, proclaimed another match of the ſame kind, in which the conqueror was to carry away a ram, as the prize. On the day appointed, when the Londoners came to the field, they were attacked by the ſteward and his party, armed with weapons; ſome were wounded, and the reſt obliged to return to the city. This fray was reſented by the friends of Lewis, who immediately made it a party quarrel. One Conſtantine Fitz-arnulph, a bold, rich, and factious citizen, was at the head of the French party. His noiſy harangues drowned the wiſe remonſtrances of the mayor, who adviſed the citizens to complain to the abbot of Weſtminſter. Conſtantine inſtantly gave out the words “ God and king Lewis;” adding, that all the houſes belonging both to the abbot and ſteward of Weſtminſter, ought to be levelled with the ground. He put himſelf at the head of the rabble, marched immediately to Weſtminſter, and there began hoſtilities by demoliſhing ſeveral houſes belonging to the abbot. The words which had been given out alarmed the friends of the government; and the lawleſs rabble having now wreaked their fury, Hubert de Burgh entered the city, at the head of a ſtrong body of forces. He immediately ſummoned the magiſtracy, with the principal citizens, and demanded who were the authors of the late riot? Conſtantine, not the leaſt intimidated, ſtepped forward, boldly avowed himſelf the author, and juſtified all he had done; alledging in his own defence, the treaty made by Pembroke with Lewis, by which the citizens of London were to be reſtored to all their former rights; and by which a general act of indemnity was to paſs, with regard to all who had been concerned in the late troubles. The juſticiary, on hearing this reſolute anſwer, diſmiſſed the aſſembly, without declaring his deſign, or diſcovering the leaſt emotion; but ordered Conſtantine and his nephew to be committed to priſon; and the next morning, cauſed them both to be executed. Had the ſeverity of the government reſted here, it might have been thought ſeaſonable; but a party of mercenaries entered the city, ſeized all who were ſuſpected of having been concerned in the late riot, committed them to priſon, and the unhappy victims were afterwards puniſhed in a very exemplary man-manner. Nor did this impolitic ſeverity, or rather cruelty, reſt here: the court, pleaſed with an opportunity of revenging itſelf on the citizens, for the part they had acted during the reſidence of Lewis in England, arbitrarily depoſed all the magiſtrates, and filled their places with creatures of their own.

A. D. 1223. Theſe proceedings, which were conſidered as direct infringements on the great charter, excited the clamours of the populace, who, with juſtice, conceiving themſelves injured, demanded a new confirmation of it. In conſequence of this, a general council was called, and the demand of the people taken into conſideration. During the debates, one of the council of the regency aſſerted, that no regard ought to be paid to the great charter, becauſe it was extorted by violence. But Langton, archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſeverely reprimanded the ſpeaker for his indiſcretion, as his aſſertion had a direct tendency to raiſe a rebellion in the nation; affirming, at the ſame time, that the demand of the people was founded on juſtice; and that the government could not, without the moſt palpable injuſtice, diſpenſe with any article in the charter. His opinion was adopted; and the parliament having granted a ſubſidy, the king iſſued orders for a new charter of confirmation. At length the biſhops, by the tenor of eccleſiaſtical cenſures, obliged the barons to deliver up the fortreſſes belonging to the crown, the poſſeſſion of which they had obtained in the moſt forcible and illegal manner.

On the 14th of July this year (1223) died Philip Auguſtus, king of France, who was ſucceeded by his ſon Lewis VIII. As ſoon as the event was known in England, Henry's council ſent over ambaſſadors to congratulate Lewis on his acceſſion to the throne, and to remind him of his promiſe he had made with regard to Normandy and the other provinces, of which John had been deprived by his father. Lewis, however, far from granting this demand, not only declared that he looked upon Normandy as unalienably annexed to the crown of France, but ſhould likewiſe, at a proper time, renew his claim to England, in virtue of the grant made him by the great barons. In conſequence of this anſwer the Engliſh council publiſhed a manifeſto, inviting the noblemen of Normandy to return to their allegiance, promiſing to reſtore them to their family poſſeſſions in England.

No material circumſtances happened in England from this time till the year 1226, which was opened with a parliament held at Weſtminſter, wherein the king was declared of age, though he had not yet attained his one-and-twentieth year. This, however, was not the buſineſs for which the parliament was aſſembled; they were more immediately convened in order to deliberate on an extraordinary demand made by the court of Rome. The pope had ſent over a legate, under pretence of removing a reproach that had long been thrown upon the court of the Vatican. The pontiff obſerved, that the holy ſee having long been accuſed of ſelling her favors for money, it was the duty of all good Chriſtians to aſſiſt in removing the cauſe of ſuch a ſcandalous imputation, which flowed intirely from the extreme indigence of the Roman church. He therefore demanded, that two prebends in every cathedral, and two cells in every convent in England, ſhould be granted to the church of Rome, by an authentic deed, confirmed by an act of the great council of the nation.

The Engliſh parliament treated this demand with ſuch contempt, that no anſwer was returned to Rome. But the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was more immediately intereſted, wrote to the pope, informing him, “ That when the Roman ſee had procured the “ ſame aſſiſtance from other nations, England would “ follow their example; but would never eſtabliſh “ the precedent.”

This was by no means ſatiſfactory to his holineſs, who, to mortify Henry in return, ſent inhibitory letters, commanding him not to attempt any thing againſt the dominions of France, ſo long as its king Lewis ſhould bear the croſs he had taken up againſt the Albigenſes.

A. D. 1227. As Henry advanced in years, he diſcovered thoſe principles that portended little happineſs to his people. He was naturally of a mild and timid diſpoſition, and poſſeſſed neither vigor of mind, nor political diſcernment. His reſentments were violent and tranſitory; his attachments ſudden and inconſiſtent: the one excited no apprehenſions; the other was not conſolidated into friendſhip. At the ſame time his irreſolution was blended with the principles of avarice, tyranny and oppreſſion. Little expectations of happineſs could be therefore formed from his government.

Henry, on his arriving at the age of majority, ſummoned a parliament at Oxford, when he declared his intention of taking into his own hands the reins of government; adding, that as the great charter, and that of the foreſts, had been obtained by an act of rebellion, and confirmed in his minority, he could not conſider himſelf as legally bound by any acts or promiſes during his infancy. The members were aſtoniſhed at this declaration; and the aſſembly broke up in a manner which ſufficiently indicated, that the ſtorm of reſentment would ſoon exert its baleful power.

This year Lewis VIII. died in his expedition againſt the Albigenſes, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Lewis IX. then a minor of twelve years of age. The Engliſh thought this a favourable juncture for attempting the re-poſſeſſion of the antient eſtates in France; and for this purpoſe a deputation was ſent into that country, commiſſioned to uſe all means to prevail with the Normans, and the other tenants of thoſe lands antiently held of the royal family of England, to renew their allegiance to Henry; but by the prudence of the queen-regent of France and her friends, the deſigns of the Engliſh were entirely fruſtrated, and the commiſſioners were obliged to return without making any progreſs in the negotiation.

In the mean time the conduct of Henry had inſpired the barons with ſo much diſcontent, that their affection for him was perceptibly leſſened. Richard, earl of Cornwall, the king's brother, having returned from France, ſoon after Henry had revoked the two charters, found one of his manors poſſeſſed by a German officer, who claimed it as a gift from king John. Richard inſiſted, that his pretended right ſhould be determined by his peers, and immediately diſpoſſeſſed the German. But inſtead of having recourſe to the laws of England, he poſted to court, and complained to the king of the injuſtice done him by the earl of Cornwall. Henry, without giving himſelf any trouble to examine into the truth of his allegations, ordered him a writ under the royal ſign manual, commanding a reſtitution of the eſtate. Exaſperated at ſuch treatment, the earl refuſed obedience, and repaired to court to defend his property. The king, highly offended at Richard's obſtinacy, told him, that he ſhould either reſtore the manor in queſtion within a limited time, or depart the kingdom.

This diſtinguiſhed exertion of arbitrary power rouſed the paſſions of Richard, who boldly replied, that he would appeal to the laws of his country, repeating, that the judgment of his peers only ſhould oblige him either to part with his property, or to quit the kingdom.

Henry, whoſe anger as well as friendſhip was momentary, ſoon forgot the offence, and fearing the power of Richard, who was greatly beloved by the barons, he ſubmitted to petition a reconciliation, and offered to ſettle on him the dower of the late queen. Richard, allured by this liberality, accepted the terms; and both the cauſe and the offence was buried in oblivion.

A. D. 1228. This year the nation ſuſtained an irreparable loſs in the death of Stephen Langton, archbiſhop of Canterbury. This prelate may be juſtly conſidered as one of the reſtorers of Engliſh liberty. He no ſooner had it in his power to be independent, than he acted with an independent ſpirit; and the part he performed in all public commotions was ſuch as became the firſt peer of England, and a ſincere lover of his country.

About the ſame time died alſo pope Honorius III. who was ſucceeded in the pontificate by Gregory IX.

A. D. 1229. Lewis, the young king of France, having made various depredations on the continent, the Engliſh nobility there ſtrongly invited Henry to come to their relief. He accordingly liſtened to their ſolicitation, and gave orders for all his military tenants to rendezvous at Portſmouth. The Engliſh were at this time highly exaſperated againſt the French. The great barons, and other military tenants, were animated with the hopes of recovering their family eſtates in Normandy; and all ranks of people appeared ſo devoted to the ſervice of their king, that a more numerous army was collected than had ever been ſeen at one time, under the command of a king of England.

But Henry's expedition was fruſtrated by the neglect of the miniſter, who had iſſued neither the proper writs to the cinque ports, nor taken the uſual methods for aſſembling a ſufficient number of tranſports. Henry was ſo incenſed at this diſappointment, that he branded the miniſter with the name of traitor, and, drawing his ſword, would have killed him on the ſpot, had it not been for the interpoſition of the earl of Cheſter.

About the beginning of October the earl of Britany, who was at this time in arms againſt the French, came over to England. He was a bold, turbulent nobleman; but finding the ſeaſon of the year too far advanced, he adviſed Henry to put off his intended invaſion till the next ſpring. In the mean time, the irreſolution of Henry got the better of his reſentment; and the faults of his miniſter were now buried in oblivion.

A. D, 1230. In the beginning of the ſpring Henry again collected a powerful army at Portſmouth, from whence he ſailed on the laſt day of April, attended by the earl of Britany. The fleet, by ſome accident, was ſeparated, and put into different ports, but without receiving any damage. The king himſelf landed at St. Malo, where the earl of Britany not only renewed his homage, but ordered all the fortified places in his poſſeſſion to be delivered up to the Engliſh.

The French, who had all the winter to prepare themſelves, had taken poſt behind Angiers, with an intent of hindering the march of the Engliſh into Poictou. But Henry's conduct ſeemed to render this precaution needleſs, for, inſtead of advancing to attack the enemy, he ſuffered them to fortify themſelves in their poſt, while he continued at Nantz, expecting the reſt of his troops, which were coming from Ireland. This inaction encouraged young Lewis, who was at the head of his troops, to advance within four leagues of Nantz, and lay ſiege to Ancennes, which Henry, who had now rendered himſelf ridiculous and contemptible, ſuffered him to take, without making one effort for its relief. The French army continued approaching towards Nantz, beſieged the caſtles of Oudon and Chauteauceaux, which they took in ſight of the Engliſh army, and afterwards extended their incurſions even to the gates of Nantz.

Neither the inſults of the French, nor the entreaties of his friends, being able to awake Henry, and Lewis ſeeing no likelihood of an action, returned to Paris in order to form a reconciliation with his diſcontented nobility, at whoſe deſire Henry had invaded his dominions.

On the French king's retiring, Henry, to ſave appearances, drew his troops out of Nantz, and marched into Gaſcony, by way of Poictou. Here he received the homage of many noblemen; and after ſtaying a ſhort time returned to Nantz, from whence he embarked for England, leaving a conſiderable army in France, under the command of the earls of Cheſter, Mareſchal and Albemarle.

Henry had no ſooner left the French coaſt, than his generals took the field with ſo much ſucceſs, that they made an irruption into Anjou, where they took the caſtle of Gautier, and laid the town in aſhes. They next fell into Normandy, where they took and razed the caſtle of Pontarſu, and burnt the town. But the winter being too far advanced for them to make any further progreſs, they returned to Britany loaded with booty; having ſufficiently demonſtrated what might have been effected by the whole army, had the king taken the field at a proper ſeaſon, and puſhed the operations with the ſpirit of an able general.

A. D. 1231. The great ſucceſs of the Engliſh generals, during the cloſe of the laſt campaign, drew the French monarch very early into the field at the head of his army. His intention was to invade Britany, as being the place of the head quarters of the Engliſh, as well as of their principal reſources. But the Engliſh commanders took their meaſures ſo effectually, as to render his deſigns abortive, by intercepting all his carriages loaded with proviſions and military engines. Henry, however, was in no condition to improve theſe favorable incidents. He found it very difficult to raiſe the neceſſary ſupplies; and the pope backward to ſupport his cauſe, under pretence that thoſe quarrels in France prevented the zealous from proſecuting the cruſades. On the other hand, nothing was more deſirable to the French court, than a reſpite from war. A truce was therefore concluded for three years; and the Engliſh generals returned to their own country.

A. D. 1232. In the beginning of this year the king ſummoned a parliament at Weſtminſter, which met on the 17th of March, of whom he demanded an aid to enable him to diſcharge the debts contracted by his late expedition into France; but the barons were ſo highly exaſperated at his paſt conduct, that they peremptorily refuſed. He next tried the clergy, but with as little ſucceſs; they did not, indeed, abſolutely refuſe, but deſired further time to conſider the matter; upon which the aſſembly was prorogued till Eaſter.

The reaſon of this coolneſs in the great men of the kingdom was principally owing to the countenance Henry had given to the pope, who, taking advantage of the king's weakneſs, had purſued the moſt unjuſt and unpopular meaſures. Many of the principal benefices in England were poſſeſſed by Italian prieſts, and one of the king's chaplains is ſaid to have held upwards of an hundred livings. The prelates and lay patrons were inhibited from preſenting natives, till all the foreign clergy were provided for. It is no wonder, that ſo ſhameful a practice raiſed a general clamour in the kingdom. It was conſidered as a national inſult, and ſeveral aſſociations were formed for delivering the realm from ſuch ſhameful oppreſſions. The principal leader of the confederates was Robert de Twenge, a knight in the north of England. He had long beheld the tyrannical proceedings of the pope with deteſtation, but on being deprived by his holineſs of the patronage of a church, he determined to take ample revenge on the foreign prieſts. He aſſumed the name of William Witham, and encouraged his followers to ſtrip the houſes of the Italian clergy, and diſpoſe of their effects. They continued this practice for ſome time without oppoſition, and the foreign eccleſiaſtics, not daring to appear, took refuge in the convents. Informed of theſe violent proceedings, the pope wrote in a very lofty ſtile to Henry, commanding him, under pain of excommunication, to chaſtiſe the inſolence of his ſubjects, and reſtore the Italian clergy to their benefices. The puſillanimous ſoul of Henry was alarmed at theſe menaces of the holy father; he dreaded the effects of a papal cenſure. He ordered a ſtrict inquiſition to be made in the ſeveral parts of the kingdom, where thoſe riots had prevailed; and had the mortification to find, that they had been ſupported and encouraged by men of all ranks; Hubert de Burgh, the chief juſticiary, did not eſcape ſuſpicion. At laſt Robert de Twenge, who ſcorned to diſown an action, which he thought juſtifiable, or to let any innocent perſon ſuffer on his account, appeared in the royal preſence, attended by five knights, and boldly declared himſelf the leader of the confederates, who had ſtripped the houſes of the foreign prieſts; alledging, that the injuries he had received were the ſole motives for his proceedings. Pleaſed with the ingenuous confeſſion, and intrepid behaviour of this reſolute knight, who diſdained to ſuffer tamely an injury, though inflicted by the holy father himſelf, the king gave him a free pardon, and pocured a reſtitution of his right to the patronage in queſtion.

But though Hubert was cleared from all ſuſpicion by the voluntary confeſſion of Twenge, yet the inconſtancy of Henry furniſhed his enemies with an opportunity of procuring his ruin. Excited by the remonſtrances of the biſhop of Wincheſter, who hated Hubert, becauſe he had been active in oppoſing his deſtructive councils, this weak prince, inſenſible to all his ſervices, perſecuted him with ſo much fury, that he was obliged to take ſanctuary in a church; whence he afterwards eſcaped out of the kingdom.

A. D. 1233. The biſhop of Wincheſter, who was a Poictevin by birth, having by the diſgrace of Hubert, engroſſed the entire confidence of his maſter, employed his authority to the worſt of purpoſes. He was in temper proud and tyrannical, and the propoſſeſſion he entertained in favor of his own countrymen alarmed the Engliſh. The court was filled with theſe ſtrangers, and he conferred on them every office and every command in the diſpoſal of the crown. Theſe proceedings ſoon produced a general ſpirit of diſcontent, which Henry conſidered only as a confirmation of that rebellious ſpirit which Wincheſter had repreſented to be the characteriſtic of the Engliſh nobility. They were denied all acceſs to the king; and treated by the miniſter with contempt.

At length, however, the Engliſh, wearied out by the inſults and injuries they received from theſe inſolent ſtrangers, formed themſelves into a body, and deputed the earl marſhal to lay their grievances before Henry. He accordingly demanded an audience, and, with the noble ſpirit of an Engliſhman, laid the complaints of the nation before the king: he beſought him not to continue laviſhing his favors upon foreigners, to the utter neglect of his natural ſubjects; adding, that if he continued to treat their remonſtrance with neglect, both himſelf and the other nobility would think it their duty to withdraw themſelves from his councils, where they had no power to ſupport the welfare of their country.

The haughty prelate, who was preſent at this audience, without giving the king time to reply, anſwered the earl with unparalleled effrontry, "That it was the higheſt degree of inſolence in him, or any other ſubject to pretend to dictate to his majeſty, on whom he ought to confer his favors: that both the king and his father had been ſo ill treated by the Engliſh, that the only expedient of procuring his own ſafety was that of truſting to foreigners; and that if their number in the kingdom was not already ſufficient to reduce his rebellious ſubjects to their duty, large reinforcements ſhould be procured."

This ſpeech ſo aſtoniſhed the earl, that he retired without returning an anſwer, and joined in the confederacy for checking the deſpotic power, which the king, by the violent counſels of his worthleſs miniſter, ſeemed deſirous to aſſume. Henry was alarmed, and the biſhop, to gain time, adviſed him to call a parliament at London. The barons refuſed to attend, and even threatened to deprive Henry of his crown, if the Poictevins were not baniſhed the kingdom. Another parliament was called, and the barons preſented themſelves dreſſed in armour, and attended by their followers. Henry now ſaw his danger, and was deſirous of a reconciliation; but the artful prelate found means to remove his fears by ſowing diſſenſions among them, and gaining the earls of Cornwall and Cheſter over to the royal party. The eſtates of ſeveral of the confederates were confiſcated, without any trial by their peers; and, by a very impolitic liberality, beſtowed upon the Poictevins, before ſo odious to the Engliſh.

A. D. 1234. The time, however, now approached for the fall of that infamous ſet of miniſters, who had, ſince the diſgrace of Hubert de Burgh, exerciſed their power in the moſt illegal, odious, arbitrary and oppreſſive manner. The removal of them was reſerved for the clergy, who, in order to avert the miſchievous conſequence that muſt have attended their mal-practices, reſolved to exert themſelves in behalf of their country.

Edmund, archbiſhop of Canterbury, taking with him his ſuffragans, demanded an audience of the king, which Henry could not refuſe. At this interview the prelate deſcribed, in the moſt pathetic manner, the dreadful effects of thoſe ruinous meaſures, which he had purſued at the inſtigation of his miniſters. He formally accuſed Peter, biſhop of Wincheſter, as the author of thoſe pernicious counſels, which had diffuſed a ſpirit of diſcontent through the whole nation; and after making a long detail of the grievances of the people, inſiſted that the king ſhould remove from his councils a miniſter ſo odious to all his ſubjects; adding, that if ſo reaſonable a requeſt was refuſed, he would excommunicate both him, and all who oppoſed ſo neceſſary a reformation.

This ſpirited remonſtrance, and the threatening at the cloſe of it, produced the deſired effect. Henry perceived his error. The biſhop of Wincheſter was ſtripped of all his employments, and the inſolent Poictevins baniſhed the kingdom. The natives were reſtored to their places in council, and the primate, who was a man of prudence, and took care to execute the laws, bore the chief ſway in the government.

A. D. 1236. Had Henry learned wiſdom from former miſcarriages, it had been happy both for him and his people; but he ſeems to have been one of that number, whom vice or indolence had rendered incorrigible. The remonſtrance of the archbiſhop had, in all appearance, convinced him of his error in cheriſhing foreigners in preference to his Engliſh ſubjects. But this conviction was temporary; Henry ſoon forgot both his danger and his intereſt. He married Eleanor the daughter of the earl of Marche; and threw himſelf again into the arms of foreigners. William de Savoy, biſhop of Valence, and uncle to the new queen, became his principal favourite. He took every occaſion of giving him a remarkable preference over the greateſt, and moſt faithful of his own ſubjects, and committed all the affairs of the ſtate to his ſole direction.

Theſe proceedings immediately alarmed the Engliſh nobility. They dreaded a revival of the late times of miniſterial inſolence and oppreſſion, and determined to exert all their power to put a ſtop to the career of this foreign minion. They began with preſenting dutiful addreſſes to the king, at the ſame time remonſtrating with a becoming ſpirit, againſt thoſe meaſures, which they apprehended to be deſtructive of the public intereſt, and that union which ſhould always ſubſiſt between an Engliſh king and his ſubjects. But they ſucceeded not in their attempts. Valence ſupported his power, and foreign influence grew every day more prevalent at court. The miniſter, who was offended with the Engliſh barons for their late ſpirited remonſtrances, ſpared no pains to render them ſuſpected by the king, and to remove the moſt active among them from his perſon and government. The ſeals were demanded from the biſhop of Chicheſter, who had filled the high office of chancellor with the moſt unblemiſhed integrity; but the prelate, on receiving the king's meſſage, nobly replied, "That having received the ſeals by the order of the parliament, he would reſign them by order of that aſſembly only."

A. D. 1237. This anſwer of the chancellor made not the leaſt impreſſion on Henry. He ſtill adhered to his foreign miniſters, and was deaf to the complaints of his people. But the wants of his needy courtiers ſoon exhauſted his revenues, and he was obliged to call a parliament to procure a ſupply. The ſeſſion was very full, ſome important buſineſs being expected to be laid before them. But they were told, "That the chief reaſon for their being called together, was to deſire them to grant an aid, which ſhould be collected and diſpoſed of, for the neceſſary uſes of the ſtate, by ſuch perſons as they themſelves ſhould think proper to commiſſion for that purpoſe."

The parliament, who had ſo often truſted to Henry's promiſes, were no longer to be deceived; and returned for anſwer, "That they had often granted the king aids, without receiving any marks of his affection: that ſince his acceſſion to the throne, his dominions were conſiderably leſſened, though he had frequently exacted from his ſubjects very large ſums, which had been wholly laviſhed away upon foreign favourites, to the impoveriſhment of the ſtate, and the diſgrace of his character." To this ſpirited reply, Henry pleaded the expences of his own and his ſiſter's marriage, which had entirely exhauſted his treaſury; but if they would grant him a thirteenth part of their moveables, he promiſed upon his honor, never to injure or oppreſs any baron of the realm. In order to facilitate their compliance, he diſavowed the pope's bull, which his miniſtry had lately obtained for the reſumption of grants; declared he would inviolably obſerve the articles of the Great Charter; and ordered a ſentence of excommunication to be ſolemnly denounced againſt all perſons, himſelf not excepted, who ſhould dare to violate that ſacred conſtitution.

The parliament, ſoftened by theſe aſſurances, complied with the king's demand; but ordered the money ariſing from the tax to be depoſited in certain abbies, churches and caſtles, as a fund ſacred to the neceſſities of the ſtate; and the following expreſs condition was annexed to the grant for levying it: "That the king ſhould no longer hearken to the ſuggeſtions of foreigners, who had already oppreſſed and impoveriſhed the nation, but be governed for the future by his own natural-born ſubjects."

The king readily ſubmitted to every thing propoſed by the parliament; but his purpoſes were no ſooner anſwered, than he returned to his former meaſures, ſhewed as much fondneſs for foreigners as ever, and to ſecure himſelf a party ſufficient to oppoſe the power of his barons, he had recourſe to the moſt baſe and mean expedient. He made application to the pope, for a legate to be ſent into England, under whoſe protection he thought he might ſecurely violate his recent engagements, which neceſſity had compelled him to enter into with his people. The Engliſh were alarmed, and the archbiſhop of Canterbury warmly expoſtulated with him on his conduct for ſuffering a legate to come into the kingdom without any apparent neceſſity, and without the knowledge of the parliament and clergy. But Henry regarded not the remonſtrances of the prelate, the cenſures of the church were no longer terrible; he knew the authority of the pope to be ſuperior to that of the archbiſhop. He ſeized the money depoſited in the churches and convents by the parliament for the uſe of the ſtate, and ſquandered it with the utmoſt profuſion upon ſtrangers and favourites. His brother, the earl of Cornwall, ſaw this deſtructive conduct with regret, and putting himſelf at the head of the nobility, demanded an audience, where he openly upbraided Henry with this ſhameful breach of faith and honor. He laid before him the exhauſted ſtate of the kingdom, the perpetual demands of his exchequer, though his revenues were large and abundantly ſufficient to ſupport the royal dignity; and, laſtly, the ſhameful ſtep he had taken in calling in the legate of the pope, under whom he acted, with only a ſubordinate power. But theſe remonſtrances had very little effect on Henry; he heard them with patience, promiſing amendment; but, as ſoon as the noblemen were departed, relapſed into his former indolence, and forgot his reſolutions.

A. D. 1239. Notwithſtanding Henry's entire dependence laid on the pope for ſupport againſt the reſentment of his barons and clergy, yet ſuch was the inconſiſtence of his conduct, that he ſent a body of troops to the aſſiſtance of the emperor Frederic II. then at open war with the court of Rome. Gregory IX. who then filled the papal chair, was highly offended at what he termed the inſolence of his vaſſal, and ordered the legate to make the moſt ſevere remonſtrances. The puſillanimous monarch was alarmed, and to avert the cenſure of the vatican, he ſuffered the ſentence of excommunication againſt Frederic to be publiſhed in all the churches of England; though that prince had lately married the princeſs Iſabella, his ſiſter.

The great intereſt of the earl of Cornwall, the king's brother, had ariſen from his being conſidered as heir apparent to the crown; but this year, on the 16th of June, the queen was delivered of a prince, who was named Edward, and afterwards acceded to the throne by the additional name of Longſhanks.

A. D. 1240. Henry, by his conduct, had now obtained the univerſal hatred of his ſubjects. The nobility were juſtly incenſed againſt the rapacious foreigners, who waſted the royal treaſure, governed the kingdom, and treated the laws of England with contempt. The parliament therefore refuſed to grant their exhauſted monarch any ſupplies, and the king had recourſe to the moſt illegal methods and dangerous expedients for ſupplying his neceſſities. He exacted loans; he demanded benevolences; he uſurped a power of diſpenſing with the laws, becauſe the pope ſcrupled not to diſpenſe with the canons of the church, whenever the intereſts of the holy ſee required it. The people complained loudly; the barons formed aſſociations for their defence; and the judges were alarmed at the illegal proceedings of the king. "Alas!" exclaimed one of them upon the bench, "in what a "corrupt age do we live! The civil court is vitiated "in imitation of the eccleſiaſtical; and the river is "poiſoned from that fountain."

A. D. 1242. The earl of Marche, father-in-law to Henry, was at this time at war with Lewis IX. of France, and Henry was deſirous of going to his aſſiſtance. The earl had given him the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of ſucceſs; promiſing, that all the old tenants of his family in France would immediately join his ſtandards, together with the king of Arragon, and the count of Tholouſe. Pleaſed with the proſpect of recovering his old dominions on the continent, and wreſting from Lewis the territories which Philip had taken from his father, Henry ſummoned a parliament, in order to procure the ſupplies neceſſary for carrying his arms into France. But he had the mortification to find his requeſt denied, the parliament abſolutely refuſing to grant him any aſſiſtance for carrying on the war. Henry, however, found means to raiſe the neceſſary ſums at exorbitant intereſt, and paſſed over to the continent at the head of a conſiderable body of troops. But he was equally deſtitute of military and civil talents. His army was defeated at Tillebourg; his allies deſerted him; he loſt what remained to him of Poictou, and returned with diſgrace to England.

A. D. 1244. The whole kingdom had for ſome time paſt reſounded with complaints againſt the enterprizes of the pope of Rome: but his holineſs was not to be intimidated; he determined to proceed, and even to increaſe his deſtructive exactions. Accordingly he ſent over one Martin as his nuncio, to demand a thouſand marks from the clergy, to aſſiſt him in the war he was carrying on againſt the emperor. This nuncio was inveſted with more ample powers than any of his predeceſſors, and his oppreſſion and inſolence exceeded every thing that had yet been experienced from that proud and venal court.

The nation was now ſenſibly alarmed, and the barons reſolved to lay before the general council, then aſſembled at Lyons, the intolerable oppreſſions of the holy ſee.

The methods made uſe of by Martin to extort money from the clergy exaſperated the nation; and it was concluded on, in an aſſembly of the barons, to drive him out of the kingdom by force, if perſuaſions could not prevail upon him to depart peaceably. They aſſembled in arms, under pretence of holding a tournament; and choſe Fulk Fitz Warren as their meſſenger, to carry their reſolutions to the nuncio.

This was the moſt proper perſon they could have choſen, as he had himſelf ſeverely ſuffered by papal exactions, and thoroughly hated every partiſan of Rome. He ſet out immediately to execute his commiſſion, with a determined reſolution to terrify the nuncio, and induce him to abandon the kingdom. On being introduced into Martin's preſence, he told him, with a ſtern and reſolute air, that he muſt inſtantly prepare for his departure from England. The nuncio, little accuſtomed to ſuch diſreſpectful addreſſes, aſked him by whoſe authority he dared to ſpeak to him in ſo inſolent a manner? "By the autho- "rity of a body of Engliſh knights now in arms," anſwered Fulk, "who ordered me to tell you, that "if either you yourſelf, or any of your followers, "remain in England more than three days, every "one of you ſhall be cut to pieces. Act as you "pleaſe; but remember it is an Engliſh knight that "delivers you this meſſage." Martin was ſufficiently intimidated. He was too well acquainted with the character of the Engliſh to contemn a menace ſo peremptorily delivered. He immediately complained to Henry, and deſired his protection. But the king, who had for ſome time beheld the exactions of the pope with concern, told him, that his robberies and oppreſſions had raiſed ſuch a ſpirit of reſentment in every part of the kingdom, that he was hardly able to protect himſelf againſt his own ſubjects, who were thoroughly incenſed againſt him for having countenanced his rapacious proceedings.

Martin was now convinced of his dangerous ſituation, and determined to abandon a kingdom where his life was in the utmoſt danger. He accordingly demanded a paſſport, which was readily granted him by Henry, and he embarked with all poſſible expedition for the continent; but it was thought neceſſary to ſend a proper guard with him to the ſea-ſide, to protect him from the reſentment of the juſtly incenſed multitude.

In the mean time the Engliſh ambaſſadors, having arrived at Lyons, laid their complaints before the council, where the pope himſelf preſided in perſon. They repreſented, that the benefices enjoyed by the Italian clergy in England amounted to ſixty thouſand marks a year, a ſum that exceeded the annual revenue of the crown. They accuſed the pope of frequently cancelling his own acts by clauſes of non obſtante inſerted in his bulls; a clauſe abſolutely deſtructive of all the rights of patrons, and of all the liberties of the Engliſh church. They expatiated on the perpetual extortions of the nuncios and legates, and various other oppreſſions to which the Britiſh clergy had been ſo long expoſed. The pope was confounded, and gave an evaſive anſwer. He feared the power of the council, and was willing to ſoothe the Engliſh agents. He promiſed them redreſs; and cauſed two bulls for that purpoſe to be publiſhed.

A. D. 1246. The promiſes of the pontiff were of no longer exiſtence than his fears; for the council was no ſooner broke up, than he renewed all his exactions. The Engliſh were exaſperated; and a parliament was ſummoned at London for redreſſing this public grievance. A ſtate of the hardſhips ſuffered by the nation from papal tyranny was drawn up; and, after being ſigned by the king, biſhops and temporal lords, ſent to the court of Rome, and ſatisfaction demanded from the pontiff. This inſtrument produced not the deſired effect. The ambaſſadors were treated with contempt, and the pope threatened to proceed to the ſame extremities againſt Henry, as he had lately done againſt the emperor. The king immediately prohibited any farther payments to the pope. But Henry wanted firmneſs to ſupport a meaſure ſo agreeable to his ſubjects; he relapſed into his former indolence, and ſuffered the pope to proceed in his extortions.

A. D. 1248. Henry had for ſome years ſubſiſted entirely on the revenues of the crown eſtates. Theſe were, indeed, very large, and amply ſufficient for ſupporting the grandeur and dignity of the crown, could he have been prevailed upon to have kept his expences within proper bounds: but his prodigality to foreigners ſtill ſubſiſting, he was forced once more to the diſagreeable neceſſity of having recourſe to the parliament for a ſupply.

The aſſembly met on the 9th of February, when Henry accordingly applied for a pecuniary ſupply; however, he was not only peremptorily refuſed, but alſo ſeverely rebuked by the aſſembly for demanding any aſſiſtance after he had ſo often broke his promiſes, openly violated the great charter of their liberties, and refuſed to abandon his deſtructive partiality to foreigners.

Henry was confounded at ſuch plain language from his parliament, eſpecially as he was conſcious that all the allegations were ſtrictly true. He, however, endeavoured to conciliate the affections of the aſſembly by repeated promiſes that he would, for the future, faithfully obſerve all the articles of the great charter. He promiſed, at a proper opportunity, to conſider and redreſs all their real grievances; and concluded with expatiating on the prudence, as well as juſtice, of their furniſhing him with ſupplies for recovering his patrimonial dominions in France.

But all Henry's rhetoric was in vain. By trifling with his former oaths and promiſes, he had forfeited the eſteem of his people; his character was without dignity, and his power without authority. The parliament conſidered him in this diſgraceful light, and treated him accordingly. They plainly told him, that they would no longer, on ſpecious pretences, impoveriſh themſelves for the emolument of ſtrangers; and put him in mind of his contemptible and diſgraceful behaviour during his laſt expedition into Poictou and Gaſcony.

Henry finding it in vain to labour any longer in removing this ſpirit of oppoſition, diſſolved the parliament: but his finances were reduced ſo low, that he was obliged to ſell his family plate and jewels. After they were diſpoſed of, he aſked who had been the purchaſers? It was replied, the citizens of London. "On my word, (ſaid the king) if the treaſury of "Auguſtus could be brought to market, the citizens "of London are able to be the purchaſers: theſe "clowns, who aſſume to themſelves the name of "barons, abound in every thing, while we are re"duced to the utmoſt neceſſity." And he was ſo firmly perſuaded of the opulence of London, that he took every opportunity of fleecing the citizens.

A. D. 1251. An incident happened this year that evinces to what meanneſs the deluded Henry could proceed, to compaſs any end upon which his heart was ſet. The biſhopric of Wincheſter being now vacant, the king wrote to the monks of the convent in the moſt earneſt obliging manner, deſiring them to chuſe his half-brother Ethelmar for their biſhop. As there were, it ſeems, many and great exceptions to the character of the candidate, who had not one qualification to fit him for the office, it was in vain that his letters were ſeconded by the intrigues of his chief favourites, whom he ſent down to influence the election. In ſhort, the objections of the monks were ſo ſtrong, and Henry's probability of ſucceſs ſo ſmall, that he reſolved to try what he could do in perſon. For this purpoſe he went himſelf to Wincheſter, and going into the chapter-houſe, in a full aſſembly of the monks, he began to hold forth upon the following words of ſcripture; "Righteouſneſs and peace have kiſſed each "other;" and made a ſermon on this text, in which he uſed all the motives he could think of to induce them to accept of his recommendation. Perhaps the royal eloquence would have had very little effect, had it not been for a ſting in the cloſe of this diſcourſe: for he petitioned with ſword in hand, and declared to the brotherhood, that if they refuſed his requeſt, he would confound them all. This eloquence was irreſiſtible; the young prince was choſen, and afterwards confirmed by the pope.

A. D. 1253. Innocent IV. who was now pope, was one of the moſt implacable pontiffs that ever filled the papal chair. The emperor Frederic, with whom he and his predeceſſor had been ſo long at war, was now dead; but the hatred he bore that monarch did not die with him; it devolved on his grandſon, Conrade, the lawful heir of the crown of Sicily, but whoſe ſucceſſion was ſet aſide by the perfidious arts of his uncle Mainfroy.

The pope ſoon perceived that his own force was far from being ſufficient to diſpoſſeſs Mainfroy from the Italian dominions of Frederic; and therefore ſent a nuncio into England, to offer the Sicilian crown to Richard, earl of Cornwall. That nobleman, though extremely fond of power, had prudence ſufficient to perceive, that the ſole deſign of the court of Rome was nothing more than the acquiſition of a large ſum of money, and prudently declined the offer. But Henry had not the ſagacity of his brother; he accepted it for his ſecond ſon, Edmund, and gave the pope unlimited credit for expending the ſums neceſſary for the reduction of Sicily. Edmund was accordingly treated with the honors of royalty; and no means of extortion or oppreſſion were omitted by the pope, in conjunction with Henry, to obtain money from the Engliſh, under pretence of eſtabliſhing prince Edmund in his new kingdom.

A. D. 1255. The war was begun by the papal army with great ſucceſs; but Mainfroy, determined to riſk his crown on the event of one deciſive action, advanced againſt the Roman forces. A battle enſued; the army of Innocent was totally defeated, and he himſelf was threatened with being beſieged in his capital. His haughty ſoul could not bear this reverſe of fortune; the violence of his paſſion threw him into a fever, which, in a ſhort time, put a period to his life. He was ſucceeded in the papal chair by Alexander IV. who purſued the ſame meaſures with his predeceſſor, and undertook to place Edmund on the throne of Sicily.

The deluded Henry, in order to graſp this phantom of ſovereignty for his ſon, had complied with ſuch exorbitant demands of the pontiff, that he now found himſelf more embaraſſed than ever. The parliament refuſed to grant the neceſſary ſupplies for carrying this ridiculous project into execution; and the whole weight fell upon the clergy. This was not, however, effected, without a noble ſtruggle from the eccleſiaſtics.

ſtics. For when Ruſtan, the pope's nuncio, aſſembled the prelates, and propoſed their ſigning obligatory notes proportioned to the benefices of each individual, the biſhop of London declared, he would ſooner loſe his head than ſubmit to ſo ſhameful an act of tyranny. He was ſeconded by the biſhop of Worceſter; and the whole aſſembly unanimouſly declared, that the clergy of England would not ſubmit to be enſlaved by the pope.

The nuncio complained of this refuſal to Henry, who threatened the biſhop of London with his reſentment; but the prelate, far from being intimidated, replied, with a noble intrepidity, "That he knew "the king and the pope were his ſuperiors; but if "they deprived him of his mitre, he would ſupply "its place with a helmet."

This generous ſtand in ſupport of the liberties of the Engliſh church, exaſperated the haughty Ruſtan; who finding it would be impoſſible to prevail on them in a body, determined to wreak his vengeance on each in particular. He accordingly commenced proſecutions againſt individuals for pretended faults, and obliged them to make an atonement, by paying very conſiderable ſums. The prelates appealed to the pope; and Alexander, dreading the conſequences of driving the Engliſh clergy to deſpair, ordered his nuncio to deſiſt from his proſecutions.

A. D. 1256. During theſe diſputes between the nuncio and the clergy, Henry was determined to make another attempt to procure a ſubſidy from his barons. A parliament was called for that purpoſe; and the archbiſhop of Meſſina was ſent with letters from the pope, preſſing the nobility, in the moſt earneſt manner, to comply with the requeſt of their ſovereign. But all attempts were in vain: the parliament, after mature deliberation, unanimouſly refuſed to grant the ſubſidy.

The pope's nuncio, finding there were no hopes of procuring a ſupply from the parliament, declared, in an aſſembly of the prelates, that the demands of the pope upon Henry amounted to above 150,000 marks; and that if the clergy ſtill refuſed to comply with his requeſt, he would immediately make a demand of the whole debt, and lay the kingdom under an interdict till it was paid. Could the biſhops have depended on Henry for ſupport, they would, doutleſs, have treated this menace with the contempt it deſerved; but they knew his weakneſs, and the ſhameful conceſſions he had already made: they knew that an interdict on the kingdom would expoſe both the church and ſtate to the moſt imminent danger. Theſe conſiderations induced them to ſubmit. In the mean time the conqueſt of Sicily advanced ſo ſlowly, that Henry, finding it would be impoſſible to raiſe the ſums neceſſary to ſupply the avarice of the holy father, renounced all pretenſions to the crown of that kingdom.

A. D. 1257. In the beginning of this year, William, earl of Holland, and king of the Romans, was killed in a ſkirmiſh with the Friſons. The electors met to conſult upon a new choice, and the majority carried it for Richard earl of Cornwall, who was conſidered as the moſt wealthy prince in Europe. In conſequence of this, deputies were ſent over to England, acquainting the earl with the conſent of the majority of the electors in his favor; but that there were others of them who were for placing the crown on the head of Alphonſo, king of Caſtile. Richard, pleaſed with this proffered addition of dignity and power, reſolved to be beforehand with his competitor; and every thing being ready for his departure, a parliament was held at Weſtminſter, when he took leave of the repreſentative body of England in form, and immediately ſet out, attended by a great number of Engliſhmen of fortune and quality. Towards the end of May, Henry received advice of his having actually cruſhed the oppoſition againſt him, and that he had been crowned king of the Romans at Aix-la-Chapelle.

A. D. 1258. The parliament met this year on the ſecond Tueſday after Eaſter, when Herlot, the new nuncio, produced a bull from the pope, enjoining the biſhops to pay the tenths granted to the king by his holineſs, under pain of excommunication. The king ſeconded the demand of the nuncio, and preſſed the barons to aſſiſt him with a ſupply.

Had Henry really intended to provoke the members, he could hardly have mentioned any thing more likely to produce that effect. The intolerable acts of papal tyranny and oppreſſion, and ſuch complicated ſcenes of royal fraud and deceit, as the nation had for ſome time unhappily experienced, could not fail of rouſing the indignation of a people not wholly loſt to all ſenſe of freedom and independence. Far from granting his requeſt, they reproached him with his acts of rapine and injuſtice, and with his hatred of the Engliſh nation, from whom, they ſaid, he ought to bluſh to require any aid or ſubſidies, while he preferred ſtrangers to them, and made them groan under the moſt dreadful oppreſſions. Four of their brethren were deputed by the biſhops to make warm remonſtrances with regard to his conduct in general, and the uncanonical elections which had been made to vacant dignities in particular.

Henry acknowledged that their complaints were well founded; adding, that as each of them had attained his benefice in that irregular manner, it was proper that their dignities ſhould be vacated by reſignation, in order to have them diſpoſed of according to the methods preſcribed by the canons of the church. But the remonſtrances of the barons were not to be anſwered. They inſiſted on a ratification of the great charter; and it was in vain for the king to oppoſe the whole power of the kingdom. His brother Richard, whoſe power was very extenſive, was abſent in Germany, and the barons defied all the cenſures of the Vatican. Henry therefore ſubmitted to neceſſity, and the great charter was ratified with the moſt religious oſtentation.

Henry ſwore to obſerve every article of the charter; but he ſoon forgot the oaths he had taken; the ſame indolence, the ſame infatuation for foreigners again returned, and the articles of the great charter were forgot; they were violated whenever the intereſt of the court, or the ambition of his minions required it.

A. D. 1259. The barons, enraged at finding that neither oaths nor promiſes could bind the perfidious king, determined to have recourſe to the ſame expedient that was before uſed with his father. They formed an aſſociation; and a parliament being called at Oxford, they came to the aſſembly, attended by their military tenants, well choſen, and properly armed. Simon de Montfort, earl of Leiceſter, was at the head of this aſſociation. That nobleman, who was at once both haughty and ambitious, had been greatly careſſed by Henry, who had given him his ſiſter in marriage, and made him governor of Guienne. But the inconſtancy of the monarch, and the unbounded ambition of the earl, ſoon produced an open breach between them; and Leiceſter, who imputed his diſgrace to the inſinuations of the foreign minions, determined to take an ample revenge. He was a perfect maſter of intrigue; and his violent remonſtrances againſt the government, his apparent zeal for the liberties of the nation, and the privileges of the church, obtained him not only the friendſhip of the prelates and barons, but alſo the univerſal affection of the people.

The military appearance of the barons greatly terrified Henry, who, on his entering the aſſembly, aſked, with ſome emotion, whether he was their priſoner? the earl marſhal replied, that he was not their priſoner, but that it was the determined reſolution of the whole aſſembly to baniſh his foreign favourites from the kingdom, and redreſs the grievances of the nation. Adding, that if he would agree to theſe reaſonable demands, and give authority for that purpoſe to perſons of character and capacity, they would grant the ſupplies neceſſary for giving weight and dignity to the ſtate.

Henry perceived it would be in vain to oppoſe the power of his barons, and therefore made no objections to the propoſal; but, on the contrary, promiſed to ſubmit to any regulations they ſhould think fit to enact.

Having thus obtained the king's conſent, they conſtituted a council of twenty-four barons, whom they inveſted with an unlimited authority for reforming the ſtate; and Simon Montfort was elected preſident. Henry himſelf took a ſolemn oath to maintain the ordinances they ſhould iſſue for that ſalutary purpoſe. The plan of government had been digeſted in a previous meeting of the principal barons; ſo that a ſet of regulations ſoon appeared; and theſe, conformable to the practice of all innovations, were favourable to the people. They were in ſubſtance as follow:

1. That the king ſhould confirm the great charter, which he had ſo often ſworn to obſerve, and ſo often violated.

2. The important office of chief juſticiary ſhould be beſtowed upon a perſon of talents and integrity, who ſhould adminiſter juſtice to the poor and the rich, without favor or partiality.

3. That the chancellor, treaſurer, judges, and other public miniſters, ſhould be annually choſen by the council of twenty-four.

4. That the cuſtody of the king's caſtles ſhould be committed to the care of that council, who ſhould entruſt them to ſuch perſons as were well affected to the ſtate.

5. That any perſon, of what degree or order ſoever, who ſhould oppoſe, directly or indirectly, what ſhould be decreed by the council of twenty-four, ſhould be puniſhed with death.

6. That three ſeſſions of parliament ſhould be regularly held every year, to enact ſuch laws as ſhould from time to time be found neceſſary for the good of the people.

Theſe articles, which, from the place where they were drawn up, were called the Statutes, or Proviſions of Oxford, were approved by the parliament, and confirmed by the aſſent of the king, who ſwore to obſerve, and cauſe them to be obſerved, to the utmoſt of his power.

The earl of Leiceſter, who was a man of an aſpiring diſpoſition, now ruled the government with ſuch aſcendency, that the king perceived himſelf no more than a cypher in the adminiſtration. He expected that the parliament would grant him a large ſubſidy, purſuant to their promiſe, when he ſigned the Oxford Conſtitutions: but he was deceived; the conſideration of the ſupplies was poſtponed; and his two uterine brothers, the ſons of the earl of Marche, and the queen Iſabella, were ſtripped of their wealth, and baniſhed the kingdom, as the principal authors of the public calamities. Nor was the council ſatisfied with baniſhing theſe foreigners; even the officers of the houſhold were removed, and their places filled with perſons in the intereſt of the council. At the ſame time, they alſo obliged every individual in the kingdom to take an oath to obey them.

Underſtanding that the king of the Romans intended coming to England, and fearful that his credit might check their progreſs, they diſpatched the biſhop of Worceſter to the continent, to inform him that he would not be ſuffered to land in England, unleſs he would promiſe to take an oath to obſerve the Statutes of Oxford. At the ſame time, they required to know on what account he was coming to England, and how long he intended to ſtay.

Richard, incenſed at their inſolence, and exaſperated at the degrading treatment of his brother, ſwore he would never take the oath they wanted to impoſe upon him; and that he would viſit England when, and as often as he pleaſed, without ſubmitting to give them any reaſons for his actions. He was, however, ſoon after informed, that the barons had taken ſuch precautions, by marching troops to the ſea-coaſts, and fitting out a powerful fleet, that it would be impoſſible for him to land in England without their conſent. He therefore thought it more prudent to ſubmit to the neceſſity of the times, than engage in a fruitleſs oppoſition. He agreed to take the oath required, and the barons gave him permiſſion to come to England.

Among ſeveral innovations introduced by the council, the moſt important was the eſtabliſhment of a committee, conſiſting of twelve perſons, who during the receſs of parliament, were inveſted with its authority, and were to attend the perſon of the king in all his motions. Thus the whole conſtitution of England was overturned, and the kingdom governed by a committee of nobles.

It was not reaſonable, however, to ſuppoſe, that a government of this kind could be permanent. It was ſoon perceived, that the good of the people engaged not the attention of the council: the ſtate was oppreſſed by a confederacy of the nobles. The people were no longer deceived; they complained loudly of their tyranny; and the knights of the ſhires not only joined in the complaint, but implored the aſſiſtance of prince Edward to undertake the defence of the right of the crown, and the liberties of the people. The prince accordingly ſent a meſſage to the barons, inſiſting on their finiſhing, without delay, the reformation they had undertaken; otherwiſe he ſhould think himſelf obliged to exert all his power to procure redreſs for an injured people.

This ſpirited remonſtrance alarmed the barons, and a new code of laws was publiſhed: but it ſoon appeared that the whole was nothing more than the common laws of England, with ſome trifling alterations. So glaring an impoſition exaſperated the people; and the animoſities which now broke out between the barons themſelves, gave them hopes that their tyranny would ſoon have an end. The earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, the two moſt powerful barons in the whole confederacy, became profeſſed enemies to each other. Theſe diviſions greatly weakened the ſtrength of the barons; and Leiceſter retired into France, under pretence of abandoning intirely the adminiſtration.

Leiceſter, however, had very different views; he hoped, by his retreat, to increaſe the power of his party, by gaining the French monarch over to his intereſt. But fortunately for England, the throne of France was filled by a prince who delighted not in the diſtreſs of other nations. He was deſirous of healing, not of increaſing, the wounds which the Engliſh conſtitution had lately received. Lewis IX. generally called St. Lewis, was endued with all the piety of an anchorite, as well as the virtues of a king. His liberality was not in the leaſt inconſiſtent with the wiſeſt œconomy. He knew how to reconcile a profound policy with an exact juſtice. He was prude and firm in council, intrepid but cool in war, and a compaſſionate as if he had always been unhapp From a prince of this character England had nothi to fear; he deſired not to uſurp the territories of h neighbours, and was ſo far from taking advantage of the troubles of England, that he laboured to eſtabliſh peace and harmony among the contending parties, whoſe diviſions threatened the kingdom with deſtruction. He even entertained a doubt with regard to the juſtice of the ſentence paſſed againſt John in the court of peers in France; and had formed a deſign of reſtoring to Henry all the provinces that had been wreſted from his father. The tranquillity of his own country at laſt diverted him from this reſolution; but he made a treaty with Henry which abundantly proved, that a love of juſtice, rather than power, was the ruling paſſion of his ſoul.

A. D. 1261. Henry, careleſs and indolent as he was, could not but regret, and at the ſame time heartily wiſh to reſent, the inſults he daily received from the council of the barons, who had now been three years abſolute maſters of the kingdom, under pretence of reforming the ſtate. The quarrel between the earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter gave him hopes that his misfortunes were drawing to a cloſe; and perceiving that the diſpoſitions of the people had taken a turn in his favor, he determined to make one ſtruggle for recovering his authority.

In order to this, he applied to the pope to abſolve him from the oath he had taken with regard to the Oxford proviſions; when the pontiff, who was highly exaſperated at the barons for having ſtopped the revenues of foreign beneficed prieſts, readily granted the deſired diſpenſation.

Henry, having ſurmounted this difficulty, now determined to declare publicly the reſolutions he had formed; and having aſſembled a parliament at London, he told them, "That as they had not on their parts performed their promiſe with regard to paying his debts, and augmenting his revenues, when he ſigned the proviſions of Oxford, he did not think himſelf obliged to keep the oath he had taken on that occaſion; that he was determined no longer to remain in the hands of a faction who had treated him more like a ſlave than their king, but would immediately free himſelf from ſuch inglorious fetters, and aſſert the dignity of his own prerogative."

The aſſembly were aſtoniſhed at this unexpected declaration; and the king, without giving them time to reply, retired immediately to the tower; ſeized all the money in the mint; publiſhed a proclamation for removing the ſheriffs and other officers appointed by the council of twenty-four; and acted with ſuch vigor as ſeemed to be the effect of a fixed reſolution to ſupport his own independence. He informed his ſubjects that he had reſumed the reins of government, and that he would inviolably obſerve the two charters, notwithſtanding any falſe reports to the contrary; he nominated a chancellor, chief juſticiary, and officers of his houſhold, in the room of thoſe who had been appointed by the council.

In ſhort, Henry found means to repel the attempts of the barons, and obliged them to promiſe obedience for the future. But the gaining any advantage, or even the total defeat of an army, was of very little conſequence in theſe times of national debility and diviſion. New forces ſuddenly ſprung up, and ſuddenly diſperſed; to-day one leader remained maſter of the field, and to-morrow was obliged to take refuge in ſome place of ſafety. Henry was again defeated, and again obliged to confirm the ſtatutes of Oxford.

A. D. 1264. The young prince Edward, who had itherto ſcrupled to break the oath he had taken to ubmit to the council, perceiving that the barons, ith Leiceſter at their head, were determined to ender their tyranny perpetual, undertook the defence f his country. He was ſoon at the head of a powerful rmy, and was alſo joined by ſeveral of the barons, ho thought they could not, as true Engliſhmen, ontinue any longer with Leiceſter and his party.

The two armies were in ſight of each other, and a deciſive battle was every moment expected, when ſeveral of the moſt prudent perſons interpoſed their good offices to prevent the effuſion of blood. But it ſoon appeared that the claims of the contending parties were not to be adjuſted, and it was agreed to refer the deciſion to St. Lewis, in whoſe wiſdom and equity both parties placed an equal confidence.

Lewis accepted the office of arbitrator, and having heard, with the utmoſt attention, the whole cauſe fairly debated, together with the allegations of both parties in an aſſembly of the ſtates at Amiens, he delivered the following award:

"That the ſtatutes of Oxford, with all the proceedings that followed in conſequence of thoſe acts, ſhould be annulled: that the king ſhould enjoy all the rights and prerogatives, which were inveſted in the crown, before thoſe ſtatutes were enacted: that all the caſtles which the king had ceded to the barons as a ſecurity for the performance of his promiſe, ſhould be reſtored; and that he ſhould enjoy the privilege of appointing his great officers of ſtate and government, equally from foreigners or natives." But, at the ſame time, he declared that his award was not meant to derogate from the privileges and liberties of the Engliſh, nor from the charters which had been granted them by king John.

This ſentence was ſo contrary to what the barons expected, that they were highly exaſperated. They aſſerted, that the ſaving clauſe was utterly contradictory to the other part of the ſentence; becauſe the latter ratified Magna Charta, and the former condemned the ſtatutes of Oxford, which were calculated to ſupport that charter.

The negotiation was therefore entirely broke off, and each party prepared to decide the conteſt by the ſword. The royal army headed by the king in perſon, the king of the Romans, and prince Edward, encamped at Lewes in Suſſex. Leiceſter, being reinforced by a body of fifteen thouſand Londoners, marched immediately to Lewes, reſolving to hazard a deciſive engagement. The battle was begun by prince Edward, who charged the van of the rebel army with ſuch impetuoſity, that the troops gave way, and a dreadful carnage enſued. He then fell upon the Londoners, routed them with great ſlaughter, and purſued them near four miles with the utmoſt fury. This conduct of the prince loſt the battle. Had he, inſtead of purſuing a body of unexperienced troops, fallen, in conjunction with the reſt of the royal army, upon the remaining forces of the enemy, a complete victory muſt have been obtained. But the abſence of the prince afforded Leiceſter an opportunity of changing the fortune of the day. He attacked the ſecond body of the king's forces, cut the greateſt part of them in pieces, and took the king of the Romans priſoner. The third body, commanded by Henry in perſon, made ſo noble a ſtand, that it was not broke till the evening; but the king's horſe being killed under him, and he himſelf ſlightly wounded, he retired, with part of his followers, to the priory of Lewes.

Prince Edward, returning from the purſuit of the Londoners, was ſurprized to ſee the field of battle covered with dead bodies; and ſeveral of his principal followers were ſo intimidated at the fatal event, that they fled with ſeven hundred of their beſt troops to Pevenſey, and paſſed over to France. The prince himſelf, who was a ſtranger to fear, thought only of retrieving the misfortune. He immediately attacked the barons; but night prevented a general engagement. Uncertain of the conſequence, and ſolicitous for the fate of his father, the prince went round the town and caſtle in ſearch of him; but without effect. At laſt he found him at the priory, which was now attacked by the rebels; but the royal party made ſo noble a defence, that the enemy were obliged to abandon the enterprize. The gallant prince Edward now exerted all his abilities to rally and collect his ſcattered forces; and having ſtill the advantage of ſome excellent officers about his perſon, he determined to try the fortune of another battle. Leiceſter had loſt near half his army. The Londoners had been ſo totally broken, that they made no attempt to rejoin his army. He was therefore deſirous of avoiding a freſh engagement with a body of reſolute troops, more experienced than his own. He knew that a defeat muſt be fatal, and that he could expect no mercy if he fell into the hands of the enraged monarch. Under pretence, therefore, of preventing the farther effuſion of human blood, he ſent mediators next morning to the prince, to propoſe a ceſſation of arms, in order to terminate this deſtructive war by an equitable peace; offering to ſubmit his demands to ſuch arbitrators as the king ſhould approve; but, at the ſame time, inſiſted, that prince Edward, and young Henry, ſon to the king of the Romans, ſhould be delivered as hoſtages for the king's performance of the conditions. This demand was abſolutely rejected by the king as inſolent and unreaſonable; it concealed, under the maſk of a deſire of peace, a treacherous deſign of making himſelf abſolute maſter of the kingdom.

Leiceſter, fearful of another engagement, had recourſe to menaces; he threatened to ſtrike off the head of the king of the Romans, together with thoſe of all the priſoners of note in his hands, if the prince made any attack upon his army.

The earl's character was too well known, to doubt of his carrying this threat into execution. The prince feared the conſequence; and before he could determine in what manner to act, Leiceſter had rallied his forces. There was now a neceſſity for coming to an accommodation, which was dictated by Leiceſter, on the following conditions:

“That prince Edward, and Henry, ſon to the king of the Romans, ſhould ſurrender themſelves priſoners, as pledges in the place of the two kings: that all other priſoners on both ſides ſhould be releaſed; and that, in order to ſettle fully the terms of agreement, application ſhould be made to the king of France, that he ſhould name ſix Frenchmen, three prelates and three barons. Theſe ſix to chuſe two others of their own countrymen; and theſe two to chuſe one Engliſhman, who, in conjunction with themſelves, were to be inveſted by both parties with full powers to make what regulations they thought proper for the ſettlement of the kingdom.”

Theſe conditions were termed the Miſe (that is, the agreement or convention) of Lewis, and were confirmed by the ſeals of the king, the prince, and all the chiefs of both parties. The king immediately ſent orders for the priſoners taken by his forces to be ſet at liberty. But Leiceſter never intended to perform his part of the agreement: for after ſending the prince and young Henry to Dover-caſtle, he refuſed to ſet his priſoners at liberty; and both the king and his brother were retained in cuſtody.

Leiceſter, inſtead of ſending ambaſſadors to Lewis, took the whole power into his own hands. He diſpoſed of offices, without even conſulting the king; and had recourſe to every method he could project to raiſe money for ſtrengthening his party. He projected a new form of government, by which he might become in reality the ſole maſter of the kingdom. He ſummoned a parliament of his own partizans, in order to rivet the chains of ſlavery he had impoſed upon the nation. In this aſſembly it was enacted, that every act of royal power ſhould be exerciſed by nine perſons, who were to be choſen and removed by the authority of three others; namely, Leiceſter himſelf, the earl of Glouceſter and the biſhop of Chicheſter. By this intricate plan of government the ſcepter was, in reality, put into Leiceſter's hands, as he had the intire direction of the biſhop of Chicheſter, and conſequently commanded all the reſolutions of the council of three, who could appoint, or diſcard at pleaſure, every member of the ſupreme council.

It is little to be wondered at that this ſtrange mode of government ſhould be but of ſhort continuance; the leaſt incident was ſufficient to ſhake its very foundation. Qeen Eleanor, who had for ſome time reſided in France, left no means untried to ſtir up every court to aſſiſt her in revenging the injuries offered to royalty. She raiſed a conſiderable army, and fitted out a fleet, for releaſing her ſon and huſband; and Lewis himſelf, who beheld with deteſtation the perfidy of Leiceſter, favoured her enterprize.

As ſoon as the ambitious earl was apprized of theſe proceedings, he was greatly alarmed, and immediately diſpatched a number of troops to guard the coaſt; but little could be expected from men who were exaſperated at his behaviour; and Leiceſter owed his ſecurity more to unfavourable winds, which rendered the attempt abortive, than to any defence that could have been made againſt the French had they landed in England.

The Roman pontiff being highly exaſperated at the behaviour of the barons, diſpatched cardinal Guido, as legate, to excommunicate the earls of Leiceſter, Glouceſter, and Norfolk, by name, and all others in general who joined in the oppreſſion and captivity of their ſovereign. But Leiceſter took an effectual method to prevent the conſequences of the papal cenſures: he threatened the legate with immediate death the moment he landed in the kingdom; in conſequence of which Guido was ſo greatly intimidated, that he returned back to Rome, and the ſentence was never pronounced.

A. D. 1265. The attention of the barons began now to be rouſed at the ambitious projects of the earl of Leiceſter: even Glouceſter himſelf was alarmed, and remonſtrated ſharply with him on his behaviour. The nobles, ſtill in the intereſt of Henry, retired into the marches of Wales, and received protection from the earl of Glouceſter. The people complained loudly of the ſhameful breach of the convention made at Lewes; and demanded that prince Edward, and the other priſoners, ſhould be ſet at liberty, conformable to the articles of that treaty.

Leiceſter perceived that it would be impoſſible to divert the gathering ſtorm, without having recourſe to ſome artifice to deceive the Engliſh. He ordered a parliament to meet at London, but fixed that aſſembly on a more republican baſis than any that had ever been ſummoned ſince the foundation of the Engliſh monarchy. Beſides many barons and eccleſiaſtics, who were not immediate tenants of the crown, he ordered the ſheriffs to return two knights from every ſhire, and the ſame number of deputies from every borough. The meeting of this parliament, which happened on the twentieth of January, is generally eſteemed the epoch of the Houſe of Commons in England; and that, indeed, with great reaſon; for it is certain that this is the firſt time repreſentatives were ſent by the boroughs to parliament.

The active and intrepid prince Edward, who had languiſhed in priſon ever ſince the fatal battle of Lewes, was, by this parliament, declared free and at full liberty, after ſtipulating to deliver up all the caſtles poſſeſſed by the barons in the intereſt of the royal party; and neither to depart the kingdom during three years, nor introduce any foreign troops.

But Leiceſter never intended to ſet the prince at liberty; he was ſtrictly guarded by the emiſſaries of that nobleman, and continued only a priſoner at large, large. The barons now ſaw that there were no hopes of reſtoring tranquillity to the nation; the tyranny of Leiceſter was more dreaded than that of Henry.

The earl of Glouceſter perceived his own danger; for every thing that oppoſed the deſpotiſm of Montfort was ſacrificed at the altar of his ambition. He therefore retired for ſafety to his eſtates on the borders of Wales; and Leiceſter followed him to Hereford at the head of an army, carrying with him both the king and the prince. Glouceſter found means to open a negotiation with young Edward, and a plan was formed for the prince's eſcape. A horſe of extraordinary ſwiftneſs was procured by Glouceſter, and conveyed to Edward by means of a truſty ſervant, and Edward Mortimer, at the head of a ſmall party, waited in a wood not far from Leiceſter's camp, in order to receive the prince, and convey him to a place of ſafety. Every thing being thus prepared, the prince pretending to take the air with ſome of Leiceſter's retinue, made matches between their horſes, and rode ſeveral of them himſelf. When by this ſtratagem he had ſufficiently tired and blown their horſes, he mounted the ſtead ſent him by Glouceſter, and calling to his attendants, bade them adieu, and effected his eſcape.

The people were highly elated at the eſcape of the prince; they flocked to his ſtandard from all parts of the country, ſo that Edward ſoon found himſelf at the head of a powerful army. He immediately took the field, and in order to prevent Leiceſter from retreating back to the capital, broke down all the bridges upon the Severn. Leiceſter ſaw his danger, and diſpatched an expreſs to his ſon to haſten from London with an army to his relief. But Edward was too vigilant, and too well informed of young Leiceſter's motions, to ſuffer him to join his father. As ſoon as he heard that he was advanced to Kenilworth, Edward marched to meet him, ſurpriſed him in his camp, and totally diſperſed his army. The abſence of the prince furniſhed Leiceſter with an opportunity of croſſing the Severn in boats; and being entirely ignorant of his ſon's misfortune, advanced to Eveſham, expecting every hour to be joined by the forces from London.

Prince Edward, being informed of Leiceſter's ſituation, divided his army into three bodies, one of which advanced along the road to Kenilworth, carrying before them the banners which had been taken from young Leiceſter's army; while he himſelf, at the head of the ſecond diviſion, made a circuit, in order to attack the earl's army in another quarter. This ſtratagem for ſome time deceived Leiceſter; he took the firſt diviſion for his friends; but perceiving his miſtake, and obſerving the excellent diſpoſition of Edward's troops, he exclaimed, "They have learned from me their military order! The Lord have mercy upon our ſouls, for I ſee our bodies are the prince's." The greater part of the army of Leiceſter made but a feeble reſiſtance; the Welſh, who formed the van, unable to ſupport the furious attack of Edward, fled with the utmoſt precipitation, while Glouceſter, at the head of another diviſion, charged the main body with equal fury. Leiceſter, however, maintained the battle with amazing intrepidity, till his horſe being killed under him, he demanded quarter, which was refuſed, and he fell among the ſlain, together with his ſon Henry. His troops, deprived of their two principal leaders, threw down their arms, and begged for quarter.

Thus fell Simon Montfort, earl of Leiceſter, a bold, reſolute, and enterprizing genius, ſuperior to moſt men of the age in the art of war; inſinuating, artful and perſuaſive. His talents enabled him to form and improve the meaſures moſt ſuitable to his purpoſe, and his intrepid heart ſupplied him with vigor to carry them into execution; ſo that with theſe advantages, no man was ſo well qualified as himſelf to lead a party, or ſubvert the conſtitution of a ſtate.

The battle of Eveſham entirely changed the face of affairs. The king of the Romans, his ſon and all the barons of the royal party were immediately ſet at liberty. Edward eaſily ſubdued the remains of the rebel party; and the far greater part of the caſtles garriſoned by the rebels delayed not to make their ſubmiſſion, and open their gates to the king.

Adam Gourdon, a courageous baron, maintained himſelf for ſome time in the foreſt of Hampſhire, and committed depredations in the neighbourhood. Edward led a body of forces againſt him, and attacked the camp of the rebels with the utmoſt fury. The two valiant leaders met, and a ſingle combat enſued between them. The victory was long doubtful; but at laſt ended in favour of Edward. Gourdon was wounded, thrown from his horſe and taken priſoner. But Edward knew how to eſtimate valor, even in an enemy. He procured his pardon, granted him his friendſhip, and Gourdon ſerved him faithfully till his death.

A more diſtinguiſhed moderation was perhaps never ſhewn upon a ſimilar occaſion. No ſacrifices of national liberty were made; the great charter continued inviolate. No blood was ſhed upon the ſcaffold; thoſe who had borne arms againſt the king were puniſhed only by pecuniary compoſitions, and even theſe were exacted with great moderation. The city of London had merited the moſt rigorous chaſtiſement, but this was greatly mitigated; its privileges were indeed taken away, but they were ſoon after reſtored.

A. D. 1268. Tranquillity being now in ſome meaſure reſtored to the kingdom, Henry ſummoned a parliament, at which the pope's legate aſſiſted, who informed the aſſembly that the pontiff had reſolved to publiſh a cruſade in every ſtate that profeſſed the Chriſtian religion; exhorting the Engliſh to ſupport an enterprize calculated to promote the glory of the church. The Engliſh had not yet learned wiſdom from paſt misfortunes; enthuſiaſm prevailed, and the recovery of the Holy Land was conſidered as more meritorious than the ſtricteſt exerciſe of all the Chriſtian virtues. Prince Edward, his brother Edmund, and their couſin Henry received the croſs from the hands of the legate; and their example was followed by the earls of Glouceſter, Warrenne, and Pembroke, one hundred and twenty knights, and great numbers of inferior orders.

A. D. 1269. A parliament was held this year at London, in which the conduct of the Jews came under conſideration. Theſe people had, during the laſt commotions, found means to become poſſeſſed of very conſiderable landed intereſt, by getting lands from many of the king's ſubjects for loans of money, for the payment of which they had certain annuities or fees upon the eſtates of the debtors. It was therefore now provided, that no Jew ſhould enjoy a freehold in any manor, land, or eſtate, by charter, gift, obligation, or otherwiſe. This was a great relief to the ſubject, and, no doubt, materially contributed towards enabling the nation to pay its ſubſidies.

Henry's thoughts had been for ſome time engaged in the deſign of celebrating the feaſt of Edward the Confeſſor, his tutelary ſaint, in the moſt magnificent manner, and tranſlating that ſaint's relics into a rich ſhrine of very curious workmanſhip. The ceremony was performed with great pomp and ſolemnity, Henry, and his brother the king of the Romans, bearing the relics on their ſhoulders, in preſence of all the prelates and nobility of the realm.

A. D. 1270. The nation now enjoying a profound tranquillity, prince Edward prepared for embarking for the continent; and a parliament being called at Wincheſter, the aſſembly took leave of him in the name of the whole kingdom. At the ſame time the king, whoſe preſence was judged neceſſary in his own dominions, delivered his croſs to prince Edward, and aſſigned to him the whole produce of the ſubſidy that had been granted him for the expedition.

Lewis of France, who had alſo engaged in the cruſade, ſailed ſome time before the Engliſh forces were ready, and landed near the ruins of Carthage, in order to reduce the city of Tunis. Edward reached his camp, but had the misfortune to find that great prince already dead from the intemperance of the climate, and the great fatigues he had undergone.

The devotion of Lewis was deſtructive to France; and is a proof that the exceſs of a good quality may be criminal. He was ſucceeded in the throne by Philip, ſurnamed the Hardy, a prince of conſiderable merit, but much inferior to that of his father.

The death of Lewis was not, however, ſufficient to intimidate Edward. He continued his courſe to Paleſtine, where he ſignalized himſelf by the moſt aſtoniſhing acts of valour. He revived the glory of the Engliſh name in thoſe parts, and ſtruck the Saracens with ſuch terror, that they had recourſe to the infamous method of aſſaſſination. The villain employed to execute this inhuman deſign, was admitted ſeveral times into the prince's preſence, under pretence of negotiating a treaty between Edward and the governor of Joppa. One day, finding the prince alone, ſitting on a couch undreſſed, he approached him, and offering him ſome letters, took the opportunity of drawing a concealed dagger, and endeavoured to ſheathe it in the prince's breaſt; but Edward fortunately warded off the blow. He received indeed a conſiderable wound in the arm, but that misfortune did not prevent him from ſeizing the villain, and having wreſted the dagger from his hand he plunged it into his heart.

This affair cauſed an univerſal conſternation among the prince's followers, which was not a little increaſed by the report of the ſurgeon, who declared the wound to have been made with a poiſoned inſtrument, and that there were ſymptoms of much danger. Edward himſelf received this notice like a ſoldier and a man: he made his will, and expected his fate with perfect compoſure; but happily the great ſkill of the ſurgeon, who was an Engliſhman, effected a cure in little more than a fortnight.

With reſpect to the recovery of Edward, moſt hiſtorians pay a compliment to the female ſex, at the expence of truth, by extolling the unexampled conjugal affection of Edward's princeſs Eleanor, who cured her ſick conſort by ſucking the venom from his wound: but hiſtorical truth obliges us to refute this pretty tale, as having no foundation but in the imagination of thoſe who delight in the marvellous: though, at the ſame time, we muſt ſo far ſatisfy the ladies as to aſſure them that Eleanor was ſo excellent a wife, that, had ſhe believed this dangerous expedient to be the only poſſible means of preſerving her huſband's life, ſhe would probably have tried it.

When Edward was perfectly recovered, he found that his ſoldiers were ſo greatly intimidated by this attempt, that it would be in vain for him to think of proceeding. He had done enough for juſtice; enough for glory. The ſultan of Babylon ſent ambaſſadors, ſolemnly diſclaiming all knowledge of the baſe aſſaſſination; and Edward ſeemed to give credit to the aſſeveration; but was far from being ſatisfied that their maſter was not privy to the attempt. In the mean time the princeſs Eleanor was delivered of a daughter, who, from the place of her nativity, had afterwards the name of Joan of Acre.

A. D. 1271. Prince Edward's abſence from England was attended with many of thoſe pernicious conſequences which had been dreaded from the time of his departure. The laws were not executed; the barons oppreſſed the common people with impunity: they gave ſhelter on their eſtates to bands of robbers, whom they employed to commit ravages on the eſtates of their neighbours. The populace of London returned to their uſual licentiouſneſs; and the king, who was now grown old and infirm, called aloud for his ſon to return, and aſſiſt him in ſwaying that ſceptre which was ready to fall from his feeble and uncertain hand.

A. D. 1272. This year Henry received advice of the death of his brother Richard, king of the Romans, who expired at Berkhamſtead on the 2d of April. His body was depoſited in his own abbey at Hayles, and his heart in the priory of Rowley, founded by him in the ſuburbs of Oxford, for the Ciſtercian monks. He was ſucceded, as earl of Cornwall, by his ſon Edmund, who married Margaret, ſiſter to the earl of Glouceſter.

Among the various inſurrections that happened about this time, one of the moſt remarkable was at Norwich, occaſioned by a quarrel between the citizens and the monks, in which the cathedral and monaſtery adjoining were reduced to aſhes. Henry was determined to puniſh the authors of theſe commotions, and for that purpoſe ſummoned a great council at Northampton, whither he went himſelf, though at that time very weak in health. Here the citizens of Norwich were fined 3000 marks, and ſeveral of the moſt active in the riot were ſentenced to be hanged, and their bodies burnt.

Henry went to Norwich to ſee juſtice done on the rioters: here he ſtaid twelve days, and then came to St. Edmundſbury in his way to London, where he was ſeized with a malady that ſoon put an end to his life. His diſtemper increaſing daily, he ordered himſelf to be removed by eaſy journies to Weſtminſter; when, finding his end approaching with haſty ſtrides, he ſent for the earl of Glouceſter, and exacted from him an oath, that he would preſerve the peace of the kingdom, and, to the utmoſt of his power, maintain the intereſt of his ſon Edward. He then ſent for the chief nobility, took a ſolemn farewell of them, and expired in the evening of the 17th of November, in the 65th year of his age, and the 57th of his reign. His body, dreſſed in royal robes, was, on the 24th, carried by the chief nobility to the abbey church of Weſtminſter, and interred, according to his own directions, near the ſhrine of Edward the Confeſſor, where his tomb, with his ſtatue in braſs, is ſtill to be ſeen.

The character of this prince is ſo marked by the principal actions of his life as to leave the hiſtorian but few particulars to relate concerning him. His genius was narrow, his temper capricious, his principles arbitrary, and his meaſures oppreſſive; which, together with his attachment to foreigners, were the real cauſes of the troubles that diſturbed his reign, and proved deſtructive to the tranquillity of his ſubjects. He evinced two principles that are undeniable demonſtrations of meanneſs of ſoul; the former was a moſt preſumptive arrogance in proſperity, and the latter a moſt abject deſpondence in adverſity. But with all theſe vices and foibles, he had ſome virtues; he was noted for his piety and devotion, and his regular attendance on public worſhip. He was alſo an affectionate huſband, and an indulgent parent.

Henry left iſſue two ſons, namely, Edward, who ſucceeded him, and Edmund earl of Lancaſter. He had alſo two daughters, Margaret queen of Scotland, and Beatrix, ducheſs of Britany. Beſides theſe he had five other children, all of whom died in their infancy.

The remarkable occurrences that happened in this king's reign were as follow :

In the ſixth year of his reign there was a dreadful tempeſt of thunder, lightning and rain, in February, which threw down ſeveral churches, and rooted up many trees. This was followed by extraordinary rains, and theſe by a dearth, another violent tempeſt, an earthquake, a prodigious ſtorm of wind, inundations, and a comet.

In his ſeventeenth, it thundered for fifteen days together. The next year began with terrible tempeſts of thunder, rain, and floods, which ſpoilt the fruits of the earth.

In April, 1233, there appeared four falſe ſuns in Worceſterſhire and Herefordſhire. The true ſun was of a red colour, with a great circle of a chryſtalline colour, whoſe circuit ſeemed as large as the kingdom of England : from its ſides went forth certain half circles, in whoſe ſections the four falſe ſuns appeared. The true one was in the eaſt, it being about ſeven in the morning, the air clear, and the ſky ſerene. The biſhop of Hereford and Sir John Monmouth ſaw and witneſſed to this wonder. Near the ſea-ſide, the figures of two huge dragons were ſeen fighting in the air : after a long diſpute, the one vanquiſhed the other, and drove him into the ſea ; and the conqueror following him, they were both no more ſeen. The ſame year there was a dearth, which was preceded by an earthquake.

On the 6th of June, 1239, the twenty-third year of this king's reign, prince Edward, his eldeſt ſon, was born. Before his birth-day there appeared a new ſtar in the heavens for ſeveral days together ; it was carried with a ſwift courſe through a long circuit of air ; it ſeemed ſometimes to bear fire along with it, and ſometimes to leave ſmoke behind it. In the next, there was a great battle of fiſh at ſea; the conſequence of which was, that eleven whales were caſt on the ſhore, and appeared to be dead of ſome wounds they had received. Not long after, a great ſound was heard at one time in all parts of England, as if it had been the noiſe of mountains falling into the ſea.

In the twenty-ſixth year, the ſun was eclipſed in a terrible manner; and two years afterwards, ſo many ſtars ſeemed to fall in one night as if there would have been none left in the ſky.

In his thirty-ſecond year, a dreadful earthquake happened on the 14th of February ; and the ſea, for a long tract near the coaſt of England, ceaſed to ebb and flow near three months together. The next year, the town of Newcaſtle was deſtroyed by fire, and an earthquake threw down ſeveral ſteeples and houſes in Somerſetſhire.

On the 1ſt of October, in his thirty-fourth year, the moon appeared red and bloated, which was the preſage of a ſtorm of wind, ſo violent, that the ſea flowed twice without ebbing, and in the night ſeemed to burn. Soon after, an earthquake was felt at St. Alban's.

In the following year, the chimney of the chamber where the queen and her children lay, was blown down by a terrible ſtorm, and her whole apartment at Windſor ſhaken and torn ; oaks in the park were rent aſunder, and turned up by the roots; and all was accompanied with ſuch thunders and lightnings as had not been heard or ſeen in the memory of man.

In May, the new moon appeared three days before her time ; and the ſun, moon, and ſtars, for fifteen days ſucceſſively, ſeemed of a red colour. A dearth and a murrain among cattle followed this prodigy.

In his thirty-eighth, the new moon in February was ſeen four days before the courſe of her time.

In his thirty-ninth year, the figure of a ſhip was ſeen in the air at St. Alban's; and in his fortieth, a comet.

In his fifty-ſecond year, the two companies of goldſmiths and taylors of London fought, and ſeveral were killed on both ſides. The ſheriffs appeaſed the tumult, and thirteen of the moſt mutinous of them were hanged : as were thirty citizens of Norwich, in the laſt year of his reign, for quarrelling and fighting with the monks of that city.

Hollingſhed has many more miracles, prodigies, and extraordinary ſights in his hiſtory of king Henry III ; but we have reported enough to let the reader ſee that the ſeaſons were as much diſtracted as the times, and that nature ſeemed to be diſturbed in all her productions during the reign of this weak prince, who had, however, many brave ſubjects, and governed a people that ſhewed they might have been great and happy, had their prince known how to have made them ſo.

The moſt remarkable learned men that lived in England from the acceſſion of Henry II. to the death of Henry III. were as follow :

The firſt of theſe is Roger Hoveden, who was chaplain to Henry II. He wrote a book of Annals that begin with the year 732, and are carried down as low as the reign of king John. This work is written in a very pleaſing ſtyle, and contains many valuable materials for the civil as well as eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of the times he has treated of.

Ralph de Diceto lived in the reign of king John, and wrote a chronicle of the Britiſh kings, from Brute to Cadwalladar, and from Hengiſt to Harold.

John Wallingford, ſuppoſed to have been abbot of St. Alban's, wrote a ſhort chronicle of the progreſs of the Saxons and Danes in England. This work is ſtill preſerved in the Cottonian Library, though wretchedly mutilated and defaced.

Gervaſe, a monk of Canterbury, who alſo lived in the reign of king John, is ſaid to have been profoundly learned in matters of antiquity, particularly the Britiſh and Saxons. He compiled a large Hiſtory of the Britons, Saxons and Normans, from their origin to the reign of king John. The greateſt part of this work is loſt, but the remains, which contain the reigns of Henry II. and Richard I. ſufficiently evince the whole to have been a very valuable performance.

Groteſt was an able divine and a great ſcholar, and particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a vigorous oppoſition to the extenſion of the papal authority in the reign of Henry III. His principal performance was a tranſlation from the Greek into Latin of the Teſtament of the twelve patriarchs. He was born at Stodbroke in Suffolk, and died on the 8th of October, 1253.

Richard Poor, at firſt biſhop of Saliſbury, and from thence tranſlated to the ſee of Durham, is remarkable upon two accounts : his perſuading the inhabitants of Sarum to remove to a more advantageous ſituation, where Saliſbury now ſtands, and where he founded that noble cathedral which remains to this day: and for his Synodical Conſtitutions, which he enacted for the uſe of the church of Saliſbury.

Alexander Hales, born in Glouceſterſhire, a great canoniſt, was profeſſor of divinity in the univerſity of Paris. He compoſed Annotations on the Bible, and ſeveral tracts in logic and metaphyſics.

Sewald, archbiſhop of York, was an able divine, and remarkable for the purity of his life. He was ſo incenſed at the impudent exactions of the court of Rome, that he could not forbear writing a letter of complaint to the pope, in which he deſires his holineſs to remember, that " when Chriſt gave the charge of his flock to Peter, it was that he might feed them, and not fleece or flay them."

BOOK VII.

From the Acceſſion of Edward I. to the Death of Richard II.

SECTION I.

EDWARD I. SURNAMED LONG-SHANKS.[*]

ON the death of Henry III. his ſon Edward ſucceeded to the crown of England; and notwithſtanding he was at this time on the continent, yet not the leaſt oppoſition was made againſt him, but, on the contrary, all ranks and orders of people in the kingdom teſtified their earneſt deſires of ſeeing him placed on the throne of his anceſtors. He was accordingly proclaimed king, by the council of ſtate, immediately after the deceaſe of his father; and all the eſtates of the kingdom ſwore fealty to his perſon and government.

Edward had reached Sicily in his return from the Holy Land, when he received the news of the death of his father; and about the ſame time advice was brought him of the loſs of his ſon, who died at Acre in Paleſtine. He appeared more ſenſibly affected with the news of the former than that of the latter; and the king of Sicily expreſſing a ſurprize at ſo ſingular a circumſtance, Edward replied, "That the death of a ſon was a loſs he might hope to repair; but the death of a father was a loſs abſolutely irreparable."

A. D. 1273. Edward, after having paid the neceſſary tribute of reſpect to the death of his father, made preparations for proceeding on his journey to England. Before, however, he had left Sicily, he received advice of the quiet ſettlement of his kingdom, in conſequence of which he was not in ſuch haſte to take poſſeſſion of the throne; and therefore determined to ſettle all affairs in the beſt manner he could before he left the continent.

In paſſing through France he was invited by the prince of Chalons in Burgundy to a tournament he was preparing to celebrate. Edward had particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf in theſe dangerous and martial exerciſes, and was too ambitious of glory to loſe ſo favourable an opportunity of ſignalizing his courage and addreſs in arms. He therefore accepted the invitation, but the glory he acquired excited envy, and produced conſequences of a very ſerious nature. Edward and his retinue were ſo ſucceſsful, that the French knights finding themſelves foiled in every attempt, made a violent and envious attack upon them; but they were repulſed, and many lives were loſt. So that what was at firſt intended as amuſement, became at laſt a matter of the moſt ſerious conſequence.

From Chalons Edward repaired to Paris, in order to do homage to Philip for the dominions he held in France, and was received by that monarch with every poſſible mark of politeneſs and reſpect. He afterwards repaired to Guienne, and put an end to the troubles of that province.

A. D. 1274. Edward, having now ſettled his affairs on the continent, embarked at Boulogne for England, and arrived at Dover on the ſecond of Auguſt. He was received by his ſubjects with all poſſible demonſtrations of affection and reſpect; and on the nineteenth of the ſame month was crowned at Weſtminſter, with Eleanor his queen, by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the preſence of Alexander III. king of Scotland, the duke of Britany, and all the principal nobility of the kingdom.

The ceremony of the coronation was no ſooner over, than Edward applied himſelf to the correcting of thoſe diſorders, which the civil commotions and the weak adminiſtration of his father, had introduced into every part of government. He made the great charter the rule of his conduct; and obliged the barons to obſerve it with regard to their vaſſals. The licentiouſneſs of the nobles had long been the ſource of various calamities, both with reſpect to the crown and people. He therefore took care to curtail their power, and, without invading their real privileges, rendered them obedient to the laws of their country.

A. D. 1275. Edward ſummoned a parliament to be held at Weſtminſter, when ſeveral excellent ſtatutes were enacted; beſides which he took care to inſpect the conduct of his magiſtrates and judges; to diſplace ſuch as were either negligent or corrupt; to provide them with ſufficient force for the execution of juſtice; to root out all bands and confederacies of robbers; and to repreſs thoſe more ſilent robberies, which were committed, either by the power of the nobles, or under the countenance of public authority. By this rigid adminiſtration the face of the kingdom was greatly changed, and Edward's ſubjects flattered themſelves with poſſeſſing that happineſs, which had been denied them in the reign of his predeceſſor.

But amidſt the excellent inſtitutions, and public ſpirited plans of Edward, a circumſtance happened this year, that ſhewed the natural ſeverity of his diſpoſition, and, at the ſame time alſo diſplayed the common prejudices of the times. Among the various diſorders to which the kingdom had been a long time ſubject, no one was more univerſally complained of than the adulteration of the coin; and, as this crime required more art than the Engliſh of that age, who chiefly employed force and violence in their iniquity, were poſſeſſed of, the imputation chiefly fell upon the Jews. Edward alſo appears to have indulged a ſtrong prepoſſeſſion againſt thoſe people, and, with an ill-judged zeal for chriſtianity, (naturally augmented by an expedition to the Holy Land) he let looſe the whole rigor of his juſtice againſt thoſe unhappy people.

Beſides many who ſuffered in various parts of the kingdom, near 900 of them were hanged at one time in London. The houſes and lands, (for the Jews had of late ventured to make purchaſes of that kind) as well as the goods of great numbers, were ſold and confiſcated: and the king, leſt it ſhould be ſuſpected that that the riches of the ſufferers were the chief part of their guilt, ordered one half of the money raiſed by the confiſcations to be ſet apart and beſtowed upon ſuch as were willing to embrace chriſtianity. But the reſentment of their injuries was more prevalent over their minds than the temptation ariſing from their poverty; ſo that very few of them could be induced to embrace the religion of their perſecutors.

But the miſeries of theſe people did not terminate here: though the arbitrary talliages and exactions levied upon them had yielded a conſtant and conſiderable revenue to the crown, Edward, prompted at once by his zeal and rapacity, reſolved, a ſhort time after, to purge the kingdom of that hated race, and to ſeize to himſelf their whole property, as the reward for his labour. He left them only money ſufficient to defray the expences of their paſſage into foreign countries, where new perſecutions and extortions awaited them. But the inhabitants of the Cinque ports, imitating the avidity of their ſovereign, deprived moſt of them of this ſmall pittance, and even threw many of the Jews into the ſea; a crime for which the king, who was determined to be the ſole plunderer in his dominions, inflicted capital puniſhment on the perpetrators. No leſs than 15000 Jews were thus robbed of their effects, and baniſhed the kingdom.

A. D. 1276. This year Edward undertook an enterprize that was not only of the utmoſt importance to himſelf, but of peculiar advantage to his people. Llewellyn, prince of Wales, who had been cloſely connected with the Montfort family, had refuſed to repair to the court of Edward and pay him homage. This exaſperated the haughty ſpirit of the Engliſh monarch, and he determined to reduce his refractory vaſſal. Llewellyn well knew the power and great abilities of Edward, and endeavoured to ſtrengthen himſelf by a ſtrict alliance with the remains of the Montfort family. He accordingly demanded Eleanor, daughter to the late earl of Leiceſter in marriage. The young lady was then at the court of France, where ſhe had taken refuge on the death of her father. The requeſt of Llewellyn was, however, readily complied with, and Eleanor, embarked for Wales, under the care of her brother Aumeri; but the veſſel being taken at ſea, the betrothed princeſs was ſent to the court of Edward, where ſhe was detained as a priſoner of ſtate; but her brother was committed to Corſ-caſtle. Deputies ſoon after arrived from Llewellyn, offering to ranſom the princeſs, whom he aſſerted to be detained againſt the law of nations. But Edward refuſed to ſet Eleanor at liberty, unleſs Llewellyn would engage to repair all the devaſtations committed on the borders of England, and reſtore all the caſtles he had taken during the late wars. Llewellyn refuſed the conditions, and hoſtilities immediately commenced between them; but the operations of the firſt campaign were of little conſequence, neither Edward nor Llewellyn heading their troops in perſon.

In the ſpring of the following year, A. D. 1277, Edward marched with his army into Wales; and Llewellyn, perceiving it would be madneſs to meet the Engliſh in the open field, retreated to his woods and inacceſſible mountains, in order to harraſs the Engliſh troops; but Edward was not to be ſurprized. He cut a capacious road for his forces through a tract of woods extending from the marches on the border of Cheſhire to Caernarvonſhire, by which his forces penetrated with eaſe into the heart of the country. Llewellyn retreated to Snowden, the uſual place of refuge when attacked by the Engliſh. But their faſtneſſes now were of very little conſequence. Edward ſeized all the paſſes, and prevented any proviſions from being carried to Llewellyn's army. Famine ſoon reduced the Welſh prince to ſue for peace, and a treaty was concluded at Aberconway, on the following conditions; "That Llewellyn ſhould pay fifty thouſand pounds ſterling, as a ſatisfaction for damages; that he ſhould quit for ever a tract of land containing the whole country between Cheſter and the river Conway; and that he ſhould repair to the court of Edward and perform his homage." Edward, however, thought proper to remit the payment of the fifty thouſand pounds, and brought Llewellyn with him to London, where he did homage and ſwore fealty in the preſence of a great number of the prelates and nobility of England. The ceremony being over, Edward delivered to him his betrothed ſpouſe, Eleanor, and cauſed their nuptials to be celebrated with the greateſt magnificence.

A. D. 1278. Soon after Midſummer this year Edward held a parliament at Glouceſter, in which ſeveral laws were enacted for ſecuring the rights and liberties of the ſubject, and providing for the better adminiſtration of juſtice. But among the many excellent regulations made by Edward for the advantage and happineſs of his people, he took one ſtep that again threatened the nation with all the miſeries of a civil war. He iſſued commiſſions to enquire into all the encroachments made on the royal demeſnes; and all perſons were ſummoned to produce the titles by which they held their eſtates. The barons were ſufficiently alarmed, and vigorouſly oppoſed the order, as cruel and oppreſſive. Among others, John, earl of Warrenne and Surry, was cited before the king's commiſſioners for that purpoſe. He obeyed the ſummons, but on being called upon to produce his titles, drew a family ſword he had brought with him for that purpoſe, and addreſſed the court in the following manner: "It was with this ſword, that my anceſtors, who came in with William the baſtard, acquired their poſſeſſions; and by the ſame I will defend them: it was not for himſelf only that William conquered; it was not for him alone that my anceſtors fought." This noble and ſpirited declaration, which was conſonant to the ſenſe of all the old Engliſh nobility, put an end to the enquiry. Edward ſoon ſaw his error, and immediately revoked the commiſſion.

A. D. 1281. Notwithſtanding Llewellyn had ſtrictly obſerved the conditions of the treaty, yet the officers of Edward had committed ſo many acts of violence upon the Welſh, that they implored the protection of their prince againſt their inſolent neighbours. Llewellyn made ſtrong remonſtrances to Edward, but without effect: the grievances ſtill continued. Exaſperated at ſuch unjuſt treatment, the Welſh determined rather to encounter a force which they had already experienced to be ſo much ſuperior to their own, than bear any longer the oppreſſions of the haughty victors.

David, brother to Llewellyn, had long ſerved the crown of England with the utmoſt fidelity; but exaſperated at the unjuſt oppreſſions of his countrymen, he joined his brother, and offered to head the army, and venture his life to retrieve the liberties and independence of that antient people. The generous propoſal was joyfully accepted; the whole nation flew to arms, and joined the ſtandard of David, who led them immediately againſt their oppreſſors. Several caſtles ſoon fell into their hands, and they ſeverely retaliated on the Engliſh the miſeries they had ſo long ſuffered from their unprovoked violations.

Edward, piqued at the ſucceſs of the inſurgents over his Engliſh ſubjects, determined to cruſh for ever a people who had only taken up arms in defence of their liberties, and to procure that redreſs they had ſo often ſolicited in vain.

The archbiſhop of Canterbury, deſirous of preventing the effuſion of human blood, exerted all his intereſt to bring about an accommodation, and made ſeveral equitable propoſals by the requeſt of Llewellyn and his brother, for ſheathing the ſword of deſtruction, and preventing the horrid devaſtation that muſt enſue, if the bloody ſtandard of war ſhould be carried into the country of that diſtreſſed and injured people. But his labours were in vain. Edward was determined to put a final period to the government of Wales, and exterminate all the remains of its antient independence.

In conſequence of this reſolution, Edward, in the ſpring of the following year, A. D. 1282, led his army into the enemy's country, without meeting any oppoſition, Llewellyn and his brother having retired to their faſtneſſes in Snowden, waiting for an opportunity of falling on the Engliſh when embarraſſed among the woods.

In theſe expectations, however, they were greatly diſappointed, for Edward, who had learned experience from his former expedition, inveſted the enemy by ſecuring all the avenues through which it was poſſible for them to eſcape, and threw a bridge of boats over the river Menay, oppoſite to Bangor. Before the work was entirely completed, three hundred men at arms, under the command of lord Latimer and Lucas de Thany, a Gaſcon, paſſed the river to amuſe the enemy, while the main body of the army croſſed the bridge. The Welſh, who were well acquainted with the nature of the river, and knew that the water would ſoon ſwell and cut off their retreat, did not for ſome time moleſt the Engliſh in their paſſage; but when about 1500 of them were landed, they ruſhed down from the mountains, with the moſt horrid cries, and fell upon the Engliſh with ſuch fury and reſolution, that they were immediately routed with the moſt dreadful ſlaughter.

The Engliſh were ſo diſpirited at this defeat, that for ſome time their operations were ſuſpended; they found it impoſſible to advance, and were aſhamed to retire. The Welſh, on the other hand, fluſhed with their late ſucceſs, and encouraged by the inactivity of the enemy, began to think themſelves invincible; more eſpecially as their bards had perſuaded them that the period was arrived for the accompliſhment of the prophecy of the great Merlin, who had foretold, that one of the race of Llewellyn would ride through the ſtreets of London with a crown on his head. This ridiculous notion, well adapted to the ignorance and ſuperſtition of the times, proved the deſtruction of the Welſh army. It was reſolved to commit the care of Snowden to David, while Llewellyn himſelf led the main body of the forces againſt the Engliſh.

This fatal reſolution being taken, the prince advanced into Radnorſhire, in order to join the remains of Montfort's party; but his little army was met at Pont Orewyn, a bridge which ſecured the paſſage over the Wye, by a detachment of the Engliſh, and totally defeated; and he himſelf, who had advanced ſome diſtance before his troops, killed by the hand of one Adam de Frampton, who not knowing him, ran a ſpear through his body.

Thus fell the famous Llewellyn, a prince deſcended from one of the moſt antient royal families in Europe, and with him the ſmall remains of Welſh liberty expired; after having been preſerved in that little corner of the iſland above eighteen hundred years, againſt all the efforts of the Engliſh monarchy, though deſtitute both of foreign alliances, and a naval power.

No ſooner was Llewellyn dead, than his head, together with the news of the victory, was ſent to the king then encamped at Conway. Edward immediately ordered the head to be ſent to London, where it was conveyed, through the ſtreets upon the point of a lance in a cart, and, at laſt, crowned with a ſilver circle, in contempt of a prophetical tradition, which ſaid, that Llewellyn's head ſhould ride down Cheapſide, encircled with a ſilver diadem. It was next placed upon a pillory in Cheapſide, from whence it was conveyed to the Tower of London, crowned with ivy, in ridicule of the prophecy, which ſaid, that Llewellyn ſhould wear the crown of Brute. And here, purſuant to the order of the king, it was fixed on the point of a high ſtaff erected for that purpoſe on the top of the fortreſs.

The death of Llewellyn ſtruck the Welſh with terror; they made no farther efforts to ſupport the falling ſtate of their country: the greater part of them ſubmitted to the Engliſh. David himſelf retired to the woods and faſtneſſes of the mountains, where he continued for ſome time in the greateſt diſtreſs; but was at laſt ſeized by his own countrymen in one of his retreats, and conveyed a priſoner to Edward, who ordered him to be ſent in chains to Shrewſbury. The captivity of David put a final period to all oppoſition: the Welſh nobility delivered up their caſtles, and the whole country ſubmitted to the conqueror.

About the latter end of the ſummer of the following year, 1283, ſummonſes were iſſued for a full meeting of parliament at Shrewſbury, to deliberate on the fate of the captive David. The trial, however, took up but a ſhort time, at the cloſe of which David, inſtead of being reſpected as the defender of the liberties of his country, was condemned as a traitor, to be drawn, hanged and quartered. This ſentence was executed with many circumſtances of barbarous exultation; his bowels were conſumed in the fire; his four quarters were expoſed in different parts of the kingdom, namely, one at Briſtol, another at York, the third at Northampton, and the fourth at Wincheſter, and his head was placed on the Tower by that of his brother Llewellyn.

Edward having thus ſecured the conqueſt of Wales, built two caſtles, one at Aberconway and another at Caernarvon; and having ſettled the civil government of Wales, it was ever after annexed to the crown of England. It was, however, happy for the Welſh, placed as they were in ſuch diſadvantageous circumſtances, that, when they fell, they fell into a ſtate, not of ſlavery, but of dependence, and of ſuch a dependence as bears marks rather of an union than a conqueſt.*

The ſatisfaction which Edward received from the conqueſt of Wales was greatly checked by the loſs of his eldeſt ſon prince Alphonſo, who died about Chriſmas, 1283, in the 12th year of his age. This was the third ſon Edward loſt within the ſpace of three years: John, his firſt ſon died before his return from the Holy Land; and Henry, his ſecond ſon, ſoon after.

A. D. 1284. In the beginning of this year Edward made a progreſs into Glamorganſhire, where he was received with extraordinary magnificence by the earl of Glouceſter, between whom and the king there now appeared to ſubſiſt the moſt perfect good underſtanding ſtanding. Edward, willing to render himſelf as popular as poſſible in that country, ordered tournaments to be held for ſeveral days, during which his queen was delivered of a ſon at Caernarvon, and Edward gave the young prince the name of that place.

* The following anecdote, which is very properly adapted to the taſte of Monkiſh writers, is related by ſeveral of our hiſtorians. "Edward, ſay they, aſſembling the Welſh, promiſed to give them a prince of unexceptionable manners, born in their own country, and one who could ſpeak no other language. The favor was accepted with the greateſt acclamations of the people, and promiſe of obedience; and he immediately beſtowed the inveſtiture of the principality on his ſon Edward, then an infant, and born at Caernarvon." Since this period the principality of Wales has given title to the eldeſt ſons of the kings of England.

Edward, having ſettled matters in Wales, came, about the middle of December, to Briſtol, where he kept his Chriſtmas, and held a parliament; and then repaired to London, from whence he had now been abſent near three years. Soon after his arrival, namely, about the middle of February, 1285, he received a ſummons from the king of France, to attend that prince in his war againſt the king of Arragon, by reaſon of the lands he held in Gaſcony; but a truce being ſoon after concluded between thoſe two powers, Edward was left at liberty to attend the affairs of his own kingdom.

Edward now directed his attention to the reforming of many great abuſes which had been practiſed by the city magiſtrates during his abſence. George Brockſley, the mayor, was turned out of his office for having taken bribes from the bakers, to connive at their ſelling bread ſhort of weight; beſides which he took away the charter of the city, and put in another mayor by his own authority. At the ſame time licence was given to merchant-ſtrangers to rent houſes and keep ſhops; whereas formerly they were only importers of goods, and the Engliſh landlords, with whom they lodged, acted as brokers to ſell the goods for them.

A. D. 1286. In the month of July this year Edward paſſed over to the continent, in order to eſtabliſh a peace between Alphonſo king of Arragon, and Philip the Fair, who had lately ſucceeded his father, Philip the Hardy, in the crown of France. He continued here three years; and during the greater part of the time was employed in this buſineſs, which he effectually accompliſhed by forming an alliance between the two monarchs on the moſt ſolid and permanent foundation.

A. D. 1289. Edward had made preparations for leaving France early in the ſpring; but through unavoidable delays, he did not arrive at London till the middle of Auguſt. During his abſence great diſorders had happened in the kingdom: the ſtreams of juſtice were poiſoned at their fountains by the corruption of the judges. Edward was determined to examine very ſtrictly into their conduct, and for that purpoſe, in the beginning of the following year, 1290, ſummoned a parliament at Weſtminſter, and before that aſſembly the judges were tried. Two only were found innocent: the proofs againſt the reſt were ſo clear, that they could not make any defence, and they were all depoſed and ſeverely fined. The two judges who were found, on the ſtricteſt examination, to have adminiſtered juſtice with integrity, were John de Martingham, and Elias de Bokingham, both clergymen.

In this parliament an act was paſſed for baniſhing the Jews out of the kingdom, they having rendered themſelves odious to the whole nation by their uſury and extortion. They were ordered to depart the kingdom before the 1ſt of November on pain of death, and all their wealth, except only ſuch ſums as were neceſſary to defray the expence of their voyage, was confiſcated to the king's uſe. But many of them were not ſuffered to eſcape even with ſo ſmall a pittance of their fortune: ſome of them were murdered by the ſeamen in their paſſage; and others, after being plundered of their little all, were left deſtitute on an inhoſpitable ſhore. Such are the dreadful effects of enthuſiaſtic conſequences, when under no reſtraint from the laws of humanity!

In the beginning of May this year (1290) Edward beſtowed his daughter Jane, or Joan of Acre, on the earl of Glouceſter, after that nobleman had ſworn to maintain the lineal ſucceſſion of England. In the month of July following his other daughter Beatrix was married to the eldeſt ſon of John, duke of Brabant. But the joy theſe alliances occaſioned was ſoon deſtroyed by the loſs of Queen Eleanor, who died as ſhe was accompanying Edward in a progreſs to the north, at Holmſby in Lincolnſhire, on the 29th of November. The death of this truly excellent princeſs (who had lived his wife in loving participation of all his troubles and long voyages thirty-ſix years) overwhelmed Edward with the moſt poignant grief; and, making every other conſideration give way to affection, he inſtantly returned to Weſtminſter with her corpſe, where her obſequies were performed with a magnificence ſuitable to the greatneſs of his love, and the deep ſenſe he had of her loſs. He ordered a handſome tomb, with her image on it in braſs, to be erected over her grave; as likewiſe ſeveral croſſes of ſtone to be raiſed to her memory, with her arms engraven upon them, at thoſe places where her body had reſted in its conveyance to London, and where ſolemn dirges had been ſung for her ſoul, as at Northampton, Waltham, &c. ſeveral of which croſſes are ſtill remaining. There was one in Cheapſide, and another at the place now called Charing Croſs; but theſe two laſt were taken down by order of the Long Parliament in 1643, as relics of popiſh ſuperſtition.

We now come to the commencement of an incident, which was productive of circumſtances that particularly diſtinguiſhed the remainder of Edward's reign. It had always been lamented by the greateſt ſtateſmen, that England and Scotland were not united; and ſome attempts had been made to produce ſo deſirable an event. Alexander III. king of Scotland, had been unfortunately killed by a fall from his horſe in the year 1286, leaving no male iſſue. Margaret, daughter to Eric king of Norway, and grand-daughter to Alexander, was the only lineal deſcendant from the royal family of Scotland. This princeſs, then an infant, and known by the name of The Maid of Norway, was recognized ſucceſſor by the ſtates of Scotland. Edward, who was great uncle to the Norwegian princeſs, now flattered himſelf that an opportunity offered for uniting the two kingdoms; and accordingly propoſed a marriage between his ſon, the prince of Wales, and the Maid of Norway. The friendſhip which had for ſome time prevailed between the two nations greatly facilitated this project, ſo favourable to the grandeur and happineſs of both kingdoms. The eſtates of Scotland were pleaſed with the offers of Edward, and the marriage articles were drawn up, agreed to, and ratified. The biſhop of Durham was appointed the queen's lieutenant in Scotland; and two of the Scottiſh commiſſioners, with the earl of Warrenne and the dean of York, embarked for Norway, to ſettle every thing relating to the marriage. Thus every thing appeared ripe for effecting a laſting union between the two kingdoms, when this coalition, which would have been ſo much to the advantage of both parties, was ſuddenly and unexpectedly broken off by the untimely death of Margaret, who died in one of the iſlands of the Orkneys, whither ſhe had been driven by ſtreſs of weather, as ſhe was on her paſſage to England, in the month of October, 1290.

The death of this princeſs, in ſo critical a juncture, brought upon Scotland all the calamities which attend a diſputed ſucceſſion; and, beſides the inteſtine broils and foreign invaſions which ſoon after rendered that country a ſcene of blood and deſolation, it laid the foundation of thoſe wars and depredations on the borders, which were continually carried on for ſome ages between the Scots and the Engliſh, and of that animoſity which hath, in ſome degree, ever ſince ſubſiſted between the two notians.

A. D. 1291. Several perſons offered themſelves as claimants to the crown of Scotland, but the two principal competitors were, Robert Bruce and John Baliol, both deſcended in the female line from the brother of that William who had been taken priſoner by Henry II. The Scots, who were at this time a groſs and ignorant people, were little qualified to diſcuſs the claims of theſe competitors. The parliament was divided; and if they had determined the diſpute by a plurality of voices, the competitors were ſo powerful, that there were little hopes of their ſubmitting to their deciſion; the animoſities of the parties would, in all probability, have been heightened, and the nation plunged into all the horrors of a civil war. It was therefore reſolved to refer the conteſt to the king of England, who had already ſhewn himſelf ſo able and impartial an arbitrator in ſeveral contentions between different princes of Europe.

Edward readily accepted the office; but they little thought he would abuſe their confidence, in order to impoſe on their independence. He determined to eſtabliſh a right of ſuperiority over Scotland, a project he had ſome time formed, though he had hitherto wiſhed to obtain it rather by compact than claim; by the arts of policy and addreſs, rather than by force of arms. He wiſhed not to plant his ſtandard of power in fields manured with the blood of their inhabitants. He ſought, with the utmoſt diligence, for proofs in antient hiſtories; but the only circumſtance he inſiſted on, which had the leaſt appearance of plauſibility, was the homage paid by William to Henry II. tho' Richard I. had renounced his homage. Furniſhed, however, with a number of uncertain teſtimonies, he advanced to Norham, a town on the northern banks of the Tweed, at the head of a powerful army, to give weight to the unexpected claim he intended to make. On his arrival, he invited the parliament of Scotland, and the competitors for the crown, to his camp; where the chief juſticiary told the aſſembly, "that the king had taken the greateſt "pains to collect proofs from all the antient records "and chronicles, to determine this important truth, "namely, that the kings of Scotland had been dependent on the Engliſh monarchs from time immemorial, and had accordingly done them homage, "except when they had taken advantage of the inteſtine commotions of the nation, or the reign of "a weak prince, to withdraw their allegiance. The "king was, therefore, intitled to decide this diſpute, not in virtue of the reference made to him, "but in the quality of liege lord of the kingdom."

This unexpected declaration threw the aſſembly into the greateſt conſternation. It was in vain, however, to make any remonſtrance: they therefore begged to have ſome time allowed them to give in their anſwer, as many of the prelates and the nobility of Scotland were abſent, whoſe advice was neceſſary in a point of ſo much importance. Edward conſented to indulge them with three weeks for that purpoſe; and iſſued ſafe conducts for all the nobility of Scotland to repair to Norham on the day appointed for giving in their anſwer. No objection being made by the barons to Edward's claim, the king addreſſed himſelf to the ſeveral competitors, requiring their acknowledgment of his ſuperiority. Bruce was the firſt to acknowledge it; while Baliol, afraid of giving offence to the Scottiſh nation, conſented with more reluctance.

Having gained this important acknowledgement, Edward demanded that the principal caſtles in that kingdom ſhould be put into his hands; adding, that it would be in vain for him to pronounce any ſentence, without having it in his power to enforce it. The demand was complied with; and Edward having named commiſſioners to inquire into the claims of the competitors, promiſed to pronounce ſentence the enſuing year.

A. D. 1292. The moſt celebrated laywers of Europe were now conſulted on this queſtion, who unanimouſly gave their anſwer in favour of Baliol. After long debates, and ſeveral adjournments, Edward pronounced ſentence in favour of that claimant, and he was immediately put in poſſeſſion of the kingdom. All the Engliſh garriſons were withdrawn, and Baliol did homage and ſwore fealty to Edward at Norham. After this he ſet out to take poſſeſſion of his new dignity, and was, in the middle of December, crowned at Scone, with the uſual formalities, and all the noblemen of Scotland ſwore allegiance to him, except Robert Bruce, who abſented himſelf from this ceremony. The new king then repaired to Newcaſtle upon Tyne, where he again did homage to Edward, in ſuch terms as fully denoted his ſtate of abſolute dependence.

A. D. 1293. A circumſtance happened this year which threatened two powerful kingdoms with deſolation, and evinced that the moſt fatal effects may ariſe from very trifling cauſes. Two ſeamen, one belonging to a Norman, and the other to an Engliſh ſhip, having ſome diſpute at a ſpring near Bayonne, with regard to the preference of filling their caſks with water, the Norman attempted to ſtab the Engliſhman with a dagger he drew from his ſide. The latter perceived his deſign, grappled with him, threw his adverſary on the ground, and the Norman was killed by falling on his own dagger. Exaſperated at the death of their countrymen, the Normans determined to take the ſevereſt revenge; and meeting with an Engliſh veſſel, they hanged ſeveral of the crew at the yard-arm, together with ſome dogs; bidding the mariners inform their countrymen, that vengeance was now taken for the blood of the Norman killed at Bayonne. The Engliſh were not formed to bear ſo deliberate an inſult: they made ſevere repriſals: the ſeas were covered with hoſtile fleets, while the kings of France and England ſeemed indifferent ſpectators of the dreadful outrages committed by their ſubjects. Fleets were fitted out for carrying on this new ſpecies of war, which now became truly alarming; and increaſed to ſuch a degree, that in one of thoſe naval engagements, the French loſt near fifteen thouſand men. Philip the Fair now demanded ſatiſfaction from Edward; and being diſſatisfied with his anſwer, cited him to appear before the peers of France, as duke of Guienne. Edward, however, not being able to leave the kingdom, ſent his brother Edmund into France, in order to adjuſt the quarrel, and prevent, if poſſible, the ravages of a bloody war.

A. D. 1294. While theſe negotiations were carrying on at the court of France, an event happened which left the Scots no room to doubt of the abſolute ſtate of vaſſalage into which they were fallen. A burgher of Berwick, complaining of an injury he had received from ſome Engliſh commiſſioners ſent into Scotland, Edward ordered the cauſe to be tried in England by his judges. The council of Scotland conſidering this order as a breach of promiſe in Edward, who had aſſured them, that any offences committed in their kingdom ſhould be cognizable only in the Scottiſh courts, ſent a remonſtrance to the Engliſh monarch. But they obtained not redreſs: Edward declared, "That the cauſe ſhould be tried in England; "it belonged not to vaſſals to puniſh thoſe that re"preſented the perſon of their ſovereign." But if the Scots were mortified at this inſtance of their dependency, they were much more ſo in the treatment of their new king, who was ſoon after obliged to appear appear perſonally before Edward, in his court at Weſtminſter, to anſwer a complaint exhibited againſt him by the earl of Fife, for ſeizing certain eſtates of which he had been inveſted by Edward's particular order. At this trial, Baliol was obliged to relinquiſh the ſeat of honor hitherto filled by the kings of Scotland in the Engliſh courts, and to plead his own cauſe at the bar as a common defendant. This puſillanimous ſubmiſſion rendered Baliol ſo contemptible to the Scottiſh nobility, that they choſe a regency of twelve perſons to direct the management of affairs. The Scottiſh monarch was alarmed; and notwithſtanding the facility of his temper, determined to ſhake off ſo ignominious a dependence. He left the court of London without taking leave, and Edward ſeized all his eſtates in England.

Baliol now ſaw his danger, and concluded a treaty of alliance with Philip of France; an incident that gave riſe to that ſtrict union which continued ſo many ages between the French and Scottiſh nations.

A. D. 1295. Edward had determined to make an entire conqueſt of Scotland; but the ſituation of affairs on the continent prevented him from carrying his deſigns into execution. Edmund was now at the French court ſoliciting a treaty of peace between Philip and his brother; but the former refuſed to liſten to any accommodation, unleſs ſome expedient could be found for repairing his honor, which he pretended was wounded on account of his being the liege lord of Edward with regard to his poſſeſſions on the continent. It was therefore propoſed that the Engliſh monarch ſhould put Philip in poſſeſſion of Guienne, as a reparation for the inſult; and that the king of France ſhould immediately reſtore it to Edward. Philip promiſed, on the word of a king, to perform his part of the treaty; and Edmund was commiſſioned to give him the ſatisfaction he deſired. But the French king had no ſooner obtained poſſeſſion of the province, than he refuſed to fulfil his engagement, cited Edward to appear in the court of France, and on his refuſing to obey the ſummons, the province of Guienne, by a formal ſentence, was declared to be forfeited and annexed to the crown.

Enraged at the ſhameful duplicity of Philip, Edward determined to take a ſevere revenge; while this infamous breach of faith awakened the higheſt reſentment among the Engliſh, who reſolved to ſupport their monarch to the utmoſt of their power. Edward, inſtead of obeying the ſummons of the French monarch, renounced the homage he had paid him on the footing of former treaties, and reſolved to recover by force the territories which Philip had ſo treacherouſly uſurped.

To defray the expences of an armament for this purpoſe, an additional duty was laid upon all merchandize in England and Ireland: the prelates and clergy granted a moiety of all their revenues for one year; and the parliament voted a ſubſidy, amounting to one tenth of all their effects.

A. D. 1296. During the laſt year the war with France had been carried on with various ſucceſs; but Pope Celeſtine, who was deſirous of engaging the powers of Europe in another cruſade, now offered his mediation; and a truce was made between the contending monarchs.

The ceſſation of hoſtilities with Philip enabled Edward to make preparations for repelling the attempts of the Scots, whom he knew were highly exaſperated at the affront their king had lately received. While he was employed in raiſing an army neceſſary for that purpoſe, he received advice of the treaty ſecretly concluded between Baliol and Philip; but he was not intimidated by the cloſe connection between the two powers. He ſummoned Baliol to perform the duty of a vaſſal, and cited him to appear before the Engliſh parliament; but he refuſed the citation, and having procured a diſpenſation of the pope from his oath of fealty, he renounced his homage, and bid defiance to the Engliſh monarch.

Edward, exaſperated at the conduct of Baliol, marched to the northward, at the head of 30,000 foot, and 4000 horſe. The Scots army was more numerous, being compoſed of 40,000 infantry, and 5000 horſe, but they wanted both diſcipline and experience; and, what was ſtill of more conſequence, diſſenſions prevailed among the leaders. From theſe alarming appearances, ſeveral of the Scottiſh nobility, (among whom were Robert Bruce, the father and ſon, the earls of Marche and Angus) prognoſticated the ruin of their country, and made their ſubmiſſion to Edward, who now paſſed the Tweed at Coldſtream, without oppoſition. Berwick was taken by aſſault, and above ſeven thouſand of the garriſon put to the ſword.

Edward now diſpatched the earl Warrenne, at the head of 10,000 men, to beſiege the caſtle of Dunbar, defended by the flower of the Scottiſh nobility. Baliol knew the importance of this fortreſs, and determined to venture a battle for its relief: and Warrenne, informed of his intention, marched to meet him. The Scots, bad armed and diſciplined, could not ſupport the furious charge of the Engliſh: they were ſoon broke, and driven with great ſlaughter from the field of battle; above twenty thouſand of them are ſaid to have fallen by the ſwords of the Engliſh. The caſtle ſurrendered the next day to Edward, who then joined his army, and purſued his conqueſts without any father oppoſition from Baliol's army. The caſtles of Roxburgh, Edinburgh and Sterling ſubmitted after a feeble reſiſtance; and all the ſouthern parts of the kingdom were immediately ſubdued by the Engliſh.

The timid Baliol, finding himſelf unable to reſiſt the progreſs of his antagoniſt, reſolved to make his ſubmiſſion, which he did by appearing before Edward mounted on a ſorry ſteed, holding a white rod in his left hand and his ſword in the right, the latter of which he abjectly preſented to the king. The next day his ſubmiſſion was drawn up in form, as alſo an inſtrument, by which he reſigned his kingdom to Edward, to be diſpoſed of according to his pleaſure. This inſtrument was ſigned by Baliol himſelf, together with the greateſt part of the barons of Scotland, on the 10th of July, 1296, at Brechin, a town on the river Eſk, about 40 miles from Edinburgh.

Baliol was ſent priſoner to the Tower of London, and two years after ſubmitted to a voluntary baniſhment in France, where, without making any farther attempts for the recovery of his throne, he died in a private ſtation.

Scotland being thus ſubdued, Edward, the better to ſecure his acquiſition, ordered the ſtates to aſſemble at Berwick, where the principal noblemen and governors of caſtles ſwore fealty to him, and delivered up all their fortreſſes into his hands. The great ſeal of Scotland was now broken, and another, with the Engliſh arms, made in its ſtead, which was delivered to the care of Walter de Agmondeſham. At the ſame time the king appointed Hugh de Creſſingham treaſurer, W. de Ormeſby juſticiary, and John, earl of Warrenne, guardian of the Scottiſh realm: and that he might not leave theſe vanquiſhed people the leaſt particle of the liberty they had hitherto enjoyed, Edward ordered the crown and ſceptre of Scotland, with all the reſt of the regalia, to be carried to England; as alſo the famous marble ſtone at Scone, on which the inauguration of their kings had always been performed. The popular ſuperſtition of the Scots paid the higheſt veneration to this ſtone, which was regarded as the true palladium of their power, and the ultimate reſource in every national miſfortune: the loſs of it was therefore conſidered by them as an indubitable proof of the utter extinction of their monarchy, agreeable to a latin diſtich engraven on it, the tranſlation of which is thus:

Or fate's deceiv'd, and Heav'n decrees in vain,
Or where they find this ſtone, the Scots ſhall reign.

This ſtone, which was incloſed in a wooden chair, had been placed at Scone by Kenneth II. as a monument of the victory which he obtained over the Picts near the monaſtery of that place. It had been brought out of Spain into Ireland by Simon Breccus; from Ireland into Argyle, and from thence to Scone, from which place Edward now cauſed it to be conveyed to Weſtminſter, where it continues to this day, and is always uſed at the coronation of the Engliſh monarchs.

Edward, having made all thoſe regulations he thought neceſſary for the peace of the country, returned with his army to England, bringing with him ſeveral of the moſt diſtinguiſhed Scotch noblemen that had been made priſoners, and whom he thought proper to detain as ſuch, till he ſhould form a ſatiſfactory reconciliation with the French monarch.

The Scottiſh expedition had drained Edward's coffers, and he was obliged to have recourſe to his parliament for a farther ſupply, in order to enable him to wreſt the province of Guienne out of the hands of Philip, the truce with that monarch being now expired.

The barons and burgeſſes very readily complied with his requeſt, but he met with an oppoſition from the clergy, which was attended with ſome important conſequences. Robert de Winchelſey, archbiſhop of Canterbury, had procured a bull from pope Boniface VIII. who had lately ſucceeded Celeſtine in the papal chair, prohibiting the princes of Chriſtendom, under the penalty of excommunication, from levying, without his conſent, any tax on the clergy; and reſtraining, under the ſame penalty, all eccleſiaſtics from ſubmitting to ſuch impoſitions.

Edward, who knew nothing of this bull, was aſtoniſhed when the clergy refuſed their aſſiſtance, and publiſhed the bull as a reaſon for their conduct. But Edward was not formed to ſubmit to inſults; he, however, adjourned the parliament till the fourteenth of January, that they might have time to deliberate on his demand, and form their final reſolution.

A. D. 1297. The parliament met according to the time of prorogation, when the king hoped to find the clergy in a more compliant humour; but in this he was miſtaken. Having ſent to the archbiſhop of Canterbury to know his final reſolution, that prelate, in the name of his brethren, returned for anſwer, "that they had two ſuperiors, namely, the pope and the king; and though they were bound to obey both, yet they owed the greater obedience to the ſucceſſor of the holy apoſtle, St. Peter, as their ſpiritual lord and maſter."

Though Edward was greatly enraged at this anſwer, yet he concealed his reſentment; but told them, that as they refuſed to aſſiſt the civil power, it was unreaſonable for them to expect any protection from the laws.

The clergy were diſmiſſed with this anſwer, and Edward iſſued orders to the judges to receive no cauſe brought before them by any eccleſiaſtic; to hear and decide all cauſes in which they were defendants; to do every man juſtice againſt them; but to do them juſtice againſt no man: at the ſame time he locked up all their granaries and barns, and prohibited any rent to be paid them.

The prelates were aſtoniſhed at theſe proceedings; they had never before experienced the proper reſentment of an Engliſh monarch. The archbiſhop of York and his clergy complied with the king's requeſt, and received the royal protection; but Winchelſey grew more obſtinate from perſecution. He ordered the pope's bull to be publiſhed in all the churches of his dioceſe, and convened a ſynod of his ſuffragans. But Edward, aware of his intention, iſſued a writ, inhibiting him, under pain of impriſonment, from denouncing any eccleſiaſtical cenſure either againſt the king, his miniſters or ſubjects. At the ſame time, the archdeacon of Bath appealed, in the king's name, to the pope againſt all proceedings; an expedient which rendered the operations of the ſynod totally ineffectual.

The clergy now found themſelves in the moſt dreadful ſituation. Their houſes and convents might, indeed, have afforded them a ſafe retreat, but they were in want of ſubſiſtence; and whenever they ventured abroad, they were robbed and abuſed by every ruffian. The people, who had hitherto beheld them with a kind of religious awe, now looked upon them with contempt, and laughed at their ſufferings. The archbiſhop himſelf was robbed of his equipage and furniture, and at laſt reduced to board himſelf with a ſingle ſervant, in the houſe of a poor clergyman.

This ſituation was not to be endured: experience convinced them, that a deprivation of the advantages of citizens was the greateſt calamity; and they accordingly became ſolicitous to ſatisfy both the king and the ſtate. But in order to avoid an open diſobedience to the poſitive injunctions of Boniface, inſtead of granting the king a fifth of their moveables, they agreed to depoſit an equivalent ſum of money in ſome church or convent; whence it ſhould be received by proper officers appointed by the king.

Though theſe ſupplies were very conſiderable, yet they were far from being ſufficient to anſwer the deſigns formed by Edward for taking ample vengeance on Philip for his perfidy; ſo that he was obliged to have recourſe to arbitrary meaſures, extremely oppreſſive to the people. He impoſed a tax of forty ſhillings on every ſack of wool exported; he ſeized, without conſent of the owners, the cattle and other commodities neceſſary for the ſupply of his army; and required the attendance of every proprietor of land, poſſeſſed of twenty pounds a year, even though he was not a tenant of the crown, and therefore not obliged by the tenure of his eſtate to perform any ſuch ſervice.

It is no wonder that deſpotic meaſures, like theſe, occaſioned great uneaſineſs in the kingdom. The nobility were alarmed; they gave countenance and authority to the complaints of the people, and Edward was ſoon convinced that he had purſued imprudent meaſures.

An army was aſſembled on the ſea coaſt, which Edward intended ſhould embark for Guienne under the command of Humphrey, earl of Hereford, the conſtable, and Roger Bigod, earl of Norfolk, the mareſchal of England; at the ſame time he propoſed heading another army himſelf to attack the French on the ſide of Flanders.

This incident gave the two barons an opportunity of ſhewing their reſentment of the arbitrary meaſures purſued by the king. They affirmed that their office obliged them only to attend his perſon in the wars, and therefore refuſed to lead the army he had directed. A violent altercation enſued; and the king, turning himſelf to the conſtable, exclaimed, "By God, Sir earl, you ſhall either go, or hang." "By God, Sir king," replied the conſtable, "I will neither go nor hang." And immediately left the army, with the mareſchal, and about thirty other barons of very conſiderable power.

However provoked Edward might be at this rebuff, he endeavoured, by purſuing conciliating methods, to get the better of this oppoſition. He careſſed his nobility; he reconciled himſelf to the clergy; he made an apology for his conduct, which he imputed to the urgent neceſſities of the crown, and promiſed on his return from his expedition, to redreſs all grievances, and reſtore the execution of the laws.

The two earls were convinced, from Edward's conduct, that it would be very imprudent to carry their reſentments farther than they were warranted by the laws of their country. They accordingly contented themſelves with drawing up a remonſtrance, which was preſented to the king at Winchelſea, when he was ready to embark for Flanders. Edward again promiſed them redreſs as ſoon as he returned to England, and added, that he hoped thoſe nobles who had declined leading his army, would do no injury to his crown or kingdom during his abſence. The barons were, however, far from being ſatisfied, and he had hardly landed on the continent, before the conſtable and mareſchal inſiſted on an authentic confirmation both of the great charter, and the charter of the foreſts. Edward was very deſirous of putting it off till his return, but the parliament, which had been aſſembled at London by his order, joining with the two earls, and the charters being ſent over to Flanders, he confirmed them in preſence of all the prelates and nobility in his army.

A. D. 1298. Though Edward had been as expeditious as circumſtances would admit in getting over to the continent, yet he did not land in Flanders till the ſeaſon was two far advanced for making any attempt of importance. The earl of Flanders, who had joined in a league with Edward, ſoon experienced the power and reſentment of Philip. Liſle, St. Omer, Courtray, and Ypres were already wreſted from him, and many more of the principal places in his dominions were threatened with the ſame fate. The arrival of Edward indeed put a ſtop to the ſucceſs of Philip; but the two kings, inſtead of venturing a deciſive action, agreed to a truce for two years; and engaged to ſubmit their difference to pope Boniface. But as both theſe monarchs were jealous of the claims made on the moſt trivial pretences by the holy ſee, they took care to inſert in the reference, that they did not ſubmit their differences to his deciſion, from any right he might pretend by virtue of his pontifical character; but merely by their own conſent, as a private perſon.

The pope ſoon gave his ſentence, which ſeemed to have been dictated by his paſſion rather than his judgment. He commanded not only a reſtitution of Guienne, but alſo the places which had been taken from the earl of Flanders. Philip was deſirous of comprehending John Baliol and the Scots in this treaty; but this was abſolutely refuſed by Edward. At laſt the two monarchs compromiſed their differencies, by making mutual ſacrifices to each other. Edward abandoned his ally, the earl of Flanders; and Philip gave up the Scots. This is not the only time the intereſts of allies have been ſacrificed at the altar of ambition. The ſentence of Boniface was, however, regarded, and the treaty cemented by a double marriage; that of Edward himſelf with Margaret, Philip's ſiſter; and that of the prince of Wales with Iſabella, the daughter of that monarch.

While theſe things were tranſacting on the continent, the Scots made a ſucceſsful effort for the recovery of their liberties. Edward had not been fortunate in his choice of perſons to whom he had committed the adminiſtration of affairs in Scotland. The earl Warrenne, to whom the chief authority had been delegated, was, indeed, a man of prudence, virtue, and abilities; but his ill ſtate of health obliged him to return to England. At his departure, the reins of government were intruſted to William de Ormeſby, chief juſticiary, and Creſſingham, the treaſurer. The former was diſtinguiſhed by the rigour and ſeverity of his temper, and the latter by his avarice. Perſons of ſuch characters were ill adapted to the taſk of reconciling the Scots to a yoke they bore with the utmoſt reluctance. Inſtead of making uſe of moderate and lenient meaſures, they treated them as a conquered people, and made them ſenſible of the ſervitude into which they were fallen.

This exaſperated the whole nation, and the Scots reſolved to attempt the recovery of their ancient liberties. Among thoſe who had ſeverely felt the hand of power, was one William Wallace, a perſon of ſmall fortune, but deſcended from an antient family. He ſaw the diſtreſſes of the people, and undertook the defence of his country. He was of a gigantic ſtature, prodigious ſtrength, heroic courage, and diſintereſted magnanimity. He had retired to the woods, to avoid the vengeance of the government; and put himſelf, at the head of a ſmall body of men, who like himſelf, had fled from the tyranny of the Engliſh. He planned his enterprizes with ſo much prudence, that he was always ſucceſsful; and the fame of his exploits ſoon increaſed the number of his followers. He now determined to attack the governors, and accordingly advanced to Scone for that purpoſe. But Ormeſby and Creſſingham, apprized of his intention, fled into England, and were followed by all the other officers of that kingdom.

Elated at this ſucceſs, the Scots flew to arms; and ſome of the principal barons, among whom was Sir William Douglas, openly countenanced the party of Wallace.

The earl Warrenne was now ſufficiently alarmed, and endeavoured to recover by the celerity of his motions what he had loſt by neglect. He entered Annandale, and came up with the Scottiſh army at Irvine before they were ſufficiently formed. The nobility finding it would be in vain to oppoſe the Engliſh, made their ſubmiſſion, and obtained a pardon. Wallace, however, at the head of a choſen body of men, who had all bound themſelves by an oath never to lay down their arms till they had effected the liberty of their country, retired before the capitulation was ſigned, and took poſt on a hill above the monaſtery of Cambuſkenneth, in the neighbourhood of Stirling. Warrenne continued his march, and diſcovered the enemy on the oppoſite bank of the Forth; but at the ſame time, perceived the danger of attacking them in this advantageous ſituation, eſpecially as the bridge over the Forth was ſo narrow, as hardly to admit two men a-breaſt. Sir Richard Lundy, a Scotſman of birth and family, but a firm adherent to the Engliſh, deſired a party of five hundred horſe, and a proportional body of foot, might be put under his command; promiſing to paſs the river at a ford a few miles above, and to fall on the rear of the enemy, in order to divert their attention while the main body of the army paſſed the bridge. This prudent deſign was, however, rendered abortive by the impatience of Creſſingham, who being actuated, both by perſonal and national animoſities, againſt the Scots, urged the general to attack them immediately; exclaiming loudly againſt all delays, as expenſive, and diſhonourable to the king. Warrenne, who conſidered theſe reflections as cenſures upon his own conduct, ordered the army to paſs the bridge immediately. Wallace let as many of them paſs as he was confident he could conquer; and then attacked them with ſuch fury, that they were all cut to pieces, or puſhed into the river, where they periſhed. Near five thouſand men fell in the action, and among the reſt Creſſingham himſelf, who being found among the ſlain, the Scots flayed his body, and made ſaddles and girths of his ſkin. The remainder of the Engliſh army were ſo diſpirited at the deſtruction of their countrymen, whom they could not aſſiſt, that Warrenne thought it adviſeable to make no farther attempts againſt the enemy; and he accordingly retreated to Berwick.

The Scots now flocked from every part of the kingdom to join the ſtandard of Wallace, who was immediately declared regent of the kingdom during the captivity of Baliol. His forces were greatly elated with their ſucceſs; and he immediately led them towards the borders of England, where he was ſure of finding ſubſiſtence; the diſorders of war, added to unfavourable ſeaſons, having occaſioned a famine in Scotland. The caſtles of Berwick and Roxburgh made but a feeble reſiſtance, and opened the Scots a free paſſage into Northumberland. Wallace firſt led his victorious troops againſt Carliſle; but not being able to take the city, he ravaged the country as far as Durham, and then returned loaded with plunder.

A. D. 1299. Edward, who was returned from the continent, determined to wipe off this ſtain of national diſgrace, and make the Scots pay dearly for their conduct. But before he put himſelf at the head of his army, he prudently endeavoured to appeaſe the murmurs of his people by conceſſions and promiſes. He aſſembled a parliament at York, and ordered the two charters, together with the additional ſtatutes in favour of public liberty, to be read and publiſhed for the ſatisfaction of the common people. This was accordingly performed with great formality; and the biſhop of Carliſle ſolemnly denounced the ſentence of excommunication againſt all violators of theſe charters. The king then ordered a ſtrict account of the quantity of corn, and other commodities, which had been violently ſeized before his departure, to be taken, in order that the owners might receive ſatisfaction; and returned to the citizens of London the privilege of chuſing their own magiſtrates, which had been taken from them in the latter part of his father's reign.

By theſe popular meaſures he ſo gained the affections of his ſubjects, that they flocked to his ſtandard, and he ſoon found himſelf at the head of an hundred thouſand fighting men; a force abundantly ſufficient to reduce the inſurgents to ſubjection. On the other hand, that union, which alone can render an army powerful, was wanting among the Scots. Diviſions and envy took place among that unhappy people. The noblemen deſcended from the royal family of Scotland, inſtead of looking upon the patriotic virtues of Wallace with admiration, and joining in a glorious emulation in the ſervice of their country; threw the moſt ungenerous reflections upon his conduct, and even charged him with having formed a deſign of ſeizing the crown. Wallace ſaw the fatal conſequences that muſt attend theſe diviſions, and generouſly reſigned his authority, retaining only the command of a body of men who refuſed to follow any other leader. The liberty of his country, not a deſire of power, had called him from his retreat, and he willingly ſacrificed the latter to preſerve the former.

On the reſignation of Wallace, the command of the army devolved upon the ſteward of Scotland, and Cummin of Badenock, both eminent for their birth and fortune; who marched to Falkirk with a determined reſolution to wait the attack of the Engliſh. The army was drawn up in three bodies, the fronts of which were compoſed of pikemen, and the intervals filled with archers. But dreading the great ſuperiority of the Engliſh cavalry, they endeavoured to ſecure their front with palliſadoes faſtened together with ropes.

Edward divided his army into three bodies, conformable to that of the enemy, and led them to the charge. The atack was begun by the Engliſh archers, who poured a dreadful ſhower upon the enemy. The Scottiſh bowmen, unable to ſupport the fury of the Engliſh, were driven from the field of battle with great ſlaughter. The archers purſued their advantage; and pouring in their arrows among the pikemen, threw them into diſorder, which was improved by the cavalry, and a general rout enſued, attended with the moſt dreadful carnage. The number that fell in this remarkable battle is ſaid to have amounted to at leaſt twenty thouſand.

The only commander among the Scots that kept his troops together was Wallace, who retiring behind the Carron, marched leiſurely along the banks of that ſmall river, which protected him from the enemy. Bruce followed him, and when near enough, requeſted of him a ſhort conference. He began with reproaching the Scottiſh leader with madneſs, in taking up arms againſt Edward, one of the moſt powerful princes, and the beſt general of the age: at the ſame time inſinuating, that Wallace himſelf had formed a deſign of ſeizing the crown. Wallace warmly diſclaimed every ambitious intention; declaring, that the miſeries of his country alone rouſed him to arms. Adding, that he had neither any right to expect, nor any inclination to ſeize the ſcepter of Scotland. "To you," added he, "your country owes her afflictions. You left her overwhelmed with miſeries, and I undertook the cauſe you ſo baſely betrayed; a cauſe I mean to ſupport while I have ſtrength to wield a ſword; nor ſhall I envy you a life of eaſe and pleaſure in the court of a foreign tyrant. You may, my lord, have, indeed, a juſt title to the crown, and might wear it with honour to yourſelf, and advantage to your country; but you ſeem to prefer the chains of ſervitude to freedom, and the ſmiles of deſpotiſm to the calls of honour."

Bruce was ſenſibly ſtruck with the noble ſentiments of Wallace. He ſaw his own conduct in a very different light, and determined to ſeize the firſt opportunity of joining thoſe patriotic chiefs who had ſo nobly ſupported the cauſe of his country. Bruce now returned to the Engliſh army; and Wallace, at the head of the poor remains of the battle of Falkirk, retired in the northern parts of the kingdom, fully determined never to ſubmit to the laws of the conqueror.

The Scots, finding themſelves unable to face the army of the Engliſh, and deſirous, if poſſible, to ſupport the liberties of their country, implored in vain the protection of Lewis: he had abandoned them to the fury of the conqueror by his late treaty. But they were more ſucceſsful in their application to Boniface. That pontiff, who ſeemed determined to carry the power of the papal chair to the moſt extravagant height, wrote a letter to Edward; in which, after confuting the pretenſions of this monarch to the ſuperiority of Scotland, he advanced claims ſtill more abſurd in their room. He aſſerted, with a ſingular degree of confidence, that the pope was the true liege lord of Scotland; that his right was full, entire, and derived from the moſt remote antiquity.

Edward, both aſtoniſhed and offended at this bold aſſertion, was at firſt inclined to treat the pontiff's letter with contempt; but fearing the ſuperſtitious bigotry of the people might occaſion diſorders in the nation, and prevent his maintaining the ſuperiority he had acquired over Scotland, he wrote an anſwer to the pope's epiſtle, and advanced claims to the Scottiſh crown, at leaſt as chimerical as thoſe of his holineſs. He deduced the ſuperiority of England over Scotland, from the time of Brutus the Trojan, who, he ſaid, firſt founded the Britiſh monarchy, in the time of Eli and Samuel. He laid it down as a fact, confirmed by the records of antiquity, that the Engliſh monarchs had often made grants of Scotland to their ſubjects, and had dethroned thoſe vaſſal kings when they proved unfaithful to them. He recited, with great oſtentation, the homage which William had done to Henry II. but mentioned not the abolition of that extorted deed by Richard I. Theſe pretenſions, however abſurd, were confirmed by one hundred and four barons aſſembled at Lincoln for that purpoſe. But though they ſigned thoſe pretenſions, and agreed to ſend them to Boniface, they took particular care to prevent this act from affording the leaſt pretenſion for his holineſs to make it the foundation of any claim to a ſuperiority over England. They annexed a poſitive declaration, that though they were willing to ſubmit theſe proofs to him as a man, they did not by any means receive him as a judge. "The crown of England" added they, "is free, nor will we ſuffer even the king himſelf to relinquiſh its independency."

A. D. 1303. Notwithſtanding the Scots had been ſo totally defeated at the caſtle of Falkirk, yet they were far from being ſubdued: the remains of that army had been joined by freſh forces from the mountainous parts of the country, who again attacked the diſtricts belonging to the Engliſh. An army of 10,000 men was ſoon formed under Cummin, appointed regent on the reſignation of Wallace, and advanced to Biggar, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh. John de Segrave, whom Edward had left guardian of Scotland, aſſembled all the Engliſh forces in that kingdom to oppoſe the Scots; but perceiving that it would be difficult to procure the neceſſary quantity of proviſions for their ſubſiſtence in a body, he ſeparated them into three diviſions: the firſt was commanded by himſelf in perſon, the ſecond by his brother, and the third by Sir Robert Neville. Cummin determined to take advantage of this ſeparation, and advanced, under covert of the night, to attack Segrave's diviſion, which lay at Roſlin, about ſixteen miles from the Scottiſh camp. As ſoon as the dawn appeared, the Engliſh diſcovered Cummin's army marching to attack them, but it was too late to make the neceſſary preparations; the Scots fell upon them before they could form themſelves in order of battle, and obtained an eaſy victory: a few only eſcaped, by flying to the ſecond diviſion, informing them at once of their misfortune, and the approach of the enemy. The commander immediately drew up his men, and led them on directly to revenge the deaths of their countrymen. A bloody conteſt enſued. The Scots, elated with ſucceſs, charged with the utmoſt fury; while the Engliſh, animated with vengeance, made a noble reſiſtance. The battle continued for ſome time doubtful, but at laſt terminated in favour of the Scots, and the Engliſh were obliged to retreat with conſiderable loſs. By this time the third diviſion, under the command of Sir Robert Neville, appeared; and the Scots, already exhauſted with fatigue, and their ranks conſiderably thinned by the two former actions, would willingly have declined the engagement. They pleaded the exceſſive labours they had already undergone; they pointed to their wounds, and deſired to retire while it was yet in their power. Cummin, who knew that a retreat was now impoſſible, reminded them of the cauſe for which they were fighting, the tyranny of the Engliſh, the glory of their anceſtors, and the diſgrace of ſlavery. His arguments prevailed, and having furniſhed the followers of his camp with the arms of the vanquiſhed, they mounted the horſes they had taken, ſtood the ſhock of a third engagement, and with the utmoſt difficulty obtained the victory. The event was not, however, wholly inglorious to Neville; he reſcued Segrave, who had been taken priſoner in the firſt engagement, and retreated in excellent order. The Scots ſoon after made themſelves maſters of Stirling-caſtle, and gave the command of that fortreſs to one Oliphant, a brave and experienced officer.

On the twentieth of May this year, a peace was finally concluded between the two crowns of England and France at Paris, and ratified by both parties.

The ſucceſs of the Scots in the late engagements proved only gleams of ſunſhine before a dreadful ſtorm. Edward determined to revenge the diſgrace of his forces, and appointed Roxburgh for the rendezvous of his army. Every precaution was taken to enſure the ſucceſs of this expedition; and to prevent any want of proviſions, a numerous fleet was fitted out with orders to ſail along the coaſt, and attend the march of the army with proper ſupplies. The forces being aſſembled at Roxburgh, Edward advanced into the heart of Scotland, at the head of an army that would have rendered all oppoſition in the open field a ſpecies of madneſs: the Scots had no other reſource than to fly for ſafety to the woods and faſtneſſes of their country. The only oppoſition Edward met with was from two or three caſtles; the reſt opened their gates on the firſt ſummons. In this manner he led his army from one extremity of Scotland to the other: his vigilance preſerved his forces from ſurpriſe, and his fleet ſupplied them with plenty of proviſions. Even the intrepid Wallace, though he followed the Engliſh armies, found few opportunities for diſplaying his valour. The conduct of Edward rendered all his attempts abortive.

A. D. 1304. Edward having at laſt completed his conqueſt of Scotland, applied himſelf to the more difficult part of the undertaking, namely, that of ſettling the country, of eſtabliſhing a new form of government, and of making his acquiſition durable to the crown of England. He ſeems, however, to have carried matters to extremities againſt the natives; he abrogated all the Scottiſh laws and cuſtoms; he endeavoured to inſtitute the Engliſh in their place; he entirely deſtroyed all the monuments of antiquity; ſuch records or hiſtories as had eſcaped his former ſearch were now burnt or diſperſed; and he took every other meaſure he could project totally to extirpate the Scottiſh name.

A. D. 1305. After Edward had ſettled his affairs in Scotland, he returned to England, and immediately iſſued a general pardon to all the Scottiſh nobility who had carried arms againſt him. Wallace, however, was excepted; the king inſiſting that he ſhould ſurrender himſelf at diſcretion. That chief ſtill continued in arms, at the head of a few followers, and ſtill cheriſhed the expiring ſparks of Scottiſh liberty. But the publication of Edward's pardon cauſed a very conſiderable deſertion in his little party, and he was obliged to wander from one part of the country to another, in order to keep himſelf concealed from the vigilant eyes of his enemies. He continued this itenerant courſe of life for ſome time; but was at laſt betrayed by Sir John Monteith, his former friend, and ſent priſoner to London. Edward, whoſe natural bravery ſhould have induced him to cheriſh ſimilar qualities in an enemy, was ſo enraged at ſome violences committed by Wallace during the fury of the war, that he ordered him to be tried as a rebel and traitor. He was cccordingly conducted to Weſtminſter-hall, and his indictment, which accuſed him of treaſon being read, he pleaded, not guilty; and ſaid, that it was abſurd to accuſe him of treaſon againſt a king, whoſe authority in Scotland he had never owned, and whoſe government he had ever diſputed. The judges, however, upon the principle that Edward was not only the direct, but natural lord of Scotland, condemned him to ſuffer as a traitor; and the ſentence was accordingly executed with every circumſtance of barbarity.

A. D. 1306. Edward, however, failed in the purpoſe which his barbarous policy was directed to ſupport. The Scots, already diſtinguiſhed by the many innovations introduced by the ſword into their laws and government, were ſtill further enraged by the injuſtice and cruelty exerciſed upon Wallace. All the envy, which, during his life-time, had attended that gallant leader, was now buried in his grave. Influenced with reſentment, and deſirous of retaliating the injuries they had received, the people were every where diſpoſed to riſe againſt the Engliſh government; and it was not long before a general of the greateſt merit preſented himſelf.

Robert Bruce, deſcended from the royal family of Scotland, determined to ſeize the ſceptre of his anceſtors. He well knew, that after the ſubmiſſions he had made to Edward, he never ſhould be able to appear with any advantage, while the illuſtrious Wallace, then the idol of the common people, ſurvived; but the death of that chief removed the only obſtacle to his ambition. John Baliol, the competitor with Bruce's father for the Scottiſh crown, died alſo about the ſame time. This incident united the two parties, which had before divided Scotland, and greatly encouraged Bruce to attempt the deliverance of his country from the yoke of ſlavery. He was now at the court of Edward, and opened his mind to Cummin, who approved of his deſign, and promiſed his aſſiſtance; but by reflecting coolly on the enterprize, he changed his opinion, and informed Edward of Bruce's intentions. The king, who ſuſpected that the diſcovery of Cummin proceeded from envy, omitted to ſecure the perſon of Bruce, till he was convinced of the truth from concurring circumſtances.

The friends of Bruce ſoon perceived the dangers to which he was expoſed; and the earl of Glouceſter, thinking it would be imprudent either to converſe with him or give him the neceſſary information in a letter, ſent him, by a ſervant, a pair of gilt ſpurs and a purſe of gold, which he pretended he had borrowed from him. Bruce ſoon perceived the meaning of the ænigmatical preſent, and immediately effected his eſcape. Soon after his arrival in his native country, he preſented himſelf at a meeting of the Scottiſh nobles, diſcovered to them his deſigns, and exhorted them to join in the noble attempt to break the chains of ſervitude, and revenge the inſulted rights of their fellow citizens. They liſtened to his remonſtrances, and declared their reſolution of ſeconding his patriotic deſigns and aſſerting the undoubted rights of the nation, againſt their common oppreſſors. Cummin alone oppoſed this general determination. He repreſented the attempt as pregnant with deſtruction; he told them it was madneſs to oppoſe the power of the Engliſh, while that power was in the hands of a prince of ſuch uncommon vigour and abilities. He added, that nothing but the moſt rigorous puniſhments could be expected, if they again broke their oaths of fealty, and ſhook off their allegiance to the victorious Edward.

Bruce, who plainly foreſaw the failure of all his ambitious projects from the oppoſition of Cummin, followed him, on the diſſolution of the aſſembly, to the cloiſters of the Grey Friars, and running him through the body, left him for dead. Sir Thomas Kilpatrick, one of Bruce's friends, aſking him ſoon after if the traitor was ſlain. "I believe ſo," replied Bruce." "And is that a matter," cried Kilpatrick, "to be left to conjecture? I will ſecure him." He immediately ran to Cummin, and drawing his dagger, ſtabbed him to the heart. This act, ſo juſtly condemned in the preſent age, was at that time conſidered as a noble atchievement of patriotic virtue.

As no pardon could be expected from Edward, Bruce and his party had only the alternative to attempt a conqueſt, or periſh. No time was to be loſt, and that martial leader improved every moment: he flew into different parts of the kingdom to rouſe his countrymen to arms, and perſuade them to ſhake off the galling yoke of ſlavery. The Scots embraced with ardour the pleaſing hopes of recovering their liberty. Their courage was ſtimulated by oppreſſion. The Engliſh were again driven out of the kingdom, except thoſe who had taken refuge in places of ſtrength; and Bruce, coming to the abbey of Scone on Lady-day, 1306, was there crowned by the counteſs of Buchan, ſiſter to the earl of Fiſe, a privilege inherent in that family.

As ſoon as Edward was informed of this unexpected event, he ſent Aymer de Valence, earl of Pembroke, at the head of a conſiderable body of forces, into Scotland, to check the progreſs of the inſurgents. Bruce had collected a conſiderable number of forces, but they were raw and undiſciplined, and conſequently unable to withſtand the attacks of veteran troops. They were encamped at Methuen near Perth, without ſuſpecting the approach of an enemy. Pembroke profited by their ignorance; he attacked them in the night, and drove them from the field. Bruce behaved with the greateſt intrepidity; was thrice diſmounted from his horſe and as often recovered himſelf: but all his efforts were in vain; he was obliged to ſubmit to ſuperior fortune, and ſeek his ſafety in a ſpeedy flight. This dreadful diſaſter ſtruck the Scots with terror: the greater part of them deſerted their leader, and Bruce was obliged to fly for ſhelter to the Weſtern Iſles.

A ſhort time after this defeat, Edward himſelf arrived in Scotland, and divided his army into two bodies, one of which he ſent to the northward under the command of the prince of Wales, aſſiſted by the earls of Lancaſter and Hereford. The prince made himſelf maſter of the caſtle of Kildrommey, and ſoon after took the counteſs of Buchan, and the lady Mary Bruce, ſiſter to the Scotch king, priſoners. Theſe two ladies Edward, from a diſingenuous motive of revenge, ordered to be ſhut up in wooden cages, and one of them to be hung over the battlements of Roxburgh, and the other over thoſe of Berwick caſtles, as public ſpectacles to the inſulting populace. After performing this ſucceſsful expedition, Edward went to Carliſle, where he aſſembled a parliament, in order to fix the eſtabliſhment of that kingdom.

While Edward appeared at Carliſle with all the dignity of an Engliſh monarch, at the head of his parliament, he met with an affliction in his own family, which afforded him an affecting proof that happineſs is ſeldom the companion of greatneſs. He ſaw, with concern, the diſſolute courſes of his ſon, the prince of Wales, who was entirely guided by one Gaveſton, his favourite. Edward had ſeveral times endeavoured in vain to reclaim him, ſometimes by gentle admonitions, and ſometimes by puniſhments bordering on ſeverity. But a diſtinguiſhed inſult being now offered to the biſhop of Cheſter, the king determined to proceed in a legal manner againſt the favourite; and it was determined that Gaveſton ſhould, in three months, embark for France, and never more return to England, without the king's permiſſion or command. At the ſame time Edward ordered him a penſion of an hundred marks a year on condition that both he and the prince ſhould ſolemnly ſwear to obſerve the ſentence, which was readily accepted.

A. D. 1307. Edward's tranquillity was farther interrupted by a circumſtance little expected. Bruce, who had hitherto concealed himſelf ſo effectually that it was generally believed he had periſhed, now appeared at the head of a ſmall body of men, and committed the moſt dreadful ravages on the peaceable inhabitants who were in the intereſt of the Engliſh. Edward, at once alarmed and exaſperated at this ſudden and unexpected interruption, diſpatched the earl of Pembroke and lord Lorn, with a conſiderable body of forces, to repel the inſurgents.

Bruce, finding the enemy far ſuperior in ſtrength to his own, intrenched himſelf on the brow of a hill; but it was not long before he perceived the highlanders under lord Lorn endeavouring to form a compaſs round the eminence, by which he muſt have been ſurrounded, and cut off. He therefore immediately divided his army into three bodies, and ordered them to march different ways, but all to rendezvous, by a certain time, in the wood of Glantroule near Cumnock. This retreat being performed, Bruce's army was conſiderably increaſed, and he obtained ſeveral advantages over the enemy, though his whole force did not exceed 1000 men. With theſe, however, he knew ſo well how to chuſe his ground, and watch his opportunity, that he defeated the earl of Pembroke, and attacked a party under the earl of Glouceſter with ſo much reſolution, that after a bloody engagement, that nobleman was obliged to ſhut himſelf up in the caſtle of Ayre, till he could be relieved by Edward. This gleam of ſucceſs raiſed the Scots from deſpair. The ſpirit of freedom ran from breaſt to breaſt, and Bruce, in a ſhort time, found his army increaſed to ſeveral thouſands, by which he became a dangerous, becauſe a deſperate enemy.

In the mean time Edward remained at Carliſle, impatiently waiting for a number of troops he had ſummoned to meet at that place at Midſummer, having formed the reſolution of taking a ſignal vengeance of the Scots, even to the extirpation of their very name: but death cut ſhort all his mighty projects, and ſaved the Scottiſh nation from the precipice of deſtruction.

Edward had, for ſome time, laboured under a dyſentery, which had greatly weakened him, but his eagerneſs for executing his deſigns not permitting him to wait for the day of the general rendezvous of his forces, which was to be on the 8th of July, he put himſelf at the head of ſuch of them as were already come up, and marched on Monday the 3d of July from Carliſle, though not able to proceed more than two miles a day.

When Edward came to a place called Burgh on the Sands in Cumberland, he found that his laſt moments were coming very faſt, and therefore ſent for prince Edward his eldeſt ſon, to whom he earneſtly recommended the following particulars, viz. that he ſhould bury his body in Scotland, and proſecute the war with the utmoſt vigor; that he ſhould ſend his heart to the Holy Land, with 30,000l. ſterling, which he had provided for the ſupport of the holy ſepulchre; and that he ſhould never recall Gaveſton. To theſe requeſts the prince ſolemnly ſwore obſervance; but with what ſincerity we ſhall ſee in the hiſtory of his reign.

Edward now took leave of his children and all his great officers, and then delivered himſelf up to the care of his ſpiritual monitors; ſoon after which he reſigned his laſt breath, as his ſervants were raiſing him up to take ſome nouriſhment, on the 7th of July 1307, in the 68th year of his age, and 35th of his reign.

It is almoſt impoſſible for any prince's character to be ſo perfect, but that there will be ſome kind of flaw in it. Edward was certainly poſſeſſed of many virtues, though at the ſame time it muſt be acknowledged that he had ſome vices; but the former were more than ſufficient to balance the latter. His ambition, and a deſire of increaſing the power of his kingdom, ſeem to have formed the ruling paſſion of his ſoul. In purſuit of theſe, he ſcrupled not to purſue meaſures inconſiſtent with the liberty of his people. The equity of his enterprize againſt Scotland has been juſtly queſtioned; but when it is remembered, that the union of the two kingdoms muſt have been attended with the moſt ſolid advantages to both, we ſhall, perhaps, be more inclined to praiſe than cenſure his conduct. At the ſame time, it muſt be confeſſed, that if his character ſhould be thought exceptionable in this particular, his country obtained the moſt permanent advantages from his activity, his courage, his policy and his prudence. He reſtored authority to the government, maintained the laws againſt all the efforts of his turbulent barons, and executed juſtice with ſeverity on all who diſturbed the domeſtic peace of the kingdom. His merit as a legiſtator was ſo great, that he is often called, "The Engliſh Juſtinian;" becauſe, in his reign, the laws acquired a great perfection, and juſtly deſerved the name of Eſtabliſhments. He ſettled the juriſdiction of the ſeveral courts; and he firſt eſtabliſhed the office of juſtice of peace. His conduct with regard to the clergy was more politic; he ſaw their power, and was deſirous of preventing its increaſe. Their poſſeſſions were unalienable, and perpetually augmenting: he therefore prohibited them from making new acquiſitions, by paſſing the ſtatute of mortmain. But the undertaking that will always render the name of this great legiſlator dear to the Engliſh, was his eſtabliſhing the Houſe of Commons, by ſummoning two deputies from every borough, conformable to the example of the earl of Leiceſter. By this means the boroughs became of importance in the ſtate; and the mechanics and tradeſmen, whom the feudal ſyſtem had placed in a deſpicable point of light, acquired the honor of being one of the branches of the legiſlature; trade was encouraged, and men of property thought it no diſgrace to engage in the commerce of their country.

Edward is repreſented in his perſon as graceful, tall and comely; his features regular and elegant, with eyes keen and piercing, and an aſpect that equally commanded reverence and eſteem: he was of a robuſt and compact make, and excelled moſt of his contemporaries in bodily ſtrength and activity; his ſhape was ſomewhat diſproportioned, on account of the too great length of his legs, whence he received the name of Long-ſhanks; but then this blemiſh was attended with a conſiderable advantage, for it gave him ſuch a firm ſeat on horſeback, that he was not, without the greateſt difficulty, to be diſmounted.

With theſe bodily perfections he poſſeſſed a cool head, a ſound judgment, and an intrepid heart; he was ſagacious in foreſeeing difficulties, provident in guarding againſt them, and ever ſteady under the moſt ſudden change of events, and in the midſt of the greateſt perils. In a word, if we compare him with his father, his grandfather, and his own ſon his ſucceſſor, we muſt confeſs that England ſuffered a very conſiderable loſs by his death.

Edward had by his firſt wife, Eleanor of Caſtile, four ſons, but Edward his heir and ſucceſſor, was the only one that ſurvived him. She alſo bore him eleven daughters, moſt of whom died in their infancy: Joan was married firſt to the earl of Glouceſter, and, after his death, to Ralph de Monthemer: Margaret eſpouſed John duke of Brabant; Elizabeth married, firſt John earl of Holland, and afterwards the earl of Hereford: Mary was a nun in the monaſtery of Ambreſbury. He had by his ſecond wife, Margaret of France, two ſons and a daughter; Thomas, created earl of Norfolk, and mareſchal of England; and Edmond, who was created earl of Kent by his brother after he aſcended the throne. The princeſs died in her infancy.

The remarkable occurrences of this king's reign were as follow :

In the third year of his reign, a general earthquake happened in England ; from which, among other accidents, St. Michael's church on the Hill, near Glaſtonbury in Somerſetſhire was entirely thrown down.

In his ſixteenth year, as the king and queen were talking together in their bed-chamber, a flaſh of lightning ſtruck in at the window, paſſed by them, and killed two of the ſervants in waiting, though their majeſties received no other injury than being greatly frightened.

In the 27th of his reign, an act was made by the common-council of London for preventing impoſition in the ſale of proviſions, when the prices of poultry to be ſold in the city were fixed as follow:

	s.	d.		s.	d.
A fat cock —	0	1½	A plover —	0	1
Two pullets —	0	1½	A ſwan —	3	0
A fat capon —	0	2½	A crane —	1	0

A partridge —	0	1½	All the reſt of the year	0	4

In this king's reign the title of Baron, which was common to all ſuch as held lands of the crown, was confined to thoſe only who were ſummoned by the king in parliament.

SECTION II.

EDWARD II. SURNAMED of CAERNARVON.

EDWARD II. was not quite twenty-three years of age when he acceded to the throne of England. The gracefulneſs of his perſon, the majeſty of his appearance, and the mildneſs of his diſpoſition inſpired the people with the moſt pleaſing ideas of enjoying both happineſs and tranquillity under his government. But they ſoon perceived that all their hopes were built on a chimerical foundation, and that the pleaſing proſpect was merely deluſive.

The firſt act of his reign gave an unhappy omen of what followed. His father had ſcarcely reſigned his breath, and himſelf received the homage of the Engliſh prelates and nobility at Carliſle, than, forgetting his promiſes to his dying parent, he ſent to recall his favourite Gaveſton ; and, without waiting his return, made him the richeſt ſubject in the kingdom, by creating him earl of Cornwall.

Such was his prejudice in favor of this minion, that no ſooner did he hear of his arrival in England, than his impatience to have his company got the better of faith, honor, promiſes, intereſt, and even decency ; he inſtantly appointed the earl of Pembroke his governor of that part of Scotland which ſtill remained in allegiance to the Engliſh, and then haſtened to welcome the companion of his wiſhes.

Gaveſton was no ſooner returned, than the weak and deluded young monarch removed all his father's officers and domeſtics, without even adviſing with his council. Langſton, biſhop of Lincoln, treaſurer to the late king, was removed from his dignities, his effects were ſequeſtered, and himſelf impriſoned in Wallingford-caſtle.

About Michaelmas a parliament was ſummoned at Northampton, to regulate the late king's funeral[*], together with the marriage and coronation of his ſon, the reigning prince, and alſo to deliberate on the ſtate of the nation. Here a ſubſidy was granted to defray the expences of the two ceremonies ; and a very impolitic ordinance was paſſed, making the baſe coin, which had been cried down in the preceding reign, again current throughout the kingdom.

Edward, not ſatisfied with having broken his engagements to his dying father, in the two inſtances of recalling Gaveſton, and the diſpoſal of his royal body, now added a third of the moſt aggravating kind, by beſtowing upon his favourite, as a gift, the very ſum which the deceaſed prince had, by his laſt will, appropriated to the maintenance of 140 knights, who had engaged to carry his heart to Jeruſalem ; and, to crown the whole, he gave him his niece Margaret, ſiſter to the young earl of Glouceſter, in marriage, the nuptials being celebrated with great magnificence on the firſt of October.

While Edward was thus laviſhing power, honours and eſtates on a worthleſs favourite, the war in Scotland was neglected. Bruce, who had retired to his faſtneſſes on the approach of the former Edward, now appeared boldly on the plain, fell upon the county of Galloway, and ſoon reduced it to his obedience. The earl of Britany was ſent at the head of a powerful army to ſtop the career of the Scots ; and Bruce perceiving that it would be in vain to contend with a force ſo ſuperior to his own, once more retired to the mountains and moraſſes of that country.

A. D. 1308. The neceſſary preparations being made for Edward's voyage to the continent, in order to conſummate his marriage with the princeſs Iſabella, daughter of Philip the Fair, he ſailed early on the morning of the twenty-ſecond of January, and landing at Boulogne, did homage to the king of France

---

[*] The body of the deceaſed king, inſtead of being conveyed into Scotland, agreeable to his dying requeſt, was removed from Carliſle to Waltham ; from hence it was carried to Weſtminſter-abbey, where it was interred with great ſolemnity on the 18th of October 1307, on the north ſide of the ſhrine of St. Edward, under a tomb of grey marble, with the following inſcription : Edwardus Primus, Scotorum malleus, hic eſt. 1307. Pactum Serva. That is, " Here lies Edward I. the Scourge of the Scots. 1307. Obſerve Engagements."---It is remarkable that the tomb of this king was opened ſo lately as in the month of May 1774, the cauſe of which was as follows: The Society of Antiquarians having found it mentioned in a book called Rymer's Fœdera, that king Edward I. ſurnamed Long-ſhanks, was interred in a ſtone coffin, incloſed in a ſtone tomb, in Edward the Confeſſor's Chapel, and that a ſum of money was allowed to preſerve the tomb, determined to gratify their curioſity by endeavouring to diſcover the truth of it. Accordingly they applied to the dean of Weſtminſter for leave to open the tomb, who readily complied with their requeſt. At the time appointed for opening the tomb, the dean, with about fifteen of the ſociety, attended, when, to their great aſtoniſhment, they found the royal corpſe to appear as repreſented by the hiſtorian. He had on a gold and ſilver tiſſue robe, over which was a very handſome one of crimſon velvet, both of them quite freſh ; and the jewels that were about him appeared exceeding bright. He had in one hand a ſceptre and dove, and in the other a ſceptre and croſs, which meaſured near five feet in length. The crown on his head being raiſed, the ſkull appeared bare, but the face and hands ſeemed perfectly entire. He meaſured in length ſix feet two inches.

France on the twenty-fourth. The following day the nuptials were celebrated in the church of Boulogne, the kings of France, Navarre, of the Romans and Sicily, with the queens of the two former monarchs, being preſent at the ſolemnity.

Edward, after ſpending ſome days on the continent, returned to England, and was crowned with his new queen at Weſtminſter, on the twenty-fifth of February. But a difficulty aroſe, previous to the performance of the ceremony, which greatly alarmed the monarch. The barons, exaſperated at the inſolence of Gaveſton, who affected to treat them with the moſt mortifying contempt, refuſed to aſſiſt at the coronation, unleſs Gaveſton was baniſhed the kingdom. Edward promiſed to redreſs all their grievances provided they would not force him to delay the ceremony; and the barons, in return, agreed to ſuſpend their reſentment. But Gaveſton was ſo far from profiting by theſe national marks of diſguſt to his perſon and conduct, that he appeared, with the moſt faſtidious pomp, in the proceſſion, in which he carried the crown of St. Edward before the king. One of the barons was ſo highly provoked at his aſſuming behaviour, that he was, with ſome difficulty, prevented from ſacrificing the inſulting favourite to his reſentment.

No ſooner was the ceremony of the coronation over, than Edward, unmindful of his promiſe to his barons, began to heap new favours every day upon Gaveſton: there was no acceſs to the king's perſon but through him; and all places of profit and honour were diſpoſed of ſolely by his will. The barons were ſo irritated at this, that a party was formed againſt Gaveſton, at the head of which was Thomas earl of Lancaſter, couſin-german to the king, and once the moſt opulent and powerful ſubject in England. The confederate barons bound themſelves, by a ſolemn oath, never to deſert each other till the deteſted favourite was baniſhed the kingdom. Countenanced by the oppoſition of the nobility, the people paid no longer any ſubmiſſion to the laws: robberies, murders, and other alarming diſorders, the conſtant preludes to civil war, were committed in every part of the kingdom. But Gaveſton ſtill deſpiſed the threatening ſtorm, and even treated the young queen with contempt.

The king, in order to remove theſe diſorders, ſummoned a parliament at Weſtminſter. The barons, determined not to miſs ſo favourable an opportunity of effectually humbling the favourite, came to the houſe, attended by a numerous armed retinue, required the baniſhment of Gaveſton, and prevailed upon the biſhops to threaten him with excommunication. Edward found it would be madneſs to reſiſt, and therefore complied with their demands; but inſtead of ſending him out of the Engliſh dominions, as the barons expected, he appointed him lord lieutenant of Ireland, with powers as ample as thoſe of royalty itſelf, allotting him the whole revenue of that kingdom for his ſubſiſtence; and when the day of his exile came, he accompanied him as far as Briſtol, where he ſhewed the moſt unmanly weakneſs at parting with him.

A. D. 1309. Gaveſton, who did not want bravery, and poſſeſſed all the neceſſary talents for war, was not idle in his own government. He put the laws vigorouſty into execution, and reduced ſeveral bands of Iriſh rebels who had for ſome time diſturbed the peace of that kingdom. Theſe actions, together with Edward's conduct to his nobles during the favourite's abſence, made ſuch a change in the minds of the latter, that they even conſented to his being recalled, and all reſentment ſeemed to be buried in the grave of forgetfulneſs.

But Gaveſton learnt not wiſdom from experience: he forgot his former misfortunes, and reſumed, on his return, the ſame inſolence and oſtentation which had before procured his exile. The barons were now more provoked than ever; they determined to put it out of the power of the king himſelf to protect ſo hated a minion. They again came to parliament, attended by an army of their retainers, and compelled the king to ſurrender his authority into the hands of twelve perſons, whoſe ordinances were to have the force of ſtatutes.

A. D. 1311. After this junto had governed the kingdom near a year and a half, the king ſummoned a parliament to meet on the eighth of Auguſt, when a ſet of ordinances were produced, which the king confirmed with the ſame facility he granted this unlimited commiſſion to the barons. Theſe ordinances were twenty-ſix in number, the moſt material of which were as follow: That all evil counſellors ſhould be removed from the king's perſon, particularly Henry de Beaumont, and his ſiſter the lady de Veſey, who had obtained grants from the king diſhonourable to the dignity, and prejudicial to the prerogatives of the crown. That whereas Piers Gaveſton had given evil counſel to his majeſty, removed all perſons of integrity and abilities from the public offices, and ſupplied their places with his own weak and worthleſs creatures, embezzled the king's treaſure, impoveriſhed the realm, by obtaining unreaſonable grants, and procuring blank charters, which he filled up according to his own pleaſure, protected robbers, arrogated to himſelf the royal power and dignity, and formed aſſociations inconſiſtent with the laws of the land; he ſhould, for theſe miſdemeanors, abjure the kingdom for ever before the firſt of November; and if found in any part of his majeſty's dominions after that day, ſhould be treated as a public enemy. That the king ſhould not leave the realm, nor declare war againſt any prince or potentate, without the conſent of the barons. That on his quitting the kingdom with their conſent, a guardian of the realm ſhould be appointed by the parliament, who ſhould alſo nominate the chief officers of the ſtate, of the houſhold, of the revenue, and of juſtice, as well as the keepers of foreſts, the eſcheators on both ſides the Trent, and, in a word, all perſons employed under the crown in any part of his Majeſty's dominions. That all perſons in office ſhould take an oath to obſerve theſe ordinances; and that one biſhop, two earls, and as many barons, ſhould be choſen in every parliament, to receive the complaints againſt the king's miniſters, and others who ſhould violate theſe ordinances, and to puniſh offenders at diſcretion.

Though ſeveral of theſe ordinances were well calculated, not only for the regular diſpenſation of juſtice, but alſo as barriers againſt any oppreſſion on the people, yet others wholly deprived the king of his prerogative, and rendered him a mere cypher in government. Edward was no ſtranger to this; and therefore, when he ſigned them, he determined to obſerve them no longer than he had an opportunity of declaring them void, and of no effect. For as the commiſſion was granted ſolely for the purpoſe of making ſuch ordinances as ſhould be advantageous both to the king and his people, ſuch articles as ſhould be found prejudicial to either could not be conſidered as ratified and confirmed. The parliament was therefore no ſooner diſſolved, than the king repaired to York, where he publiſhed a proclamation, repealing the article relative to the exile of Piers Gaveſton, "as being unjuſt, and contrary to the oath taken by the king at his coronation." Gaveſton immediately obeyed the royal mandate, and was reinſtated in all his former employments.

A. D. 1312. This barefaced breach of the late ordinances ſo exaſperated the barons, that they immediately took up arms, and beſieged Gaveſton in Scarborough Caſtle. The king exerted all his power in raiſing an army for the relief of his favourite; but his attempts were in vain; for the people refuſed to join his ſtandard.

While the king was thus employed in endeavouring to raiſe a body of forces, Gaveſton, ſenſible of the bad condition of his garriſon, and the want of proviſions, was obliged to capitulate; by which it was agreed, that he ſhould ſurrender himſelf a priſoner for two months, during which time means ſhould be uſed for bringing about an accommodation; but if the terms propoſed by the barons ſhould not be accepted, the caſtle ſhould be reſtored to him in the ſame condition as when he ſurrendered it.

The earl of Pembroke, taking charge of the priſoner, propoſed to conduct him to Wallingford caſtle, which belonged to Gaveſton as earl of Cornwal; but he ſtopped at Dedington in Oxfordſhire, where he left him under a guard on pretence of having ſome very preſſing buſineſs to tranſact in the neighbourhood.

The earl of Warwick, having notice given him of this diſpoſition, got together a ſtrong force and ſurrounding the houſe where Gaveſton was lodged, took him out of the cuſtody of his keepers, and carried him to his own caſtle of Warwick, where the earls of Lancaſter, Hereford, and Arundel were aſſembled. Here a ſham trial was ſet on foot, and Gaveſton adjudged to die as an enemy to the public; after which he was removed to a place called Blacklow Hill, about a mile from Warwick, where his head was ſevered from his body by an executioner who had been previouſly provided for the bloody purpoſe. Such was the end of Piers Gaveſton, who, having enjoyed his prince's favour in a higher degree than was ſcarce ever known in any other inſtance, fell at laſt a victim to his own vanity, inſolence and avarice!

When Edward was informed of the death of his favorite, he was almoſt frantic; he threatened to take the ſevereſt vengeance, and even to exterminate his whole noblity who were concerned in that deteſtable action. But he ſoon found that his threatenings were in vain. The more reaſonable part of the nation could not indeed behold this bloody tragedy without horror, and dread the conſequence of a reformation begun with murder and perjury; yet they did not think it adviſeable to plunge the nation into all the horrors of a civil war, and depopulate the kingdom to revenge a breach of the laws of humanity. Nor was Edward himſelf inexorable in his reſentments; he ſoon liſtened to the terms of accommodation. It was ſtipulated, that the barons ſhould aſk him pardon publickly on their knees, and he was ſo pleaſed with theſe vain appearances of exterior ſubmiſſion, that he readily forgave them all their paſt offences.

A. D. 1314. All animoſities being now ſubſided between the king and his barons, it was determined to ſend a powerful force againſt the Scots, who taking advantage of the troubles in England, had made inroads into the northern counties, and committed the moſt dreadful ravages. The whole military force of the kingdom was aſſembled; and Edward put himſelf at the head of a powerful army, which, according to the Scottiſh writers, amounted to an hundred thouſand men. Bruce, whoſe army was inferior in numbers, endeavoured to ſupply by art, what he wanted in ſtrength. Perſuaded that this important conteſt was to decide the fate of his kingdom, he choſe the field of battle with the utmoſt prudence, and made the neceſſary preparations for receiving the Egliſh. He poſted himſelf at Bannock-burn, about two miles from Sterling; having a hill on his right flank, and a moraſs on his left. In the front of his camp ran a ſmall rivulet, the banks of which, as well as the bed of the ſtream, he filled with ſharp ſtakes; and cauſed deep pits to be dug a little beyond the oppoſite bank, into which ſharp ſtakes were alſo planted, and the whole covered over with turf. The van of the Engliſh army reached the neighbourhood of the Scottiſh camp in the evening of the twenty-fourth of June, and a ſmart ſkirmiſh enſued between two parties of cavalry. The Engliſh were led by Henry de Bohun, a younger brother of the earl of Hereford, and the Scots by Bruce in perſon. The conteſt was very bloody; but was at laſt decided in favour of the Scots, by the valour of Bruce, who rode up to Bohun, and cleft his head with a battle-axe, in ſight of both armies.

The Engliſh, on the loſs of their leader, retreated, and night coming on, the general attack was poſponed till the morning, when the Engliſh troops prepared for the dreadful conflict. The wings, compoſed of cavalry, were commanded by the earls of Glouceſter and Hereford, and the king himſelf led the centre or main body. Bruce drew up his forces, conſiſting chiefly of foot, in three lines, and a body of reſerve. The centre was commanded by himſelf, the right wing by his brother Edward, the left by Randolph, and the body of reſerve by Sir James Douglas and the lord high ſteward of Scotland.

When the Engliſh army were juſt ready to engage, a diſpute happened between the earls of Glouceſter an Hereford, with regard to making the firſt attack upon the enemy. The firſt claimed it by cuſtom, as having been always employed by his anceſtors, and the latter as conſtable of England. The earl of Glouceſter, determined not to ſubmit to his opponent, broke the rank, and, impelled by all the ardour of youth, ruſhed on to the attack, and fell among the covered pits, by which means his whole ſquadron was thrown into confuſion, and he himſelf periſhed. This imprudent ſally of youth proved fatal to the Engliſh army. Several of the covered pits had been diſcovered during the ſkirmiſh in the evening; and the king, in order to prevent a ſimilar misfortune, gave orders for a body of infantry to take a circuit round the moraſs, and attack the main body of the Scottiſh army in flank; and during the confuſion of that unexpected attack, the cavalry were to have forced the paſſage of the rivulet, and fallen ſword in hand on the embarraſſed enemy.

Glouceſter had hardly paid the forfeit of his imprudence and diſregard to military diſcipline, when the Engliſh infantry, having made the preſcribed circuit, fell with the utmoſt fury on the wing commanded by Randolph, and galled them ſo ſeverely with repeated ſhowers of arrows, that they were thrown into diſorder. Sir James Douglas perceived the confuſion, and fell ſuddenly upon the rear of the Engliſh with ſuch impetuoſity, that they were routed with great ſlaughter. The main body of the Engliſh, however, marched up with a determined reſolution to attack the enemy; when they obſerved on the heights towards their left, the appearance of another army marching leiſurely to ſurround them. This formidable appearance was nothing more than a number of waggoners and ſumpter boys, whom Bruce had ſupplied with military ſtandards, which at a diſtance gave them the appearance of a numerous body of forces. The Engliſh were ſtruck with a pannic; they fled with the utmoſt precipitation and Bruce obtained a complete victory.

The booty acquired by the Scots was prodigious; beſides which they took ſeveral perſons of diſtinction priſoners, who paid largely for their ranſom. Edward himſelf had ſcarce time to reach Dunbar caſtle, before Sir James Douglas appeared at the head of four hundred horſe, hoping to intercept Edward if he attempted to eſcape to Berwick by land; but the king eluded his vigilance by paſſing to that town by water.

Bruce diſtinguiſhed himſelf as much after the victory by his humanity and generoſity, as he had done in the battle by his bravery and prudence. He treated all his priſoners with the greateſt tenderneſs; he ſent the bodies of the earl of Glouceſter and lord Clifford to the Engliſh monarch at Berwick; he diſmiſſed lord Monthermer, for whom he had a particular friendſhip, without ranſom; he exchanged the earl of Hereford and other noblemen, for his wife, his daughter and ſiſter, the earl of Mar and the biſhop of Glaſgow, who had remained priſoners in England ever ſince the battle of Methuen: and he cauſed the dead bodies left on the field of battle to be decently interred.

A. D. 1315. The barons were not in the leaſt affected at the overthrow of their monarch by the Scotch king, but, on the contrary, ſeemed totally regardleſs of the honor of their country, and even founded the hopes of their own future grandeur on the weakneſs and diſtreſſes of the crown. They no ſooner ſaw the king return with diſgrace, than they inſiſted on a renewal of their ordinances, and Lancaſter was placed at the head of the miniſtry. Edward perceived his danger, and ſenſible of his own incapacity for holding the reins of government, attached himſelf to a new favourite. This was Hugh le Deſpenſer, or Spencer, a young man of high rank, deſcended from a noble family, and an Engliſhman by birth. He poſſeſſed all the exterior accompliſhments of perſon and addreſs, neceſſary to engage the affections of Edward; but wanted that prudence and moderation which alone could have ſupported him in this dangerous pre-eminence, ſurrounded by ſuch numbers of powerful enemies. Had the oppoſition of the barons, however, been founded on virtue, and directed only to ſupport the honor of their country, theſe defects would have been conſidered as abundantly ſupplied by the talents and experience of the father of this new favourite, and who had alſo acquired a conſiderable ſhare in the adminiſtration. He was a nobleman venerable for his age, and during his whole life had been reſpected for his wiſdom, his valor and his intrepidity. But envy now obſcured all his merits; his paſt ſervices were forgotten; and he was, together with his ſon, devoted to deſtruction.

A. D. 1321. The turbulent barons firſt indicated their diſpleaſure by abſenting themſelves from parliament; this not producing the deſired effect, they determined to have recourſe to more powerful methods for completing their deſigns. It was not long before an opportunity offered. Edward, who had ſet no bounds to his bounty with regard to his favourites, had not only married the younger Spencer to his neice, one of the co-heireſſes of the earl of Glouceſter (ſlain at the fatal battle of Bannock-burn) but alſo given him a barony, which it was pretended had reverted to the crown. This tranſaction, which could be conſidered as nothing more than a proper ſubject for a law-ſuit, cauſed an inſurrection in the kingdom. Lancaſter, and ſeveral other barons, flew to arms, and peremptorily demanded the baniſhment of the two Spencers. The king refuſed to comply; upon which they marched to London, and preſented to the parliament an accuſation againſt the favourites. All reſiſtance was in vain: the two Spencers were condemned to baniſhment without a ſingle crime being proved againſt them.

This ſentence was voted by the lay barons alone, not the leaſt attention beig paid to the voice of the prelates. The only indication thoſe turbulent barons gave of their regard to law, was, their requiring from the king an indemnity for their illegal proceedings; after which they diſbanded their army, and retired to their ſeveral caſtles.

Edward, circumſtanced as he was, might poſſibly have ſubmitted to this incroachment made upon his prerogative, had not a freſh inſult rouſed him from his indolence. The queen, having occaſion to paſs by the caſtle of Leeds in Kent, belonging to Lord Badleſmere, one of the confederate barons, diſpatched ſome of her ſervants to deſire a night's lodging in the caſtle; the requeſt was not only denied, but they were even refuſed admittance, and ſome of them killed. This outrageous behaviour to a princeſs who had joined the barons againſt the younger Spencer, was reſented by all parties, and the king, levying an army, made himſelf maſter of the caſtle, and put the governor and ſeveral of the garriſon to death. This ſeaſonable act of juſtice was approved even by the turbulent barons themſelves, and Edward, who was too apt to be over elated at the moſt trifling ſucceſs, now determined to attempt the recovery of his prerogative. He ventured to recall the two Spencers, whoſe ſentence he declared to be illegal and unjuſt, as being paſſed without the conſent of the prelates, and extorted by violence from him and the barons aſſembled in parliament. He added, that he was bound by the great charter to receive the petitions of the Spencers, becauſe he was obliged to do juſtice to all his ſubjects.

A. D. 1322. The turbulent barons ſtill continued in arms, upon which Edward, at the head of a powerful army, marched againſt them, and continued his rout to the borders of Wales, where, finding them totally unprepared for reſiſtance, he ſeized their caſtles, and many of them being taken, were committed to priſon.

In this diſtreſſed ſituation, the barons had recourſe to the Scottiſh monarch, with whom they concluded a treaty, promiſing to recognize his title to the crown of Scotland; and that prince in return, ſtipulated to aſſiſt them with a body of forces. Encouraged by the hopes of a powerful aſſiſtance, and joined by the earl of Hereford at the head of his retainers, Lancaſter poſted himſelf at Burton upon Trent, in order to defend the paſſage of the river. But he wanted intrepidity in the day of battle; he was intimidated at the approach of the royal army, and retreated towards Borough-bridge, in order, if poſſible, to reach the borders of Scotland. Unfortunately for Lancaſter, Sir Andrew Harcla, governor of Carliſle, ſuſpecting his deſign, poſted himſelf, at the head of a body of troops, to oppoſe his paſſage over the Eure, ſo that Lancaſter found himſelf reduced to the wretched alternative of venturing an engagement, or ſurrendering himſelf a priſoner to Harcla. He choſe the former: but the earl of Hereford being ſlain in the firſt attack, the barons troops fled with great precipitation, and Lancaſter was taken priſoner. Harcla conducted the earl to the king at Pomfret, where he was tried by a court martial, and condemned to death. Lancaſter now experienced no leſs indignities than what had been practiſed upon Gaveſton. He was dreſſed in mean apparel, placed upon a lean horſe without a bridle, and a hood put upon his head. In this ignominious manner he was conducted to an eminence in the neighbourhood of Pomfret, amidſt the ſcoffs of the rabble, and there beheaded. Thus fell Thomas earl of Lancaſter, a prince of the blood, and one of the moſt powerful barons ever known in England; but whoſe tutbulent temper hurried him into meaſures deſtructive at once of the peace of ſociety, and the honour of his country.

Lancaſter, however, was not the only perſon that ſuffered on this occaſion; about twenty other barons were afterwards tried and executed. Many made their eſcape into France, and others were taken and thrown into priſon. Oppoſition ſeemed to lie gaſping at the feet of Edward. Harcla was rewarded for his ſervices with a large eſtate and the earldom of Carliſle; but he did not long enjoy the royal bounty, for he forfeited his honors and life by being found guilty of holding a treaſonable correſpondence with the king of Scotland.

Edward, deſirous that his kingdom might have ſome reſpite from the calamities of Scottiſh invaſions, liſtened to overtures of peace made by Henry de Sully, the ambaſſador from the court of France; and, about Midſummer 1323, a truce was agreed upon for thirteen years. By the articles of this truce it was agreed, that a free commerce ſhould be open between the two nations, but no other correſpondence without a licence from the conſervators of the truce: that no new caſtles ſhould be built, nor any old fortreſſes repaired: and laſtly, that the truce ſhould remain in force, though the king of England, or lord Robert Bruce ſhould die in the interim.

A. D. 1324. The truce with Scotland was the more convenient to England, as the nation was at this time threatened with new calamities. Charles the Fair, the third ſon, and the third ſucceſſor of Philip the Fair, ſummoned Edward to do him homage for his province of Guienne. Spencer, who ſaw all the conſequences that might attend his own authority during the king's abſence, would not conſent to his leaving the kingdom. The parliament was conſulted, and it was the unanimous opinion of the whole aſſembly, that it was improper for the king to go abroad in perſon, but that ambaſſadors ſhould be ſent to the court of France, requeſting that the homage might be delayed till a more convenient opportunity. Charles refuſed to poſtpone the ceremony, and ſent a body of forces to attack Guienne. It was now thought proper to ſend the queen Iſabella to her brother's court, in order, if poſſible, to bring about an accommodation; but all her attempts were in vain; Charles inſiſted that Edward ſhould repair to Paris in perſon to perform his homage.

While theſe diſputes were in agitation, the fertile brain of Iſabella furniſhed her with an expedient for removing all difficulties, and putting it in her power to be revenged on the young Spencer, whom ſhe heartily deteſted. She propoſed that the king ſhould reſign the ſovereignty of Guienne to his ſon, and that the prince ſhould be ſent to Paris to perform the duties of a vaſſal. This expedient was greedily embraced by the Spencers, and the young prince, attended by the biſhop of Oxford, went over to Paris, and did the required homage and allegiance to the French monarch.

The artful Iſabella had now gained her principal point, and was determined to make uſe of her good fortune, by procuring the deſtruction of her enemies. Edward and his favourites were convinced of the egregious blunder they had committed, in truſting the perſon of the heir apparent to the crown in the hands of an ambitious woman. The queen, on her arrival in France, had found a great number of fugitives, the remains of the Lancaſtrian party; and their common hatred of Spencer ſoon cemented a ſecret friendſhip between them. Among the reſt was Roger Mortimer, a powerful baron in the Welſh marches, and one of the leaders of the late rebellion. This young nobleman ſoon inſinuated himſelf into her affections, and ſhe ſacrificed to a vicious paſſion all the ſentiments of honor and fidelity ſhe owed to her huſband. It was in vain that Edward ordered her to return; ſhe declared her reſolution of continuing in France till the Spencers were baniſhed England with infamy and diſgrace.

A. D. 1326. Edward and his friends tried every gentle method they could deviſe to bring the refractory Iſabella to a ſenſe of her duty; but all in vain: ſhe remained deaf to the lenient voice of intreaty. Recourſe was therefore had to the pope, who readily engaged in the cauſe of the injured Edward. He wrote a very preſſing letter to the king of France, inſiſting, even on pain of excommunication, that the queen of England ſhould be ſent back to her huſband.

Charles was ſo affected by this menace, by the continual remonſtrances of the Engliſh envoys, and much more by the ſhameful commerce carried on between Mortimer and his ſiſter, that he determined not to ſupport her any longer: he accordingly ſhewed her the pope's letter, and told her that he could not, either with honor or ſafety to himſelf, continue to afford her ſhelter and protection.

Iſabella had for ſome time expected this event, and had therefore taken proper care to guard againſt its conſequences. She had affianced her ſon, the prince of Wales, to the daughter of William, count of Hainault and Holland; who, in return, promiſed her an aſylum in his dominions, and to aſſiſt her with a body of troops to humble her enemies. She therefore retired directly into Hainault, where ſhe was received with the greateſt marks of kindneſs and reſpect. Every method was now uſed for raiſing an army to attend the queen and the young prince to England; and about three thouſand men in arms were collected for this expedition, under the command of John de Hainault, the count's brother. But Iſabella did not found her hopes of ſucceſs on the number and valor of her troops in the intended invaſion of her huſband's dominions, but in the connections ſhe had formed with the diſcontented nobles. All the old Lancaſtrian faction were ready to join her; and the families of about twenty of the nobility, who had ſuffered with the late earl of Lancaſter, were the more zealous in their attachment, as they hoped, in conſequence of her ſucceſs, to be reſtored to the eſtates which had been forfeited in conſequence of the rebellion of their relation. Beſides theſe, others had joined the queen's party. The king's brothers, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, with other prelates, and ſeveral of the moſt powerful barons, approved her meaſures; ſo that nothing was wanting but the appearance of the queen and the prince, with ſuch a body of foreign forces as was ſufficient to protect them againſt immediate violence, to turn the whole force of the tempeſt againſt the unfortunate Edward.

Iſabella, having collected her forces at Dort, embarked with her ſon, and landed in Suffolk on the twenty-fourth of September. She was immediately joined by the princes of the blood, and other factious nobles. But to give her hoſtile appearance a ſtill more favourable aſpect, ſhe renewed her declaration, that the ſole motive of her enterprize was to deliver the nation from the tyranny of the Spencers, and of chancellor Baldoc, their creature. This proclamation had the deſired effect: the ardor of the Engliſh to join the ſtandard of the queen was aſtoniſhing; even Robert de Watteville, who had been ſent by Edward to oppoſe her progreſs in Suffolk, deſerted to her with all his forces.

Edward, who was at this time in London, applied to the citizens for aſſiſtance againſt the invaders of his kingdom; but he ſoon perceived that no reliance could be placed on their loyalty. He therefore ſet out for the weſtern parts of England, hoping that his ſubjects in that corner of the kingdom would commiſerate majeſty in diſtreſs, and ſupport their king againſt the unnatural rebellion of an implacable woman. But he was deceived; they flocked not to his ſtandard; and that unfortunate prince formed a reſolution of paſſing over into Ireland, leaving the elder Spencer to command in the caſtle of Briſtol.

No ſooner had Edward left London, than the populace committed the moſt dreadful diſorders. They plundered the houſes, and murdered the perſons of all who were obnoxious to them. Even the acknowledged virtues of the biſhop of Exeter could not protect him from their rage. He was dragged, like a felon, to the great croſs in Cheapſide, where his head was ſevered from his body. The other cities followed the example of the capital; and taking advantage of the national confuſion, committed every ſpecies of outrage with wantonneſs and impunity.

The earl of Kent, aſſiſted by John de Hainault, at the head of his foreign mercenaries, went to Briſtol, and inveſted the caſtle, where the elder Spencer had ſhut himſelf up, and would have defended the fortreſs to the laſt extremity, had not his garriſon been infected with the diſloyalty of the times; they therefore mutinied againſt their commander, and delivered him up to the enemy.

No reſpect was paid to this venerable nobleman, who had nearly reached his ninetieth year. All his former ſervices, as well as his virtues, were forgotten; and though they could alledge nothing againſt him but his loyalty to his maſter, he was condemned to death by the rebellious barons, and hanged on a gibbet like a common malefactor.

Edward, in conſequence of his reſolution, had embarked for Ireland; but being driven back by contrary winds, he endeavoured to conceal himſelf among the mountains of Wales. Iſabella was alarmed when ſhe heard that her huſband was in his own dominions. She feared that his diſtreſſed ſituation might turn the tide of popular favor againſt her party; and it was therefore determined to ſeize the perſon of the king. The difficulty of diſcovering his retreat was ſoon removed, by bribing the Welſh, who delivered up the unfortunate king* into the hands of his enemies. At the time he was ſeized he had with him only the younger Spencer, Robert de Baldock the chancellor, Stephen de Reading, and a few domeſtics; all the reſt of his courtiers having forſaken him in his misfortunes.

The exultation of the queen and her paramour exceeded all the bounds of decency, in beholding their capital enemy, the young Spencer, in their power. Without waiting for the meeting of a parliament, he reſolved to make him the immediate ſacrifice to her vengeance. He was accordingly brought to a mock trial before the queen; but he refuſed to plead before this unauthorized tribunal, in conſequence of which ſentence of death was paſſed on him; and he was condemned to be hanged, drawn and quartered. This ſentence was executed with the moſt ſhocking circumſtances of barbarity and inſult: his limbs were diſperſed through the principal towns in England, and his head was left affixed to the gibbet, as a ſpectacle to glut the eyes of his revengeful adverſaries. Stephen de Reading ſuffered the like death; but Baldock, being a prieſt, was committed to the priſon of the biſhop of Hereford, from whence he was ſent to London, and confined in Newgate, where he ſoon fter ended his days, through the barbarous uſage he nderwent there and in his conveyance from Here- ord.

In the mean time the unhappy Edward was con- eyed to Ledbury, and from thence, about the middle f December, to the caſtle of Kenelworth, where e continued all the winter, under the cuſtody of he earl of Lancaſter. Before his removal, however, he queen, willing to have all poſſible ſanction to her roceedings, had, by the advice of her council, ſent e biſhop of Hereford to demand the great ſeal of e king, who, finding it in vain to contend with his te, delivered it up without ſhewing the leaſt reluct- ce.

Iſabella, having thus obtained the great ſeal, was now inveſted with the actual exerciſe of the government; and the firſt uſe ſhe made of it was, to convoke, in the name of her huſband, a parliament who were to dethrone him, and which was appointed to aſſemble on the 7th of January following. This buſineſs being done, ſhe left Hereford, and went to keep her Chriſtmas at Wallingford Caſtle, where, in the adulterous embraces of the infamous Mortimer, ſhe forgot every call of nature; ſhe loſt every ſenſe of ſhame; nor ſeemed to remember that there exiſted ſuch a perſon as the wretched Edward, her ſovereign and huſband.

A. D. 1327. The parliament, according to appointment, aſſembled at Weſtminſter on the 7th of January; and on the 10th an impeachment was exhibited againſt the king; in which, though it was drawn by his moſt inveterate enemies, nothing but his confined genius or his misfortunes were alleged againſt him; malice itſelf not being able to find any particular crime that could be alledged againſt him. But this was of little weight in an aſſembly convoked for his deſtruction. The ſpirit of faction had annihilated juſtice. The impeachment being read in the preſence of the prince, ſeated on the throne, it was reſolved that young Edward ſhould aſſume the reins of government, and that Edward II. ſhould no longer be ſtiled king of England, but only Edward of Caernarvon, the king's father.

This reſolution of the parliament being notified to the queen, ſhe affected the deepeſt ſorrow for her huſband's ſufferings; and ſo well did ſhe play her part, that young Edward, (who was poſſeſſed of tender ſenſations) was ſo affected with the ſcene, which he believed to be real, that he ſolemnly ſwore not to take upon him the government, if not voluntarily reſigned by his father.

The perfidious queen now began to be apprehenſive that ſhe had ſpun the web of diſſimulation too fine: the generous reſolution of young Edward might have diſconcerted the whole plan of her and her faction, the government would naturally revert to its firſt principals, and all they were doing was treaſonable againſt the ſtate, and might prove fatal to themſelves.

In this perplexity the cabal found it abſolutely neceſſary to oblige the king to reſign his crown to his ſon. To effect which certain commiſſioners were immediately appointed for carrying to Edward the reſolution of the parliament with regard to his depoſition. This deputation conſiſted of three biſhops, three earls, two abbots, and two knights for each county, together with Sir William Truſſel, one of the judges, who was nominated the nation's particular procurator. Theſe were inſtructed to uſe every argument they could deviſe to prevail upon Edward to make a voluntary reſignation of that power they were determined he ſhould no longer hold.

In order to prepare the unfortunate king for the approaching change of his condition, the biſhops of Hereford and Lincoln, two of his moſt inveterate enemies, were ſent to converſe with him before the deputies arrived. Edward was ſufficiently convinced that his fate was determined when theſe two prelates appeared; and the manner in which they diſcharged their commiſſion was perfectly ſimilar to the reſt of their conduct. Inſtead of pouring the balm of conſolation into the breaſt of wounded royalty, they aggravated the pungent ſmart by a thouſand malicious inſinuations: and when they perceived Edward made the leaſt ſtruggle to maintain his dignity, by refuſing to confer with the deputies; they told him, "that if he continued obſtinate in refuſing to reſign, the parliament would involve his whole family in his guilt, exclude all his children from the ſucceſſion, and place another perſon on the throne of his anceſtors." This menace awakened all the fondneſs of a father in the ſoul of the unfortunate Edward: he pauſed; he dropped a tear to the remembrance of his fallen ſtate; conſented to admit the deputies to an audience, and retired to his chamber.

As ſoon as he had recollected his ſpirits, he entered the chamber of audience dreſſed in a mourning habit; but after the articles of impeachment againſt him were read, and the commiſſioners had demanded his immediate reſignation, he was unable to ſtand the ſhock; his ſpirits forſook him, and he had fallen to the ground, had not the biſhop of Lincoln ſupported him in this dreadful moment of conflicting paſſions. As ſoon as he recovered, he proceeded to the ceremony of reſignation, by delivering, with his own hands, to the commiſſioners, the crown, ſcepter, and other enſigns of royalty, which had been brought thither for that purpoſe. And Sir William Truſſel renounced, in the name of the parliament and people, all future allegiance and fealty.

This melancholy ceremony (which was performed on the 20th of January 1327) being over, the commiſſioners returned to London, and young Edward was placed on his father's throne. But it was impoſſible to prevent theſe atrocious acts of violence from opening the eyes of a deluded people. The cruelty, the perfidy, and the infidelity of the queen, joined to her impudent hypocriſy, in publicly bewailing, with tears, the misfortunes of the king, who owed them all to her execrable conduct, could not fail of exciting the indignation of the Engliſh. Her infamous commerce with Mortimer increaſed the public odium, and ſhe was looked upon with deteſtation by every friend to truth, to virtue, to fidelity. The current of popular favour was now changed; the queen was looked upon with horror, while the fate of the unfortunate Edward was deplored. A ſcene of majeſty in diſtreſs attracted the pity, the compaſſion, the tears of the people. The earl of Lancaſter himſelf was touched with theſe generous ſentiments. He treated his royal captive with a lenity and tenderneſs very inconſiſtent with the projects his enemies had in view; and ſuch as gave the queen and Mortimer reaſon to fear that he harboured a deſign of reſtoring him to the throne.

In conſequence of this, the queen and her paramour reſolved to take the royal captive out of the hands of his too indulgent keeper, and to conſign him to the cuſtody of ſuch perſons on whom they could more firmly depend for the execution of their diabolical intentions. Accordingly, they ſent orders to have him conveyed from Kenelworth to Berkeley caſtle, in Glouceſterſhire, where he was placed under the care of Sir John Gurney and Sir John Maltravers, both of whom poſſeſſed that brutiſh diſpoſition which was requiſite for the deſigns of thoſe that employed them. Thomas, lord Berkeley, who was governor of the caſtle, did, indeed, endeavour in ſome meaſure to alleviate the wretched king's ſufferings by gentle uſage; which being obſerved by Gurney and Maltravers, they made ſuch a report thereof to their principals, that orders were ſent to remove Edward in the night, and to carry him from place to place, ſo that his friends might not know where he was. This order was obeyed with the moſt inhuman exactneſs; that he might be the more effectually diſguiſed, and not known to any he might meet, his barbarous keepers made him travel in the night with very thin cloaths and without any covering on the head; beſides which, during this melancholy progreſs, they offered him a thouſand indignities: they alſo attempted, more than once, to poiſon him; but the ſtrength of his conſtitution rendered all their attempts ineffectual.

In one of theſe nocturnal journies his ſavage tormentors made him alight in an open field, that he might have his head and beard ſhaven, which they did with cold water out of a ſtinking ditch. Here all Edward's firmneſs forſook him, and the horrors of his altered fate preſented themſelves ſo forcibly to his imagination, that for the firſt time he ſhed a flood of tears, telling them, that in deſpite of their inſolence and barbarity, he would be ſhaved with clean and warm water.

The unfeeling monſters having, as they thought, effectually eluded the ſearch, and defeated the attempts of his friends, brought him back again to Berkeley caſtle, where, as the lord of the place was now abſent, the poor king was left entirely to their management, who, by every vexation and fatigue they could deviſe, endeavoured to put an end to his exiſtence; but finding their endeavours had not ſo ſpeedy an effect as they could wiſh, they ſent for freſh inſtructions, for which they were not made to wait long. Adam Orleton, Biſhop of Hereford, who had been the chief contriver of the various ſpecies of torture and mortification the impriſoned king had undergone, and by which he thought to make his court to thoſe who were the original authors of his calamity, now ſent an order, doubtleſs with the privity, or rather by the direction, of the queen and Mortimer, for putting a ſpeedy end to Edward's life. This order was contained in a letter, directed to his keepers, Maltravers and Gurney, and couched in ſuch artful and ambiguous terms, that though the perſon to whom it was directed ſhould take it in the literal ſenſe, yet it furniſhed him with an opportunity of exculpating himſelf from the fact in caſe young Edward ſhould beſtir himſelf to bring the authors of his father's death to that puniſhment they juſtly merited.*

This diabolical ſtratagem but too well ſucceeded: no ſooner had the keepers read the letter than, perfectly ſenſible of what was expected from them, they entered the king's apartments while he lay aſleep, attended by other ruffians their followers, and cauſed him to be held faſt down to the bed; then thruſting a pipe, made of horn, up his body, they ran a red hot iron through it, and burnt his bowels in ſo horrid a manner, that the unfortunate king expired amidſt the moſt excruciating torments.

As ſoon as theſe monſters had perpetrated the execrable deed, they expoſed the body to public view, imagining that the precautions they had taken would effectually conceal the cauſe of his death; but though the ſkin appeared without any wound or blemiſh, the muſcles of his face were ſo diſtorted as plainly to ſhew that he had undergone ſevere agonies; beſides, a number of perſons, at a great diſtance from the caſtle, had heard the piercing ſhrieks and groans the tortured prince had thrown out while in the agonies of aſſaſſination.

After his body had been viewed by the prior of Briſtol,

* This letter contained the following words;

Edwardum occidere nolite timere bonum eſt:

The tranſlation of which is as follows:

To ſhed king Edward's blood
Refuſe to fear I count it good.

Theſe fallacious and artful lines admit of either a good or bad, a peaceable or ſanguinary conſtruction; for if a comma is placed after the Latin word nolite, or the Engliſh word refuſe, the lines imply the criminalty of entertaining any idea of the king's death; but if on the contrary the comma is placed after the Latin word timere, or the Engliſh word fear, the command to commit the murder appears poſitive.

Briſtol, the abbot of Glouceſter, and ſeveral perſons of quality and credit, it was buried, without farther enquiry, in the abbey of St. Peter at Glouceſter. His murtherers, however, were ſo far from recoverng the reward they expected for their infamous ſervices, that they were forced to fly beyond ſea, to avoid he reſentment of the people; and the very perſons hat employed them affected to make diligent ſearch fter them, to cover the ſhare they had in the crime.

Thus fell Edward II. by the hands of inhuman ſſaſſins, in the 43d year of his age, and the 20th of is reign. He fell a victim to an unguarded affection or his favourites, who, becauſe they were favouites, became juſtly the objects of national jeaouſy. As to his incapacity to govern, it does ot appear, by any means, to be ſo great as ſome riters have alledged; for though he had not all the alour and underſtanding of his father, yet he was either a coward nor a fool. In a word, he might ave continued to ſway the Britiſh ſceptre to his laſt oments, had he not countenanced the Spencers in he perſecution of the Lancaſtrian faction. The lood of that nobleman, and others who ſuffered ith him, proved a fountain from which deſtruction lowed upon thoſe who ſought their overthrow; hough, at the ſame time, it muſt be confeſſed that he king ought not to have been ſo ſeverely puniſhed; or would he, had not the reſentment of an imlacable woman turned reformation into diſloyalty, nd expelled from the government him, whom his eople ſought only to reclaim.

Edward left two ſons and two daughters, namely, dward his eldeſt ſon and ſucceſſor; John, afterwards reated earl of Cornwall, and who died young at erth; Jane, afterwards married to David Bruce, ing of Scotland; and Eleanor, married to Regild, count of Guelders.

The only remarkable occurrence that happened in is king's reign was, the diſſolution of the Knights emplars, which was occaſioned by the barbarous inſtice of pope Clement V. inſtigated by the cruel nd vindictive ſpirit of Philip the Fair king of France. his order owed its riſe to the firſt fervour of the ruſades; and by uniting valour with devotion, the two moſt popular qualities of that age, and employing both in the defence of the Holy Land, they ſoon made rapid advances to credit and authority. Hence they alſo acquired, from the piety of the faithful, very ample poſſeſſions in every country of Europe, eſpecially in France. But time having relaxed the ſeverity of their original virtues, and convinced them of the inefficacy of thoſe expeditions to the Eaſt, which had ſo long depopulated Europe, they choſe rather to enjoy in their native countries thoſe opulent eſtates, than expoſe themſelves to inceſſant dangers againſt the infidels in the Holy Land. By this change of conduct they loſt their popularity, while their riches tempted the avidity of ſeveral of the monarchs of Europe. But though they were no longer beheld with reverence by the people, they ſtill maintained a conſiderable part of their former credit; the vindictive ſpirit of Philip the Fair alone proved the ſource of their deſtruction. They were accuſed, by two profligate and impriſoned knights of their own order, of crimes ſo repugnant to reaſon and policy, that their being mentioned was abundantly ſufficient to deſtroy the credit of the witneſſes. But Philip was implacable. All the Templars in France were ſeized and committed to priſon in one day; above an hundred of them were put to the moſt cruel tortures, and fifty-nine burnt together near the abbey of St. Antoine, in Paris. Even the grand maſter of the order, John de Molay, and Guy, brother to the ſovereign of Dauphiné, two of the principal noblemen in Europe, the one by his dignity, and the other by his birth, were committed alive to the flames before the church of Notredame. Clement V. one of Philip's creatures, and who then reſided at Poictiers, aboliſhed the whole order, by the plenitude of his apoſtolic power. Their conduct underwent the ſtricteſt ſcrutiny in ſeveral parts of Europe, but not the leaſt trace of the crimes imputed to them by Philip was even pretended to be diſcovered. England ſent back an ample teſtimony of their piety and morals to the pope; but as the order was now annihilated, the knights were diſtributed into ſeveral convents, and their poſſeſſions transferred to the order of St. John.

SECTION III.

EDWARD III. SURNAMED of WINDSOR.

AS ſoon as the commiſſioners had returned from Kenelworth-caſtle, and made their report of the aptive king's reſignation, his ſon was immediately roclaimed king by the name of Edward the Third, nd a few days after was crowned at Weſtminſter by e archbiſhop of Canterbury. At this time he was ut fourteen years of age, and conſequently incapable f holding the reins of government; a council of reency was therefore appointed by the parliament for recting the adminiſtration of affairs during his miority. This council conſiſted of five prelates and ven lay peers, excluſive of the earl of Lancaſter, how as choſen guardian and protector of the king's erſon.

A. D. 1327. From the depoſition of the late ng, and the elevation of his ſon, the people flatred themſelves with receiving the moſt diſtinguiſhed dvantages; but they ſoon found the pleaſing proſpect vercaſt, and began to perceive that the government of a weak and imprudent king was not more to be dreaded than that of a minor prince, under the direction of a paſſionate and head-ſtrong woman, herſelf governed by an arbitrary and unexperienced miniſter, who, though he poſſeſſed even more power than the younger Spencer, was very deficient both with reſpect to abilities or intereſt, to that nobleman.

The Scotch, who conſidered the truce that had been made between them and the Engliſh, as terminated by the depoſition of the elder Edward, took advantage of the unſettled ſtate of the kingdom, and Bruce made an attempt upon the caſtle of Norham; but the governor, Sir Robert Manners, having intelligence of the deſign, made a ſally on them with ſuch ſucceſs that great numbers of them were killed, and the reſt fled with the greateſt precipitation.

Bruce, however, was not intimidated at this rebuff; he collected an army on the frontiers, conſiſting of twenty-five thouſand men, under the command of the earl of Murray and lord Douglas, and threatened to invade the northern counties. The Scots had been long trained to the deſultory practices of war. The noble equipage of their troops conſiſted of a bag of oatmeal, which, as a ſupply in caſes of neceſſity, each ſoldier carried behind him, together with a light plate of iron, on which he inſtantly baked the oatmeal into a cake in the open fields. But his chief ſubſiſtence was the cattle he ſeized; and his cookery was as expeditious as his other operations. After flaying the animal, he placed the ſkin hanging looſe in the form of a bag, on ſome ſtakes driven into the ground for that purpoſe; he poured a ſufficient quantity of water into this bag, kindled a fire below, and thus made it ſerve as a cauldron to boil his victuals. Soldiers like theſe, wholly unincumbered, and who diſlodged themſelves in a moment, could ravage provinces with impunity; and to this particular they chiefly owed the ſucceſs they afterwards met with in their various invaſions.

Though the Engliſh miniſtry would willingly have evaded the war with Scotland, yet they were too ſenſible of the fatal conſequences that muſt have ſucceeded, had they ſuffered ſuch inſults to have paſſed with impunity. Even the young prince conceived the neceſſity of repelling their attempts in ſuch a light, that he earneſtly deſired to lead his troops againſt the enemy and chaſtiſe their inſolence. No objection was made to his attending the campaign in perſon, and he marched to the northward at the head of 60,000 men. He found the enemy encamped on the declivity of a hill, at the foot of which was the river Were. But however deſirous Edward was of coming to an engagement, he ſoon perceived that he could not attack the enemy in their preſent ſituation, without expoſing his army to the utmoſt danger. Incenſed at being ſo near the enemy without being able to bring them to an engagement, Edward ſent them a defiance, and challenged them to meet him in the open field, and terminate their quarrel by a deciſive battle. Douglas was highly exaſperated at this defiance, and adviſed to accept the challenge ſent by the king of England; but the motion was over-ruled by Murray, who told Edward, that he never liſtened to the counſel of an enemy in any of his operations. But Douglas, though he could not prevail on Murray to bring on a general engagement with the Engliſh, determined not to continue idle in his camp. He put himſelf at the head of two hundred horſe, paſſed the river in the night, and entering the Engliſh camp unperceived, advanced as far as the royal tent, with a deſign to ſurprize and carry off the king. But the attempt was rendered abortive by ſome of Edward's ſervants, who awaking in the critical moment, made a noble reſiſtance, and ſacrificed their lives in his defence. The king himſelf cut his way through the Scots, who had entered his camp, and eſcaped. The Engliſh were now alarmed, and the greater part of the Scots were ſlain; but Douglas himſelf, with a few followers, found means to retreat to his own army. Soon after the Scots decamped during the night, and marched with ſuch expedition, that Edward, finding it would be impoſſible to overtake them, marched with his army to Durham, and from thence to York, where he diſbanded his forces.

While Edward was at York, he reſolved to ſolemnize his nuptials with Philippa of Hainault, that alliance having been concluded on by his mother, and for which a diſpenſation had been procured from the pope. Accordingly, a procuration was granted to the biſhop of Litchfield to make a contract with Philippa, in the name of Edward, and ſhe was eſcorted into England by her uncle John de Hainault, with a pompous retinue. She arrived at London on the 23d of December, and from thence ſet out for York, where the king at that time reſided, and where the nuptials were ſolemnized with great pomp and ſplendor, on the 24th of January, 1328; but the ceremony of her coronation was not performed till about two years after.

The queen-mother and Mortimer, who had uſurped the whole authority of the government, now found themſelves grow daily more and more obnoxious to the thinking part of the nation. The king himſelf was highly incenſed, and was determined to free himſelf from the power of a miniſter who ſeemed totally regardleſs of all national honor. Mortimer ſaw his danger, and thought it neceſſary, at all events, to make peace with the Scots. Accordingly, he entered into a negotiation with Bruce, whom he acknowledged as king of Scotland, renounced the Engliſh claim of ſuperiority, and was contented in return with ſtipulating the payment of 30,000 marks.

Though the queen and Mortimer had ſufficient intereſt to procure a confirmation of this treaty by the parliament, yet it was no ſooner made public, than it excited an univerſal clamour throughout the kingdom; and the people expreſſed their reſentment in the moſt poignant terms. They declared openly, that this peace was neither honourable nor neceſſary; that thoſe who concluded it had baſely ſacrificed both the blood and treaſure of the nation to private views; that the queen-mother, who under pretence of her huſband's incapacity, had uſurped his authority, had now ſufficiently diſcovered how unable ſhe herſelf was to hold the reins of government; and that the errors of the elder Edward were very inferior to thoſe committed by the queen ſince the adminiſtration of affairs had been in her hands.

Mortimer appeared thoroughly convinced that his treaty with Bruce had rendered him very unpopular, and he began to dread the conſequences, eſpecially when he was informed, that the earls of Kent, Norfolk, and Lancaſter, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhops of London and Wincheſter, and ſeveral powerful barons, had determined to impeach him before the parliament. He knew the conſequence if a majority in that aſſembly ſhould favour the complainants, and exerted all his power to bring about a reconciliation. He very luckily ſucceeded; and it was agreed that all grievances ſhould be redreſſed in the enſuing parliament.

A. D. 1329. Mortimer, who now imagined that he had no farther oppoſition to dread, acted more like a ſovereign than a miniſter, and, like moſt baſe and evil-minded perſons, thought rather to terrify the people into a concurrence with his meaſures, than to win them over by gentleneſs and good offices. He could not reconcile the treatment he had received from the barons; and though he had been obliged to temporize, yet he was determined to have his revenge; to effect which he ſingled out an object that might ſtrike his enemies with terror. The weakneſs of Edmund earl of Kent, (brother to the late king) promoted his criminal intentions. He cauſed a report to be ſpread that Edward the Second was yet alive, and confined in Corfe-caſtle. The earl, who had always retained a ſincere affection for his brother, though he had joined the queen's party to drive the two Spencers from the kingdom, immediately formed a deſign of replacing him on the throne. But the treacherous Mortimer had no ſooner procured ſufficient proofs of his deſign, than he cauſed him to be ſeized, and committed to that priſon where he had flattered himſelf he ſhould meet with his unhappy brother, whom he now diſcovered was no more, and that the report of his exiſtence had only been propagated to enſnare and rob him of his fortune and life.

MORTIMER
Earl of Marche seized in Nottingham Castle.

Kent was formally accuſed of high treaſon, and being found guilty, was ſentenced to be beheaded. The queen-mother and Mortimer, apprehenſive of young Edward's lenity towards his uncle, hurried on the execution, and the earl ſuffered the next day after his ſentence was pronounced. So beloved, however, was he by the people, that when he was brought upon the ſcaffold the common executioner refuſed to perform his office; nor could any one be found to ſupply his place till late in the evening, when the ſentence was executed by a felon from the Marſhalſea, who, as a reward for his ſervice, received a free pardon for all the robberies he had committed.-----Thus fell this deluded prince, in the 28th year of his age, whoſe greateſt crime was his affection for an unhappy brother, and his deteſtation of the infamous machinations of an unnatural wife and an ambitious favourite.

This execrable piece of treachery, with other iniquitous meaſures taken by Mortimer, rendered him univerſally odious to the people, and all parties now conſpired the deſtruction of this inſolent and perfidious miniſter. The king himſelf, now in his eighteenth year, was deſirous of taking into his own hands the reins of government, and bringing to exemplary puniſhment a man who made no ſcruple of ſacrificing the honour of his country, and the lives of the nobility, to his inſatiable thirſt of power. But it was abſolutely neceſſary to uſe the utmoſt precaution. Mortimer had ſo entirely engroſſed the adminiſtration of affairs, that the whole power of the kingdom was at his devotion; he was always upon his guard, was continually attended by one hundred and eighty armed knights and their followers, and had even ſurrounded the throne itſelf with his emiſſaries, who acted as ſpies on the behaviour of the king and his friends.

A prince of leſs fortitude than Edward would have been deterred by ſo many difficulties; but Edward was a ſtranger to fear. He imparted his deſign to William Lord Montacute, and ſeveral other noblemen, who all promiſed their aſſiſtance, and it was determined to ſeize Mortimer during the ſeſſion of parliament, which was ſummoned to meet at Nottingham.

That they might be enabled to carry on their deſigns with more ſafety and ſucceſs, it was propoſed that the king ſhould occupy the caſtle of Nottingham; but in this part of their ſcheme they were fruſtrated, for, on their arrival, they found it already filled with the attendants of Iſabella and Mortimer, one or two apartments only being left for the king. It was now ſufficiently evident, that it would be impoſſible to execute their deſign without the aſſiſtance of Sir William Eland, the governor of the caſtle. Lord Montacute was therefore ſent to gain him over to their party, which was effected with great facility, that gentleman joyfully embracing an opportunity of ſhewing at once his affection for the perſon of his ſovereign, and his deteſtation of thoſe, who by their infamous conduct, had brought their country to the brink of deſtruction. But at the ſame time, he informed Montacute that it would be impracticable for him to admit any aſſiſtance by the common entry, the caſtle being ſtrictly guarded, the gates locked every evening, and the keys carried to the queen. He, however, recollected that there was a ſubterraneous paſſage formerly contrived as a ſecret outlet to the fortreſs, but at preſent concealed by a heap of rubbiſh. Through this cavern therefore he undertook to conduct the confederates to Mortimer's apartment. The attempt ſucceeded; Mortimer was ſeized in an apartment adjoining to that of the queen, without the leaſt reſiſtance, and ſent directly under a ſtrong guard to the Tower of London.

The next day a parliament was ſummoned to meet at Weſtminſter for the trial of this tyrannical miniſter, and a proclamation was iſſued for all perſons who had any complaints to prefer againſt him, to appear before that aſſembly, in order to obtain redreſs for all their juſt grievances. Nor was juſtice long deferred. The firſt buſineſs that engaged the attention of the national aſſembly was the impeachment of the tyrannical Mortimer. The accuſation was immediately drawn up, and conſiſted of nine articles, which contained many high crimes and miſdemeanors. Among others, he was accuſed of having uſurped the regal power from the council of regency appointed by the parliament; of having procured the death of the late king; of having deceived the earl of Kent into a conſpiracy to reſtore that prince; of having ſolicited and obtained exorbitant grants of the royal demeſnes; of having diſſipated the public treaſure; of ſecreting for his own uſe twenty thouſand marks of the money paid by the king of Scotland; and of having repaired to the parliament with an armed force, diſturbed their deliberations, and threatened ſeveral of the members with death. Theſe facts being all notorious, it was thought unneceſſary to call witneſſes: and Mortimer was condemned to ſuffer as a traitor, without being admitted to make his defence. The ſentence was executed on the twenty-ninth of November, at a place called the Elms, about a mile from London, where this once powerful nobleman was hanged on a gibbet like a common malefactor.

The queen was confined to her houſe at Riſings in the neighbourhood of London, and her revenue reduced to four thouſand pounds a year. The king conſtantly viſited her once or twice a year, during the remainder of her life; but ſhe never recovered the leaſt degree of power or authority in the ſtate.

On the 15th of June this year (1330) queen Philippa was delivered at Woodſtock of her firſt ſon, who was chriſtened by the name of Edward, and was the ſame who afterwards became ſo famous in the annals of Europe, under the title of the Black Prince.

A. D. 1331. Edward having freed himſelf from his governors now publiſhed a proclamation, informing his ſubjects that he had taken the reins of government into his own hands. This intelligence gave the higheſt ſatisfaction to the people: they were rejoiced at ſeeing on the throne a prince, of whoſe abilities for government they had already formed the moſt pleaſing idea; and the firſt acts of his public adminiſtration tended to convince them that their hopes were not founded on a chimerical baſis. He reſumed all the grants that had been made of the royal demeſnes during his minority, and rewarded thoſe who had aſſiſted him in ſeizing the ambitious Mortimer. He remitted the fines and confiſcations that had been awarded againſt the barons who had oppoſed the deſtructive meaſures of that miniſter. He reverſed the ſentence of attainder againſt the earl of Kent, reſtored his ſon to the family eſtate and honours, and his widow to the enjoyment of her jointure. He diſplaced all the ſheriffs that had been appointed by Mortimer, diſpatched orders to the judges to adminiſter ſtrict juſtice to all perſons without delay, notwithſtanding any letters that might have been procured from the crown to the contrary; and purſued every meaſure that appeared conducive to eſtabliſh peace and harmony throughout the kingdom.

The diſorders that had crept into the adminiſtration of public affairs, were not the only ones that required the abilities and firmneſs of Edward to remove. The kingdom was infeſted with numerous bands of robbers, who, taking advantage of the late commotions, had ſet the power of the magiſtrates at defiance, and exerciſed, with impunity, their lawleſs depredations. They were even openly protected by the great barons, who employed them againſt their enemies. It was therefore previouſly neceſſary to deſtroy this alarming connection before the evil could be removed. Accordingly Edward exacted a ſolemn promiſe from his barons, aſſembled in parliament, to break off all connections with ſuch malefactors, as a diſgrace to nobility. He iſſued a proclamation, forbidding all juſts and tournaments, which ſerved as a plauſible pretence for aſſembling great numbers of armed men, to the diſturbance of the public tranquillity, and the terror of the peaceable inhabitants. After taking theſe neceſſary meaſures, he marched in perſon againſt the robbers; and by his courage and activity, the more powerful troops were broken and diſperſed; many were taken and executed, and great numbers flew to the continent for ſafety. The miniſters of juſtice followed the royal example; they were indefatigable in diſcovering and purſuing, and ſtrict in puniſhing criminals. By theſe ſalutary methods the diſeaſe was removed, and the nation continued ſecure from theſe free-booters during the remainder of Edward's reign.

A. D. 1332. An event happened in the beginning of this year, which excited the natural ambition of Edward. Robert Bruce, who had recovered by arms the independency of his country, was now dead, and had left his ſon David, a minor, under the guardianſhip of the earl of Murray. Among other particulars in the late treaty, it was ſtipulated, that both the Scottiſh nobility, who enjoyed lands in England before the commencement of the war; and the Engliſh, who enjoyed eſtates in Scotland, ſhould be reſtored to their reſpective poſſeſſions. Edward had ſcrupulouſly performed his part of the treaty; but Robert had refuſed to follow the example of the Engliſh monarch. It would have been in vain to attempt any other method for redreſs but that of petition, while Robert ſwayed the Scottiſh ſceptre; but the feeble ſtate of the kingdom under a minority induced the Engliſh nobles to enter into an aſſociation for recovering their rights. Lord Beaumont was at the head of this confederacy. He claimed the earldom of Buchan in Scotland; and propoſed, as the moſt effectual method of obtaining juſtice, to invite Edward Baliol, ſon of John Baliol to make an attempt for the recovery of his father's crown.

Young Baliol, who had lived on his patrimonial eſtate in Normandy ever ſince the death of his father, little thought of reviving the claims of his family to the crown of Scotland; but this propoſal was too flattering to be rejected, and he readily engaged in the enterprize.

Edward was now applied to for aſſiſtance; but he was too prudent to countenance openly the attempt, though he ſecretly encouraged the undertaking of Baliol, and blew the ſparks of diſcord into a flame.

As ſoon as Baliol and his friends had raiſed a body of forces, they determined to try the fortune of a battle. They therefore embarked at Ravenſpur, in Yorkſhire, and in a few days reached the coaſt of Fife. On their approaching the ſhore they perceived a body of militia, commanded by Sir Alexander Seaton, drawn up on the beach to oppoſe their landing; but the Engliſh charged the Scottiſh general with ſuch reſolution that he was totally defeated, and himſelf, with near a thouſand of his men, ſlain on the ſpot. No farther oppoſition being made to their landing, they advanced to Dumferling, where they ſtrengthened themſelves by ſeizing a large magazine of arms and proviſions.

After this ſucceſs, Baliol marched with his forces to attack the earl of Marre, who lay encamped at Duplin on the oppoſite ſide of the river Erne. The Scottiſh army conſiſted of 40,000 men, who placing their confidence only in the ſuperiority of their numbers, kept no order in their encampments. Baliol was not in the leaſt intimidated, but availing himſelf of their negligence, paſſed the river in the night, and falling on them unexpectedly, they were thrown into confuſion, great numbers of them were killed, and the reſt made a precipitate flight.

The Engliſh now thought they had obtained a complete victory, but they ſoon found themſelves miſtaken, for early the next morning they perceived the enemy drawn up on a riſing ground. This appearance, however, did not in the leaſt intimidate them, more eſpecially as they ſaw that the ground between the two armies was ſo broken, that not more than eight or ten thouſand men could engage at one time. The gallant Baliol therefore encouraged his determined troops to ſtand their ground againſt the attack of the enemy. The Scots, eager to wipe out the ſtain of their late defeat, ruſhed on with the utmoſt precipitation to the battle, without paying any regard to the broken ground between them and the enemy, in conſequence of which their ranks were broke, and an univerſal diſorder enſued. Baliol perceived their confuſion, ſeized the favourable opportunity, advanced his troops upon them, prevented their rallying, and chaſed them a ſecond time off the field of battle with redoubled ſlaughter. Near twelve thouſand Scots fell in this action, and among thoſe the flower of their nobility: the regent himſelf, the earls of Carrick, Athol, and Monteith, and the lords Hay, Keith and Lindſey. The loſs of the Engliſh is ſaid to have been ſo trifling, notwithſtanding the inferiority of their numbers, that only thirty were killed; an evincing proof of the advantages ariſing from intrepidity and good diſcipline.

Baliol was ſo elated at theſe repeated ſucceſſes, that he advanced to Perth, which he entered without oppoſition, and immediately repaired the fortifications.

This neceſſary work was hardly finiſhed, before the earl of Marche, and Sir Archibald Douglas, at the head of an army of forty thouſand men, appeared, and inveſted the place by land, fully determined to reduce the Engliſh by famine. They alſo collected a few veſſels, under the command of one John Crabbe, a Flemiſh ſailor, in order to block up the place by water. But the Engliſh ſquadron, which were lying at the mouth of the Tay to ſupply Baliol's army with proviſions, ſoon drove Crabbe from his ſtation, and took the greater part of his ſhips.

The Scottiſh generals now perceived that it would be in vain to continue the blockade of Perth; they abandoned the enterprize; the army diſperſed; and the kingdom was, in effect, ſubdued by an handful of men. The uſual conſequences attended the good fortune of Baliol: the nobility and gentry flocked to make their ſubmiſſion. The young king, and his queen, ſiſter to the king of England, were ſent into France; and on the 27th of September Baliol was crowned king of Scotland.

A. D. 1333. Baliol ſeemed now firmly ſeated on the throne of Scotland, and might, in all probability, have maintained his power, had not his imprudence, or perhaps his neceſſities, induced him to diſmiſs the greater part of his Engliſh ſoldiers. In this weak condition he was attacked near Annan notwithſtanding the truce, by Sir Archibald Douglas, and other chiefs of that party. Baliol at the head of an inconſiderable number of followers made a noble defence, but being overpowered by multitudes, was obliged to have recourſe to flight. His brother John Baliol was ſlain, and he himſelf obliged to make the beſt of his way to England, where he at laſt arrived in a very miſerable condition; having loſt his crown by a revolution as quick as it was acquired.

Before this revolution happened, Baliol had perceived, that it would be impoſſible for him to keep poſſeſſion of the throne without the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh monarch. Accordingly he ſent a meſſage to Edward, offering to renew the homage for his crown, acknowledge his ſuperiority, and to marry his ſiſter, if a diſpenſation from the pope could be obtained, as her nuptials with David Bruce had never been conſumated. Ambitious of gaining what he had loſt by the treachery of Mortimer, Edward entered into a treaty with Baliol; but that prince being now driven from his throne, there was a neceſſity for replacing him in the ſeat of power.

The proceedings of the Scotch were now ſufficient to rouze a leſs ambitious prince than Edward. Elated with their late ſucceſs againſt Baliol, and allured by the hopes of plunder, they broke into Cumberland, and laid great part of the country waſte with fire and ſword. Edward immediately ſent orders to Sir Anthony Lacy to begin hoſtilities againſt the enemy. His commands were obeyed with the utmoſt alacrity; the invaders were defeated, and obliged to make a precipitate flight to their own country.

This breach of the late treaty greatly alarmed Douglas the regent, who ſpared neither intreaties, excuſes, nor ſubmiſſions, to divert the gathering ſtorm that threatened the deſtruction of his country. But all his efforts were in vain; Edward liſtened only to the voice of ambition. The campaign was opened with the ſiege of Berwick, where Edward commanded in perſon. That place was conſidered by the Scots as the key of their country; and the regent had accordingly furniſhed it with a ſtrong garriſon, under the command of Sir William Keith; while he himſelf formed a numerous army on the frontiers, in order to penetrate into England, as ſoon as that fortreſs ſhould be inveſted by the Engliſh monarch.

The ſiege continued near two months; when great part of the fortifications being demoliſhed, the garriſon agreed to capitulate, if not relieved in five days. The terms were accepted; and a meſſenger diſpatched to Sir Archibald Douglas, informing him of the conditions, and preſſing him to march immediately to their relief. The great importance of Berwick, and the impatience of his forces to be led againſt the Engliſh, determined him to comply with the requeſt of the garriſon. He marched immediately to their relief, and drew up his forces at the foot of Halidown-hill, a little to the north of Berwick, in ſight of the Engliſh camp.

Douglas's army was divided into four bodies, and headed by the principal nobility of Scotland. The Engliſh were alſo drawn up in four ſeparate bodies, and both wings flanked with archers; and in this diſpoſition Edward waited the attack of the enemy, who began to aſcend the hill with great impetuoſity about five in the afternoon; but the ſteepneſs of the aſcent, the weight of their armour, the inceſſant ſhowers of arrows diſcharged from the bows of the Engliſh, and the large ſtones rolled down upon them, ſoon checked their career. They halted; and their general being that moment transfixed with an arrow, fell lifeleſs to the ground. The utmoſt conſternation now ſeized the Scottiſh army. Edward perceived their diſorder, and commanded lord D'Arcy, at the head of a body of light-armed infantry, to charge them in flank, while he himſelf attacked their front with a detatchment of veterans. The Scottiſh knights, in order to render the action more ſteady and deſparate, had diſmounted from their horſes, but could not ſtand the ſhock of the Engliſh. The whole army fled with the utmoſt precipitation. Near thirty thouſand of the Scots fell in the action, and all the chief nobility were either ſlain or taken priſoners. The town and caſtle of Berwick immediately ſurrendered; and no farther aſſiſtance being apprehended, Edward, after leaving a conſiderable part of his army with Baliol, returned to England.

The Scots now found it impoſſible to oppoſe the power of Baliol: the principal part of their nobility were loſt, their army was diſperſed, their king in France, and their regent ſlain. Submiſſion was their only reſource. Baliol accordingly marched through the whole country; and all the caſtles, except thoſe of Dumbarton, Urquhart, and two or three others, which were deemed impregnable, opened their gates and ſubmitted to the conqueror.

A. D. 1334. Baliol now ſummoned his firſt parliament to meet at Edinburgh on the 10th of February, when he was acknowledged king by the whole aſſembly; the ſuperiority of England was again recognized; many of the Scottiſh nobility ſwore fealty to him; and Berwick, Dunbar, Roxburgh, Edinburgh, and all the ſouth-eaſt counties of Scotland, were declared to be for ever annexed to the crown of England.

Such ſhameful conditions could not fail of exaſperating the Scots. They ſubmitted to them indeed, but determined to obſerve the treaty no longer than they were not in a condition to break it. An opportunity ſoon offered: the Engliſh troops returned to their own country, and the Scots immediately flew to arms. They renounced the fealty they had ſworn to Baliol, and returned to their former allegiance under Bruce. At the ſame time they elected Sir Andrew Murray regent, and defeated Baliol in ſeveral ſmall, but deciſive actions.

A. D. 1335. Edward now ſaw, that it was neceſſary for him to ſubdue that ſtubborn people a ſecond time; and he accordingly made preparations for invading Scotland at the head of a very conſiderable army.

The Engliſh monarch reached Berwick early in the ſpring, and purſued his march, without oppoſition, into the very heart of Scotland; the enemy having abandoned all the plains at his approach, and retired to the mountains and faſtneſſes of their country. Edward perceiving it would be in vain to traverſe a wild, deſerted, and barren country, returned to Perth. Several ſmall ſkirmiſhes, however, happened between the Scots and the ſtraggling parties of the Engliſh; in the one of which Sir Andrew Murray, the regent, was taken priſoner.

During Edward's ſtay at Perth, he detached a body of forces, under the command of his brother, John of Eltham, and Sir Anthony Lacy, to ravage the weſtern counties, which were principally inhabited by the Brucean party. The Scots, who imagined themſelves able to face a part of the Engliſh army, left their faſtneſſes, and preſented themſelves in order of battle. A bloody engagement enſued; and the victory was, for ſome time, doutful, but at laſt declared in favour of the Engliſh; and a great number of the Scots periſhed in the field of battle.

The adherents of Bruce were ſo intimidated by this defeat, that they determined to ſubmit to whatever Edward ſhould think proper to impoſe; and a treaty was accordingly concluded on the following terms: "That the Scottiſh noblemen ſhould receive a free pardon for all former offences; that they ſhould enjoy their lands, honours and offices in Scotland, and be reſtored to their Engliſh poſſeſſions which had been forfeited: That all the privileges and franchiſes of the church and boroughs of Scotland ſhould continue unaltered and inviolable: That none but natives ſhould be put into the offices of that crown and kingdom, excepting in ſome particular caſes where their king, Edward Baliol, ſhould make uſe of his prerogative in favour of perſons of another nation." It was alſo ſoon after agreed by the reſt of Bruce's party, who at firſt refuſed to ſign the above treaty, "That Edward Baliol ſhould enjoy the crown of Scotland during his natural life; and that at his death it ſhould deſcend to David Bruce, who, in the mean time, ſhould be honourably maintained at London."

Matters being thus adjuſted, Edward ordered the fortifications of Perth to be repaired, and the caſtles of Edinburgh and Stirling to be rebuilt. He alſo appointed the earl of Athol guardian of the northern parts of the kingdom; and returned to England, at the head of the greater part of his army.

Although the Scots had again ſubmitted to Edward yet they were far from being reconciled to their condition, and only waited for a favourable opportunity of ſhaking off a yoke to which neceſſity alone had compelled them to ſubmit. They did not wait long for this wiſhed-for opportunity. The earl of Athol was not at all adapted to govern ſuch turbulent people. Inſtead of ſoothing the Scots, and applying lenients to heal the wounds of their country, he treated them with rigour; and the caſtle of Kildrummy, in which the regent's wife had ſhut herſelf up, having ſtill refuſed to open its gates to the Engliſh, the guardian imprudently beſieged the fortreſs; but the garriſon attacked him with ſuch impetuoſity, that his army was routed with great ſlaughter, and himſelf ſlain. Animated with this ſucceſs, they inveſted the caſtles of Coupar and Lochendoris. The ſtandard of war was again diſplayed, and forces were collected in every part of the kingdom. But before any farther hoſtilities were commenced, the pope and the king of France interpoſed their good offices; and a truce was agreed to till the ninth of May, in the enſuing year.

This truce was intended as a prelude to a final peace, and conferences were accordingly opened at Newcaſtle in the ſpring of the following year 1336; but Philip de Valois, who now filled the throne of France, and found his intereſt in the diſſentions between the Scots and Engliſh, gave ſuch inſtructions to his envoys, that though they aſſumed the characters of mediators between the contending parties, they omitted no opportunity of embarraſſing the negociation, and rendering the intended treaty abortive. Philip had already afforded conſiderable aſſiſtance to the Scots; and his envoys now aſſured them, that their maſter would never abandon the cauſe of the unfortunate and injured David Bruce, but ſupport him to the utmoſt of his power.

Elated with theſe promiſes, and exaſperated againſt the invaders of their country, the Scottiſh deputies inſiſted on ſuch high terms, that Edward broke off the treaty in a tranſport of reſentment, and both parties made preparations for deciding the conteſt by the ſword.

The Engliſh monarch had already been very careful to conciliate the affections of his ſubjects by the moſt popular acts; and being now determined to reduce the refractory Scots to an abſolute ſubmiſſion, which could not be executed without large ſupplies, he wiſely paſſed ſeveral ſalutary laws for the preſervation of the public tranquillity, and the more effectually ſecuring the property and perſons of individuals from the deſigns of ſecret or open enemies. Among others, were ſeveral acts for the freedom and extenſion of commerce, and the preſervation of the weight and quality of the coin; for the more effectually bringing to juſtice the perpetrators of murders, robberies, and other ſpecies of felony; and for reſtraining his officers from committing exceſſes in the caſe of purveyance.

By theſe, and other ſimilar methods, Edward ſo endeared himſelf to his ſubjects, both clergy and laity, that they very readily granted him large ſubſidies not only for ſupporting the conqueſts he had made in Scotland, but alſo to enable him to make that nation totally ſubject to the Engliſh government.

Edward, thus ſtrengthened by ſupplies, marched a fourth time into Scotland, and laid thoſe countries waſte which had declared againſt him. The lord Beaumont, who commanded a ſeparate detachment, laid the town and caſtle of Aberdeen in aſhes, to revenge the death of Sir Thomas Roſſelin, whom the inhabitants had attacked and killed on his landing at Dunotter. Edward met with no oppoſition in his march; but ſtill the nation itſelf was as far as ever from being ſubdued. The Scots had retreated to their faſtneſſes; experience taught them prudence; they knew they were not able to meet the Engliſh in the open field, and wiſely abandoned the Low Countries the ravages of the enemy.

Edward having made a progreſs to the extremity of Scotland, returned to Perth, where, after ſtaying ſome time to recruit his forces, and leaving a ſmall army with Baliol, he returned to England, fully determined to undertake an expedition of the moſt important nature.

A. D. 1337. Edward, on his return from Scotland, ſummoned the parliament to meet at Weſtminſter on the 3d of March, when he declared his reſolution to attack France, and uſe his utmoſt endeavours to wreſt from Philip de Valois that crown of which he conceived himſelf to be the true heir, as next in blood to the late king.

In this determination Edward was greatly encouraged by Robert d'Artois, a prince of the blood of France, who having been condemned in conſequence of a forgery he had committed, took refuge in England. Inſpired with the moſt implacable revenge againſt Philip, Robert omitted no arguments to induce the king to declare war againſt France, in favor of his title to that crown. Edward was the more inclined to liſten to the arguments of Robert, becauſe Philip had given protection to David Bruce, the exiled king of Scotland.

Philip was no ſooner informed of the counſel given by Robert d'Artois, than he iſſued a ſentence of felony and forfeiture againſt him; and declared, that every vaſſal of the crown, whether within or without the kingdom, who gave countenance to that traitor, was involved in the ſame ſentence. This menace was eaſily apprehended; it wanted no comment; and Edward made preparations for carrying on the war with the utmoſt vigour.

Edward, in order to divert the arms of the French monarch from Guienne, and at the ſame time to make an effectual attack upon Philip's dominions, endeavoured to form alliances in the Low Countries, and on the frontiers of Germany. The earl of Hainault, the duke of Brabant, and ſeveral other noble perſonages, engaged to join the Engliſh. But this confederacy was not thought ſufficiently formidable, without the acceſſion of Flanders, which required ſome addreſs to accompliſh.

The Flemings, who, by their arts and manufactures, had acquired riches and ſome ſhare of independence, had riſen in tumults, inſulted the nobility, and driven their earl into France. The leader of theſe popular inſurrections was one Jacob Van Ardevelt, a rich brewer of Ghent, who governed the people in a more arbitrary manner than any of their lawful ſovereigns. He never appeared in the ſtreets without a guard of fourſcore perſons, who, from the leaſt ſignal given by this demagogue, murdered any perſon who happened to fall under his diſpleaſure. Whatever he thought proper to propoſe in the aſſembly of the ſtates, was never contradicted, becauſe every member feared his power.

Edward courted aſſiſtance of this ferocious leader, who refuſed to join in the alliance, unleſs he would aſſume the title of king of France, in order to remove the ſcruples of the Flemings, who heſitated on the right of invading the territories of their liege lord, lord. Edward agreed to the condition, and Ardevelt invited him into Flanders. About the ſame time Edward received from the emperor Lewis of Bavaria the title of "Vicar of the Empire," that he might with the better authority command the princes of Germany.

Previous to the opening of the rupture, Edward, willing to ſhew his allies that he was thoroughly in earneſt, ordered the duke of Brabant to demand the crown of France in his name; at the ſame time he conſtituted him lieutenant-general of that kingdom, and iſſued a proclamation, commanding the French, whom he called his ſubjects, to pay him obedience.

Philip was ſo provoked at Edward's preſumption, that he aſſembled a conſiderable army to chaſtiſe his new allies the Flemings, and to reinſtate the earl of Flanders in the poſſeſſion of that country. But Edward ſent a large body of forces to join his new allies, under the command of the earls of Derby and Suffolk, in order to render the deſigns of Philip abortive. The Engliſh, on their arrival on the coaſt, were informed that Guy de Rickenbourg, natural brother to the earl of Flanders, had taken poſſeſſion of the iſle of Cadſand, in order to cut off all communication by ſea to Bruges and Ghent. It was therefore reſolved to drive him from that advantageous poſt. Guy, who was prepared for the attack, gave them a very warm reception; but the Engliſh, after an obſtinate diſpute, made good their landing, when a bloody battle enſued, in which the earl of Derby was thrown from his horſe, and would, in all probability, have been killed or taken priſoner, had he not been reſcued by Sir Walter Manny, a valiant knight of Hainault, who, at the head of a body of horſe, charged the enemy with the utmoſt fury, and took Guy de Rickenbourg priſoner with his own hand. The loſs of their leader ſtruck the French with conſternation; they immediately fell into confuſion, and were routed with prodigious ſlaughter. This victory filled Ardevelt and his party with joy; and the Flemings ſent a meſſage to Edward, preſſing him to come over without delay, and head the allied army in perſon.

A. D. 1338. In the beginning of February Edward called a parliament, of whom he requeſted an aid ſuitable to the projects he had in view. The aſſembly readily complied, and even granted more than he aſked; but notwithſtanding it was much greater than any with which his predeceſſors had been indulged, yet it fell ſhort of his real exigencies, for, excluſive of the prodigious expence attending his armament, his German allies were as inſatiable in their demands as they were dilatory in the performance of their contracts.

Edward, having taken all the neceſſary precautions at home that his prudence could ſuggeſt, ſet ſail from the port of Orwell in Suffolk on the 16th of July, with a fleet of 300 ſhips, accompanied by the chief nobility of England; and, after a quick, and eaſy paſſage, he landed, on the 21ſt of the ſame month, at Antwerp, the capital city of John duke of Brabant.

The remainder of this year, and the greateſt part of the next was waſted in conferences and negotiations. At length, however, Edward took the field, at the head of 40,000 men, and encamped between Marchiennes and Douay, from whence he marched into the Cambreſis, which he laid waſte, and then halted ſome time under the walls of Cambray with a deſign of forming the ſiege of that place; but receiving advice that Philip was advancing, with a formidable army, to give him battle, he paſſed the river Schelde, in order to meet his enemy, and terminate at once a war attended with ſo ruinous an expence.

The two monarchs, however, remained for ſix days encamped within ſix miles of each other without coming to an action. At laſt Edward ſent a herald to offer battle, which was accepted by the other, and the following Friday (being the 22d of October 1339) was the day appointed to decide the quarrel. But, whilſt both ſides were preparing with equal ardor for the engagement, Philip received a letter from Robert king of Naples, who paſſed for a great aſtrologer, fore-telling him ill ſucceſs whenever he ſhould fight the Engliſh, which had ſuch an effect on the mind of the French king, that though Edward, on the day appointed, drew out his forces early in the morning in order of battle, the former declined coming to an engagement, and the two armies returned to their reſpective camps. The next day Edward wheeled off towards Aviſnes for the ſake of a more convenient ſituation, and ſent word to Philip that he would wait for him all Sunday in order of battle. This, however, was a challenge the French king did not chuſe to accept; but breaking up his camp, and fortifying his frontier towns with ſtrong garriſons, he returned back to Paris, and there diſmiſſed his troops.

The Engliſh monarch, finding that Philip had retreated, put his German troops into winter quarters, and marched with his own forces to Bruſſels, where he arrived on the firſt of November.

Though Edward had entered into engagements with the duke of Brabant to ſtay in the Low Countries till the war was ended, he found it impoſſible to keep his promiſe. His abſence had occaſioned many diſorders in England, where bands of robbers diſturbed the peace of the nation; and the Brucean party had not only recovered what they had loſt in Scotland, but alſo invaded the northern counties of England. Theſe were ſufficient reaſons for Edward's leaving the continent; and, in order to ſatisfy the duke of Brabant, who objected ſtrongly to his departure, he left him four Engliſh lords, beſides his queen, who was at Antwerp, as pledges for his return.

A. D. 1340. Edward arrived at Harwich on the 21ſt of February, and on the ſame day iſſued out writs for aſſembling a new parliament at Weſtminſter on the 29th of March following. At the meeting of this aſſembly the members ſhewed an uncommon alacrity in aſſiſting their monarch, and providing for the ſecurity of the realm againſt all invaders. They granted the king a large ſupply; and orders were iſſued for fortifying Southampton and the Iſle of Wight; for fitting out a fleet of one hundred and fifty ſail, to protect the coaſts; for ſending ſupplies of proviſions to the caſtles of Edinburgh and Stirling; and for raiſing a body of ſeven hundred and eighty-two men at arms, two thouſand light-horſe, and two thouſand and ten archers, for defending the marches of Scotland.

Theſe tokens of affection deſerved a grateful return, and accordingly Edward granted a full remiſſion of all debts due to the crown, and of all proſecutions of foreſt-treſpaſſes ſince his acceſſion to the throne; beſides which, he added a confirmation of the two great charters.

Edward was now making preparations for returning into the Low Countries, when advice arrived from the duke of Gueldres, that the French had aſſembled a powerful fleet to intercept him in his paſſage. Orders were therefore given for fitting out a ſufficient number of ſhips for carrying the king, and a conſiderable body of forces, to the continent. The utmoſt expedition was uſed on this occaſion; and Edward embarked at Orwell on the thirteenth of June, attended by the principal nobility of England. His fleet conſiſted of two hundred and fifty ſail of ſhips, having on board a powerful body of men at arms, and archers.

Edward, a few days after his departure, diſcovered the French fleet in the harbour of Sluys, and immediately made preparations for fighting the enemy. Early the next morning, the French, who had left the harbour, appeared in three diviſions; and about eleven the engagement began with the utmoſt fury. The Engliſh had taken care to get to windward of the enemy, and grappled their ſhips ſo firmly with thoſe of the French, that they formed a firm compact body, and the men fought with the ſame firmneſs as on dry land. The French, whoſe number of veſſels was much greater than that of the Engliſh, obſerving a ſhip carrying the royal ſtandard of England, advanced to attack her with the utmoſt intrepidity; but all their efforts were in vain. The examples of the king and his gallant nobles animated to ſuch a degree both the ſeamen and ſoldiers, that they every where maintained a ſuperiority over the enemy. The French could not ſtand the ſhock of the Engliſh; many hundreds of them leaped overboard, and periſhed in the ſea. In this critical moment, a reinforcement of Flemiſh ſhips joined the Engliſh, and determined the fortune of the day. Two hundred and thirty of the enemy's ſhips were taken; and thirty-two thouſand Frenchmen were ſlain with two of their admirals.

This defeat was conſidered in France as having given ſuch a fatal blow to the naval force of that kingdam, that none of Philip's courtiers durſt acquaint him with the loſs, till his buffoon diſcovered it to him by the following artful jeſt. Coming into the royal preſence, he cried out ſeveral times, Cowardly Engliſhmen! Daſtardly Engliſhmen! Faint-hearted Engliſhmen!" The king aſked him what he meant by that exclamation? "Becauſe, ſaid he, they durſt not leap into the ſea as our gallant Frenchmen did."

Soon after this victory Edward landed, and marched at the head of an army of one hundred and fifty thouſand men, compoſed of Engliſh, Germans, Flemings and Gaſcons. The firſt attempt was the ſiege of Tournay; but the city was no ſooner inveſted, than Edward detached fifty thouſand men, under the command of Robert d'Artois, who poſted himſelf near St. Omer's to favour the ſiege. Robert's troops were chiefly compoſed of tradeſmen, who had never faced an enemy, and were wholly ſtrangers to military diſcipline. From ſuch troops little could be expected; and accordingly, notwithſtanding the great abilities of their leader, they were totally routed by a ſally from the garriſon.

Edward was not in the leaſt intimidated at this defeat, but on the contrary puſhed the ſiege with the utmoſt vigour. At the end of ten weeks the city was reduced to great diſtreſs; and Philip having collected a prodigious army, advanced within a few leagues of the Engliſh camp; not with a deſign to bring on a general engagement, but of being ready to aſſiſt the garriſon whenever an opportunity offered. Edward, exaſperated at the length of the ſiege, ſent an herald to Philip, challenging him to decide their claims to the crown of France by ſingle combat, or by an action of an hundred againſt an hundred, or by a general engagement. Philip replied, that a vaſſal was not entitled to challenge his liege lord; and that the duel was, beſides, propoſed on very unequal terms; but if Edward would increaſe the ſtake, and put alſo the kingdom of England on the iſſue of the combat, he would willingly accept the challenge.

While theſe matters were in agitation, the counteſs dowager of Hainault, mother-in-law to Edward, and ſiſter to Philip, employed her good offices for bringing about a peace between perſons ſo nearly related to her. Her zeal produced a ſhort ceſſation of hoſtilities, and which the pope in vain endeavoured to convert into a peace; but the demands of Edward were too exorbitant to be admitted. He required that Philip ſhould free Guienne from all claims of ſuperiority, and entirely abandon the protection of Scotland. Theſe conditions were accordingly rejected by Philip; a prolongation of the truce only was agreed to. The ſucceſs of Edward certainly entitled him not to make ſuch demands. His allies were never firmly attached to his intereſt: they were, indeed, deſirous of his money, but never intended to weaken the power of France. Accordingly, when they found that his treaſure was nearly exhauſted, they abandoned the confederacy; and Edward being preſſed by his impatient creditors, was obliged to paſs privately into England.

Edward's embarraſſment had chiefly ariſen from the nature of the ſubſidy granted by parliament. It conſiſted of corn and wool, on account of the ſcarcity of money; and theſe commodities could not be collected and diſpoſed of ſoon enough to anſwer his exigencies. But though this was nothing more than might have been expected, Edward was determined to puniſh the ſheriffs and officers of his revenue; for he conſidered them as guilty of negligence, which had, in ſome meaſure, occaſioned the bad ſucceſs of his expedition. The biſhop of Chicheſter, chancellor; the biſhop of Litchfield, treaſurer; and the archbiſhop, prime miniſter; now felt the weight of his diſpleaſure. The two former were impriſoned; but the primate, fearing the effects of Edward's anger, retired immediately to Canterbury, and determined to defend himſelf by the weapons of the prelacy. He accordingly convened a meeting of the clergy in that cathedral, and pronounced ſentence of excommunication againſt all who ſhould ſeize the perſons, lands, or goods of the clergy, or inform againſt a biſhop for any crime whatever.

A. D. 1341. Edward found himſelf under the neceſſity of calling together his parliament, which met at Weſtminſter on the 23d of April, when the primate, who had received no ſummons to attend, preſented himſelf at the gate in his pontifical ornaments, and demanded admittance to his ſeat as the firſt and higheſt peer of the realm. He was, however, denied admittance for two days ſucceſſively; but Edward, ſenſible of the dangerous conſequences that might attend his quarrel with the clergy, prudently accepted of the conceſſions made by the churchman, and the primate was again received into favour.

The immenſe debt Edward had contracted on the continent, and the arbitrary meaſures he had taken with regard to the officers of his revenue, alarmed the parliament, and it was determined to ſet proper bounds to the royal prerogative. They required a new confirmation of the great charter; they paſſed a bill whereby it was enacted, that no nobleman ſhould be proceeded againſt or puniſhed, but by the judgement of his peers aſſembled in parliament; that the more important offices of ſtate ſhould be filled by the king, with the conſent of the council and barons; that every ſeſſion theſe offices ſhould be reſumed by him, and the miniſters who diſcharged them reduced to private perſons; that they ſhould, in that condition, anſwer, before the parliament, to any accuſations brought againſt them; and that if they were any ways found guilty, they ſhould finally be diſpoſſeſſed of their dignities, and more ſufficient perſons be ſubſtituted in their place.

Edward ratified theſe acts in full parliament, and by theſe important conceſſions obtained large ſupplies, particularly a grant of twenty thouſand ſacks of wool, to be tranſported to Flanders before Michaelmas, with a prohibition to all perſons from ſending thither any wool, till that period was elapſed.

But though Edward had, by ſacrificing ſome parts of the royal authority, extricated himſelf from his preſent difficulties, he did not ſeem deſirous of continuing the war on the ſide of Flanders, in ſupport of his title to the crown of France. An unforeſeen accident renewed the hoſtilities between the two kingdoms. John III. duke of Britany was deſirous of leaving his dutchy to a daughter of his brother the count de Ponthieve; but in order to prevent the calamities that always attend a diſputed ſucceſſion, he determined to marry her to ſome prince capable of repelling any attempts that might be made to diſturb the tranquillity of his country. Charles de Blois, nephew to the king of France, appeared to him the moſt proper for his purpoſe. He conſulted the ſtates of Britany, who approved of his choice: the marriage was concluded; and all the vaſſals ſwore fealty to Charles and his ſpouſe, as their future ſovereigns. The count de Montfort himſelf, one of John's brothers by a ſecond marriage, acknowledged the rights of his niece, and made no difficulty of taking an oath of fealty to Charles. But he forgot both his conceſſion and his oath on the death of John, and exerted himſelf in taking poſſeſſion of the country. He engaged many of the moſt conſiderable barons to acknowledge his authority, and made himſelf maſter of the moſt important fortreſſes of the dutchy, particularly thoſe of Rennes, Nantes and Breſt.

Notwithſtanding Montfort had made theſe acquiſitions, yet he was ſenſible he ſhould not be able to ſupport himſelf againſt the attempts of Charles de Blois, unleſs aſſiſted by ſome powerful ally. He therefore determined to apply to the Engliſh monarch. Accordingly, under pretence of ſoliciting his claim to the earldom of Richmond, which had fallen to him by the death of his brother, he viſited Edward; made that prince an offer of doing him homage, and of acknowledging his title to the crown of France, provided he would engage to aſſiſt him againſt Charles de Blois.

Edward immediately ſaw all the advantages that might attend an alliance with Montfort; and being at the ſame time invited by the perſuaſions of Robert d'Artois, he agreed to the conditions, and a formal alliance was concluded between them.

Montfort, not doubting but his treaty with Edward was a profound ſecret, made no heſitation of going to Paris, in order to ſupport his claim to the dutchy of Britany. But he was ſoon convinced both of his error and the imprudent ſtep he had taken. Philip, at his firſt audience, told him plainly, that he had no right to Britany, and at the ſame time reproached him with having done homage to Edward, and entered into an alliance with a prince, who was the profeſſed enemy of France. Montfort acknowledged his having paſſed over to England, but denied the charge of having done homage to Edward; adding, that he was ſatisfied of the goodneſs of his claim, and was ready to ſubmit to the judgment of his peers, with regard to Britany.

Philip immediately appointed a day for diſcuſſing his claim, but in the mean time forbid the earl to ſtir out of Paris.

This injunction greatly alarmed Montfort, who being now convinced that he had every thing to fear, took the reſolution of making his eſcape. He accordingly withdrew from Paris during the night in the diſguiſe of a merchant, and reached Britany in ſafety. Philip was no ſooner informed of his eſcape, than, in a tranſport of rage and indignation, he inſtantly confiſcated the earldom of Montfort, commanded the parliament of Paris, by his ſole authority, even without ſummoning the peers of France, or exhibiting any formal proceſs, to adjudge Britany to Charles de Blois; and the more effectually to carry the ſentence into execution, he ſupplied his nephew with a numerous army, under the command of his eldeſt ſon John duke of Normandy. Montfort, who was unable to face the French army in the field, ſhut himſelf up in Nantes, which was ſoon beſieged by the duke of Normandy. The city was ſtrongly fortified, and capable of holding out a conſiderable time againſt the enemy; but by the treachery of the inhabitants the city was delivered up to the enemy. Montfort himſelf was taken priſoner, and ſent to Paris, where he was confined in the great tower of the Louvre.

A. D. 1342. This event ſeemed to put a final period to all Montfort's pretenſions, but his affairs were ſoon retrieved by an unexpected incident which inſpired his party with freſh life and vigor. Jane of Flanders, counteſs of Montfort, the moſt extraordinary woman of that age, was rouzed by the captivity of her huſband, from thoſe domeſtic employments to which her genius had been hitherto confined, and nobly undertook to ſupport the falling fortunes of her family. As ſoon as ſhe received the fatal intelligence, ſhe aſſembled the inhabitants of Rennes, where ſhe then reſided, and carrying her infant ſon in her arms, laid before them, in the moſt pathetic manner, the calamity of their ſovereign, and recommended to their protection the illuſtrious orphan, the ſole remaining male heir of their antient princes, who had long governed them with ſo much indulgence and lenity, and to whom they had hitherto profeſſed ſo zealous an attachment. She declared herſelf willing to face any dangers with them in ſo juſt a cauſe; diſcovered the reſources which ſtill remained in the alliance with England, and intreated them to make, at leaſt, one effort againſt the uſurper, who being impoſed on them by the arms of France, would, in return, make a ſacrifice to his protector of the antient liberties of Britany. Moved by the affecting appearance, and inſpired by the noble conduct of the princeſs, the audience vowed to live and die with her in defending the rights of her family. All the other fortreſſes of Britany embraced the ſame reſolution. The counteſs went from place to place, encouraging the garriſons, providing them with every thing neceſſary for ſubſiſtence, and concerting their plans of defence. And after putting the whole province in a proper poſture of repelling the efforts of the enemy, ſhe ſhut herſelf up in Hennebon, where ſhe waited with impatience the arrival of thoſe ſuccours promiſed by Edward. In the mean time ſhe ſent over her ſon into England, in order at once to provide him a place of ſafety, and engage the king more ſtrongly by ſuch a pledge, to embrace with zeal the intereſt of her family.

Charles de Blois, anxious to make himſelf maſter of ſo important a fortreſs as that of Hennebon, and ſtill more ſo to take the counteſs priſoner, from whoſe vigour and capacity all the difficulties attending his ſucceeding ſucceſſion in Britany now proceeded, inveſted the place with a numerous army, compoſed of French, Spaniards, Genoeſe, and ſome Bretons, conducting the attack with indefatigable induſtry. The defence was equally vigorous: the beſiegers were repulſed in every aſſault; frequent ſallies were made with ſucceſs by the garriſon, and the counteſs herſelf being the moſt forward in all military operations, every one was aſhamed not to do his duty to the utmoſt in this deſperate ſituation. While ſhe was one day giving her orders on the ramparts, ſhe perceived that the beſiegers were entirely employed in an attack, and neglected to guard a diſtant quarter of their camp: on this, ſhe immediately ſallied out at the head of a body of two hundred cavalry, threw them into confuſion, put a great number to the ſword, and ſet fire to their tents, baggage, and magazines. But when ſhe was preparing to return, ſhe found ſhe was intercepted, and that a large body of the enemy had thrown themſelves between her and the gates. She inſtantly formed her reſolution; ordered her men to diſperſe, and make the beſt of their way to Breſt. She met them at the appointed place of rendezvous, collected another body of five hundred horſe; returned to Hennebon, broke unexpectedly through the enemy's camp, and was received with ſhouts and acclamations by the garriſon, who, encouraged by this reinforcement, and by ſo rare an example of female fortitude and valour, determined to defend themſelves to the laſt extremity.

Notwithſtanding, however, the noble defence made by the counteſs, yet the town was at length reduced to the greateſt extremity. Several breaches were made in the walls, and the enemy was preparing for a general aſſault, which, had it taken place, muſt infallibly have been deſtructive to the garriſon. It was therefore thought neceſſary to offer terms of capitulation, and the biſhop of Leon was actually ſent for that purpoſe to the camp of Charles de Blois; but the counteſs, who had mounted one of the towers of the fortreſs, diſcovering the Engliſh fleet coming to her aſſiſtance, immediately communicated the joyful tidings to the garriſon, and the biſhop of Leon was recalled. The French were confounded when they ſaw the Engliſh enter the harbour, and laid aſide their deſign of making a general aſſault. This reinforcement conſiſted of a body of men at arms, and ſix thouſand archers commanded by Sir Walter Manny, one of the beſt captains of the age. The courage of the garriſon was now revived, they readily joined the Engliſh in a ſally, drove the beſiegers from their poſts, and obliged them haſtily to decamp.

The counteſs, however, found that this reinforcement was not ſufficient to enable her to take the field againſt the enemy, ſhe therefore determined to paſs over into England to ſolicit in perſon more effectual ſuccours from Edward. Her requeſt was granted; a more numerous reinforcement was immediately embarked under the command of Robert d'Artois, and the earl of Northampton. The counteſs herſelf returned in this fleet, which was attacked in the paſſage, by a French ſquadron commanded by prince Lewis of Spain. The counteſs behaved with her uſual intrepidity, till night put an end to the conteſt. Before morning a dreadful ſtorm aroſe, which ſeparated the two fleets; but the Engliſh were ſo fortunate as to arrive ſafe the next day in the harbour of Hennebon.

As ſoon as the troops were landed, Robert d'Artois advanced to attack Vannes, which he carried by aſſault, but was dangerouſly wounded, and during his confinement a party of the Britons, in the intereſt of Charles, attacked and took the place by ſurprize. Robert had the good fortune to eſcape to Hennebon, from whence he embarked for England; but ſoon after his arrival, died in London of the wounds he had received during the aſſault.

Edward was greatly affected at the loſs of this nobleman, and ſwore he would revenge his death; an oath which he punctually obſerved. He aſſembled his army, embarked at Sandwich on the fifth of October, and after a paſſage of two days, landed at Breſt. He formed three important ſieges at the ſame time, and by attempting too much, miſcarried in all; for the duke of Normandy, at the head of forty thouſand men encamped in the neighbourhood of the Engliſh, and cut off their proviſions.

In this dangerous ſituation Edward liſtened to the mediation of the pope's legate, and a truce for three years was agreed on, which being ratified and confirmed on the 19th of January, 1343, Edward, in a ſhort time after, embarked for England, and, after a tedious and ſtormy paſſage of ſeveral weeks, he landed on the 2d. of March at Weymouth, and from thence proceeded to London, where he was received with great joy by his ſubjects.

The truce made between the two monarchs was but of ſhort duration. Edward was highly enraged at Philip, who had put to death ſeveral lords of Britany, under pretence of their having been guilty of treaſon. He was even ſo incenſed, when he firſt heard of the fate of theſe noblemen, that he gave orders for beheading all the priſoners of Philip's party, but was prevailed upon to recall the bloody ſentence, by the remonſtrances of Henry, earl of Lancaſter. He, however, ſent for one of the principal captives, and told him with great emotion, that though the death of his countrymen beheaded at Paris was a ſufficient reaſon for retaliating the ſame puniſhment on him and his fellow priſoners, yet he would not ſtain his reputation by imitating ſo bad an example; he would not ſatiate his vengeance in the blood of the innocent; but by the aſſiſtance of the Almighty, he would ſeverely puniſh the author of ſuch unparralleled treachery and barbarity.

A. D. 1344. Edward was far from being deficient in the execution of his threats: fully reſolved to puſh the war with the utmoſt vigour, he ordered a commiſſion to be drawn up, conſtituting the earl of Northampton his lieutenant general in France, as well as in Britany; and, according to the cuſtom of the age in ſuch caſes, commanded him to defy Philip de Valois, as a perjured truce-breaker and an uſurper of the crown of France; and to declare war againſt him in his name, both by ſea and land.

A ſhort time after this, Edward diſpatched the earl of Derby, at the head of a conſiderable body of forces, to begin hoſtilities in Guienne. Derby was the ſon of Henry, earl of Lancaſter, and one of the moſt accompliſhed noblemen of the Engliſh court. He was at once intrepid and humane, beloved by his friends, and dreaded by his enemies. For ſome time he was very ſucceſsful in his invaſions of the enemy's territories. He attacked the count de Laille, the French general encampted at Bergerac, drove him from his intrenchments, and made himſelf maſter of the place. This ſucceſs animated the Engliſh, and they proceeded in their conqueſts with the moſt aſtoniſhing rapidity.

While the earl of Derby was reducing the French towns, the count de Laille, having collected an army of twelve thouſand men, inveſted Auberauche, which had lately fallen into the hands of the Engliſh. Derby haſtened to relieve the place, and arriving near the camp of the enemy in the night, Sir Walter Manny propoſed to attack the French immediately. His advice was followed with ſuch ſecrecy and ſucceſs, that the Engliſh entered one quarter of the French camp without reſiſtance, and fell upon the enemy with ſuch impetuoſity, that the counts de Laille, Perigord and Valentinois, were taken priſoners in their tents, before they had time to recover from their ſurprize; and their troops ſeized with ſuch a panic, that they fled with the utmoſt precipitation. The confuſion was not, however, general. While one quarter was filled with diſorder, the other, where the count de Cominges commanded, fled to arms, and advanced againſt the enemy. Elated with ſucceſs, the Engliſh attacked them with incredible fury, and the engagement became very bloody; when the garriſon, alarmed by hearing the trumpets ſound a general charge, and diſcovering by the light of the dawn the Engliſh enſigns, ſallied out, attacked the French in flank, and put them to flight. Above ſeven thouſand fell in the action, and twelve hundred were taken priſoners; among whom were nine counts, and above three hundred knights and gentlemen of diſtinction: but the Engliſh did not gain this victory without paying a bloody tribute to the valour of their opponents. However, the force of the enemy in theſe parts being now entirely broken, the earl of Derby put his troops into nto winter quarters, and, leaving the command to he earl of Pembroke, ſet ſail for England to obtain a einforcement.

About this time John de Montfort, after having uffered a ſevere impriſonment for near four years in he caſtle of the Louvre, found means to make his ſcape in the diſguiſe of a peaſant, and coming over o England, where his counteſs and ſon now reſided, lid homage and ſwore fealty to Edward, as king of rance, for the duchy of Brittany; after which he eturned to that duchy with the earls of Northampton nd Oxford, and a conſiderable body of forces, by hich he was enabled to take the field in the ſpring of he year 1345, and to reduce Dian and other fortreſſes on the ſea-coaſt. This ſucceſs encouraged him to nveſt Quimper Corentim, which had been lately aken by Charles de Blois, who had, with unparalleled nhumanity, ordered fourteen hundred of the inhabiants to be butchered in cool blood. Upon the appearance of the Engliſh forces Charles immediately prepared to give them battle; but John de Montfort, hinking himſelf not ſufficiently ſtrong to hazard an engagement, left his competitor maſter of the field, and returned to Hennebon, where, on the 16th of September, he died of a fever. Nevertheleſs, the earl of Northampton, being reinforced by the arrival of the earl of Derby from England with eight thouſand men at arms, made himſelf maſter of St. Baſil, Roche, Meillant, Montregur, and ſeveral other very capital places.

A. D. 1346. The French king, alarmed at the progreſs of the Engliſh, collected a numerous army, under the command of his ſon the duke of Normandy, aſſiſted by the duke of Burgundy. The earl of Derby, finding it would be madneſs to meet the French in the open field, was reduced to the neceſſity of acting on the defenſive. He therefore furniſhed all the fortified places with good garriſons, large quantities of proviſions and military ſtores; and then paſſed over to England, to inform Edward of the ſtate of the provinces, and the danger to which they were now expoſed.

The duke of Normandy opened the campaign with the ſiege of Angouleme, the garriſon of which made a noble defence; but were at laſt reduced to extremities. John lord Norwich, the governor, ſaw the impoſſibility of defending the place much longer; but being unwilling to ſurrender at diſcretion, had recourſe to a ſtratagem, to ſave at once his own honor, and his ſoldiers from being made priſoners of war. He aſcended the ramparts, and deſired to ſpeak with the duke of Normandy. His requeſt was granted. The duke approached the walls; and Norwich begged a ceſſation of arms for the morrow, which was the feaſt of the Virgin, to whom the duke, as well as himſelf, paid great devotion. The duke very readily agreed to the propoſal; and Norwich having ordered his forces to prepare their baggage, marched out of the town as ſoon as the morning appeared. Perſuaded they were going to be attacked, the French flew to arms; but Norwich diſpatched a meſſenger to the duke, reminding him of his engagement. "I ſee," exclaimed that prince, "the governor has outwitted me; but let us be contented with taking the place."

Edward, in conſequence of the report he received from the earl of Derby relative to the ſtate of Guienne, determined immediately to lead his army in perſon. He therefore ſummoned all his allies on the ſide of Flanders to furniſh their quota of troops, but they refuſed to fulfil their engagements. Edward, had, indeed, lately loſt his friend, Jacob Ardevelt, the demagogue of Ghent. That popular leader, deſirous of transferring the government from the earls of Flanders to the prince of Wales, had propoſed, in a meeting of the ſtates, to inſiſt that their count ſhould renounce his alliance with Philip de Valois; and in caſe he perſiſted in maintaining that connection, that they ſhould transfer their allegiance to young Edward, adding, that they had nothing to fear from the reſentment of either their own ſovereign or the king of France, as the Engliſh monarch was both able and willing to ſupport them effectually.

The ſtates, aſtoniſhed at this unexpected propoſal, and afraid of contradicting that popular leader, deſired time to conſult their conſtituents, as they had no authority to determine a queſtion of ſuch importance without their conſent. The requeſt was too reaſonable to be denied, and the aſſembly broke up in great confuſion. His enemies laid hold of this attempt to ruin him: they charged him with having embezzled vaſt ſums of the public money; and of having made large remittances to England, whither he intended to retire, in order to enjoy in tranquillity the riches he had procured by deceiving the people. The giddy multitude eagerly ſwallowed the bait prepared for them. The idol they had ſo long worſhipped was now devoted to deſtruction: they thirſted for the blood of a perſon, for whoſe preſervation, but a few weeks before, they would willingly have ſhed their own. Ardevelt ſoon felt the effects of this fatal change in the ſentiments of the people. The enraged populace ſurrounded his houſe, and, after having killed moſt of his guards, dragged him forth, and inſtantly ſacrificed him to their reſentment.

This accident entirely overturned the plan which Edward had formed, and, in the firſt tranſports of his indignation, he vowed ſevere revenge againſt the perpetrators of this cruel deed: but the great towns of Flanders having ſent deputies to clear themſelves from all ſuſpicion of being concerned in the aſſaſſination, and the citizens of Ghent repreſenting it as the ſudden effect of popular fury, he ſuffered policy to get the better of his wrath; and, after renewing his treaty of alliance with them, he returned to England.

Edward, finding himſelf deſerted by moſt of his German allies, and that all proſpect of attacking France by the ſide of Flanders was entirely at an end, embarked with his forces for Guienne; but he was prevented from ſailing by the continuance of contrary winds. In this diſtreſsful ſituation Geoffrey D'Harcourt, a Norman baron, prevailed upon Edward to change the deſtination of his enterprize. D'Harcourt was a nobleman highly eſteemed both for his perſonal merit and valor; but having been perſecuted by Philip, fled into England for protection. He diſplayed the advantages that muſt attend an expedition into Normandy, a province well cultivated, full of rich and flouriſhing cities, deſtitute of troops, and at a great diſtance from the French armies. Hence he very juſtly obſerved, that it would be much more advantageous for the Engliſh to land in Normandy than in Guienne. Edward was convinced of the juſtice of his remarks; and, as ſoon as the wind permitted, put to ſea; and, after a paſſage of two days only, landed at La Hogue without oppoſition. Here Edward knighted his eldeſt ſon, the prince of Wales, a youth then only ſixteen years of age. His army conſiſted of four thouſand men at arms, ten thouſand archers, ten thouſand Welſh infantry, and ſix thouſand Iriſh; a number in appearance not at all adapted to the purpoſe of invading France; though the ſucceſs of the campaign far exceeded the moſt ſanguine expectations. An univerſal conſternation was immediately ſpread through the whole province of Normandy, where not the leaſt apprehenſions were entertained of an invaſion. The ſhips were deſtroyed at La Hogue, Barfleur, and Cherbourgh. The towns of Valougnes, Carentham, and St. Lo, ſurrendered rendered at diſcretion; and the Engliſh marched to Caen, the capital of Lower Normandy. This city was both rich and populous, but without fortifications. Perſuaded that the wealth of Caen would induce the Engliſh to plunder the city, Philip diſpatched the count de Eu, conſtable of France, and the count de Tankerville, at the head of a conſiderable body of troops, for its defence. The Engliſh approached the ſuburbs; and the inhabitants, elated with the reinforcements they had received, ſallied out upon the enemy, contrary to the advice of the conſtable. The conſequence was what might naturally be expected when undiſciplined multitudes attack a regular army; they were totally defeated, and the counts d'Eu and Tankerville taken priſoners. The Engliſh entered the city with the fugitives, and a dreadful maſſacre began: neither age, nor ſex, nor condition, were ſpared: all fell a ſacrifice to the ſword of the Engliſh. Edward at laſt put a ſtop to the ſlaughter; the inhabitants laid down their arms, and the city was deliberately plundered. The booty was prodigious; and the whole was embarked, together with three hundred of the richeſt burghers, and all the priſoners of diſtinction, and ſent to England.

Edward now marched with his troops through the biſhoprics of Liſieux and Evreux towards Rouen, the capital of Normandy. In his route he took the towns of Louvere and Liſieux; but on advancing to the banks of the Seine, he found the bridge already broken down, and the French monarch poſted on the oppoſite ſide of the river, at the head of a prodigious army. Edward did every thing in his power to provoke Philip to a battle. He laid the whole country waſte, and burnt the ſuburbs of Pont l'Arche, Vernon, and Mullien. The ſame fate attended the noble palace of St. Germain; and ſome of the light troops carried their ravages to the very gates of Paris. Edward made another attempt to paſs the Seine at Poiſſy, but met with the ſame diſappointment; the bridge was broken down, and Philip's army appeared on the oppoſite bank of the river. Some ſtratagem was therefore neceſſary to elude the vigilance of Philip. Accordingly the Engliſh monarch marched, with great rapidity, farther up the Seine; but by a ſudden countermarch during the night, returned to Poiſſy, repaired the bridge, routed the militia left to guard the paſſage, croſſed the river, and advanced, with quick marches, towards Flanders. In his route he burnt the ſuburbs of Beauvais; and defeated, with great ſlaughter, the inhabitants of Amiens, who were marching to reinforce their king's army. But he ſoon found himſelf in the ſame dangerous ſituation as before: all the bridges on the Somme were either broken down, or ſtrongly guarded. The country was ruined. Philip was advancing againſt him at the head of an hundred thouſand men; and Godemar de Faye was ſtationed on the oppoſite ſide of the Somme, with a numerous army, to obſerve his motions.

In this alarming criſis, Edward offered a reward to any perſon who could lead his army to a place where he might paſs the Somme; and a peaſant of Normandy, preferring riches to the ſafety of his country, pointed out a ford below Blanchetague, where the ſtream was not above a foot in depth at low water. This diſcovery revived the courage of the Engliſh; they decamped at midnight, and reached the ford about ſun-riſing the next morning, a little before the tide of flood made up the river. The place exactly anſwered the deſcription given of it by the peaſant; but the oppoſite bank was guarded by Godemar de Faye, at the head of twelve thouſand men. This oppoſition was not, however, ſufficient to intimidate Edward, who was always maſter of his paſſions, and maintained a remarkable coolneſs and preſence of mind in the midſt of the moſt furious battle. He plunged himſelf into the ſtream, calling out, "Let all who love me follow my example."

Animated by the preſence and example of their ſovereign, the ſoldiers threw themſelves into the river with the moſt amazing intrepidity. The French made a noble oppoſition; but nothing was capable of ſtopping the career of the Engliſh: they were not intimidated by any oppoſition; and after a bloody diſpute, they put the enemy to flight, and gained the oppoſite bank, juſt as the van of Philip's army, under the command of the king of Bohemia and John de Hainault, appeared.

It is impoſſible to expreſs the vexation of Philip, in being thus diſappointed of his revenge. He had traced the Engliſh above fifty leagues by the ſmoaking ruins left behind them, and now thought himſelf ſure of overtaking the invaders. But it was in vain to repine; the tide of flood was made up the river, and rendered a paſſage impoſſible, while the Engliſh purſued their march with great tranquillity.

Notwithſtanding Edward had thus eſcaped the danger of being attacked in his late alarming ſituation, yet he was convinced it would be impoſſible for him to purſue his march over the extenſive plains of Picardy, without expoſing his van to inevitable deſtruction by the perpetual attacks of a numerous cavalry: he therefore determined to wait for the enemy, and venture a general engagement. He accordingly choſe an advantageous ſpot of ground near the village of Creſſy; and to ſecure his flank from the furious attacks of the French horſe, he threw up a large entrenchment, and extended it round a ſmall wood, where he depoſited his baggage.

Having taken theſe neceſſary precautions, he drew up his army on a ſmall eminence, and divided it into three lines. The firſt was commanded by the prince of Wales, aſſiſted by the earls of Warwick and Oxford Geoffrey Hartcourt of Normandy, the lords Stafford, Chandois, Delaware, Holland and Cobham, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction. This line conſiſted of eight hundred men at arms, four thouſand archers, and ſix thouſand Welſhmen. The ſecond line was commanded by the earls of Arundel and Northampton, aſſiſted by the lords Willoughby, Roſs, Baſſet of Sapcote, and Malton; and conſiſted of eight hundred men at arms, two thouſand four hundred archers, and four thouſand bill-men. He himſelf commanded the third line, which conſiſted of ſeven hundred men at arms, ſix thouſand archers, and five thouſand three hundred bill-men.

Philip, whoſe army conſiſted of one hundred and twenty thouſand men, determined to take the ſevereſt revenge on the Engliſh, who had laid his country waſte, and inſulted the ſtandard of France. On his arrival in the neighbourhood of Creſſy, he detached ſeveral of his officers to reconnoitre the poſition of the Engliſh. They readily obeyed, and faithfully deſcribed, at their return, the admirable order of Edward's forces. The count de Balche, one of the beſt ſoldiers in Philip's army, added, that there was not the leaſt danger of Edward's declining a battle; and therefore he adviſed, that inſtead of attacking the Engliſh immediately, the engagement ſhould be deferred till the next morning, that the troops might reſt themſelves after their fatiguing march. But this was over-ruled. The force of numbers was thought ſufficient to balance every inconvenience, and it was determined to begin the action immediately

As ſoon as the French appeared in ſight, Edward, that he might ſtill farther animate his men, rode through the ranks, and urged every motive that had a tendency to raiſe their natural valour, and inſpire them with the noble reſolution of remaining conquerors, or falling in the glorious attempt. He told them, hat the number of the enemy ſhould be ſo far from intimidating, that it ſhould inſpire them with courage; hat confuſion would be the inevitable conſequence of ſuch multitudes of undiſciplined forces; and that the order in which he had placed them, added to heir own reſolution, would be abundantly ſufficient to repel all the attacks of the French army. Adding, " I requeſt nothing from you, but that you imitate my example, and that of the prince of Wales." The roops caught the courage and noble intrepidity of heir ſovereign; and appered anxious for the comnencement of the battle.

In the mean time Philip endeavoured to marſhal his army; but this was impoſſible. He ſent orders, indeed, for the lines to halt till they received farther inſtructions; but his commands were very imperfectly obeyed. His army being compoſed of a great number of princes and noblemen, jealous of each other's honour, and moſt of them ſtrangers to military ſubordination, preſſed forward to begin the attack; ſo that when the van halted, purſuant to the orders of Philip, the ſucceeding ranks continued to move orward with great impetuoſity, till the whole beame one enormous body moving towards Creſſy n great confuſion; nor was it in the power of Philip o remove the diſorder till they came near the Engliſh rmy, when they ſtopped of themſelves, and gave Philip an opportunity of drawing them up in ſome rder. He divided his army into three lines, conormable to that of the Engliſh. The firſt was led y John de Luxembourg, king of Bohemia, and ompoſed of three thouſand men at arms, twentyine thouſand infantry, and fifteen thouſand Genoeſe roſs-bowmen, under the command of Antonio Doria nd Carolo Grimaldi. Theſe were placed oppoſite o the Engliſh archers. Charles, count of Alençon, rother to Philip, led the ſecond diviſion, conſiſting f four thouſand men at arms, and twenty thouſand nfantry. The third diviſion was headed by Philip n perſon; and formed a body of reſerve, amounting o 12000 men at arms, and 50000 foot.

Theſe diſpoſitions took up ſo much time, that it as near three in the afternoon before the French rmy was ready to engage, when Philip gave orders r the Genoeſe to begin the battle; but a ſudden ower of rain having fallen a little before the engement, their bow-ſtrings were relaxed, and their arws fell ſhort of the enemy. The ſame misfortune d not, however, attended the bows of the Engliſh chers: they were preſerved in caſes, whence they w drew them, and poured in ſuch a dreadful ſhower arrows, that the Genoeſe, unable to ſupport the ock, were thrown into diſorder, and fell back upon e count d'Alençon's cavalry. The prince of Wales, ho obſerved the confuſion this accident had proced, ordered ſome battalions of guards to advance d charge them in front, which was done ſo critilly, and with ſo much fury, that both the firſt and cond lines of the French were thrown into the eateſt confuſion.

As ſoon as the count d'Alençon had diſengaged mſelf from the flying Genoeſe, he made a circuit with cavalry, and fell upon the flank of the firſt baton of Engliſh archers. The battle now became perate and bloody. The French opened a paſſage ough the archers, and advanced againſt the prince Wales, who received them with ſuch firmneſs and olution, that numbers of them were ſlain; but the nce himſelf was ſtill in the greateſt danger of being rounded by the ſuperior numbers of the enemy. e earls of Arundel and Northampton perceived ſituation, and detatched a body of troops to his aſſiſtance. Philip took advantage of this motion, and ſent three ſquadrons of French and German knights to the aid of his brother. The prince was now attacked both in front and rear; and a meſſenger was diſpatched by the earl of Warwick to the king, to inform him of the danger of his ſon, and deſire him to order a body of troops to his aſſiſtance. The king aſked the meſſenger if his ſon was ſtill alive? and being anſwered that he was, and that he had performed feats of the moſt aſtoniſhing valour, he bid the meſſenger depart, and tell his generals from him, " That they ſhould no more ſend to him while the prince was alive, he being determined that the honour of the day ſhould be wholly his; and that he muſt now, if ever, win his ſpurs." This anſwer being delivered to the prince in the hearing of his followers, they ſeemed to be inſpired with freſh courage: they were more than a match for the increaſing numbers of the enemy, who exerted all their efforts to break again the compacted phalanx of the Engliſh, who, in their turn, attacked the French with ſuch impetuoſity, that they were unable to ſtand the ſhock. A dreadful carnage enſued, princes, peers, generals, knights, and common ſoldiers, fell promiſcuouſly, and formed a frightful heap of ſlain.

Philip, enraged to ſee the firſt two lines of his army totally defeated, advanced at the head of the body of reſerve, which the confuſion that reigned in the French army had hitherto prevented from engaging; but there was now no longer any equality in the action. Confounded at the ſight of ſeeing ſuch numbers of their countrymen ſlain, and the whole plain filled with fugitives, the troops anſwered not the courage of their leader, who gave ſignal proofs of his valour and capacity as a general, but it was too late. The French refuſed any longer to face the Engliſh, and a general flight enſued. Philip himſelf was wounded, and carried off the field of battle by John de Hainault. The ſtandard of France was thrown down, and the whole French army diſperſed, every one providing in the beſt manner for his own ſafety.

Edward, finding the victory complete, moved from his ſtation, and, taking his helmet from his head, ran to the prince of Wales, whom he embraced in the moſt affectionate manner in ſight of the whole army, ſaying, " My gallant ſon, heaven grant you may perſevere in the glorious courſe you have begun! The heroic manner in which you have acquitted yourſelf to day, ſufficiently proves you deſerve the crown you are born to wear."

Such was the iſſue of the famous battle of Creſſy fought on the twenty-fifth of Auguſt 1346; when, by a moderate computation, there fell by the ſwords of the Engliſh, twenty-four baronets, twelve hundred knights, fifteen hundred gentlemen, four thouſand men at arms, and thirty thouſand infantry; together with the principal nobility of France, among whom were the dukes of Lorrain and Bourbon, the counts of Alençon, Flanders, Blois, Reaudmont, Harcourt, Auxerre, St. Pol, and Sancerre; with the kings of Bohemia and Majorca. The former had been long famous as a general, but age had now deprived him of his ſight. He could not, however, be perſuaded from engaging in the hotteſt part of the battle. He cauſed the reins of his bridle to be interlaced with thoſe of two valiant knights, and ruſhed between them to the ſpot where young Edward fought in perſon, and with whom he exchanged two or three random ſtrokes. But he was ſoon after parted from him, and, together with his valiant companions, fell among the ſlain.* Though

---

The creſt of the king of Bohemia conſiſted of three oſtrich hers; and as he had acted in the capacity of a volunteer, he the motto ICH DIEN, which, in the German language, ſignifies " I ſerve." This device young Edward aſſumed to himſelf in memory of this celebrated victory, and the princes of Wales have ever ſince retained it in their arms.

Though no mercy had been ſhewn by Edward to the living at the battle of Creſſy, yet he treated the dead with peculiar humanity: he ſent back the body of the king of Bohemia to his family; he cauſed the field of battle to be conſecrated, attended in perſon the funeral of the noblemen who had loſt their lives in the action, and ordered the common ſoldiers to be decently interred.

Edward now employed his time in making the beſt advantages he could of the great ſucceſs thus obtained over the French. He had obſerved and regretted the great length of the voyage to Guienne, the only method by which he could ſend troops to defend his provinces, or attack the monarch of France. His great object was, therefore, to ſecure an eaſy paſſage into that kingdom; the death of Ardevelt having deſtroyed his authority in the Low Countries. He had now an opportunity of making himſelf maſter of ſome part on the French coaſt oppoſite to England, and Calais ſeemed the beſt adapted to anſwer his deſigns. Accordingly he led his victorious army thither, and inveſted the place on the third of September. But as this ſiege continued near a twelvemonth, we muſt for the preſent leave Edward with his army before Calais, in order to attend the war carried on in other quarters.

Hiſtory can ſcarcely produce an inſtance of a year more glorious to England than that at preſent under conſideration: the armies of Edward were every where victorious. The duke of Normandy was recalled from Guienne, on the landing of Edward in Normandy; no army was left to oppoſe the progreſs of the earl of Derby; nor did that able general fail to improve ſo favourable an opportunity. He took Maribeau and Luſignan by aſſault; Taillebourg, St. Jean d'Angeli, and Poictiers, opened their gates at the firſt ſummons. Theſe acquiſitions opened him a free paſſage into the adjacent provinces, and Derby extended his incurſions to the banks of the Loire, ſpreading terror and deſolation through all that part of the French dominions.

At the ſame time the war was carrying on in Britany, and the counteſs of Montfort continued to diſplay her heroic virtues. Charles de Blois, at the head of a numerous army, inveſted the fortreſs of Roche de Reen, and puſhed the ſiege with the utmoſt vigor. The place was of too much importance for the counteſs to ſuffer it to fall into the hands of the enemy, without making one attempt for its relief. She put herſelf at the head of her little army, and having received a reinforcement of Engliſh troops under the command of Sir Thomas Dagworth, attacked the French during the night, routed the whole army, and took Charles de Blois priſoner. This misfortune called another heroine from obſcurity. The counteſs of Blois, in whoſe right her huſband claimed the duchy of Britany, ſeized the reins of government, and became a powerful rival to the counteſs of Montfort. She was her equal both in the field and the cabinet; and the war was carried on with the ſame vigor as before the captivity of her huſband.

In the mean time the queen of England ſhewed herſelf to be no ways inferior to theſe illuſtrious heroines, and, during the abſence of her huſband, prepared freſh wreaths to adorn his temples.

The Scots had ſome time recalled their king, David Bruce, from France; and at the inſtigation of Philip, took the opportunity of invading England during the abſence of Edward, at the head of an army of 50,000 men. David, whoſe ſole intention was to ravage the country, levied the moſt oppreſſive contributions, and committed the moſt dreadful diſorders in his march, which he extended to the gates of Durham. The diſtreſs of the people animated queen Philippa to march in perſon to their defence; and having collected an army of twelve thouſand men, ſhe led them againſt the Scottiſh invaders. Her army was divided into four bodies: the firſt was commanded by lord Piercy; the ſecond by the archbiſhop of York and lord Neville; the third by the biſhop of Lincoln and lord Mowbray; and the fourth by Baliol in perſon. In this order the Engliſh approached the army of Bruce encamped at Neville's-Croſs, near the city of Durham. Bruce drew up his army in three lines; the firſt, conſiſting of French auxiliaries and the flower of the Scottiſh nobility, was commanded by the king in perſon; the ſecond by Robert, high-ſteward of Scotland and the earl of Marche; and the third by the earls of Murray and Douglas.

Previous to the commencement of the battle, queen Philippa rode through the ranks of the Engliſh, exhorting every man to do his duty, and to take ample revenge on the barbarous ravagers of their country; after which ſhe retired to ſome diſtance to behold the action, with a kind of reſerve body, and attended by the archbiſhop of Canterbury.

The battle was begun by a troop of Genoeſe croſbowmen, who ſerved in the diviſion under Robert; but they were ſoon routed by the more experienced Engliſh archers. Robert perceived the ſuperiority of the latter, and preſſed on furiouſly with his men at arms, to begin a cloſe fight with the detachment under lord Piercy. The Engliſh archers opened to the right and left, to let the enemy paſs, but cloſed again immediately, and galled them dreadfully with their arrows in flank, while they were engaged in front with the Engliſh infantry. Robert, however, maintained the fight with the greateſt intrepidity; and it was for ſome time doubtful to which ſide fortune would give the victory. Baliol ſaw the danger, and led up his diviſion to the aſſiſtance of lord Piercy. The Scots were now ſtruck with a panic, and immediately betook themſelves to flight. Baliol, who was not deficient in military abilities, inſtead of purſuing the fugitives, wheeled ſuddenly about, and fell with the utmoſt impetuoſity on the flank of the diviſion commanded by the king. David fought with great intrepidity, and, aſſiſted by his barons, made a noble ſtand againſt the attacks of the Engliſh; but the conteſt was unequal; the whole diviſion was broken and put to flight, and the king himſelf taken priſoner. The third diviſion, under the earls of Murray and Douglas, ſtill ſtood firm, but were ſoon broken when attacked by the whole force of the Engliſh. Murray was ſlain in endeavouring to rally his men, and Douglas was taken priſoner.

The Engliſh now remained maſters of the field of battle; and this victory would, in all probability, have determined the fate of Scotland, had not Robert rallied his men after he had given way to the attacks of the Engliſh, and retreated in ſuch excellent order, that the other fugitives had time to join him, and form a body which the victors did not think proper to purſue.

In this battle, which was fought on the 17th of October, 1346, there was not leſs than 15000 Scots ſlain; and by the liſt of the killed and priſoners, there appeared ſcarce a noble family in Scotland who did not ſhare in the public calamity. David, and about thirty-ſix noble priſoners, were ſent to the Tower of London; after which queen Philippa, leaving the care of the north to the lords Piercy and Neville, embarked for Calais on the 29th of October, and repaired to the king's camp before that place, where ſhe was received with all the reſpect and joy that her high rank, her great merit, and her ſignal ſucceſs claimed from an affectionate huſband and a grateful people.

gundy, who commanded there, was a perſon of approved courage and fidelity; ſo that the Engliſh monarch, ſenſible of the difficulty of taking the place by force only, had, from the very beginning of the ſiege, determined to reduce it by famine. He accordingly blocked up the place both by land and ſea; ſo that, after a ſiege of ſome months, the place was in want of proviſions; and the governor, in order that the garriſon might ſubſiſt the longer, was obliged to force all thoſe to retire who were uſeleſs; but Edward, with a generoſity not common in this age, not only ſuffered theſe diſtreſſed people to paſs unmoleſted through his camp, but alſo ſupplied them with money to relieve their urgent neceſſities.

A. D. 1347. The French monarch, ſenſible of the importance of Calais, and deſirous of ſuccouring a garriſon that had ſo nobly exerted themſelves in defending that fortreſs, determined to attempt their relief, and approached the place at the head of an army of two hundred thouſand men. But he ſoon perceived that it would be madneſs to attack the Engliſh camp, and therefore had recourſe to negociation. He offered to cede Guienne, together with the earldom of Ponthieu; but theſe offers were rejected. On this Philip diſpatched a herald to Edward, offering to decide their quarrel in the open field; but the Engliſh monarch was too prudent to riſk the whole upon the uncertain iſſue of a ſingle combat; and Philip was obliged to decamp, and diſperſe his numerous army.

The beſieged now deſpairing of relief, and almoſt wholly deſtitute of proviſions, deſired to capitulate. John de Vienne accordingly appeared upon the walls, and made a ſignal for a conference; and Edward ſent Sir Walter Manny to hear what he had to propoſe. The governor told him, that having now no farther hopes of relief, he was willing to ſurrender the place, and deſired no other conditions than that the lives and liberties of the garriſon ſhould be ſecured. Manny anſwered, that Edward was ſo exaſperated againſt the inhabitants of Calais for their pertinacious reſiſtance, that he was ſure he would receive them on no conditions that ſhould confine him with regard to their puniſhment. "Is this," replied Vienne, "the treatment to which brave men are entitled? Would not your king have expected the ſame conduct from any Engliſh knight in my condition, which I have performed for my ſovereign? The noble defence made by the inhabitants of Calais certainly merits the eſteem of every prince, much more of ſo gallant a prince as Edward. But I inform you, that if we muſt periſh, we ſhall not periſh unrevenged; and that we are not yet ſo reduced, but we can ſell our lives at a high price to the victors. It is, doubtleſs, the intereſt of both ſides to prevent theſe deſperate extremities; and I expect that you yourſelf, brave knight, will interpoſe your good offices with your prince in our behalf."

Manny, ſenſibly ſtruck at the juſtice of theſe ſentiments, exerted all his intereſt with Edward in behalf of the brave garriſon of Calais. He repreſented the dreadful conſequences that might reſult from ſo dangerous a precedent, which could not fail of increaſing the miſeries of war, already ſufficiently ſevere. Edward felt the whole force of his obſervations, and thought proper to mitigate the ſeverity of the conditions he had intended. He conſented to ſpare the lives of the garriſon, on condition that ſix of the principal citizens ſhould repair to his camp with the keys of the fortreſs, bare-headed and bare-footed, with ropes about their necks, to be diſpoſed of as he thought proper.

Theſe ſevere conditions excited the utmoſt horror and confuſion in the breaſts of the inhabitants of Calais. They endeavoured to deprecate the wrath of the victor by the moſt humble ſubmiſſions and affecting remonſtrances. But Edward was inflexible; and it was reſolved by the garriſon to ſubmit to the maſſacre that muſt follow from their refuſal, rather than devote ſix of their brethren to an ignominious death, for no other reaſon than that of having done their duty to their king and country. But before the council broke up, Euſtace de St. Pierre, one of the principal inhabitants, ſtept forth, and offered to lay down his life for the ſafety of his friends and companions. Affected with this uncommon inſtance of magnanimity, three of his own relations declared themſelves ready to ſhare in the glorious ſacrifice; and two others were quickly found who followed their example. Theſe willing victims marched out of the town, barefooted, in their ſhirts, with halters about their necks, and, when they came to the Engliſh camp, preſented the keys of their city, and proſtrated themſelves at the feet of Edward, who, ſtill burning with reſentment, gave orders that they ſhould be carried to immediate execution. Their backs were already turned on the remorſeleſs maſter of their fate, and they were proceeding, mournful though determined, to meet their doom, when the queen, who was then big with child, pierced with the afflictions of virtue in diſtreſs, fell on her knees before Edward, and beſought him with tears to ſpare the lives of thoſe brave men, whoſe only crime was their attachment to their ſovereign. Edward could not withſtand the force of conjugal affection; he relented, and the heroic burghers were pardoned. But the compaſſion of Philippa did not terminate here: ſhe carried the almoſt famiſhed victims to her tent, ordered them a noble repaſt, made them a preſent of money and clothes, and ſent them back to their friends in ſafety.

A. D. 1348. Edward being now maſter of Calais, took every precaution in his power to ſecure his conqueſt. He knew that it would be impoſſible for him ever to make the inhabitants real friends to his government, and therefore obliged them all to leave the town, and re-peopled it from England.

Having thus ſecured his new acquiſition, Edward liſtened to the mediation of the pope, and concluded a truce with Philip; but the terms of it were very ill obſerved, and an attempt was made to recover Calais, by corrupting the governor.

One Aimery de Pavia, an Italian knight, brave and intrepid in war, but a ſtranger to every principle of honour and fidelity, was entruſted by the Engliſh monarch with the command of this important fortreſs. Geoffrey de Charni, governor of St. Omer's found means to open a negociation with Aimery; who, in conſideration of twenty thouſand golden crowns, promiſed to admit a certain number of Frenchmen into the fortreſs; and the moſt proper methods were accordingly taken to inſure the ſucceſs. Edward, informed of the deſign by Aimery's ſecretary, prepared to turn the contrivance to the deſtruction of the enemy. He ſent for the governor to London, and reproached him with his crime; but promiſed to ſpare his life, if he would aſſiſt him in taking vengeance for the perfidious attempt. Aimery readily agreed to this double treachery; a day was appointed for the admiſſion of the French; and Edward having prepared a force of a thouſand men, under Sir Walter Manny, departed ſecretly from London, taking with him the prince of Wales, and without being in the leaſt ſuſpected, arrived at Calais in the evening before the day appointed for delivering up the place. He immediately made a proper diſpoſition for the reception of the enemy, and kept all his forces, as well as the garriſon under arms. On the appearance of Charni, a choſen troop of French ſoldiers was admitted at the poſtern, and Aimery receiving the ſtipulated ſum, promiſed that, with their aſſiſtance, he would immediately open the great gate to the enemy, who were waiting with impatience for the fulfilling of his engagement. But a very different fortune attended them. All the French that entered by the poſtern were immediately ſlain or taken priſoners; the great was gate opened; Edward ruſhed out with cries of battle and of victory: the French, though aſtoniſhed at this event, behaved with valor. They found they were betrayed, but determined to ſell their lives as dear as poſſible. Accordingly a fierce and bloody engagement enſued. As the morning broke, Edward, who was diſtinguiſhed by his arms, and who fought as a private man under the banner of Sir Walter Manny, remarked a French gentleman, called Euſtace de Ribaumont, who exerted himſelf with ſingular vigor and bravery, and was ſeized with a deſire of engaging him in ſingle combat. He accordingly ſtept forth from his troop, and challenging Ribaumont, began a ſharp and dangerous encounter. He was twice beat to the ground by the valor of the Frenchman, and as often recovered himſelf. Blows were redoubled with equal force on both ſides, and the victory remained undecided, till Ribaumont, perceiving himſelf almoſt alone, ſurrendered his ſword into Edward's hand. Moſt of the French being overpowered by numbers, and intercepted in their retreat, were either ſlain or taken priſoners.

All the French officers, who had fallen into the hands of the Engliſh, were conducted into Calais, where Edward diſcovered to them the antagoniſt with whom they had been engaged, and treated them with great reſpect and courteſy. They were admitted to ſup with the prince of Wales, and the Engliſh nobility; and after ſupper, the king himſelf came into the apartment, paſſed round the table, and converſed familiarly with many of his priſoners. He even addreſſed himſelf in an obliging manner to Charni, and avoided reproaching him with the treacherous attempt he had made upon Calais during the truce. But Ribaumont was diſtinguiſhed in a very particular manner; the king beſtowed the higheſt compliments on his intrepid behaviour; called him the moſt valiant knight he was ever acquainted with, and confeſſed that he never was in ſo much danger as when he was engaged with him in ſingle combat. Then taking a chaplet of pearls from his own head, he placed it upon that of Ribaumont, deſiring him to wear it for his ſake, and conſider it as a teſtimony of his eſteem for true valor; adding, "You are, ſir, no longer a "priſoner; I acquit you of your ranſom, and you "are at liberty to-morrow to diſpoſe of yourſelf in "whatever manner you may think proper."

As for Aimery, Edward did not think him, after his double treachery, a fit perſon to entruſt any longer with the cuſtody of ſo important a place; and therefore made Sir John Beauchamp governor of Calais. He then returned to England, with the prince his ſon and Sir Walter Manny, whom he liberally rewarded, together with all thoſe who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in this expedition.

A. D. 1349. The king had propoſed, at his return, to hold a parliament, which he had ſummoned to meet on the 19th of January; but as the plague, which had, at the latter end of the laſt year, broke out in the weſt of England, had now reached London, a prorogation was thought neceſſary, nor was any parliament held, or any court of juſtice opened, for two years after; for ſo long this dreadful ſcourge laſted, and with ſuch unremitting fury, that there hardly remained the tenth part of the people in moſt parts of the kingdom. In the firſt ſix months of this year, no leſs than 37,000 perſons are ſaid to have died of it in London and Norwich.

This dreadful viſitation occaſioned a general inactivity, except with the Scots, who availed themſelves of the opportunity of diſtreſſing the Engliſh. They had hitherto eſcaped the plague, but making an inroad upon the Engliſh borders, they caught the infection, of which no leſs than 5000 of them died, and the reſt returned home to carry the ſeeds of peſtilence among their countrymen.

A. D. 1350. This year was uſhered in by a negociation between the French and Engliſh commiſſioners for ſettling a final peace; but the conferences were ſoon broken up by the deaths of the king and queen of France. Philip de Valois, in the beginning of his reign, had acquired the name of Fortunate, which, however, he did not carry with him to his grave: not that he was wanting in military or political abilities; but theſe were obliged to give way to the ſuperior genius and ſucceſs of Edward. He was ſucceeded on the throne by his ſon John, duke of Normandy, a prince poſſeſſed of many virtues, but rather of a private than public nature. With a heart full of the juſteſt ſentiments of honor and ſincerity, he was, of all others, the moſt improper perſon to ſway the ſceptre of France in theſe turbulent times; he wanted that maſterly prudence and foreſight, that penetration and ſagacity, which the ſituation of his affairs required. His kingdom was filled with domeſtic commotions, which greatly favoured the views of the Engliſh. His relation, Charles, king of Navarre, ſurnamed the Bad, threw the kingdom of France into confuſion by aſſaſſinations and perfidies. He entered into a private treaty with the Engliſh, and even ſeduced the dauphin to engage in his intrigues; but that prince being at laſt convinced of the folly of ſuch deſtructive connections, invited the king of Navarre, and the noblemen of his party, to an entertainment at Rouen, where they were all betrayed into the hands of king John. Some of the moſt obnoxious were led immediately to execution, and the king of Navarre was thrown into priſon.

A. D. 1356. Edward availed himſelf of the diſſentions that had continued for ſome time in France, by inveſting various parts of it with ſucceſs. The prince of Wales, generally known by the name of the Black Prince, from the colour of his armour, having the preceding year made a ſucceſsful expedition into Guienne, now advanced into Quercy, at the head of two thouſand men at arms, ſix thouſand archers, and four thouſand foot. The ſucceſs of this young warrior was aſtoniſhing: he waſted Quercy, the Limoſin, and Auvergne, advanced to Berry, and after ſome unſucceſsful attempts upon Bourges and Iſſodun, took Vierzon by ſtorm. Here he refreſhed his army, and here he received the firſt intelligence that the king of France was poſted at Chartres, on the other ſide of the Loire, all the fords of which were ſtrongly guarded. Young Edward now perceived it was impracticable to advance, and therefore reſolved to retreat to Bourdeaux. John perceived his intention, croſſed the Loire, and marched with ſuch expedition, that he overtook him in the neighbourhood of Poictiers. Edward perceiving that a retreat was now impracticable, prepared for battle with all the courage of a young hero, and all the prudence of the oldeſt and moſt experienced commander. He poſted his handful of men in a place of difficult acceſs, full of hedges, buſhes, and vineyards, where neither the enemy's cavalry could attempt to pierce, nor their infantry attack him without great diſadvantage: at the end of a narrow lane, the only avenue by which the French could advance to attack his main body, he placed a ſquare battalion of the flower of his Engliſh archers; nor could the enemy avail themſelves of their vaſt ſuperiority of numbers, while this place continued thus ſecured.

The French army, which conſiſted of above ſixty thouſand men, was encamped between Beauvior and Maupertuis, and had John known how to have made a proper uſe of his numerous forces, his ſucceſs had been infallible without hazarding a battle. Prince Edward was already ſo diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, that a few days would have been ſufficient to have forced him to ſurrender at diſcretion. But the imprudent ardour of the French nobility would admit of no reſtraint; they imagined themſelves ſure of victory, and advanced immediately to attack the Engliſh. Juſt before the charge was ſounded, the cardinal of Perigord reached the French army; and at his intreaty the battle was deferred till he had viſited the Engliſh prince, and endeavoured to ſave the farther effuſion of human blood, by an advantageous peace.

Edward, conſcious of his own dangerous ſituation, told the cardinal that he would agree to any terms conſiſtent with his own honour, and that of his country. He offered to purchaſe a retreat to Bourdeaux, by reſigning all the conqueſts he had made, during this and the former campaign, and by ſtipulating not to ſerve againſt France during ſeven years. Theſe offers were haughtily rejected by John, who peremptorily inſiſted, that the prince himſelf, together with an hundred of the chief nobility in his army, ſhould ſurrender themſelves priſoners; and on theſe conditions he offered a ſafe retreat to the Engliſh army. The anſwer of the prince was that of an hero, who fears death much leſs than diſhonour. He declared that neither himſelf nor his knights ſhould be taken but in battle; and that he would rather ſacrifice his life than conſent to ſuch infamous terms.

The important conteſt was now to be decided by the ſword, which was to take place the following morning. No advantage was omitted by Edward: he employed the night in ſtrengthening the poſts he had ſo judiciouſly choſen, with new intrenchments; and detached a body of choſen men under the command of de Greilly, with orders to make a compaſs round the hill, and keep himſelf concealed under covert of the hedges and ditches with which it was ſurrounded, till the battle ſhould begin, and then to fall with the utmoſt fury on the French rear. He then divided his troops into three diſtinct bodies, but ranged them in ſo cloſe a manner, that they ſeemed to form only a ſquare battalion: the front was defended by a number of ditches and hedges; and the flanks were ſecured on one ſide by a ſteep hill, and on the other by a moraſs. The earl of Warwick was ſtationed on the ſide of the hill, with the troops which compoſed the van; the rear, commanded by the earls of Suffolk and Saliſbury, was poſted behind a hedge about a ſtone's caſt from the lane through which the French muſt march to the attack. At the end of this lane was a pretty large gap, where Edward took his poſt at the head of the main body, which extended itſelf among the vines and buſhes; the weaker part of the field being incloſed by the carriages and baggage waggons.

The French army was alſo divided into three bodies; the firſt was commanded by the duke of Orleans, the king's brother; the ſecond by the dauphin of France, aſſiſted by his two brothers the dukes of Anjou and Berry; and the third, which conſiſted of forty thouſand of the beſt troops in France, was led by the king in perſon.

The battle was begun about nine o'clock in the morning by three hundred choſen Frenchmen, who marched up the lane towards the main body of the Engliſh; but were ſo galled by the archers, who lined the hedges, that more than one half of them were ſlain before they reached the front of Edward's diviſion, where the reſt were cut to pieces by an advanced party commanded by lord Audley. The marſhals Clermont and Andrehen, who with a body of choſen cavalry had advanced cloſe behind the men at arms to ſupport them, met with ſo warm a reception from the earl of Warwick, and at the ſame time ſo impetuous an attack from the earls of Suffolk and Saliſbury, at the head of a detachment from the rear, that Clermont was killed on the ſpot, and Andrehen obliged to ſurrender himſelf priſoner: moſt of the corps ſhared the fate of the former. The firſt attack of the French being thus rendered abortive, the dauphin advanced to the charge, but not without great difficulty; his men, diſpirited at the fate of their companions, were not ready to follow their leader. In this critical moment de Buche fell with the utmoſt impetuoſity upon their rear, and threw them into terrible diſorder: the Engliſh archers plied them with inceſſant ſhowers of arrows from every quarter; while the other infantry with ſwords and battle-axes ruſhed upon them and made the moſt dreadful ſlaughter. The French threw down their arms and betook themſelves to flight, while the lords of Landas, Bodenai, and St. Venant, to whom the care of the dauphin and his two brothers had been particularly committed, carried them off the field of battle, and the whole diviſion followed their example.

The grand diviſion, however, which was compoſed of the houſhold troops, and headed by their king in perſon, aſſiſted by his principal nobility, ſtood firm, and ſeemed determined to diſpute the victory with the Engliſh, who were far inferior in number. They were, however, greatly diſmayed at the precipitate flight of their companions. The lord Chandois called out to the prince that the battle was won, and Edward immediately mounted his horſe, and advanced at the head of his army to attack the main body of the French. The dreadful ſtruggle for victory now began; all that had paſſed before ſeemed only an exerciſe of arms, in compariſon to the violent ſhock which now enſued. John exerted his utmoſt efforts to retrieve by his valour what he had loſt by his imprudence. The prince of Wales fell with the moſt amazing impetuoſity on a body of German cavalry placed in the front, and a ſtubborn conteſt enſued. Nor did the Germans give ground till their three leaders, together with the duke of Athenes, conſtable of France, were ſlain; but being left without a commander, they quitted the field of battle, leaving the king himſelf and his young ſon Philip, expoſed to all the fury of the enemy.

John now ſaw himſelf reduced to a ſmall battalion of faithful friends, who were continually leſſening by the ſwords of the Engliſh. At laſt, wearied out with fatigue, and overwhelmed with numbers, he wielded the ſword but faintly, and he might eaſily have been ſlain, but every one was emulous of ſo noble a prize, and therefore as they approached, called out to him to ſurrender, and offered him quarter; but unwilling to yield himſelf a priſoner to any perſon of inferior rank, he cried out, " Where is my couſin the prince of Wales; to him only I will yield." Being informed that Edward was in another part of the field, he ſtill perſiſted obſtinately to defend himſelf, till Sir Dennis de Morbec, a knight of Artois, made his way through the croud of aſſailants, and requeſted John to yield himſelf his priſoner; and John, after being aſſured that he was a knight, threw him his gauntlet as a ſignal of ſurrender, and both he and his ſon Philip were made priſoners.

The prince of Wales, who had been led a conſiderable diſtance in purſuit of the flying enemy, was repoſing himſelf under a tent he had ordered to be pitched for that purpoſe, when advice was brought him that the king of France and his ſons were ſurrounded, and either ſlain or taken priſoners. Edward immediately diſpatched the earl of Warwick and the lord Cobham, at the head of a ſmall detachment, to enquire into the fate of the French monarch, and, if poſſible, to reſcue him from the hands of the ſoldiers. Warwick happily arrived ſoon enough to ſave his life. The Engliſh had taken the royal priſoners from Morbec: the Gaſcons claimed the honour of detaining them; and ſome of the brutal ſoldiers, rather than yield the prize to their rivals, threatened to put both the illuſtrious captives to death. Both parties were over-awed by the preſence of Warwick, who approaching the monarch with the greateſt marks of reſpect, offered to conduct him to Edward's tent.

The behaviour of the prince was even, if poſſible, ſuperior to the ability and valour he had diſcovered in the battle. Inſtead of indulging a ſupercilious pride, too commonly the attendant on youthful warriors, he came from his tent to meet the captive king with all the marks of a ſincere regard. He ſympathized with his misfortunes; he comforted him in his afflictions; he paid him the tribute of praiſe due to his valour; and aſcribed his own victory to capricious fortune, or to the ſuperior power of an over-ruling providence. He ordered a magnificent repaſt to be prepared in his tent for the royal priſoner, and he himſelf waited on him at table, as if he had been one of his retinue; and when preſſed by the king, he declared with the greateſt modeſty, "That it was not for a ſubject like him to ſit in the preſence of ſo great a monarch."

The whole army imitated the example of their prince; and the French priſoners were every where treated with the greateſt tenderneſs and humanity. The ſpoils taken in the French camp were ſo great that the meaneſt individual in the Engliſh army found himſelf placed beyond the reach of want during the remainder of his life. Indeed the ranſoms of the noble priſoners alone were more than ſufficient for that purpoſe; though theſe were very moderate. The extent of the fortunes of all were conſidered, and no more was exacted of them than they could eaſily ſpare; no man was that day impoveriſhed for his misfortunes; they had ſtill ſufficient to perform their military ſervice for the future in a manner ſuitable to their rank and quality. And after a ſolemn thankſgiving was performed in the Engliſh camp for their late victory, Edward marched at the head of his army to Bourdeaux.

A. D. 1357. Pope Innocent VI. who was a Frenchman, and conſequently very zealous in the intereſts of the king of France, hearing of this fatal defeat, and that John and his ſon were priſoners, ſent the cardinals of Perigord and St. Vital to Bourdeaux, with orders to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to bring about a peace; but, failing in their negotiation, they confined their requeſts to the obtaining a truce for two years. The prince of Wales, who was ſincerely diſpoſed to heal the wounds which both nations had received in the courſe of their bloody conteſt, joined his endeavours to thoſe of the legate, and wrote over to the king his father, then in England, in ſuch preſſing terms, that the latter ſent him full powers to conclude a truce by ſea and land for two years, which was accordingly agreed upon at Bourdeaux on the 23d of March.

As ſoon as this truce was concluded, the prince of Wales, having ſettled the affairs of Gaſcony, embarked with his royal captives for England, and landed on the 5th of May at Sandwich in Kent. He was received at every place through which he paſſed with the greateſt expreſſions of joy; but conſtantly refuſed thoſe honors which were offered him, deſiring that the reſpect intended for him might be transferred with every mark of attention and civility to the French monarch. He was met in Southwark by a thouſand of the principal citizens of London on horſeback; and the mayor diſplayed, on this occaſion, all the pomp of the city. The entry was truly magnificent. John was dreſſed in his royal robes, and mounted on a ſtately white courſer, remarkable for its ſize and beauty, as well as for the richneſs of its furniture. Young Edward rode on the left-hand of his priſoner, on a little black palfry, and in a meaner dreſs, as if ſtudious to avoid every mark of diſtinction. The ſtreets through which they paſſed were ſuperbly adorned with plate, tapeſtry, and armour. The proceſſion reached Weſtminſter-hall about noon, where king Edward, ſurrounded by a ſplendid circle of the nobles, and other great men, received his royal priſoner, in all the pomp of ſtate, but at the ſame time with all the courteſy as if he had been a neighbouring prince, who had come voluntary to pay him a friendly viſit. All the pretenſions of Edward to the crown of France ſeemed to be forgotten, and John in captivity received the honors of a king, which were refuſed him when ſeated on the throne. The French monarch behaved with ſo much propriety on this occaſion, as to ſhew himſelf truly deſerving ſo generous a treatment: though conquered and a priſoner, he ſtill preſerved the dignity of a king. The French noblemen and knights met with the ſame generous and humane treatment.

Edward at this time enjoyed a glory which appeared the more dazzling from its being ſo very uncommon: he had in confinement two of his moſt potent enemies; namely, the king of France in London, and the king of Scotland at Odiham in Hampſhire. The latter, indeed, would have received his liberty long before, had not his ſubjects refuſed to pay his ranſom. At this juncture he ſeemed to have little cauſe to expect any favour from a victorious enemy, who had reduced his country to the greateſt diſtreſs, and whom, from the late amazing ſucceſs of his arms in other parts, might, according to the uſual frame of the human mind, be ſuppoſed not very ready to liſten to the dictates of humanity. But he was deceived. Edward, moved by the intreaties of his ſiſter, the queen conſort of Scotland, agreed to a negotiation for ſetting her huſband at liberty. The conferences were opened at Berwick, where it was agreed, "That David ſhould be ſet at liberty, and acknowledged king of Scotland, and an independent monarch, on his giving hoſtages for the payment of one hundred thouſand marks ſterling in ten years, by equal portions; and that a truce ſhould ſubſiſt, and be inviolably obſerved by both nations, till the whole ſhould be liquidated." This treaty being ratified, David returned to his kingdom, after a captivity of eleven years.

The affairs of Scotland were hardly finiſhed, before the two cardinal legates, who had negotiated the truce with prince Edward, arrived in London, with propoſals for a peace: but of ſo ſtrange a nature, that Edward refuſed to return them any anſwer. Baffled in this attempt, they demanded, in the name of his holineſs, the arrears of the tribute formerly paid to the ſee of Rome, amounting to a thouſand marks. Edward treated this demand as an obſolete and ridiculous claim; and bid them tell the pontiff, "That he held his kingdom of God alone, and acknowledged no other ſuperior, nor would he pay tribute to any mortal upon earth."

A. D. 1358. The captivity of John produced an univerſal confuſion in France. Charles the dauphin was declared regent, and had the mortification of ſeeing almoſt the whole kingdom revolt againſt him. Paris, at that time, began to be a formidable city, for it contained fifty thouſand men capable of bearing arms. Charles found himſelf obliged to releaſe the king ng of Navarre, whom his father had confined.

his was, in fact, letting looſe an enemy upon himſelf.
e king of Navarre no ſooner obtained his liberty,
n he came to Paris to blow the coals of ſedition, eady ſufficiently kindled. Marcel, provoſt of the erchants of Paris, entered the Louvre at the head of e male-contents, where he cauſed Robert de Cler-ont, marſhal of France, together with the marſhal Champagne, to be maſſacred in preſence of the uphin. In the mean time, the peaſants tumultuſly aſſembled from all parts, and, in the general nfuſion, attacked every gentleman they met with, eating them as revolted ſlaves behave towards thoſe ere maſters who happen to fall into their hands.
hey revenged themſelves, by a thouſand cruel pu-ſhments, for the meanneſs of their condition. In e midſt of theſe convulſions of ſtate, Charles of avarre aſpired to the crown; and a war was rried on by him againſt the dauphin, till the ter was obliged to diſſemble his reſentment, by reeing to a ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities, and par-ning this too powerful and rebellious vaſſal. The her cities of the kingdom followed the example of e capital: they ſhook off the dauphin's authority, ok the government into their own hands, and ſpread ſorder into every province. The nobles, whoſe clinations led them to adhere to the crown, and re naturally diſpoſed to check theſe tumults, had ſt their influence; and being reproached with wardice, on account of their baſe deſertion of their vereign in the battle of Poictiers, were treated with iverſal contempt by the inferior orders. The ſbanded ſoldiers, and the peaſants, who had learned mething of the art of war, formed themſelves into rties in the different provinces, eſpecially beyond e Loire. One of their chiefs called John of Gouge, burgher of Sens, was declared king of their banditti,
d did almoſt as much miſchief by his depredations the lawful ſovereign had done in the defence of his ngdom.

While theſe dreadful ſcenes were tranſacting in rance, a treaty was concluded between the kings of rance and England; by which it was agreed, that, conſideration of Edward's quitting all claim to the chy of Normandy, the counties of Anjou and aine, and the crown of France, he and his heirs ould enjoy Guienne, the Angoumois, Xaintonge, erigord, Quercy, the Limouſin, Poictou, Touraine, alais, Guiſnes, the Boulonnois, and the county of onthieu, free and independent of the crown of rance: and that John and the French nobles, who d been taken priſoners with him, ſhould pay, for eir ranſom, four millions of golden crowns, upards of a million and a half ſterling money. Theſe ticles were ſent over to France, and laid before a eeting of the ſtates, by whom they were rejected ith diſdain, as deſtructive at once of the honor and fety of the nation. Edward was highly exaſperated this refuſal, and determined to renew the war as on as the truce was expired; flattering himſelf at he ſhould ſucceed better by arms than by nego-ations.

This year was diſtinguiſhed by the death of two princeſſes nearly related to the king of England. The one was Iſabella, his mother, widow of the unfortunate Edward II. whoſe luſt and ambition had not only proved fatal to her wretched huſband, but had given riſe to a long and bloody war. She died at the caſtle of Riſings on the 12th of November, aged 63, after a confinement of 28 years. The other princeſs was Joan, queen of Scotland, who alſo paid the debt of nature much about the ſame time, at Hertford in England. She was buried by the ſide of her mother, in the choir of the Grey Friars, now called Chriſt Church, in London.

A. D. 1359. The truce expiring at Midſummer, Edward determined to proſecute the reſolution he had formed of invading France. No ſooner were his intentions known than the ſplendor of his former victories induced a prodigious number of adventurers to flock to his ſtandard; and he croſſed the ſea to Calais with an army of an hundred thouſand men*. This force was irreſiſtible, and the dauphin was too prudent to hazard a deciſive battle. He allowed the enemy to ſpend their fury in the open country, while he employed himſelf to put all the conſiderable towns in a poſture of defence. It had been determined in a council of war called by Edward near Calais, to penetrate immediately into the heart of France, without loſing time in taking places: a wiſe reſolution had it been punctually obſerved. But after waſting the province of Picardy, and entering Champagne, Edward was deſirous of being dignified with the royal diadem of France in the city of Rheims. He accordingly inveſted the city, where three months were ſpent without effect, while his army daily diminiſhed by ſickneſs, and he was obliged at laſt to raiſe the ſiege.

A. D. 1360. Edward, failing in this attempt, conducted his army into Burgundy, which, together with the Nivernois, were preſerved from his ravages, by paying the contributions he demanded. The Brie and the Gatinois he plundered with the utmoſt cruelty. He advanced to the gates of Paris, burnt the ſuburbs of that city, and challenged the dauphin to give him battle; but not being able to make that prudent prince change his plan of operations, he ſpread his army into the provinces of Maine, Beauſſe, and the Chartraine. Here he was overtaken by ſo dreadful a hurricane, as ſeemed to threaten the diſſolution of the univerſe. The ſhock of the elements, in thunder, lightening, and hail-ſtones of a prodigious ſize, ſtruck the boldeſt with terror. No leſs than ſix thouſand horſe, and a thouſand foot, were killed on the ſpot. Edward, with all his courage, was not proof againſt this dreadful ſcene: he conſidered it a warning from heaven to him, to ſheathe the deſtructive ſword of war upon equitable terms. Penetrated with theſe ſentiments, he leaped from his horſe, and proſtrating himſelf on the ground, with his arms extended towards the church of Chartres, dedicated to the Virgin, he vowed to agree inſtantly to a peace with France, if it could be obtained upon juſt and honourable terms.

This ſtorm has been conſidered by moſt hiſtorians as the cauſe which inſpired Edward with pacific diſpoſitions; while others (and indeed with great probability) imagine, that, mortified at the little progreſs he had made with ſo numerous an army, and to hide the ſhame of not being able to do any thing more than deſtroying the open country, he was diſpoſed to a reconciliation, and was glad that this event furniſhed him with an opportunity of effecting it. But whatever gave riſe to theſe pacific ſentiments, a negotiation was opened at Bretagne, where a treaty was concluded; by which it was agreed, that France ſhould pay, at three different times, three millions of crowns of gold (about a million and a half ſterling) for the ranſom of king John: That the king of England ſhould renounce his pretenſions to the crown of France, and to the provinces of Normandy, Maine, Tourain, and Anjou; and ſhould receive in exchange the provinces of Poictou, Xaintonge, Perigord, the Limoſin, Agenois, Quercy, Bigone, Gauze, Angoumois, and Rovergne; and enjoy theſe territories in the fulleſt manner, and without any feudal ſubjection or homage. That the diſpute between Charles de Blois and John de Montfort, with regard to the duchy of Britany, ſhould be candidly diſcuſſed, and referred to arbitration, under the ſanction of both kings; but if their good offices proved ineffectual, neither ſhould take any part in the quarrel, though the ſovereignty of Britany ſhould remain to the king of France, and John de Montfort be reſtored to the poſſeſſion of all his eſtates in that kingdom: That the king of France ſhould renounce alliance with the Scots, and Edward his connections with the Flemings. Forty hoſtages, among whom were the two ſons of the French king, the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, and many of the chief nobility of France, were given as ſecurities for the performance of theſe conditions.

---

* While Edward was making preparations for this expedition e took care to keep up the good humour of his ſubjects by every t of popularity he could deviſe. Among others there is one hich ſo ſtrongly marks the genius of his court and the times, at we preſume an account of it will not be unacceptable to the ader.

About the latter end of May a ſolemn juſt was proclaimed to e held at London for three days together. The challengers in e proclamation were, the lord-mayor, the two ſheriffs, and enty-one aldermen, who undertook to maintain the field againſt ll comers. But matters were managed with ſuch ſecrecy, that the ng perſonated the lord-mayor, and his four ſons, with nineteen of the principal nobility in England, the ſheriffs and other aldermen; being all dreſſed in complete cloſe armour, on which the arms and other diſtinctions of the city were painted. The deceit was not even ſo much as ſuſpected by the citizens themſelves, who were charmed to ſee their magiſtrates (as they thought) acquit themſelves in arms ſurpaſſing that of the braveſt knights in Europe. But they were ſtill more charmed when, at the end of the three days, the beavers being then lifted up, they found, inſtead of their mayor and court of aldermen, who remained all that time concealed, the greateſt perſonages of the court of England.

In conſequence of this treaty of peace, the king of France was ſet at liberty. He immediately went over to Calais, where Edward alſo ſoon after arrived, and both parties there ſolemnly ratified the treaty.

About the latter end of October, Edward embarked for England, and landed at Dover, with all his hoſtages, on the firſt of November. From hence he proceeded to pay his devotions at Canterbury, giving orders, purſuant to an obligation he had entered into, that the hoſtages ſhould every where be treated with all the reſpect due to their high quality, and that they ſhould be admitted upon their parole of honour, to all the liberty of exerciſe and diverſions.

A. D. 1361. The peace between the two kingdoms being concluded in France was productive of dreadful diſorders in that kingdom. Great numbers of adventurers, who had enliſted in Edward's army, joined the band of robbers that had for ſome time deſolated the provinces. Habituated to pillage, and ſtrangers to fear, they committed the moſt dreadful ravages, and were known by the name of "The Companies." At length John, marquis of Montferrat, being at war with the Viſcontis, lords of Milan, took the Companies into his pay, and freed France from theſe formidable bands of ruffians.

A. D. 1362. In the beginning of this year a dreadful peſtilence broke out in France, which carried off upwards of 30,000 inhabitants in Paris, and ſpreading into England, raged with equal violence in London. Among others ſwept away by this contagion was Henry duke of Lancaſter, who, from his great humanity, had obtained the ſurname of the Good Duke. His only ſurviving ſiſter became his heir: ſhe had been ſome time married to John of Gaunt, Edward's fourth ſon, who, in right of his brother-in-law, was the following year created duke of Lancaſter.

This year is alſo remarkable for the marriage of Edward the Black Prince with his couſin, Joan of Kent, the young and beautiful relict of the late earl of Kent, who had been beheaded in the beginning of the preſent reign by the intrigues of queen Iſabella and the infamous Mortimer; and for her exquiſite beauty, ſhe was generally known by the appellation of "The Fair maid of Kent." The young hero, who had raiſed the honour of the Engliſh to ſo exalted a pitch, was now created prince of Aquitaine, and inveſted with the property of many of the noble poſſeſſions ceded to the Engliſh by the treaty of Bretagne. He ſoon after croſſed the ſea, and fixed his reſidence at Bourdeaux, where he kept a royal court, beloved and reſpected by all ranks of people.

A. D. 1363. The French hoſtages, who were ſtill in London, began now to grow weary of their confinement, and the duke of Anjou broke his parole and eſcaped to Paris. This act, ſo contrary to the principles of honor and juſtice, filled John with the utmoſt concern; and he determined, at all events, to execute the conditions of the treaty. His council in vain endeavoured to diſſuade him from his deſign: his purpoſe was fixed, and every argument loſt its force. "If juſtice and good faith", ſaid he, "were baniſhed from the reſt of the earth, they ought yet to retain their habitation in the breaſts of princes." This noble way of thinking, incompatible with the maxims of policy, induced him to return to England, in order to ſubſtitute himſelf in the place of his ſon, the duke of Anjou. But he did not long ſurvive this action, which he thought abſolutely neceſſary. He died ſoon after, in the palace of the Savoy, where he had been royally entertained at the king's expence, and the ranſom was never paid.

A. D. 1365. In the month of January this year a parliament was held at Weſtminſter, when ſeveral laws were enacted which tended to the welfare and tranquillity of the nation. Edward alſo iſſued an edict for the apprehending a number of robbers and lawleſs banditti that infeſted the kingdom, conſiſting chiefly of ſoldiers that had been diſbanded at the concluſion of the peace with France; and that theſe delinquents might be more eaſily and ſpeedily brought to trial, he enlarged the judicatory powers of the city of London. He next applied himſelf to the removal of another evil, namely, the corruption of the judges. The lord chief juſtice Sir Henry Green, and Sir William Skipwith, one of the judges, were, for their partiality and extortion, impriſoned, heavily fined, and rendered incapable of holding any public employment.

A. D. 1366. Edward the Black Prince had now lived near three years in his principality of Aquitaine, without having an opportunity of exerciſing his valour, and, indeed, without any proſpect of doing it for a conſiderable time. On a ſudden, however, he was called forth from this ſtate of inactivity by an event which muſt lead us to a country diſtant from France and England, namely, that of Spain.

The throne of Caſtile was filled by Peter, ſurnamed the Cruel, from his ſanguinary and revengeful diſpoſition. He was placed in the ſeat of power while a minor, and in very unfavourable circumſtances. His father, Alphonſo XI. had ſeven natural children by his miſtreſs, Eleanor of Guſman; and ſettled ſuch conſiderable fortunes on them, that they defied the royal authority; while their mother, who enjoyed ſtill more power, inſulted the queen dowager. Caſtile was therefore divided into two parties, one of whom joined the queen mother, and the other Eleanor. When Peter came of age, and took the reins of government into his own hands, he was obliged to maintain a war againſt the faction of his natural brothers. Being victorious in a deciſive battle attle, he took Eleanor priſoner; and, to ſatisfy his mother's revenge, put her to death. Soon after, he married Blanche of Bourbon, who falling in love with the grand maſter of St. Jago, one of thoſe very baſtards who was then at war with her huſband, ſhe joined the faction, and Peter ſhut her up in a caſtle. This greatly augmented the fury of the faction, and Peter was obliged to fight againſt the king of Arraon and his natural brothers at the ſame time; but victory ſtill followed his ſtandards, and he made a cruel uſe of it. He ſeldom forgave a crime; ſo that ll his relations who had appeared in arms againſt him, were ſacrificed to his reſentment, and among the reſt the grand maſter of St. Jago. During theſe troubles, Blanche of Bourbon died in confinement; nd it was univerſally reported, that ſhe fell by the deteſted arts of poiſon. Henry of Tranſtamare, one of thoſe baſtards, animated with a deſire of revenging at once both the death of his mother, and that of the grand maſter of St. Jago, entered into a treaty with Charls V. king of France, and a powerful army was ſoon raiſed, under the command of John de Bourbon. Bertrand du Gueſclin, a native of Britany, famous for his military abilities, was appointed general in this expedition; and had the addreſs to engage the Companies, now returned from Italy, to follow him into Caſtile. They had been excommunicated by the pope, and were deeply affected by that ſentence, to which they paid a much greater regard than to any maxims of juſtice and humanity; though it was not ſufficient to make them abandon a life of rapine and extortion.

Du Gueſclin advanced with his army firſt to Avignon, where the pope then reſided, and demanded, ſword in hand, an abſolution for all his ſoldiers, and the ſum of two hundred thouſand livres. The former was very readily promiſed; but more difficulty was made with regard to the latter. "I believe," replied du Gueſclin, "my fellows may make a ſhift to do without an abſolution, but the money is abſolutely neceſſary." The pope then extorted from the inhabitants in the city and neighbourhood, the ſum of an hundred thouſand livres, and offered the money to du Gueſclin. "It is not my intention," replied the generous warrior, "to oppreſs the innocent people; the pope and the cardinals themſelves can eaſily ſpare me that ſum from their own pockets. This money, I inſiſt, muſt be reſtored to the owners, and ſhould they be defrauded of it, I ſhall myſelf return from the other ſide of the Pyrennees, and oblige you to make them reſtitution." The pope ſaw the neceſſity of ſubmiſſion, and paid him, from his own treaſury, the ſum demanded. The army, hallowed by the bleſſings, and enriched by the ſpoils of the church, proceeded on their expedition, and paſſed the Pyrenneian mountains.

It is natural to imagine that ſuch experienced and hardy ſoldiers, headed by ſo able a general, muſt eaſily alarm the king of Caſtile, whoſe ſubjects, inſtead of ſupporting their oppreſſor, were ready to join the enemy againſt him. Peter, therefore, thought it moſt adviſeable to fly from his dominions. He firſt repaired to the frontiers of Portugal; but being denied entrance into that kingdom, he repaired to Bourdeaux, to implore the aid and protection of the Black prince.

A. D. 1367. Edward promiſed his aſſiſtance to the fugitive monarch; and having obtained the conſent of his father, he levied a great army, and ſet out upon his enterprize. He was accompanied by his younger brother, John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter.

Edward's army paſſed the Pyrennees in three diviſions, each conſiſting of 10,000 horſe. At his approach all the Companies left du Gueſclin's army, declaring they would never draw their ſwords againſt their native prince. But notwithſtanding the deſertion of the Companies, Henry de Tranſtamare and du Gueſclin were ſtill at the head of an hundred thouſand men. Both armies were now in ſight of each other, and ſoon after was fought, on the banks of the Ebro near the village of Navarette, the famous battle of that name, between Peter and the Black Prince on one ſide, and Henry de Tranſtamare and du Gueſclin, on the other. Edward acquired more honour in this battle than Creſſy and Poictiers, becauſe the conteſt was much longer diſputed. The victory was complete; above twenty thouſand of the enemy fell on the field of battle, and Bertrand du Gueſclin and the marſhal of Ardrehen were taken priſoners.

Peter was re-eſtabliſhed on the throne of Caſtile, and Henry de Tranſtamare obliged to fly to Arragon. But gratitude was not one of Peter's virtues: he deceived his benefactor when he had no longer any need of his aſſiſtance. He refuſed the ſtipulated pay to the Engliſh forces; and Edward, perceiving that his men daily periſhed by ſickneſs, found himſelf under a neceſſity of leading them back to Guienne. Peter, however, enjoyed not long the good fortune he owed to the perſon he had ſo ungenerouſly treated. The Black Prince had no ſooner croſſed the Pyrennees, and Bertrand du Gueſclin paid his ranſom, than the baſtard of Tranſtamare revived the party of the malecontents, and du Gueſclin began to raiſe a new army. The forces of Arragon, the rebels of Caſtile, and the French auxiliaries appeared on the ſide of Tranſtamare: while Peter's army conſiſted of the greater part of the Caſtalians, the troops of Portugal, and the Moors of Spain; but his new allies rendered him ſtill more odious, and were of very little ſervice in the day of battle. Tranſtamare and du Gueſclin having no longer the genius and fortune of young Edward to contend with, obtained a complete victory in the neighbourhood of Toledo. The tyrant Peter was again dethroned and taken priſoner, when his brother, in revenge, murdered him with his own hand, and was afterwards placed on the throne of Caſtile, which he tranſmitted to his poſterity.

A. D. 1369. Prince Edward, during his campaign in Caſtile, had contracted, beſides a very dangerous diſorder, an enormous debt, which Peter had refuſed to pay. This obliged him to have recourſe to methods not conſiſtent with good policy. He totally alienated from him the affections of the French, by impoſing on them an unuſual and heavy tax. The nobility of Guienne made ſtrong remonſtrances againſt this impoſition, and even carried their complaints to the king of France as their lord paramount. The principal articles in the treaty of Bretagne, regarded the renunciation of the ſovereignty, and were to have been made reſpectively by John and Edward, but had remained unexecuted, though the failure in exchanging theſe renunciations was wholly owing to the chicanery of France. Charles, who directed all his affairs by the principles of policy rather than thoſe of juſtice, admitted the appeal of the nobility of Guienne, and ſummoned the prince of Wales to appear perſonally in his court at Paris. The prince, exaſperated at ſo inſolent and unjuſt a meſſage, anſwered, with all the ſpirit of a young warrior, that it ſhould be at the head of ſixty thouſand men. Charles was not, however, intimidated; he knew the declining years of Edward, the languiſhing ſtate of the prince of Wales's health, and the extreme animoſity which the inhabitants of the conquered provinces had expreſſed againſt the Engliſh, would act very powerfully in his favour. He therefore immediately declared war, and ſent a letter of defiance to the Engliſh monarch.

An event happened about this time, which greatly affected Edward, namely, the loſs of that illuſtrious princeſs Philippa, queen of England, who died on the 15th of Auguſt at Windſor, after a long and very ſevere illneſs. Her death was in a particular manner lamented by her royal conſort, with whom ſhe had lived forty years in perfect union and had brought him twelve children. Nor was her death lamented only by her family and relations; all ranks of people were ſharers in this calamity, eſpecially the poor, to whom ſhe had been a moſt liberal benefactreſs. She was buried in Weſtminſter abbey under a tomb of black touch-ſtone, on the top of which was her portraiture in alabaſter admirably executed.

A. D. 1370. The French began now to be very active in carrying on the war, which was commenced in Ponthieu, where they met with very little oppoſition. The dukes of Berry and Anjou, brothers to Charles, aſſiſted by du Gueſclin, invaded the ſouthern provinces, and ſoon produced an important revolution. The ſtate of the prince's health would not permit him to mount on horſeback, or exert his uſual activity. The brave Chandois, governor of Guienne, was ſlain in one action, and du Buche in another. Young Edward ſaw the progreſs of the French with the utmoſt regret; but his diſtemper increaſed ſo faſt upon him, that he was obliged to throw up his command, and return to England.

Edward, incenſed at the injuries he had received from Charles, meditated a ſevere revenge, but the infirmities of age ſuffered him not to head his armies in perſon, with that vigour and activity which attended him in the field of Creſſy. Sir Edward Knowles was for ſome time very fortunate. He marched from Calais at the head of thirty thouſand men, and extended his ravages to the very gates of Paris, but without being able to bring the enemy to a general engagement. He entered the provinces of Maine and Anjou, and laid them both waſte: but part of his army being there defeated by the admirable conduct of du Gueſclin, now created conſtable of France, the reſt were ſcattered and diſperſed, ſo that inſtead of reaching Guienne, they took ſhelter in Britany, whoſe ſovereign had entered into an alliance with England. The duke of Lancaſter, at the head of twenty-five thouſand men, made, ſoon after, the ſame attempt, and marched the whole length of France, from Calais to Bourdeaux, but his rear was ſo dreadfully harraſſed by flying parties of the enemy, and his foraging parties ſo frequently cut off, that hardly half his army reached the place of their deſtination. One province after another fell into the hands of the enemy, till Bourdeaux, Bayonne, and Calais only remained in the hands of the Engliſh, when the neceſſities of Edward obliged him to conclude a truce with the enemy.

A. D. 1376. The military glory which the great Edward once poſſeſſed was now buried in the grave of voluptuouſneſs. His whole attention had been hitherto engroſſed in the purſuits of war and ambition; but thoſe paſſions were now totally extinguiſhed. He began, at a very unſeaſonable time of life, to indulge himſelf in amorous dalliance, and was dwindled into the contemptible ſlave of an infamous woman, called Alice Pierce, who, to the ſcandal of all government, was ſuffered to ſit in the public court of juſtice, and even appeared decked in the jewels of the virtuous queen Philippa, which the now fallen Edward had the weakneſs to make her a preſent of, with all the other moveables of that worthy lady*: in ſhort, the regal authority ſeemed wholly conſigned to the hands of this ſtrumpet, who placed and diſplaced every great officer as ſhe thought proper. The people were no longer able to bear ſuch proceedings; and the parliament, which met on the 24th of April, declared their ſentiments on this ſubject with ſuch freedom, that before they broke up they obliged the king to iſſue a ſentence of baniſhment againſt the ſaid Alice, and to confiſcate her eſtate. At the ſame time, to ſhew that they retained a warm and loyal affection for their ſovereign, even in the midſt of his weakneſſes, they granted him a very conſiderable ſubſidy.

During this ſeſſions of parliament, the nation ſuffered an irreparable loſs by the death of Edward prince of Wales, who expired at Windſor on the 18th of June, in the 46th year of his age*. The character of this prince is truly amiable. His valour and military talents, which procured him the admiration of all Europe, form only a ſubordinate part of his merit. His humanity, generoſity, affability, and moderation, gained him the eſteem of all the world; even the moſt ſhining period of ancient or modern hiſtory would have received a luſtre from his virtues; they were celebrated by his greateſt enemies. Charles of France, though his kingdom had ſuffered ſo ſeverely from his valour, gave a noble mark of his high eſteem for this diſtinguiſhed hero. He cauſed a ſolemn ſervice to be performed for the repoſe of his ſoul, in the church of Notre Dame, and aſſiſted himſelf in perſon, with the principal part of the nobility of France.

The death of the prince was greatly lamented by the people, who had flattered themſelves with the proſpect of uninterrupted happineſs and glory under his reign. Their concern was likewiſe increaſed by the jealouſies they had entertained of the great power of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter, whom they were apprehenſive might ſeize the crown on the death of his father. To remove theſe fears, before the prince was buried, the commons petitioned the king, "that, for the comfort of the nation, his eldeſt ſon, Richard of Bourdeaux, might be brought into parliament, and acknowledged as the true heir apparent to the realm." Edward not only readily complied with this requeſt, but alſo created the young prince duke of Cornwall and earl of Cheſter, and ſoon after conferred on him the title of Prince of Wales.

The grief which Edward felt for the loſs of his ſon, added to the weakneſs that had for ſome time obſcured his great talents, rendered him now in a manner unfit for government, and he retired to a ſolitary life at Eltham in Kent, one of his country ſeats. The duke of Lancaſter availed himſelf of this opportunity ſo favourable to his ambition, by getting himſelf declared regent of the kingdom, with the approbation of the princeſs dowager and young prince Richard, whom he had gained over to his intereſt; and, the more effectually to remove from Edward the thoughts of reſuming the reins of government, he contrived to have Alice Pierce recalled again about the royal perſon; and ſhe ſoon gained ſuch an aſcendancy at court, as to procure the diſgrace of every one ſuſpected by, or obnoxious to, her, or the duke her patron.

Lancaſter, on being inveſted with the government, made it his firſt buſineſs to wreak his vengeance on the earl of Marche and the biſhop of Wincheſter, both men of great power and abilities, and the conſtant oppoſers of his ambitious meaſures: the former of theſe he obliged to reſign the ſtaff of earl-marſhal; and the latter was forbid the court, after having all his temporalities ſeized.

* He was buried in the cathedral of Canterbury, where his tomb, with an inſcription in French, is ſtill to be ſeen. He had iſſue two ſons, viz. Edward of Augouleſme, who died an infant, and Richard of Bourdeaux, who ſucceded his grand-father on the throne of England. He had likewiſe one daughter.

Lancaſter's next ſtep was, to procure a parliament that would, without heſitation, grant large ſupplies. This was eaſily effected; and the aſſembly meeting on the 27th of January, 1377, the lords and commons very readily granted the king four-pence, by way of poll-tax, from every perſon in the kingdom above fourteen years of age. The commons alſo, to ſhow their eagerneſs to oblige the court party, revoked the ſentence of confiſcation and baniſhment which had been paſſed againſt Alice Pierce; and ſhe was reinſtated in full poſſeſſion of all her former rights, privileges and eſtates.

Theſe meaſures, with the laying on the poll tax, occaſioned the greateſt diſcontent among the people; and the haughtineſs of the duke of Lancaſter and his friend the lord Piercy, on whom he had beſtowed the ſtaff of earl-marſhal, taken from the earl of Marche, ſerved to increaſe the flame which ſoon broke forth into the moſt unwarrantable exceſſes.

About this time John Wickliff, doctor of divinity in the univerſity of Oxford, began to publiſh his belief upon ſeveral articles of religion, wherein he differed from the common doctrine. He ſoon gained a number of followers in the kingdom, and among others the duke of Lancaſter and the lord Piercy, earl-marſhal. Wickliff being ſummoned to appear before the biſhop of London at a ſynod held by that prelate in St. Paul's cathedral, the duke and marſhal accompanied him thither, thinking their preſence would be a powerful protection; and, in the courſe of the examination, the duke and marſhal inſulted the biſhop, and even proceded to threats, upon which the ſynod broke up in great confuſion. The populace of London, who adored the biſhop, and were glad of any opportunity to be revenged on thoſe whom they thought their oppreſſors, aſſembled in a tumultuous manner, and, running to the Savoy, the magnificent palace of the duke of Lancaſter, they rifled the houſe, and ſearched every where for his perſon, which, in all probability, they would have ſacrificed in their unbridled fury; but, on advice of the danger that threatened him, he had eſcaped, with the lord Piercy, to the court of the princeſs of Wales, then at Kennington in Surry, where they remained till the tumult was ſubſided. The duke was ſo provoked that he could not be pacified but by the removal of the then mayor and aldermen, whom he accuſed of not having done their endeavours to quell the rioters. But this ſeverity ſerved only to render Lancaſter more odious and contemptible in the eyes of the people.

The truce with France expiring on the 1ſt of April, hoſtilities were again begun between the two crowns. The French laid ſiege to a ſtrong fort near Calais, which was delivered into their hands by the treachery or cowardice of the commanding officer. On the other hand, the brave Sir Hugh Calverly, governor of Calais, made an inroad into the French territories, from whence he returned with a great booty to Calais.

This was the laſt of the numerous military operations which diſtinguiſhed this buſtling reign; as the following was of the public acts of the great Edward. In an aſſembly of the knights companions of the Garter, on St. George's-day, he conferred that order on his grandſon Richard; which was the only honor he could give him, after declaring him his ſucceſſor.

A few days after this the king removed to Shene, where he was ſeized with a diſtemper called the cingles (a kind of St. Anthony's Fire that encompaſſes the body like a belt) which quickly encreaſed to ſo danrous a height as to leave no hopes of his recovery. In this ſituation all his infamous courtiers and attendants forſook him, Alice Pierce alone excepted, who watched with care the royal body ſo long as ſhe thought any life remained in it; but when ſhe beheld him in the agonies of death, ſhe ſtripped him of his rings and jewels, and then left him without a ſingle friend or domeſtic to cloſe his eyes.

Thus deſerted and forlorn lay the once great, but now expiring, Edward. At length, a prieſt of his houſhold, paſſing by accident through the room where he lay in a condition the moſt abject that can befal the human race, had the humanity to approach the bed-ſide, and, finding the poor king yet breathing, addreſſed to him ſome pious exhortations, to which the latter endeavoured to reply, but in words too inarticulate to be underſtood. At laſt, however, making a final effort, he pronounced the word Jeſus! and cloſed his eyes upon this world and all his former glories.

Here let humanity take its ſympathizing ſtand! here let ambition drop its aſpiring head! and contemplate (in the deplorable exit of this conqueror of nations) the vanity of all ſublunary greatneſs! while the hiſtorian, turning his eyes from this humiliating object, endeavours to trace the lineaments of a character ſo conſpicuous in the Engliſh annals.

Edward III. was in perſon tall of ſtature, but ſo juſtly proportioned, and of ſo noble and majeſtic an aſpect, as at once engaged affection and commanded reſpect. He was gracious and obliging to the virtuous and deſerving; ſtern and inexorable to the bad and faithleſs. In converſation he was affable and communicative, nor did he diſdain to receive inſtruction from thoſe beneath him, in inſtances where they were enabled to give it: at the ſame time he was poſſeſſed of ſo juſt a diſcernment, that few princes ever made a more happy choice of ſervants, either in the domeſtic, the civil, or the military departments. He was a friend to the poor, the fatherleſs, the widow, and when he relieved, it was as a king, by putting them above the return of their miſeries. In the diſtribution of rewards and dignities, he ſhewed a diſtinguiſhed judgment, and an invariable regard to merit. He had a taſte for the liberal arts, much above what could be expected for the age in which he lived; witneſs the edifices of Windſor Caſtle, King's Hall in Cambridge, and the collegiate chapel of St. Stephen (now the room where the commons of Great Britain aſſemble) all which he built, and the two laſt endowed.

It remains now that we ſhould ſay ſomething of his political character. If we view him in this light he will appear to us one of the greateſt princes that ever ſwayed the Engliſh ſceptre, whether we behold him as a warrior, a legiſlator or a monarch. It muſt, indeed, be confeſſed that the love of glory was his predominant paſſion, and that, on ſeveral occaſions, he ſcrupled not to indulge it even at the expence of humanity, the lives of his ſubjects, and the intereſt of his country; but then it muſt be conſidered that he was but a man, and, as ſuch, liable to errors; and that the diſtracted ſtate of affairs on the continent, and the jarring intereſts of its princes, concurred in flattering his ambition, and inſpiring him with views which otherwiſe, perhaps, he might never have conceived. His conduct with regard to Scotland, and his claim to the ſucceſſion of France, involved his ſubjects and himſelf in many difficulties; but theſe very difficulties ſerved in the end to wean them from the vain notions they had entertained on their king's amazing ſucceſſes, and at the ſame time taught them that victories may, under certain circumſtances, ſerve only to diſtreſs, and conqueſts to encumber. The obtaining of conqueſts, however, ſeems to have had but a ſecond place in Edward's glory: he was a true lover of the conſtitution of his country, with which he was intimately acquainted, and ſhewed himſelf on all occaſions as anxious to defend the privileges of the people, as to preſerve the prerogatives of the crown.

As to his weakneſs at the cloſe of his life, in ſuffering himſelf to be made the dupe of an artful and worthleſs woman, we may in ſome meaſure excuſe him, by ſuppoſing that his paſſion might at firſt be only an amuſement to divert the melancholy reflections ariſing from the diſappointments with which his latter days were clouded; and conſidering, that he who had not had leiſure in his youthful hours to be acquainted with the power of love, was the leſs able to guard againſt it in his old age.

This great prince died at Shene (now Richmond) on the 21ſt of June, 1377, in the 65th year of his age, and the 51ſt of his reign. He was buried in Weſtminſter-abbey near his queen Philippa, by whom he had the following iſſue:

1. Edward the Black Prince.
2. William of Hatfield, who died in his infancy.
3. Lionel of Antwerp, duke of Clarence; who was firſt married to Elizabeth de Burgh, heireſs of William de Burgh, earl of Ulſter. After her death, he married Violante, daughter to the duke of Milan; and died in Italy ſoon after the conſummation of his nuptials, without leaving any poſterity by that princeſs.
4. John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter, from whom ſprung that branch which afterwards poſſeſſed the crown. He firſt married Blanche, daughter and coheireſs of Henry duke of Lancaſter, to whoſe title he ſucceeded. His ſecond wife was Conſtance, eldeſt daughter of Peter the Cruel, king of Caſtile, in whoſe right he aſſumed the arms and title of that kingdom. After her death, he married Catherine Swinford, who had already bore him ſeveral illegitimate children.
5. Edmund de Langley, earl of Cambridge, conſtable of Dover-caſtle, and afterwards duke of York.
6. William of Windſor, who died an infant.
7. Thomas of Woodſtock, who received the title of earl of Buckingham from his father, and duke of Glouceſter from his nephew.

The daughters were,

1. Iſabella, married to Ingelram de Coucy, earl of Bedford.
2. Joan, who died of the plague at Bourdeaux.
3. Blanche, who died in her infancy.
4. Mary, married to John de Montfort, earl of Britany.
5. Margaret, married to John de Haſtings, earl of Pembroke.

The remarkable occurrences that happened in the reign of Edward III. were as follow:

In the fourth year of his reign, on the 10th of July, there happened a great eclipſe of the ſun; and the rains were ſo violent this year, that the harveſt did not begin till Michaelmas. At Chriſtmas, a violent weſterly wind overthrew ſeveral private houſes and public edifices, tore up trees by the roots, and did other conſiderable miſchief.

In his ninth year, the rains were ſo fatal, that the corn was ſpoiled; a dearth enſued, wheat being ſold for forty ſhillings a quarter, (as much as twenty ſhillings a buſhel now) and the cattle was deſtroyed by a murrain.

In his twelfth year, it rained almoſt continually from the beginning of October to the beginning of December, and then came a froſt upon it, which laſted twelve weeks; yet, though the corn was deſtroyed by it in a great meaſure, the war with Scotland made money ſo ſcarce, that all ſorts of grain were ſold at a reaſonable rate.

In his thirteenth year, an hundred and twenty laymen, and ſeveral prieſts, beſides women, were drowned, by an inundation of water, at Newcaſtle upon Tyne.

While the battle of Creſſy was fighting, in the twentieth year of his reign, there fell a violent ſtorm of hail, accompanied with an eclipſe, and terrible thunder, at which times prodigious flights of crows hovered over the Engliſh and French armies.

In his twenty-ſecond year, it rained from Midſummer to Chriſtmas ſo conſtantly, that there was not one day or night dry together. This wet ſeaſon cauſed great floods, and a peſtilence, which raged for a whole year. The earth was, at the ſame time, barren, and even the ſea did not produce ſuch plenty of fiſh as formerly. The mortality was ſo great, that, in the city of London, two hundred corpſe were buried every day in the Charter-houſe-yard, beſides thoſe interred in other common burying-places; and this laſted from Candlemas to Eaſter.---This year was alſo remarkable for the inſtitution of the Order of the Garter, which probably owed its origin to the love Edward bore to the counteſs of Saliſbury. That celebrated lady, at a court ball, dropped her garter, which the king took up; and obſerving that ſome of his courtiers ſmiled, as if he had not obtained that favor merely by accident, he called out, "Honi ſoit qui "mal y penſe." Evil be to him who evil thinks. Theſe words became the motto of the order. It conſiſted at firſt of no more than twenty-four perſons beſides the ſovereign; though it ſoon became a capital object of ambition to courtiers.

His twenty-ſeventh year was remarkable for the ſcarcity of corn and proviſions in England and France, occaſioned by a great drought. It was called the Dead Summer. Rye was brought out of Zealand to ſupport the poor, who otherwiſe muſt have periſhed for want of ſuſtenance.

In his thirty-fourth year great deſtruction was made both among men and beaſts by dreadful ſtorms of thunder and lightning; and to add to theſe calamities, the plague again broke out with great violence, which was diſtinguiſhed from that already mentioned by being called the Second Mortality.

In his thirty-ninth year the rains were again violent, and a great dearth and peſtilence followed. Flights of ſparrows fought in the air, and prodigious numbers of them were found dead on the ground.

In his forty-ſecond year a comet appeared in March, between the north and weſt; the beams were darted towards France, and were thought to preſage new troubles to that kingdom in the following year. The weſtern parts of England, and particularly Oxford, were greatly afflicted with a peſtilence.

SECTION IV.

RICHARD II.

ON the death of Edward III. his grandſon Richard ſucceeded to the throne; and was imediately proclaimed king by the name of Richard II. which time he was only in the eleventh year of his ge. The beauty of his perſon, joined to the enthuaſtic fondneſs of the people for his illuſtrious father e Black Prince, occaſioned his acceſſion to be celerated with univerſal joy throughout the whole kingom. And ſo impatient were the people to ſee their ew monarch decorated with the enſigns of royalty, at the day of his coronation was fixed for the 15th of uly, when the ceremony was performed with the eateſt magnificence*. On this occaſion the young ng created his uncle, Thomas of Woodſtock, duke Glouceſter; and conferred the honour of knightood on ſeveral of the young nobility.

A few days after the king's coronation, the parliaent eſtabliſhed a council of regency; and the comons proceeded to increaſe their influence, and to onfirm their privileges. But the greater power of e king's uncles directed the meaſures of governent. Lancaſter in particular, though very unpolar, and of a genius not at all adapted to any bold terprize, yet having been accuſtomed to govern ring the latter part of the late reign, took upon nſelf the chief direction of affairs, though, what is ry remarkable, neither himſelf or his brothers were med in the council of regency.

The war with France was ſtill carried on with gour on both ſides, and ſeveral places were taken, ough no action of real importance had happened tween the two kingdoms. In the month of Ocber the parliament aſſembled at Weſtminſter, in der to deviſe the proper means of checking the ogreſs of the French arms. The commons dened giving their opinion in a matter of ſuch mont, without the advice and aſſiſtance of the duke Lancaſter; but as that nobleman, for various ighty reaſons, excuſed his attendance, the comons granted a conſiderable ſupply for the ſervice of e public, on condition that the money ſhould be dged in the hands of two truſtees, John Philpot and illiam Walworth, merchants of London. Theſe triotic citizens had fitted out ſeveral ſhips at their n expence, which ſailing in queſt of one Mercer, a ottiſh mariner, who had greatly annoyed the Engliſh ſters, took him, together with fifteen Spaniſh ſhips ich had entered into his ſervice.

The Scots had not only made captures at ſea, but mmenced hoſtilities by land, in violation of a truce ich had been lately concluded between the two gdoms. They ſurprized and took the town and caſtle Berwick, on which the earl of Northumberland rched with an army of 10,000 men, and ſummon- the fortreſs to ſurrender, was anſwered by Ramſey, vernor of the garriſon, that the place had been en by virtue of a commiſſion from the king of France, in whoſe name he would defend it to the laſt extremity. An aſſault was therefore immediately made, and the place being taken, the whole garriſon were put to the ſword. The earl, after this, ſent Sir Thomas Muſgrave with a party of 600 men to reconnoitre the country that he might make farther advances; but Sir Thomas's party being totally routed, and himſelf taken priſoner, the earl, who was fearful of not getting ſubſiſtence for his men, thought proper to return to England.

A. D. 1378. In the month of March, Sir Hugh Calverly, governor of Calais, burnt upwards of twenty ſhips in the port of Boulogne, which town he laid in aſhes, and carried off a conſiderable booty. In his return to Calais he was informed that the people of Picardy had betrayed to the French the caſtle of March, a fort of great conſequence not far from Calais, in the abſence of the governor; but Sir Hugh attacked the place ſo vigorouſly, that he ſoon retook it, and hanged up all the Picards who had betrayed it, as guilty of treaſon.

About the ſame time Richard entered into a treaty with the duke of Bretagne, who agreed to deliver up into the hands of the Engliſh the ſtrong town, caſtle and harbour of Breſt, on condition that the ſame ſhould be reſtored to him in caſe of a peace, that he ſhould raiſe the ſum of 1000l. ſterling, and be allowed a penſion of 800l. per annum. He alſo engaged to bring about an alliance between the courts of England and Flanders.

A. D. 1379. In the ſpring of this year, a dreadful plague broke out in the north of England, which depopulated the greateſt part of the country. The Scotch took advantage of this calamity by making a furious irruption into that part of the country, where they not only plundered many towns and villages, but committed the moſt ſhocking barbarities on the helpleſs inhabitants.

In the month of September, in the following year died Charles V. king of France, leaving his throne to his ſon Charles VI. a minor under twelve years of age. This event might have proved of conſiderable advantage to the Engliſh, had the duke of Bretagne continued firm to his engagements; but thinking it the ſafeſt way to take advantage of the confuſion of the court of France in the beginning of a minority, he quickly concluded a treaty with the new king; ſo that all expectations of aſſiſtance from him were totally annihilated.

In the mean time the Scots continued their depredations in the northern counties, which they ravaged with fire and ſword; and the Engliſh government, inſtead of exerting themſelves to puniſh thoſe inſolent and cruel invaders, meanly propoſed a treaty of peace, which was gladly embraced by the Scots, and was concluded for three years by the duke of Lancaſter

* It is at this coronation that hiſtory firſt mentions a champion, appeared compleatly armed, in Weſtminſter-hall, where his eſty dined. He was attended by the high conſtable and marof England; and preceded by the heralds. When the cham reached the middle of the hall, he threw his gauntlet on the nd, and challenged all perſons whatſoever, who ſhould dare ſpute his majeſty's title to the crown. The origin of this cuſtom, which is ſtill preſerved, is, however, utterly unknown: for though this is the firſt time we find it mentioned by hiſtorians, it is, doubtleſs, of a much earlier date; ſince Sir John Dimmock, who performed the office at the coronation of Richard II. was admitted to it by virtue of a right annexed to the manor of Scrivelſby, in Lincolnſhire, held by him in right of his wife, the daughter of Sir John Marmion.

(who had had a commiſſion for that purpoſe) on the 6th of September.

Though no action of importance had yet been performed in the war againſt France, yet the great expence attending the ſeveral expeditions had quite exhauſted the treaſury; and the parliament, in order to raiſe the neceſſary ſupplies, impoſed a new and extraordinary tax of three groats on every perſon male and female, above fifteen years of age; but they ordained, that in levying this tax, the rich ſhould relieve the poor by an equitable compenſation. As the money was immediately wanted, and the common method of gathering it would require ſome conſiderable time, the court farmed out the grant to a ſet of rapacious collectors, who extorted it with the utmoſt rigor from the people. This impoſition, added to the cruelty and preſumptuous behaviour of the tax-gatherers, occaſioned one of the moſt ſingular mutinies recorded in the annals of hiſtory. The people had already acquired ſome idea of independence, and given ſeveral indications of their deſire of breaking thoſe chains which had ſo long been impoſed upon them by a haughty nobility. Enthuſiaſm alſo aſſiſted to augment this deſire, and make the populace acquainted with their own importance.

One John Ball, a turbulent but popular preacher, viſited various parts of the kingdom, and every where inculcated on his audience the maxims of equal right and liberty to all the goods of nature; and the tyranny of artificial diſtinctions introduced by a few inſolent rulers, in order to aggrandize themſelves, and degrade the more conſiderable part of the ſpecies. Doctrines like theſe, ſo agreeable to the populace, were embraced with avidity, and kindled in the minds of the vulgar thoſe ſparks of rebellion which the inſolence of the tax-gatherers blew into a flame.

A. D. 1381. The inſurrection began at Deptford, in Kent; where one of the collectors came to the houſe of Walter, a tyler by profeſſion, afterwards better known by the name of Wat Tyler, and demanded three groats for one of his daughters. The peaſant refuſed to comply with the demand, urging, that ſhe was under the age preſcribed by act of parliment. The inſolent tax-gatherer not only refuſed to acquieſce in this deciſion, but offered to produce a very indecent proof to the contrary; and, at the ſame time laid hold of the girl. Enraged at this inſolence, Tyler beat out the fellow's brains with his hammer. The action was highly approved by the populace of the neighbourhood, who inſtantly flew to arms. Their example was followed by the peaſants of Eſſex, Surry, Suſſex, Hertfordſhire, Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Lincoln; ſo that even before the government had any warning of the danger, the diſorder was become too great for oppoſition.

The inſurgents having appointed Blackheath as the place of general rendezvous, they accordingly aſſembled there, to the number of an hundred thouſand men, under their principal leaders, Wat Tyler, and Jack Straw. The duke of Lancaſter was now on the borders of Scotland, and the number of regular troops in the kingdom very inconſiderable; ſo that the government was thrown into the utmoſt confuſion, as having every thing to fear from this lawleſs aſſembly. A council was called in the Tower, where a reſolution was taken to ſend a meſſenger to the inſurgents, to enquire the cauſe of this tumultuous meeting. The mutinous rabble received the meſſengers with the moſt haughty inſolence; and returned for anſwer, "That they were come to ſpeak to the king about certain important affairs; and deſired he would repair to the camp in perſon, and hear what they had to propoſe." Many of the council, particularly the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Sir Robert Haies, the treaſurer, oppoſed the king's going in perſon to treat with the rebels; thinking it at once both derogatory to his dignity, and dangerous to his life. But it being repreſented to the council, that the inſurgents were in full march for London, and that it would be impoſſible to prevent their gaining admittance into the city, the king went down the river in a barge, as far as Rotherhithe; but on approaching the ſhore, he perceived ſuch ſymptoms of tumult and inſolence, that he put back, and returned to the Tower.

Exaſperated at this diſappointment, the peaſants, who were by this time joined by the city rabble, advanced to the bridge, and threatened to burn the ſuburbs firſt, and then the capital itſelf, if the gates were not immediately opened. Intimidated by theſe threats, which they were able to carry into execution, their demand was complied with. They entered the city, and immediately gave a looſe to every ſpecies of exceſs. They plundered the houſes of the moſt wealthy citizens, and abuſed their perſons, together with thoſe of their wives and daughters. A party of them ran immediately to the duke of Lancaſter's palace in the Savoy, and ſoon reduced that magnificence ſtructure, together with all its ſplendid furniture, to aſhes. Another party ſet fire to the Temple; while a third repaired to the elegant monaſtery of St. John of Jeruſalem, at Clerkenwell, near Smithfield, and burnt the whole ſtructure, together with all the books, records and papers. They beheaded all the gentlemen that fell into their hands, and particularly attornies and thoſe who had any connexions with the law.

Early the next morning they divided themſelves into three bodies. The firſt diviſion, under Jack Straw, marched to Highbury-manor, about two miles to the northward of London. The ſecond retired to Mile-End. And the third, under the command of Wat Tyler himſelf, took up their ſtation in St. Katherine's, and round the Tower, to prevent the eſcape of the miniſters and noblemen who had taken ſhelter in that fortreſs, and whom the rabble had devoted to deſtruction. The king, who had alſo retired thither for ſafety, finding the fortreſs, which was but weakly garriſoned, and almoſt deſtitute of proviſions, incapable of making any long defence, found means to eſcape during the night; and hearing that the rebels at Mile-End were the moſt tractable, and had expreſſed a deſire of treating with the government, he repaired thither, and demanded to know the reaſon for this tumultuous aſſembly; telling them, that he was their king, and that he was come to hear and redreſs their grievances. They inſiſted upon a general amneſty; the abolition of all ſlavery; liberty of trade in all market-towns, without paying either toll or impoſt; and that a ſtated rent ſhould be laid upon lands, inſtead of the ſervice impoſed upon villanage. Theſe requeſts the king granted very readily, but inſiſted on their laying down their arms immediately. They made no difficulty of obeying; and returned very quietly to their own houſes, leaving a few of each pariſh to carry down with them the general pardon, and charters of their freedom.

The rebels, however, under Wat Tyler were not to be ſo eaſily pacified. They were determined to revenge the evils they had ſuffered on the heads of the nation, and if poſſible, carry the romantic ſcheme of government they had formed into execution. Accordingly, while the king was treating with one diviſion of the inſurgents, Wat Tyler demanded admittance into the Tower; and the garriſon were ſo intimidated by the multitude of rebels, that they refuſed to defend the place, and the gates were accordingly thrown open.

This puſillanimous conduct raiſed the inſolence of the rabble to the higheſt pitch; and their behaviour was at once brutiſh and barbarous. They ſeiz Simo imon Sudbury, archbiſhop of Canterbury, then hancellor, dragged him to Tower-hill, and beheaded im with the utmoſt cruelty. Sir Robert Hales, ord treaſurer, and Legg, the Flemiſh farmer of the nd-tax, ſuffered the ſame fate; and a Franciſcan iar was put to death merely becauſe he had been in- imate with the duke of Lancaſter.

The deeper theſe rebels plunged themſelves into uilt, the more their views of murder and confuſion ere enlarged; every perſon of note that fell into eir hands, was ſacrificed as a victim to their lawleſs arbarity. The citizens now ſaw their error in ad- itting ſuch a turbulent multitude into the city. Their vage practices rouſed them to revenge, and re- overed them from their conſternation. Walworth, e lord-mayor, and Philpot one of the aldermen, romiſed the king, that they would ſupport him againſt e rebels, provided ſome method could be found to muſe them with propoſals. Sir John Newton was erefore ſent to acquaint them, that the Eſſex men d accepted certain conditions from the government, conſequence of which they had retired peaceably their habitations; and that he was impowered to ffer them the ſame terms, on their making the ſame bmiſſion. But the ſavage plebeians, fluſhed with eir late ſucceſs, had now formed the moſt chimeri- l deſigns; they propoſed to murder the king, to- ther with all the whole nobility, and bury all vernment in general anarchy, in order to deſtroy ery ſpecies of ſubordination, and render all men ual. Tyler, therefore, made no other anſwer to king's meſſage, than that he would conſent to a ace if he liked the terms.

Three different charters were ſent ſucceſſively Richard, in the ſpace of a few hours, but were rejected with the moſt provoking inſolence. The niſtry and principal men of the city were now roughly exaſperated, and Richard, attended by lord mayor, and chief officers of London, rode Smithfield. Sir John Newton was again ſent to demagogue, inviting him to a conference with king, in order that his majeſty might know his mands, and, if poſſible, give his conſent to their ng granted. Tyler now ſeemed to be alarmed, moved towards Smithfield, at the head of the ble, with a very ſlow and deſultory pace. New- told him the king was waiting for him, and de- d he would quicken his march. Make what e you pleaſe yourſelf," replied the inſolent rebel, I ſhall take my own time." The true reaſon for delay in the demagogue aroſe from his expect- a large reinforcement from Hertfordſhire and adjacent counties, and therefore he would will- y have deferred the conference till their arrival. the government was now in a capacity to defeat ir ſchemes, and therefore unwilling to ſuffer them exerciſe their ſavage barbarity any longer. The giſtrates of London had aſſembled a large body well-armed and well affected citizens, and Sir Ro- t Knowles was juſt arrived at the head of a thou- d veterans. When Tyler came into Smithfield, re the king waited for him, Sir John Newton told that both decency and duty required that he ld be uncovered in the preſence of his ſovereign; the traitor, inſtead of complying, was ſo highly nded, that he would have ſheathed his dagger in heart, had not the king ſuddenly advanced, and off his attention, by aſking what he had to re- ſt? Tyler was greatly diſconcerted; and made extravagant propoſals, and delivered himſelf in coherent a manner, that the king could make no y. He demanded that all the antient laws ſhould boliſhed; that all bondmen ſhould be free; that warrens, parks and chaſes ſhould be laid open, every perſon, the poor as well as the rich, ſhould have free liberty to fiſh, fowl, and hunt in every part of the kingdom. He added ſeveral other particulars relative to the levelling ſcheme he had formed, but in ſo confuſed a manner that they were not underſtood. The king not being able to comprehend the meaning of what this illiterate leader had advanced, returned no anſwer, which Tyler conſidering as a contemptuous refuſal, raiſed his dagger, and at the ſame time laid hold of the bridle of the king's horſe. Walworth, the mayor, who had with difficulty curbed his reſentment at the behaviour of this audacious rebel, was now ſo exaſperated that he rode up to him, and diſcharged ſo violent a blow on his head with the mace he carried in his hand, that Tyler fell ſenſeleſs from his horſe, when Philpot with his ſword immedialy diſpatched him.

The Kentiſh men ſeeing their leader fall, cried out, "Our Captain is killed; let us revenge his death!" and bending their bows, prepared to let fly a ſhower of arrows againſt the king and his attendants, which might have ſlain the greateſt part of them, had not young Richard, with an admirable intrepidity and precence of mind, rode up alone to the incenſed multitude, whom he addreſſed with a chearful yet reſolute air, ſaying, "What is the meaning of this diſorder, my good people? what are you about to do? Would you kill your king? Give yourſelves no concern about the death of that traitor; I will be your captain: follow me, and you ſhall have whatever you can reaſonably deſire."

After the king had thus addreſſed them, he gently turned his horſe, and putting himſelf at their head, rode towards the fields of Iſlington. The mob was ſo confounded at the bold action of Walworth, and death of their leader, and at the ſame time ſo overawed with the preſence and magnanimity of the young king, that they implicitly followed him, without knowing whither they were going. They had no ſooner left the city than they perceived a large body of forces marching towards them, under the command of Sir Robert Knowles: this ſight ſtruck them with ſuch terror that they imagined the whole city was in arms to attack them; and the foremoſt ranks, throwing down their weapons, called out for mercy. This ſo frightened the reſt, that they immediately followed the example, and falling on their knees begged for quarter.

Sir Robert Knowles would have perſuaded the king to put a mumber of them to death, in order to ſtrike a terror into their companions in other parts of the kingdom; but Richard, with equal juſtice and lenity, obſerved, that as many had joined them more from force than inclination, he was not willing to confound the innocent with the guilty by an undiſtinguiſhed carnage: and granting them the ſame charters with which he had indulged the Eſſex men, the whole multitude diſperſed without the effuſion of any blood except that of their leader.

The king afterwards returned to the city, where he conferred the honour of knighthood on Walworth the lord mayor, John Philpot, Nicholas Brambre, and Robert Laud, aldermen, for the ſignal ſervice on this occaſion; and likewiſe beſtowed grants in land of 100l. per annum to the firſt, and 40l. to the others, to them and their heirs for ever.

The overthrow of the Kentiſh rebels had ſuch an effect on thoſe in the other parts of the kingdom, that after ſome little reſiſtance, they were very glad to lay down their arms, and ſubmit to the king's mercy. The charter of enfranchiſements and pardon were revoked by another charter, dated the 2d of July; the common people were reduced to the ſame ſtate of ſubmiſſion and dependence in which they had formerly been placed; and ſeveral of the ring-leaders were executed in different parts of the kingdom.

On the 2d of May, this year (1381) a treaty of marriage was concluded between young Richard and Anne, daughter of the late emperor Charles IV. and ſiſter to the reigning emperor Wenceſlaus king of Bohemia. In this treaty the king's council appear to have had more regard to the merit of this princeſs than to her fortune; for inſtead of Richard's receiving any thing with her as a dowry, he gave the emperor her brother no leſs than 10,000 marks for his alliance, and was alſo at the whole expence of her coming over to England, where ſhe arrived about the latter end of December, and was married to the king, in the chapel royal at Weſtminſter, on the 14th of January 1382, at which time ſhe was alſo crowned with great ſolemnity.

The remarkable intrepidity and conduct of Richard in ſuppreſſing the Kentiſh rebels, had inſpired the people with the higheſt expectations of his future behaviour. But the preſages of early youth are often deceitful. As Richard advanced in years, his conduct abundantly demonſtrated that their hopes were built on a deluſive foundation; and it was ſoon evident, that he wanted both judgment and capacity. What rendered this want of ability the more alarming to the Engliſh was the unſettled ſtate of affairs on the continent, and which threatened to involve all Europe in confuſion. On the death of Gregory X. Brigano, Biſhop of Barri, was elected pontiff, and took the name of Urban VI. But his paſſionate and turbulent diſpoſition rendered him a very improper perſon to be placed at the head of the church. He had not long been ſeated in St. Peter's chair, before he declared, in full conſiſtory, that he was determined to puniſh the kings of France and England, as the diſturbers of the peace of Chriſtendom. Cardinal de la Grange, a Frenchman, and equally paſſionate with the pope himſelf, roſe from his ſeat, and ſhaking his fiſt at the pontiff, told him that "he lied." This raſh expreſſion involved all Europe in confuſion.

The greater part of the cardinals, ſhocked at the brutal diſpoſition of Urban, withdrew to Fondi, in the kingdom of Naples, where they declared the late election void, and proceeded to the election of a new pontiff; and Robert, ſon to Amadeus III. count of Geneva, was elected, and took the name of Clement VII. The new pontiff was a perſon of great parts, eloquent, polite, liberal, and allied to moſt of the princes of Europe. England, Flanders and Hungary, declared for Urban; France, Scotland, Savoy, and Lorrain, for Clement. All the religious orders were divided: the doctors and univerſities joined alſo in the conteſt. The two popes beſtowed on each other the appellations of Antichriſt and Uſurper, and proceeded to mutual excommunications. A civil and religions war was kindled in Europe, and the moſt horrid cruelties committed by the advocates of both parties

Clement preached up a cruſade againſt Richard and his ſubjects; while Urban not only fulminated his excommunications againſt all the adherents of Clement, but alſo ſent over a commiſſion to Henry Spencer, biſhop of Norwich, nominating him the leader of a cruſade againſt his rival. With this commiſſion the pope ſent him plenary powers, as his legate, to grant the ſame indulgencies to all who engaged in this expedition, as to thoſe who carried arms againſt the infidels. The publication of this cruſade in England anſwered the moſt ſanguinary wiſhes of the pontiff. The nobility, gentry, clergy, and almoſt all ranks of people, engaged in it with the ſame ardour and alacrity as if they had been going to fight againſt an enemy that threatened to put a period to the chriſtian name.

A. D. 1383. All neceſſary preparations being made, the biſhop of Norwich embarked for the continent, and landed at Calais on the fourth of May, at the head of 50,000 foot and 2000 horſe. His firſt attempt was upon Gravelines, which he carried by aſſault. Intimidated by this ſucceſs, the inhabitants of Dunkirk opened their gates to the victor. Bourbourg, Caſſel, Berg, Furnes, Nieuport, Oſtend, Blankenberg, and all the towns on the ſea-coaſt as far as Sluys, followed the example of Dunkirk. Alarmed at this progreſs of the Engliſh, the count of Flanders determined to give them battle. Norwich, depending on the enthuſiaſtic diſpoſition of his followers, marched to meet the enemy, and a bloody battle enſued, in which the count was totally defeated. The king of France, at the head of an army of an hundred thouſand men, now advanced to check the progreſs of the cruſaders. The prelate, on a general muſter of his forces, found that they amounted to ninety thouſand men, occaſioned by the continual arrival of freſh reinforcements from England. But many of theſe were the very dregs of the people, and at once ignorant of diſcipline and impatient of command. It was, however, reſolved in a council of war to fight the French army; but this was oppoſed by a large party of the troops, who inſiſted on their beſieging Ypres, where they expected to acquire an immenſe booty. It was in vain to oppoſe this ſtrange determination; and the biſhop, in order to prevent a mutiny in his army, was obliged to undertake the reduction of that place; a ſtep which ultimately proved fatal to his enterprize. The approaches were carried on with great intrepidity; but he was at laſt obliged to raiſe the ſiege, and ſend to England for a reinforcement. But ſo many difficulties occurred, that the ſeaſon was loſt before any thing could be effected; and the biſhop returned to England with the poor remains of his army.

Thus ended this memorable cruſade, undertaken for the ſole intereſt of Urban, without that pontiff or England receiving the leaſt benefit from it. The miſcarriage of the prelate did not, however, put an end to the ſchiſm of the church; for it laſted in a greater or leſs degree for upwards of forty years, during which ſpace of time, religion was made a pretence for the greateſt enormities.

A. D. 1384. During theſe tranſactions on the continent, the Scots had made the moſt horrid depredations in the northern counties; and a conſiderable army was now raiſed to chaſtiſe their inſolence. Richard headed his army in perſon. He entered Scotland by Berwick; while the Scots, who dreaded a pitched battle with the Engliſh, abandoned the low country, croſſed the Engliſh borders on the weſt, and plundered the counties of Weſtmoreland, Cumberland, and Lancaſhire.

Richard, in the mean time, advanced to Edinburgh, and deſtroyed all the towns and villages that lay in his rout. He reduced that city to aſhes. He treated in the ſame manner Perth, Dundee, and other places in the low country. But when he was deſired to march towards the weſtern coaſt, in order there to wait the return of the enemy, and take a ſevere revenge on them for the devaſtations they had committed, his impatience to be in England, and enjoy his uſual pleaſures and amuſements, were more prevalent; and he came back with his army, without effecting the intended purpoſes of his expedition.

A. D. 1385. The court of France had long been deſirous of wreſting their ſea-ports out of the hands of the Engliſh; and they were perſuaded that an opportunity now offered for that purpoſe, the duke of Lancaſter having carried into Spain all the flower of the Engliſh military force, in order to proſecute his empty claim to the crown of Caſtile. Great preparations were therefore made in France for an invaſion of England, as the moſt proper method of ſucceeding in their deſign. They collected an immenſe fleet and rmy at Sluys. All the nobility of France were engaged in this enterprize, and the Engliſh were kept r ſome time in perpetual alarms. The French rmy, when reviewed at Arras, conſiſted of eighty houſand men at arms, with their followers on horſeack, beſides a prodigious number on foot. Twelve undred and eighty-ſeven veſſels of all ſorts were ready t Sluys to carry over this numerous army; and ſeveal warlike engines of a new conſtruction were put on oard the fleet.

This amazing armament engaged the attention of ll Europe. The Engliſh were intimidated, particularly the citizens of London. The militia of the ingdom were ordered to the ſea coaſt; the ports and harbours were put in a poſture of defence; and all he beacons on the coaſt prepared for giving the larm, whenever the enemy ſhould appear. A fleet as alſo fitted out to guard the channel, and every rudent meaſure was taken that could be projected or the ſafety of the kingdom.

The great preparations, however, which France ad made againſt England proved of none effect. Envy and ambition, ſo often the deſtruction of ublic undertakings, had poiſoned the French councils. The duke of Berry, a prince of a covetous and ſpiring diſpoſition, was no friend to this undertaking, in which he thought neither his dignity nor intereſt had been ſufficiently conſulted, and therefore determined to render the whole abortive. In order to this, he proceeded ſo ſlow in aſſembling the troops, that it was the middle of September before he joined the army at the head of his diviſion. The forces were, however, embarked, and the fleet ſailed out of the harbour with a fair wind. But they had not left their own coaſt above two hours before the wind changed to the oppoſite quarter, and a dreadful ſtorm ſucceeded, which, in a few hours, ſcattered the whole navy. Some of the ſhips were driven back into the harbour of Sluys; ſome were daſhed on the rocks, others foundered at ſea, and many of the ſtragglers were taken by the Engliſh. Such was the end of thoſe mighty preparations which had held all Europe in ſuſpence.

A. D. 1386. Richard, like moſt weak princes, was fond of pomp and ceremony. He had for ſome time conſidered the reſtraint he was ſubject to from his uncles with regret, and now determined to break theſe ignoble chains. Accordingly, he placed his whole confidence in Robert de Vere, earl of Oxford, a young nobleman of an agreeable figure, but of very diſſolute manners, more calculated to corrupt the prince than to govern the kingdom. This favourite engroſſed the affection of Richard, who knew not how to ſet bounds to his liberality. He created him duke of Ireland, and conferred on him for life the ſovereignty of that iſland; even the whole authority of the government was by degrees lodged in his hands. Michael de la Pole, the chancellor, whom he had lately created earl of Suffolk, was another of his favourites. He was poſſeſſed of great military talents, and had ſerved in the army with applauſe. He had alſo been employed in ſeveral embaſſies and treaties of peace, in all which he had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his prudence, integrity, capacity and judgment; but his particular friendſhip for the duke of Ireland rendered him obnoxious to the people.

The king's uncles, and the chief nobility, who now ſaw themſelves ſtripped of their power, determined to attack the favourites, and recover their former influence. An impeachment was accordingly drawn up againſt the chancellor, and Glouceſter undertook to carry it to the houſe of lords. It was, however, thought proper to obſerve the appearance of decency at leaſt, and accordingly the commons ſent a meſſage by their ſpeaker to the king, importing, that unleſs the chancellor was removed, they could not proceed in the diſpatch of public buſineſs.

Richard, who little expected a motion of this nature, received the addreſs with an indignation he could not conceal. He told the ſpeaker very ſharply, "That it would better become the parliament to attend to the buſineſs for which they were ſummoned, than to concern themſelves with his ſervants." Nor did he give them leave to renew their addreſs: he ſet out immediately for Eltham in Kent, leſt his preſence ſhould be conſtrued as a ſanction to the proceedings of the parliament, who he plainly ſaw were bent upon the ruin of his favourites.

As ſoon as it was known that the king had withdrawn himſelf from the national council, a meſſage was ſent him by the duke of Glouceſter and the biſhop of Ely, deſiring him, in the name of the Parliament, to return: declaring, in caſe of refuſal, that they would immediately diſſolve themſelves. Richard finding himſelf unable to reſiſt, agreed to the impeachment being carried on againſt Suffolk; but at the ſame time it was ſtipulated that no attack ſhould be made againſt any other of his miniſters. The accuſation was at once both frivolous and unjuſt; but innocence was but a poor defence againſt the turbulent envy of the barons, Suffolk was convicted, and adjudged to pay a fine and ranſom to the king; and in the mean time was committed to the cuſtody of the duke of Glouceſter, who, as conſtable of the kingdom, ſent him to Windſor Caſtle.

The fall of the earl of Suffolk was only a prelude to greater exceſſes. Glouceſter and his aſſociates, indeed, obſerved their ſtipulation with the king: they attacked no more of his miniſters; but they went much farther by attacking the regal power. The king was deprived of his authority, and the exerciſe of the ſovereign power intruſted to fourteen commiſſioners, whoſe juriſdiction was limited to a twelve-month, though it was ſufficiently evident, that the party of Glouceſter never meant to reinſtate their monarch in his prerogatives. This was not all; they furthermore obliged the king not only to grant a commiſſion, under his own hand and ſeal, for veſting this committee with the neceſſary powers, but alſo to give his aſſent to a ſtatute, by which any perſon who ſhould dare to propoſe a revocation of the powers granted to this committee ſhould, for the firſt offence, forfeit his eſtate; and for the ſecond be puniſhed as a traitor.

Richard, however, puſillanimous as he was, proteſted againſt this violence at the end of the ſeſſion, and declared in full parliament, "that the prerogatives of his crown, notwithſtanding his late conceſſion, ſhould be deemed entire and unimpaired."

A. D. 1387. The commiſſioners, however, paid no attention to Richard's proteſt: they immediately proceeded to the exerciſe of their office; and the king found himſelf deſtitute of all authority. Richard was, however, determined to make one attempt for the recovery of his power. He aſſembled the judges and lawyers, who made no ſcruple of declaring, that the commiſſion was derogatory to the royal authority; that thoſe who procured it, or adviſed the king to conſent to it, were puniſhable with death; that thoſe who compelled him were guilty of treaſon; that thoſe were equally criminal who ſhould perſevere in maintaining it; that the king has the right of diſſolving parliaments when he pleaſes; that the parliament, while they ſit, muſt proceed firſt on the king's buſineſs; and that they cannot, without the king's conſent, impeach any of his miniſters and judges.

No ſooner were the duke of Glouceſter and his party informed of this ſecret conſultation, than they immediately had recourſe to arms, and demanded that the perſons who had ſeduced the king by their pernicious counſel, ſhould be delivered up as traitors to the ſtate. A few days after they appeared in his preſence armed, and attended by their followers; where they accuſed the archbiſhop of York, the duke of Ireland, the earl of Suffolk, Sir Robert Treſilian, and Sir Nicholas Brambre, as public and dangerous enemies to the kingdom. The duke of Ireland ſaved himſelf by flight; but the others were condemned and executed. Force became the only rule of law in thoſe unfortunate times, when the paſſions of the great ſeemed to have annihilated every idea of juſtice.

A. D. 1388. While the Engliſh government was thus in a mere ſtate of anarchy and confuſion, the Scots took the advantage by making the moſt horrid depredations in the northern counties. In the beginning of Auguſt they entered Northumberland with a ſmall army, conſiſting of three hundred horſe and two thouſand foot, all veterans, and commanded by the two Douglaſes, the earls of Fife, Murray, and Dunbar, the moſt celebrated commanders in the Scottiſh army. They ravaged the whole country through which they paſſed, and advanced as far as the gates of Newcaſtle, where the lord Henry Piercy, ſurnamed Hotſpur, ſon to the earl of Northumberland, firſt oppoſed them. But his troops were defeated, and himſelf unhorſed in ſingle combat by the younger Douglas, who having ſeized his lance, vowed to carry it to Scotland as a trophy of his victory. Inflamed with rage at his late misfortune, Hotſpur vowed that Douglas ſhould never carry his lance to Scotland in triumph. He accordingly collected a body of ſix hundred horſe and eight thouſand foot, and putting himſelf at their head marched in purſuit of the enemy, without waiting for a reinforcement of troops that were haſtening to join him under the command of the biſhop of Durham.

The Scots, elated with their late ſucceſs, had undertaken the ſiege of the caſtle of Otterborn, and were lying before that fortreſs when Piercy, by forced marches, reached their camp. Rage had ſtifled prudence in the breaſt of Piercy: he would not delay the engagement for a moment, though his troops were ſo greatly fatigued with their long marches, and though night was approaching when he came up with the enemy. He attacked the Scots with all the fury of a diſappointed warrior, but the darkneſs rendered it impoſſible to continue the conteſt, and they ſeparated without either obtaining the victory. The moon riſing at midnight, however, occaſioned the battle to be renewed with great fury, and at laſt victory declared for the Scots. The younger Douglas was ſlain in the battle; Piercy, with upwards of an hundred gentlemen and officers of diſtinction were taken priſoners; and above twelve hundred of the Engliſh were left dead on the field.

The biſhop of Durham, who was on his march with 10,000 men to Piercy's aſſiſtance, hearing of the defeat of the Engliſh, immediately made the beſt of his way to Newcaſtle, leaving the Scots at liberty to return home, enriched with a great booty, and exulting in the triumph over an enemy, before whom they had ſo often fled.

A. D. 1389. The authority of Richard appeared now to be totally annihilated: the combination of the princes of the blood and chief nobility had ſo far engroſſed the royal power, that a revolution was apparently inevitable. But the event proved otherwiſe. Richard, who was now in his twenty-third year, declared, in a full council held at Eaſter, his intention of directing the affairs of his kingdom and houſhold by his ſole authority, and taking into his own hands the reins of government. No oppoſition being made to ſo reaſonable a deſign, Richard immediately demanded the great ſeal from the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and gave it to William of Wickham, biſhop of Wincheſter. He removed the duke of Glouceſter and the earl of Warwick from the council-board, and ſupplied their places with others whom he thought more worthy of his confidence. The biſhop of Hereford was deprived of his office of treaſurer, and the earl of Arundel of that of admiral. Theſe changes were made without the leaſt oppoſition; the dukes of Glouceſter and York affected to return to their duty; and Richard, by paſſing a general amneſty, and remitting ſome ſubſidies which had been granted him by parliament, acquired the affections of the people, who eaſily paſs from one extreme to another.

From this period the kingdom enjoyed tranquillity for a conſiderable time. A truce of twenty-five years was concluded with France, which was followed with the reſtitution of Breſt and Cherbourgh; and Richard, who was now a widower, was affianced to the daughter of Charles VI. though at this time only a child of ſeven years of age.

A. D. 1397. The ſtrong alliance which Richard had formed with France, by his marriage, gave great offence to the Engliſh, who had contracted a violent antipathy againſt that nation; and the conduct of Richard was not calculated to procure the reſpect of his ſubjects. A ſlave to pleaſure, and incapable of applying himſelf to buſineſs; under the dominion of favourites, on whom he profuſely laviſhed the revenues of the crown and the grants of the people; and ſullying the dignity of his rank by admitting perſons of very mean condition to his familiarity; he was conſidered as totally unworthy of ſwaying the Britiſh ſceptre.

The duke of Glouceſter availed himſelf of the king's weakneſs. He abſented himſelf from the court; hardly ever appeared in council but to oppoſe the meaſures of the adminiſtration; and exerted all his abilities to cultivate and increaſe his popularity with the nation. The invectives he made uſe of againſt the government, againſt the long truce concluded with Charles, and againſt the marriage of Richard, joined to his addreſs in fomenting the hatred againſt France, and in reviving the deſire of ravaging again that hoſtile kingdom, made the deepeſt impreſſions on the minds of a people diſpoſed at all times to revolt, and ever impatient under imaginary diſtreſs.

Richard, whoſe precipitate temper admitted of no deliberation, was ſo enraged at Glouceſter's conduct, that he ordered him to be unexpectedly arreſted. The attempt was made with ſucceſs; the duke was ſeized, and hurried on board a ſhip which lay in the river ready to receive and carry him over to Calais, where alone it was thought he could be ſafely detained in cuſtody. The earls of Arundel and Warwick, and the lord Cobham, Glouceſter's aſſociates, were arreſted the next day, and all of them committed priſoners to the Tower of London.

In order to prevent all poſſibility of their making the leaſt reſiſtance, a parliament was immediately ſummoned at Weſtminſter, and the members entered with violence into all the meaſures of the court. They annulled the act of amneſty, which Richard had voluntarily confirmed: they proſecuted the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the earls of Arundel, Warwick and other noblemen, ſeveral of whom were condemned and executed, for having been engaged in former attempts againſt the crown, notwithſtanding the pardon they had received.

The proſecution againſt Glouceſter was juſt going to be commenced, when intelligence arrived of his death. It was pretended that he died ſuddenly of an apoplexy; but it was the general opinion that he had been murdered in conſequence of orders from his nephew; and in the ſucceeding reign, undoubted evidence was produced in parliament of his having been ſuffocated with pillows by thoſe who had the care of his perſon.

Thus fell Thomas of Woodſtock, duke of Glouceſter, the victim of his enemies treachery, and of his own imprudent conduct. With many great and good qualities, he joined an inordinate thirſt after popularity, in the purſuit of which he too often loſt ſight of that reſpect which ſhould always be preſerved to majeſty; and whatever advantages he might intend to procure to his country, the meaſures he took for that purpoſe were ſuch as no court, that had the leaſt regard to its own honour or conſequence, could implicitly admit.

No ſooner was Glouceſter's death known, than his brothers, the duke of Lancaſter and York, haſtened to London at the head of a numerous body of forces, threatening to take the moſt ſevere revenge on the authors of this execrable tragedy, not excepting even the king himſelf. Richard had, however, taken all the precautions neceſſary to divert the force of the expected ſtorm. He had not only gained over the parliament to his devotion; but alſo collected an army of twenty thouſand veterans, and ſtationed them in the neighbourhood of London. Nor did he depend on the forces he had raiſed; he had recourſe alſo to the milder methods of negotiation, and the two brothers, finding that all reſiſtance would be in vain, liſtened to an accommodation.

A. D. 1398. The duke of Glouceſter's party was hardly ſuppreſſed, before another aroſe which proved fatal to Richard. The principles of honour were at this time ſo little known among the nobility, that Henry earl of Hereford, ſon to the duke of Lancaſter, accuſed, before the council, the duke of Norfolk, of having ſpoken in private many ſlanderous words againſt the king. Norfolk gave him the lie, and offered to prove his innocence by ſingle combat, a method of trial then authorized by the laws of the kingdom. The challenge was accepted, and the diſpute ordered to be decided according to the laws of chivalry, in preſence of the king and his whole court.

On the day appointed, both the noblemen appeared, the trumpets ſounded, and they were preparing to ruſh againſt each other, when the king interpoſed, to prevent the effuſion of noble blood, and commanded them to depart the kingdom; but their ſentences were unequal; the exile of Norfolk, was for life; but Hereford only for ten years. Both, however, obeyed the royal mandate. Norfolk, who knew he had nothing to expect from Richard, retired into Germany, and afterwards to Venice, where he ſoon after paid the debt of nature: he did not live to ſee the revolution which ſoon happened in his country. The earl of Hereford was more reſigned to his fate; he waited on the king to take his leave before he quitted the kingdom, and this ſubmiſſive and reſpectful behaviour had ſuch an effect upon Richard, that he remitted four years of the time aſſigned for his baniſhment; and alſo empowered him, by letters patent, to enter into immediate poſſeſſion of any eſtates that might fall to him during his exile.

A. D. 1399. The earl of Hereford had left the kingdom but a few months, when his father John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter, paid the debt of nature*; and his ſon, in conſequence of his rights, and the letters patent he had received, deſired to be put in poſſeſſion of the eſtate and juriſdiction of his father. But Richard, to the eternal ſtain of his memory, denied this requeſt, revoked the letters patent he had given to Hereford, decreed his baniſhment ſhould be perpetual, and confiſcated all his paternal eſtate.

It is little to be wondered at that a nobleman of Hereford's rank and character ſhould be deſirous of reſenting ſuch a complication of injuries. He was of a bold and enterprizing ſpirit: he had ſignalized his courage and intrepidity both at home and abroad; he was beloved by the people, and adored by the ſoldiers. He was always cool, ſedate, and prudent; and was conſidered as the only Engliſh prince that deſerved the public confidence and eſteem. His misfortunes were lamented, and the injuries he had received complained of by all ranks of people. He was ſecretly invited to return to England, and aſſured of being ſufficiently ſupported in the recovery of his lawful inheritance.

Hereford, (now duke of Lancaſter) determined to accept this generous offer; and an event ſoon happened which gave him all the advantages he could deſire. Roger Mortimer, earl of Marche, lord lieutenant of Ireland, had been lately killed in a rencounter with a ſmall party of the Iriſh; and Richard, in order to reduce the rebels to ſubjection, and revenge the death of Mortimer, reſolved to paſs over into that iſland, and head his army in perſon. He accordingly embarked at Briſtol, and after a ſhort paſſage landed at Waterford, at the head of 2000 men at arms and 10,000 archers. Struck with conſternation at ſeeing the king of England at the head of ſo powerful an army, the moſt conſiderable part of the rebels ſubmitted, and the reſt were ſoon reduced to obedience.

While Richard was in Ireland, the duke of Lancaſter embraced the opportunity of returning to England. He embarked at Nantz with a retinue of ſixty perſons, and landed at Ravenſpur in Yorkſhire, where he was immediately joined by the lords Willoughby, Roſs, D'Arcy, and Beaumont, and ſeveral gentlemen of diſtinction, attended by a numerous body of vaſſals and adherents. A few days after, his party was increaſed by the arrival of the earl of Northumberland, with his ſon Hotſpur Piercy, and his brother the earl of Weſtmoreland, at the head of ſuch a numerous body of forces, that Lancaſter's ſmall retinue was increaſed to an army of 60,000 men. The duke now took a ſolemn oath, that his ſole deſign in this invaſion was that of recovering the duchy of Lancaſter, unjuſtly detained from him. At the ſame time, he invited all his friends in England, and all lovers of equity and their country, to ſecond him in this reaſonable and moderate pretenſion.

The duke of York, who was left guardian of the realm, during the king's abſence, aſſembled an army of 40,000 men, and marched at their head to St. Alban's; but, upon reviewing his forces, the ſoldiers declared to a man, that they would not draw a ſword againſt Henry of Lancaſter. The guardian himſelf did not, indeed, ſeem to be well affected to the cauſe he had undertaken to defend: he made no difficulty of declaring, that he would ſecond his nephew in recovering his juſt rights. It is, therefore, no wonder that he liſtened to a meſſage ſent him by Henry, who intreated him not to oppoſe a loyal and humble ſupplicant in the recovery of his legal patrimony. The guardian was ſo far from oppoſing, that he joined the party of Henry; and the ſoldiers joyfully followed the example of their leaders.

* On the 20th of February 1772, as ſome labourers were breaking up a part of the ground in the cathedral of Bury St. Edmund's, Suffolk, they diſcovered a leaden coffin, which on examination, appeared to contain the remains of Thomas Beaufort, third ſon of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter, and ſon to king Edward III. The body was entire, the features and lineaments of the face quite perfect, the hair brown intermixed with grey, and the nails on the fingers and toes complete. The body was about ſix feet in length, and the face was covered with a maſk. In the coffin were ſeveral materials belonging to embalming, as alſo a ſilver crucifix. He died at Eaſt Greenwich in 1427, in the reign of Henry VI. and was buried in this cathedral, to which he was a great benefactor.

Henry, now finding himſelf maſter of the kingdom, marched to Briſtol, where ſome of Richard's miniſters had ſhut themſelves up, in order to defend the caſtle againſt the attempt of an enemy whoſe favour they had no hopes of obtaining. The garriſon, however, made but a poor defence; they ſoon ſurrendered; and Henry, yielding to the requeſt of the people, ordered the earl of Wiltſhire, Sir John Buſſy, and Sir John Green, who were taken priſoners, to be executed immediately, without even the form of a trial.

As ſoon as Richard received intelligence of this invaſion, he haſtened over from Ireland, and landed at Milford-haven with a body of twenty thouſand men. But his ſoldiers, like the reſt of their brethren, were ſo ſtrongly attached to the fortunes of Henry of Lancaſter, that his army melted away like ſnow before the ſun; and he ſoon perceived that he was in no condition of meeting the enemy.

Richard, diſtracted with a variety of thoughts, knew not what courſe to purſue. Wavering and irreſolute, he knew not whom to truſt, or whom to fear. At length he determined to deſert his forces, and take refuge in Wales. Accordingly he retired, with the dukes of Exeter and Surry, the biſhop of Carliſle, and a few other attendants, to Conway-caſtle; propoſing to take the firſt opportunity of embarking for Ireland or France, and there wait for ſome favourable criſis of recovering his crown, which he was now incapable of defending.

Henry, ſenſible of his danger, ſhould Richard find means to execute his deſign, diſpatched the earl of Northumberland to him, with the ſtrongeſt profeſſions of loyalty and ſubmiſſion; when that nobleman, by the moſt infamous treachery and falſe oaths, made himſelf maſter of the king's perſon, and carried him to his enemy at Flint-caſtle. Henry loſt no time in conveying his royal captive to London, where he was received with the moſt barbarous inſults, and committed priſoner to the Tower.

But though Lancaſter had acquired poſſeſſion of the perſon of his ſovereign, he was very uneaſy with regard to the beſt method of diſpoſing of that unfortunate monarch, and ſeveral councils were held on that ſubject. At laſt it was reſolved to perſuade Richard to make a formal reſignation of his power, and to procure an authentic confirmation of the deed by the parliament. For ſome time Richard refuſed to ſubmit to ſo humiliating a circumſtance; but at laſt, finding himſelf abandoned by all his friends, and ſenſible of his incapacity to reſiſt the torrent of popular hatred, or, perhaps, deſirous of gaining time to ſave his life, and procure aſſiſtance from France, Richard ſubmitted; and, in the preſence of a great number of lords aſſembled on the occaſion, the king ſurrendered up the crown, ſceptre, and other enſigns of royalty; and then taking the ſignet-ring from his finger, he preſented it to the duke of Lancaſter. At the ſame time, he deſired the archbiſhop of York, and the biſhop of Hereford, to notify to the parliament his reſignation of the crown; and to acquaint them, that he wiſhed his couſin, the duke of Lancaſter, might be choſen his ſucceſſor.

Lancaſter, however, well knowing that this reſignation would plainly appear the reſult of force, propoſed, notwithſtanding the danger of the precedent to himſelf and his poſterity, to have the king ſolemnly depoſed in parliament, for his pretended tyranny and miſconduct. Accordingly a charge, conſiſting of thirty-three articles, was drawn up againſt him, and preſented to that aſſembly; who, without examining one of the articles, though many of them were falſe in fact, depoſed their ſovereign. Nor was there found more than one man who had courage and virtue ſufficient to ſtand up, and plead in defence of his unhappy maſter. This was the biſhop of Carliſle, who nobly ſuſtained the cauſe of fallen majeſty; but his eloquence was exerted in vain; and Lancaſter, exaſperated at the bold truths he uttered, committed him priſoner to the Tower.

As ſoon as the aſſembly had pronounced the depoſition of the king, they declared the throne vacant; upon which the duke of Lancaſter aroſe from his ſeat, and after croſſing himſelf on his forehead and breaſt, declared, "In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit," that the vacant throne belonged to him as the deſcendant of Henry III. and "through the right which God had ſent him, with the aſſiſtance of his friends, to recover a kingdom which was on the point of being ruined by miſconduct and oppreſſion."

In order to conceive the meaning of theſe perplexed and obſcure expreſſions, it muſt be obſerved that Henry of Lancaſter, ſuppoſing the throne really vacant, was not the immediate heir. The duke of Clarence, the elder brother of the late duke of Lancaſter, had left a grandſon, whoſe title was undoubtedly preferable to that of Henry. He therefore went back as far as Henry III. in order to avail himſelf of an abſurd but popular tradition, which ſuppoſed that Edmund, earl of Lancaſter, ſon to Henry III. was really the elder brother of Edward I. but that, by reaſon of ſome deformities, in his perſon, he had been poſtponed in the ſucceſſion, and his younger brother impoſed upon the nation in his ſtead. This pretence, however, was deſtitute of the leaſt foundation; but the parliament made no enquiry; the moſt palpable abſurdities would have paſſed for truths; and Henry was, in the preſence of the whole aſſembly, formally placed on the throne of England.

Thus ended the reign of Richard II. a prince, who, in the beginning of it, had filled all his ſubjects with the moſt pleaſing hopes of his future good government; but, by ſuffering himſelf afterwards to become corrupted by flattery, loſt all their affection; and by aiming at a power greater than the conſtitution of the kingdom permitted, forfeited a crown which he might otherwiſe have worn with honour and happineſs.

Notwithſtanding that Richard, in general, led a diſſolute life, he was never known to be engaged in any private amour that produced illegitimate iſſue: this might, perhaps, be owing to ſome natural defects, eſpecially when we conſider that he had no children by his firſt wife, Anne, daughter of Charles IV. emperor of Germany, who was an amiable princeſs, with whom he lived twelve years in the utmoſt conjugal harmony. As for his ſecond wife, Iſabella, eldeſt daughter of Charles VI. king of France, her nuptials with him were never actually conſummated, for ſhe was but juſt turned of ten years of age at the time of his death, the particulars of which will be noticed in their proper place.

The remarkable occurrences that happened during the reign of Richard II. were as follow:

In the fifth year of his reign, when his firſt queen Anne came from Bohemia, ſhe had no ſooner landed than ſuch a tempeſt aroſe as had not been ſeen for many years: ſeveral ſhips were daſhed to pieces in the harbour, and that in which the queen came over was ſunk. It is further obſervable that his ſecond wife brought with her a ſtorm to the Engliſh coaſt, in which the king's baggage was loſt, and many ſhips of his fleet caſt away.

On the 21ſt of May, in the 6th year of his reign, there happened a dreadful earthquake in London, which threw down many churches and other public edifices; and on the 24th of the ſame month, the water in the river Thames was ſo agitated, that the veſſels beat againſt each other with ſuch violence, that ſome were ſunk, and others received conſiderable damage.

About this time the uſe of cannon was projected; and Sir Hugh Calverly, governor of Calais, was the firſt that employed them in the Engliſh ſervice.

In his tenth year wine was ſo cheap, that the beſt was ſold for 20s. a tun; and the more indifferent ſort at 13s. 4d.

In his thirteenth year there happened a violent hurricane, which threw down many houſes, tore up trees by the roots, and deſtroyed a great number of cattle.

On the 9th of July, in his fifteenth year, the ſun appeared to be obſcured by thick and dreary clouds between that and the earth: its beams ſeemed of the colour of blood, and gave little or no light from noon till it ſet: theſe clouds roſe daily for almoſt ſix weeks together.

About this time the north and eaſt parts of England were greatly afflicted with a peſtilence; inſomuch that in the city of York only upwards of eleven thouſand ſouls periſhed in a few weeks.

In his ſixteenth year wool was ſo cheap, that in ſome places it was ſold for 22d. the ſtone. The ſame year a dolphin was taken near London-bridge ten feet long. His coming ſo far up the river was conſidered as an ill omen; which was in ſome degree verified by the national confuſion that happened a ſhort time after.

The moſt remarkable men that lived in England from the acceſſion of Edward I. to the depoſition of Richard II. were as follow:

Robert Kilwarby, archbiſhop of Canterbury in the reign of Edward I. He was a prelate of eminent learning, and wrote ſeveral theological tracts, which were of infinite repute. Being made a cardinal, he reſigned his archbiſhopric, and died at Rome.

In this reign flouriſhed the learned and ingenious Francis Bacon (a Franciſcan Friar of Oxford.) His great ſkill in mathematics brought on him the character of a magician, in an ignorant age, inſomuch that he was ſent to Rome by the general of his order, where he was impriſoned; but afterwards he cleared himſelf, and returned to England. He died in 1284, leaving ſeveral works behind him, of which ſome are ſtill preſerved in manuſcript at Oxford. He is ſaid to have been the firſt that invented ſpectacles.

Nicholas Trivet, prior of a monaſtery of Dominican Friars in London. He wrote a general Hiſtory of Europe, beginning with king Stephen, and continued down to the year 1307. This work is chiefly valuable for the excellent Chronological Tables, ſhewing, at the beginning of every year, the year of Chriſt, the year of the reigns of the popes, the emperors, and the kings of France and England.

Richard Fitz-Ralph, archbiſhop of Armagh, was a great enemy to the Mendicant Friars, whom he attacked vigorouſly by his preaching and writings. He tranſlated the bible into Engliſh, and wrote two treatiſes, one in defence of pariſh prieſts againſt the friars, and the other on auricular confeſſion.

Geoffrey Chaucer (the greateſt poet of his time) was a man of quality, and made a conſiderable figure in the courts of Edward III. and Richard II. In 1374 we find Edward III. allowing him a pitcher of wine a day from his cellar, and a yearly ſalary; which is ſuppoſed to be the origin of the butt of wine and ſalary allowed to the king's poet laureat*: both theſe were continued to him by Henry IV. Chaucer poſſeſſed an admirable fund of humour, painted the manners of life with great ſtrength of colouring, and helped to improve and purify the Engliſh language. But it was the fate of this great poet, (though poſſeſſed of an ample fortune, and a more ample genius; though loved by his prince, who employed him in many honourable poſts; though admired by his countrymen, who were enamoured with his writings) to fall into misfortunes in private life. He died in the year 1400, and was buried in Weſtminſter-abbey, where a monument was erected to his memory.

The laſt perſon we ſhall take notice of among the learned men of this age was, John Gower, the friend and companion of Chaucer, and aſſiſtant to him in his attempts to bring the Engliſh language to a greater purity. His genius was leſs extenſive than that of Chaucer; but his language is remarkably pure for the time in which he lived.

* Though this cuſtom is ſtill nominally obſerved, yet, for ſome years paſt, in lieu of the butt of wine, the ſum of 26l. is allowed, which, added to the fixed ſalary, makes the whole 126l. per annum.

From the Acceſſion of Henry IV. (the firſt Engliſh King of the Line of Lancaſter) to the Depoſition of Henry VI.

SECTION I.

HENRY IV. SURNAMED of BOLINGBROKE.

THE Parliament had no ſooner acknowledged Henry of Lancaſter for their king, than every neceſſary preparation was made for the ceremony of his coronation, which was performed with great magnificence at Weſtminſter, on the 13th of October, 1399, the crown and all the coronation jewels having fallen into the duke of Lancaſter's hands on Richard's return from Scotland.

Henry, on the very day of his coronation, iſſued a proclamation, declaring that he aſcended the throne by right of conqueſt, the reſignation of Richard in his favour, and as next heir male to the late king: thus he excluded the very title of which he ought to have availed himſelf, namely, the conſent of the people; and, with a ſhameleſs impudence, trampled upon the rights of Edmund Mortimer, earl of Marche who yeilding to the torrent of Lancaſter's fortune, retired to a private life, in his caſtle of Wigmore, on the marches of Wales.

Henry's uſurpation was ſo palpable, and the earl of Marche's right ſo clear and evident, that it required all the courage, diſcernment and capacity of the new monarch to ſecure that crown he had ſo illegally obtained. The city of London, indeed, and the adjacent counties, were, in general, well affected to him; but Wales and its marches, where the Mortimer intereſt lay, and which had been always diſtinguiſhed by Richard, wanted only an opportunity of breaking out into rebellion. Several conſultations were held for reſtoring of Richard, who was now removed from the Tower of London, to the caſtle of Leeds, and afterwards to that of Pontefract in Yorkſhire.

A. D. 1400. The parliament had ſcarcely finiſhed ſettling the buſineſs of the nation before a conſpiracy was formed to deprive Henry of a crown to which he had no legal claim. Several of the principal nobility of the kingdom were engaged in this deſign; and in order to render their undertaking ſucceſsful, they prevailed on one Maudlin, a prieſt, who greatly reſembled Richard both in ſhape and features, to perſonate him; and that this part of their plan might have the greater effect, they agreed to dreſs him in royal robes, and carry him to different parts of the kingdom till the real Richard could be releaſed from his confinement.

The conſpirators were perſuaded that it would not be difficult to ſurprize Henry, who was at this time in a bad ſtate of health at Windſor, attended by a few of his nobility. It was therefore agreed, in order to aſſemble a ſufficient number of perſons without ſuſpicion, to propoſe a tilting-match of twenty-one on a ſide to be held at Oxford. Henry was to be invited as a ſpectator of this manly exerciſe. If he accepted the invitation, they imagined it would be very eaſy to ſeize his perſon: if he refuſed it, they were to march ſecretly to Windſor-caſtle, where they flattered themſelves with obtaining an eaſy admittance.

The conſpiracy being thus digeſted, the members entered into a ſolemn aſſociation, and ſix ſeveral copies of an indenture for that purpoſe were taken, and delivered to the ſix principal noblemen concerned in this dangerous undertaking.

Henry, not ſuſpecting the treacherous deſigns of his nobility, accepted the invitation of being preſent at the Oxford tournament; but was prevented from attending by a circumſtance of the moſt ſingular nature, and which rendered the whole plot totally abortive. The earl of Rutland had no ſooner received the copy of his indenture, than he left Weſtminſter to pay a viſit to his father the duke of York in his way to Oxford. While he ſat at table, the duke, obſerving a parchment with ſeveral ſeals appended to it, hanging out of his ſons boſom, was very deſirous of knowing the contents, which the latter abſolutely refuſed. This alarmed his father, who ſnatched the writing from his ſon, and, on peruſing it, diſcovered the whole conſpiracy.

The duke of York, who had pledged his own life to the king for the loyalty of his ſon, ſharply upbraided him for the unnatural and ungrateful part he had acted, by expoſing, at once, the life of his father, and abuſing the goodneſs of his prince. It was in vain for the ſon to offer any defence againſt the charge; and finding his father had ordered his horſes to be ſaddled, in order to inform the king of his danger, reſolved to prevent him, by being the firſt meſſenger and informer of his own treaſon. Accordingly he mounted his horſe, arrived at Windſor before his father, and, gaining admittance to the king, ingenuouſly diſcovered the whole of the conſpiracy, and obtained the promiſe of a pardon.

Henry immediately ſet out for London, where he was ſure of being ſupported by the citizens, and would therefore be in a condition of giving the rebels battle, in caſe they ventured to approach the capital. In the mean time the conſpirators, ſuſpecting their deſign diſcovered, marched immediately to Windſor, and ſurpriſed the caſtle, but were confounded when they found that Henry had made his eſcape. Henry appeared next day at Kingſton upon Thames, at the head of twenty thouſand men, moſtly drawn from the city; and the rebels, unable to reſiſt his power, diſperſed themſelves with a view of raiſing their followers in the ſeveral counties, where their intereſt more immediately lay. But they were ſo cloſely purſued by the royal party, that the earls of Kent and Saliſbury were ſeized at Cirenceſter by the inhabitants, and beheaded the next day without farther ceremony.

The earl of Huntingdon and ſeveral other noblemen, were taken priſoners, and ſuffered death by the expreſs commands of the king. As for Maudlin, after being publickly expoſed on the pillory to the inſults of the populace, he was taken out half dead and carried to the gallows, where he was hung up by the heels till he expired.

This conſpiracy greatly alarmed Henry, who could not think himſelf ſafe while Richard was alive. That unhappy prince was ſtill at Pontefract caſtle, where he was ſhewn ſome ſmall remains of royal reſpect. Sir Peirce de Exton, one of thoſe wretches who think nothing too barbarous for gratifying either their own ambition or that of their maſter, determined to deſtroy Richard, and free Henry from the uneaſineſs that he could not conceal. Accordingly he imparted his deſign to eight ruffians, who all agreed to diſpatch the unhappy prince, not doubting but they ſhould receive a noble reward, as the action was at once too deteſtible for the king to command, and too dangerous for any but abandoned ruffians like themſelves to undertake.

The horrid deſign being formed, Exton and his ruffians ſet out for Pontefract caſtle, in order to execute their barbarous intentions. On the day of their arrival Richard perceived, at dinner, that his victuals was not taſted as uſual: enquiring the reaſon, he was told by the perſon who uſed to perform that ceremony, that the king had ordered it to be omitted; upon which Richard, loſing all patience, ſtruck the taſter on the face with his knife, ſaying, "The devil take Henry of Lancaſter and thee!" Exton coming in at the inſtant, with five of his attendants, attempted to lay hold of Richard, who, gueſſing their deſign, wreſted a pole ax out of the hands of one of them, and defended himſelf ſo bravely that he ſlew four of the ruffians: but at length Exton, getting upon a chair behind him, the villain diſcharged ſuch a blow with an ax upon his head, that he laid him dead at his feet.

Thus fell Richard in the thirty-third year of his age, condemned to perpetual impriſonment by his parliament, removed from his friends, and dreaded by his enemies. The injuries he did in his life-time ſeem to have periſhed with him; but his high birth, his elegant perſon, and the miſery of his fate, awakened in the breaſts of the Engliſh, all the compaſſion ſo naturally due to majeſty in diſtreſs. He was then conſidered as a prince miſled by habit, rather than cruel by diſpoſition; as one who might have been fortunate had he not been a king, and who might have held the reins of government till old age, had he not been called to it in early youth. The flattery of his parliament was the moſt deadly drug infuſed in the poiſon that intoxicated his brain with regard to his own power as a king. He had by repeated peated acts of the legiſlature, raiſed himſelf above the law; but he had not learned that maxim ſo neceſſary to all princes, that principles give way to feeling, and profeſſions to ſafety. Had he acted with moderation, he might have held the ſubſtance of arbitrary power; but the violence with which he graſped it, diſſolved it in his hand. The allegiance of his ſubjects melted before the heat of his government, and Richard became a melancholy inſtance, that thoſe men who abandon the intereſt of their country, will alſo forſake their ſovereign in the hour of danger,

Henry now ſaw himſelf in a very dangerous ſituation. He well knew that the death of Richard, and the late executions, muſt give riſe to animoſities that are always injurious to the royal authority; and therefore determined, if poſſible, to gain the clergy over to his intereſt. It was ſuſpected that he had imbibed all the opinions of his father in favour of Wickliff's doctrine; but he now made no difficulty of ſacrificing his principles to his intereſt. He cauſed a law to be paſſed by the parliament, whereby it was enacted, that when any heretic, who had relapſed, or refuſed to abjure his opinions, was delivered over to the ſecular power, he ſhould be committed to the flames by the civil magiſtrate, before the whole people. This ſanguinary ſtatute was the ſource of additional diſtreſs to the people, who were already ſufficiently acquainted with misfortunes. Nor was it long before this execrable law was carried into execution. William Soutre, rector of St. Oſithe's in London, having embraced the doctrine of Wickliff, was condemned by the ſynod of Canterbury, and the unhappy man was immediately committed to the flames.

A. D. 1401. In the beginning of this year one Owen Glendour, a deſcendant of the ancient princes of Wales, made various incurſions into the Engliſh territories. In conſequence of this a troubleſome and tedious war was kindled, which the Welſh prince long ſuſtained by his valour and activity, aſſiſted by the natural ſtrength of that country, and the untamed ſpirit of the inhabitants. In one of theſe encounters the earl of Marche, who had armed his followers in defence of Henry, was taken priſoner, and committed to a loathſome and ſtrict confinement. But notwithſtanding his loyalty, Henry, with unpardonable ingratitude, ſuffered him to remain in captivity; nor would he permit the earl of Northumberland, to whoſe aſſiſtance he was indebted for his crown, to treat with Glendour for his ranſom.

The ſucceſſes of the Welſh gave encouragement to the Scots, who committed the moſt dreadful ravages in the northern counties. The largeſt diviſion of them, conſiſting of 12,000 men, was headed by the earl of Douglas. Hotſpur Piercy attacked the invaders at Homeldon, or Haly-down-hill; and, after a furious engagement, obtained a complete victory. Above 7,000 Scots were killed on the field of battle; and the earls of Douglas, Fife, Angus, Athol, and Montieth, with a great number of other officers of diſtinction, were taken priſoners.

As ſoon as Henry received intelligence of this victory, he wrote a letter full of the warmeſt expreſſions of gratitude to the Piercies but at the ſame time ſtrictly enjoined them not to ranſom any of their priſoners, but to keep them to be diſpoſed of as he ſhould think proper. This injunction was conſidered as an arbitrary uſurpation of power, all priſoners being (by the laws of war which then prevailed) the ſole property of thoſe by whom they were conquered.

A. D. 1403. The commands of Henry relative to the Scotch captives highly exaſperated the Northumberland family, who had been materially inſtrumental in placing him on the throne. Beſides the perſonal inſult offered them by Henry on this occaſion, Thomas Piercy earl of Worceſter, brother to the earl of Northumberland, had other cauſes to excite his reſentment. He had been made vice-chamberlain and admiral by Richard: he loved the perſon of his old maſter and benefactor while living, retained a grateful ſenſe of his benefits after his death, and could not but deteſt Henry, as the author of his murder, and the uſurper of his crown. He therefore joined his brother, to drive from the throne a perſon who had no title to fill it, and whoſe power was founded on the blood of his maſter.

Preparations were made by the powerful family of the Piercies for wreſting the ſcepter from the hands of Henry. An alliance was concluded with Glendour; and Hotſpur offered earl Douglas his liberty without ranſom, if he would join the Northumberland army; a propoſal which that martial nobleman very readily accepted, as he had long borne an inveterate hatred to the whole houſe of Lancaſter.

In a ſhort time a very conſiderable army was aſſembled; but before the troops were ready to take the field, the earl of Northumberland was ſeized with a ſudden illneſs at Berwick, and the chief command devolved upon Hotſpur Piercy, who led his forces to Shrewſbury, in order to join the troops of Glendour.

Piercy now ſent a manifeſto to Henry, in which he renounced his allegiance, and ſet that prince at defiance. He likewiſe enumerated all the grievances of which the nation ſo loudly complained, and which he was now determined to redreſs. He accuſed Henry of perjury: for ſoon after his landing at Ravenſpur, he had ſworn upon the goſpels, in preſence of the earl of Northumberland, that his ſole intention was that of recovering poſſeſſion of the duchy of Lancaſter, and that he would ever remain a faithful ſubject to king Richard. He aggravated his guilt in firſt dethroning, and then murdering that prince; and in uſurping upon the title of the houſe of Mortimer, to whom the crown juſtly belonged both by lineal deſcent, and the declaration of parliament. He complained loudly of the cruelty exerciſed againſt the earl of Marche, who was ſuffered to remain a captive in the hands of the enemy, nor were any of his friends permitted to treat for his ranſom. He charged him with perjury in loading the nation with heavy taxes, after having ſworn, that, without the utmoſt neceſſity, he would never levy any impoſitions upon his ſubjects.

Henry, in order to exculpate himſelf from the crimes with which he was charged, immediately ſent an anſwer to the manifeſto, in which he accuſed the Piercies, in his turn, of having excited an unnatural rebellion againſt the eſtabliſhed government; and againſt him, who had, on all occaſions, diſtinguiſhed them from the reſt of his ſubjects by every act of munificence and friendſhip that a ſovereign could beſtow upon his moſt favourite counſellors. He offered to lay aſide every privilege of prerogative, to grant the Piercies a ſafe conduct, and ſuffer them to lay all their complaints before their peers, where they ſhould be candidly heard, and, if well founded, both theirs and the public grievances redreſſed.

Henry, however, was not inſenſible that remonſtrances were of very little uſe among his ferocious nobility: fortunately for him, he had, at that time, an army which had been aſſembled againſt the Scots, ready to take the field; and he immediately ſet out on his march in order to give the rebels battle.

Piercy, who did not ſo ſoon expect to be oppoſed by a royal army, was obliged to abandon the ſiege of Shrewſbury, which he had juſt inveſted, and prepare for an engagement. He encamped at Hartlefield, where he reſolved to hazard a battle, though he had not yet been joined by Glendour's forces. The great bravery of the two leaders promiſed an obſtinate conteſt for the palm of victory; and the equality of the two armies, each being about 12,000 men, gave ſufficient reaſon to expect, that the field of battle would be deluged with the blood of the contending parties.

The ſhock was at once both dreadful and conſtant. Henry's infantry immediately gave ground, and the whole army would have been thrown into confuſion, had not the impetuous valour of Piercy and Douglas given the royaliſts an opportunity of rallying. Theſe two chiefs fought ſide by ſide, and opened themſelves a paſſage to the ſpot where the royal ſtandard was erected, and where they knew Henry fought in perſon, both contending who ſhould have the honour of encountering the royal warrior. Piercy ſupported that renown which he had acquired in ſo many bloody combats; and Douglas, his antient enemy, and now his friend, ſtill appeared his rival amidſt the horrors and confuſion of the battle. Their ardour, however, proved fatal to their cauſe: they charged with ſuch deſperate fury, and pierced with ſuch rapidity the ranks of the enemy, that few of their men could follow them. They performed ſuch prodigies of valour, that they were ſoon ſurrounded by heaps of dead bodies, and the royal ſtandard was thrown to the ground. Nor did Henry flinch from the ſtorm of battle; he expoſed his perſon in the thickeſt of the fight. His gallant ſon, whoſe military atchievements afterwards became ſo famous, followed the example of his father; and even a wound, which he received in his face with an arrow, could not oblige him to quit the field. Henry, however, in order either to elude the attacks of the enemy upon his perſon, or to encourage his own men by the belief that he was preſent every where, had dreſſed ſeveral perſons in the royal garb; and the ſword of Douglas, who ſeemed determined that the king of England ſhould fall by his arm, rendered that honour fatal to many.

But while both armies were contending in this furious manner, Piercy fell by an unknown hand. This accident decided the victory in favour of the royaliſts. About two thouſand five hundred gentlemen are ſaid to have periſhed in this ſanguinary conteſt; but the perſons of the moſt diſtinction in the royal army were the earl of Stafford, Sir Hugh Shirley, Sir Nicholas Ganſel Sir Hugh Mortimer, Sir John Maſſey, and Sir John Caverly. About 6000 private men were ſlain, of whom two thirds belonged to Piercy's army. The earls of Douglas and Worceſter were taken priſoners, the former of whom was diſmiſſed without ranſom on account of his diſtinguiſhed valour; but the latter, with ſeveral others, was beheaded at Shrewſbury. The body of Hotſpur Piercy was at firſt buried in the field of battle; but it was afterwards dug up by order of Henry, and ſent in quarters to the chief towns in the kingdom, while his head was carried to London, and there expoſed on the bridge.

At the time the above victory was obtained, the earl of Northumberland, being recovered from his illneſs, was advancing at the head of a very conſiderable body of troops to reinforce his ſon's army; but hearing of the total defeat of his ſon, and that the king was advancing againſt him at the head of his victorious troops, he ſhut himſelf up in Warkworth-caſtle. He afterwards diſmiſſed his army, and came to the king at York. Northumberland pretended that his ſole intention of raiſing an army was to mediate a peace between the two parties, and Henry, unwilling to drive ſo powerful a nobleman to deſpair, admitted his apology, and granted him a pardon.

A. D. 1405. The Piercies, notwithſtanding their defeat at Shrewſbury, remained ſtill in great power and credit with the public, and the earl of Northumberland acquired an additional eſteem on account of the ſufferings of his family. Thomas Mowbray, earl of Nottingham, ſon to the duke of Norfolk, whom Henry, while only duke of Hereford, had accuſed of high treaſon, and by that means procured his perpetual baniſhment, and Richard Scroope, archbiſhop of York, ſtill continued to harbour an implacable rancour againſt Henry. The duke of Northumberland alſo, who well knew that he ſhould never be cordially forgiven, was ſtill determined to procure redreſs for the wrongs his family had received. Accordingly he joined theſe malecontents, and a plan was concerted for taking the field againſt Henry. The conſpiracy ſoon after received an additional ſtrength by the junction of the lords Bardolf, Haſtings, and Fauconbridge, and a great number of gentlemen of figure and fortune in their reſpective counties. The earl of Northumberland viſited the courts of France and Scotland, in order to prevail upon thoſe powers to ſupport the confederates and wreſt from the hand of Henry the ſcepter of England. He was received with the utmoſt reſpect, and met with great encouragement in his negotiation. The hopes of foreign aſſiſtance gave new life to the conſpiracy, and a plan was formed for making an inſurrection into the north, while the French not only made a deſcent in Wales, but alſo laid ſiege to the moſt important places belonging to the Engliſh on the continent.

As ſoon as Henry was informed of this conſpiracy, he immediately exerted himſelf to ſuppreſs it. He well knew that Glendour had joined the confederacy, and therefore ſent an army into Wales, under the command of his ſon, who attacked one of Glendour's detachments, and obtained a compleat victory.

The conſpirators now perceived that Henry was no ſtranger to their intentions, and precipitately took the field, before the earl of Northumberland was ready to join their army. A manifeſto was alſo publiſhed by the archbiſhop of York againſt Henry, in which he reproached that prince with his uſurpation of the crown, and the murder of the late king; requiring that the right line ſhould be reſtored, and all the public grievances redreſſed.

The earl of Weſtmoreland, aſſiſted by ſeveral noblemen of conſiderable power in the north, having been appointed to watch the Scottiſh marches, no ſooner heard of this inſurrection, than he advanced at the head of his forces, hoping to ſurprize the rebels before they were prepared for defence. In this, however, he was deceived; for on his reaching Shipton-Moor, he perceived the inſurgents, amounting to 17,000 men, drawn up in excellent order, and ready to engage. Weſtmoreland, not being able to give the enemy battle, had recourſe to negotiation, and prevailed upon the archbiſhop and the earl of Nottingham to lay down their arms, and ſubmit themſelves to the goverment. The inſurgents, who had juſt received advice that Henry himſelf was within three days march, at the head of a powerful army, and that it would be impoſſible for the earl of Northumberland to join them before the royal body of forces arrived, ſurrendered themſelves to the earl, and were ſent priſoners to York.

Henry, however, inſtead of agreeing to the terms offered by Weſtmoreland, determined to make theſe mutinous leaders feel the weight of his reſentment. But knowing that the trial of the archbiſhop, if conducted in the uſual form, would prove both troubleſome and tedious, and that the celerity of the execution alone could render it ſafe and prudent, he determined to follow the ferocious cuſtoms of the age, and put the prelate to death, without the form of a trial. He accordingly applied to Sir William Gaſcoigne, the chief juſtice, to paſs the ſentence of high treaſon on the archbiſhop. But Gaſcoigne refuſed to act contrary to the laws of his country. Sir William Fulthorpe was therefore appointed a judge on this occaſion; ſion; who, without any indictment, trial or defence, condemned the prelate to ſuffer death. Nor was the execution of the ſentence delayed; the archbiſhop immediately ſuffered in a very ignominious manner. This was the firſt inſtance in England of a capital ſentence being inflicted on a dignitary of the church. The earl of Nottingham, Sir John Lamplugh, and Sir Robert Plumpton, ſuffered at the ſame time. The pope was ſo highly incenſed at this alarming attack on the privileges of the church, that he pronounced the ſentence of excommunication againſt all who were concerned in the death of the archbiſhop; and it was with great difficulty that Henry could procure abſolution.

As ſoon as the earl of Northumberland heard of the fate of the inſurgents, he fled into Scotland with lord Bardolf; and Henry ſoon after reduced all the caſtles belonging to thoſe noblemen. The unfortunate earl, however, did not long enjoy the benefit of his aſylum: an event ſoon after happened which obliged him to ſeek his ſafety on the continent. Robert III. king of Scotland, was by no means qualified to hold the ſceptre in theſe ferocious times. He was a prince of a ſlender capacity, but extremly innocent and inoffenſive; virtues which were then ſo far from being admired, that they rendered him contemptible. His brother, the duke of Albany, a prince of a more violent and boiſterous diſpoſition, aſſumed the reins of government; and deſirous of rendering his power perpetual, he threw David, the eldeſt ſon of Robert, into priſon, where he was inhumanly ſtarved to death. James, a younger brother of David, was now the only obſtacle that oppoſed the tyrant from mounting the throne on the death of his brother. Robert, ſenſible of his ſon's danger, embarked him on board a ſhip, in order to ſend him into France, not doubting but he would there find ſufficient protection from that friendly power. But Robert was deſtined to misfortunes: the ſhip was taken by the Engliſh, and Henry, notwithſtanding the truce which ſubſiſted between the two crowns, refuſed to reſtore the young prince to liberty. Worn out with grief and infirmities, Robert was unable to ſupport this laſt misfortune. He ſunk under the weight of his diſtreſs, and left the government in the hands of his brother. Henry now ſaw all the importance of his acquiſition: the duke of Albany was entirely dependent on the Engliſh monarch; becauſe a ſingle attempt to prejudice the intereſt of Henry would be ſufficient to diſplace him from the throne. James was about nine years of age when he was firſt brought to London; and if any thing could atone for this breach of faith, it was the excellent education which Henry beſtowed upon him, and which afterwards qualified him for filling the throne of his anceſtors with great applauſe. It is little to be wondered at that the duke of Albany ſhould, from theſe circumſtances, refuſe to protect a nobleman ſo obnoxious to Henry as the earl of Northumberland: he therefore obliged him to leave the kingdom, and the earl retired to the continent.

A. D. 1407. In the beginning of this year a dreadful plague broke out in England, which obliged the king to remove his court to Glouceſter. Thirty thouſand perſons periſhed of this diſtemper in London only, and a proportionable number in ſeveral parts of the country.

A. D. 1408. The earl of Northumberland, being now weary of his exile, determined to make one effort for the recovery of thoſe poſſeſſions of which he had been deprived by his ſovereign. Accordingly, in the ſpring of this year he landed in the north of England, accompanied by his faithful companion the lord Bardolf. He was immediately joined by a party of Scottiſh free-booters, and in a few days found himſelf at the head of a conſiderable force, by whoſe aſſiſtance he retook ſeveral of the caſtles which had been reduced after the battle of Shrewſbury. Theſe proceedings greatly alarmed the government, and orders were immediately iſſued for raiſing an army againſt the rebels, who were now become very formidable, and had appointed Thirſk in Yorkſhire for the place of their rendezvous. While the court was making levies to oppoſe the earl, Sir Thomas Rockeſby, ſheriff of the county of York, thinking it his duty to ſtop the progreſs of the inſurgents, raiſed a conſiderable body of forces, and advanced to meet them. The earl of Northumberland was equally deſirous of coming to an action with the ſheriff, perſuaded that if he could defeat Rockeſby's forces he ſhould not only diſappoint Henry of ſo eſſential a reinforcement, but alſo, by this ſucceſs, engage the city and county of York to declare in his favour. He accordingly put his army in motion, and met Rokeſby on Beaham Moor, where a bloody engagement enſued, in which the rebels, after an obſtinate reſiſtance, were totally routed, notwithſtanding they had greatly the ſuperiority of numbers. The earl of Northumberland was ſlain on the ſpot, and the lord Bardolf taken priſoner, but ſo mortally wounded that he died a few days after.

This fortunate event, together with the death of Glendour, which happened ſoon after, freed Henry from all his domeſtic enemies. No more attempts were made to tear the laurel from his brow; and he enjoyed the crown he had uſurped without any farther oppoſition.

A. D. 1410. Henry was never remarkable for favouring the clergy; but their power was now ſo great, that his private ſentiments were obliged to give way to his public intereſt. The common people, however, were in general inclined to favour the reformation begun by Wickliff; and were encouraged in their oppoſition to the eſtabliſhed form of worſhip, by a ſchiſm in the Romiſh church, where two different popes laid claim to St. Peter's chair. The perſecutions that had for ſome time been carried on againſt the Wickliffites, or Lollards, had no other effect than increaſing their number; many of whom held places of truſt and power under the government. Alarmed at the great progreſs of theſe ſectaries, whoſe numbers were daily augmenting, the clergy determined to carry the laws into execution, in order, by ſome dreadful example, to prevent this ſchiſm from extending its influence, which threatened the foundation of their wealth and power. One Bodby, a taylor, took upon him, to exclaim violently againſt the abſurdity of the real preſence in the ſacrament. This perſon, therefore, was ſingled out by the clergy for exemplary puniſhment. He was accordingly tried and condemned to the ſtake; and the prince of Wales had the curioſity to be a ſpectator of the execution. When the flames firſt reached the body of the criminal he cried out in ſo horrid a manner, that the prince ordered the fire to be removed, and offered the man his life, together with a penſion out of his private purſe, as the flames had diſabled him from following his buſineſs, on condition he would renounce his opinions. Bodby, however ſhocked when he firſt felt the flames, refuſed the offered pardon; he loved his opinions better than his life; and he was accordingly committed again to the fire, and there reſigned his breath as a forfeit to his faith.

A. D. 1412. Though Henry had now no domeſtic enemy to contend with, yet his days were greatly embittered by the irregular courſes of his ſon the prince of Wales. He was at this time in full vigour of youth, and of an active, ſprightly ſpirit. While he was employed in the field, no actions of immoral tendency ſtained his character. But a life of indolence was not agreeable to his nature. He now plunged himſelf, with the utmoſt violence, into all the extravagancies of debauchery, and bluſhed not for a conduct the moſt diſorderly and licentious. But his outrages proceeded not ſo much from a depraved diſpoſition as from the violence of his temper, which not being directed to uſeful objects, induced him to give full ſcope to his paſſions. At the ſame time, however, many gleams of ſpirit and magnificence were obſerved to break through the cloud, which a wild conduct had thrown over his character.

The king was too good a judge of mankind to deſpair of his ſon's reformation; and his hopes on that head were not a little heightened by an accident which gave a real picture of his ſon's diſpoſition. One of young Henry's favourites having been indicted for ſome miſdemeanor, was condemned, notwithſtanding all the intereſt the prince, who was preſent at the trial, could make in his favour. Young Henry was ſo incenſed at the iſſue, that he ſtruck Sir William Gaſcoigne, the judge, as he ſat on the bench. But the magiſtrate was not to be intimidated; he acted with a ſpirit ſuitable to his character, and inſtantly ordered the prince into cuſtody. This ſally of paſſion in the prince was immediately ſucceeded by a noble return of reaſon; he ſuffered himſelf, with the utmoſt reſignation, to be conducted to priſon by the officers of juſtice. When the king was informed of this tranſaction, he ſaid, "I thank God I have a judge poſſeſſed of ſo much courage to execute the laws, and a ſon endowed with ſo much obedience as to ſubmit to ſuch chaſtiſement."

A. D. 1413. Henry's health had for ſome time been viſibly declining: he was ſubject to fits, which for a time bereaved him of his ſenſes; and though he was yet in the flower of his age, his end was viſibly approaching. He was naturally of a peeviſh and jealous diſpoſition, which was now greatly encreaſed, and he too readily liſtened to the vile ſuggeſtions of his courtiers, who inſinuated that his eldeſt ſon had formed unnatural deſigns upon his crown and life. Theſe inſinuations filled Henry's breaſt with the moſt anxious fears and apprehenſions; and he even removed the prince from his poſt of preſident of the council.

Young Henry was now greatly alarmed: fond as he was of pleaſure and diſſipation, he was ſtill very ſuſceptible of the nobler paſſions, and could not, without the moſt piercing anguiſh, reflect, that his own conduct had given too much reaſon for his enemies to aſperſe his character. But ſtill he knew himſelf innocent with regard to his having formed even a wiſh to the prejudice of his father's authority; and determined to purſue every method in his power to convince the king of his duty and loyalty.

With this view, after having received the euchariſt, he dreſſed himſelf in a mourning habit, and repaired to court, in order to requeſt a private audience of the king. Being admitted to his father's preſence, he immediately fell on his knees, and addreſſed himſelf to him in the following words:

"Moſt dread ſovereign, and honoured father, it gives me the moſt ſincere concern to find that I am ſuſpected by your highneſs of an unnatural deſign againſt your crown and perſon; which I, more than any other ſubject of your majeſty, am bound to reverence and defend. I confeſs, indeed, with ſhame and contrition, that my irregularities and exceſſes have given ſufficient cauſe for your diſpleaſure. But I call the Almighty, who knows the inmoſt ſecrets of the heart, and never fails to puniſh thoſe who dare to invoke him to ſanctify a falſhood, to witneſs, that I never harboured a ſingle thought inconſiſtent with that duty I owe your majeſty as my ſovereign and my father. Thoſe who charge me with contrary intentions, ſeek only to diſturb your tranquillity, and to alienate your affections from your ſon and ſucceſſor. I would willingly remove theſe anxieties from your mind; I came for no other purpoſe. Let me beſeech you, therefore, to let my actions be tried by the utmoſt rigour, with the ſame ſeverity as if I was the meaneſt of your ſubjects; and if I am found guilty, in any reſpect, of the attrocious crime laid to my charge; if I have ever uſed any expreſſion that indicated diſloyalty or want of affection, let me be puniſhed as the vileſt miſcreant that ever diſgraced the name of ſon or ſubject. I will readily ſubmit to any puniſhment you may think proper to inflict. I again, therefore, beſeech you, with the utmoſt humility, both for the eaſe of your own mind, and the vindication of your injured ſon, to iſſue the neceſſary orders for making the rigorous ſcrutiny I now demand."

This ingenuous and pathetic addreſs greatly affected the king. He took the prince in his arms, embraced him with tears, and aſſured him, that all his ſuſpicions were entirely removed, and that he would never, for the future, harbour a thought prejudicial to his loyalty and honour. He even promiſed, that in order to remove every ſuſpicion from the minds of all ingenuous perſons, he would give him the names of his accuſers, that they might be brought to juſtice in the enſuing parliament.

But the death of Henry put a total ſtop to this enquiry. The dreadful fits with which he was ſo often attacked impaired his ſenſes; and he had been ſo frequently in danger of loſing his crown, that his imagination ſeems to have been ſtrongly impreſſed with that idea, which increaſed as his ſtrength and reaſoning faculties decayed, even to a degree of childiſh anxiety. He would not ſleep unleſs the royal diadem was laid on his pillow. One day he remained ſo long in a ſwoon, that his ſervants thought him actually dead; and the prince took the crown from the pillow, and carried it into his own apartment. The king recovering the uſe of his ſenſes, and obſerving the diadem was removed, aſked who had dared to take it from his pillow? and being told that the prince had carried it away, he ordered him to be brought into his preſence. When young Henry appeared, the king with an angry countenance, ſaid, "What! would you deprive me of my crown before my death?" "No," replied the prince, "I took it, thinking your majeſty was really dead, as my lawful inheritance; but now, happily perceiving my miſtake, I return the diadem with far greater pleaſure than I took it." He accordingly re-placed the crown on the king's pillow; and having received his father's bleſſing, retired. A ſhort interval between the attacks of this dreadful diſeaſe inſpired Henry with the pleaſing hopes of recovery; and, agreeable to the cuſtom of that age of bigotry, he aſſumed the croſs, and made a ſolemn vow to heaven, to ſpend the remainder of his days in a war againſt the infidels, in order, if poſſible, to recover the Holy City from the enemies of the Chriſtian name. But he lived not to put his deſign in execution. He was ſeized with his laſt fit as he was paying his devotions before the ſhrine of St. Edward; and being carried into the Jeruſalem Chamber, belonging to the abbot of Weſtminſter, he expired, on the twentieth of March, in the forty-ſixth year of his age, and the thirteenth of his reign.

The great popularity which Henry enjoyed before he obtained the crown, and which had ſo greatly aſſiſted him in the acquiſition of it, was entirely loſt ſeveral years before the end of his reign, and he governed his people more by terror than by affection; more by his own policy than by their ſenſe of duty or allegiance.

HENRY V.

The crimes he committed in order to uſurp the ſeat of power muſt be conſidered as perpetual ſtains on his memory by every man who makes the leaſt pretenſions to follow the dictates of conſcience, or the eternal precepts of the moral law. It may, indeed, be ſaid, that the injuſtice with which he had been treated by Richard gave occaſion to his crimes: for, in all probability, he never would have uſurped the crown, if that monarch had not deprived him of his patrimony. But one crime cannot juſtify another. The murder of a king, his near relation, and the excluſion of the true heir from the throne, will always render the name of Henry of Lancaſter obnoxious to the virtuous and the good. He ſeemed, indeed, himſelf, to be ſufficiently conſcious of the turpitude of his crimes; and the uneaſineſs with which he poſſeſſed his envied greatneſs, and the ſtings of conſcience which he perpetually felt, cannot fail of rendering him an object of our pity, even when ſeated upon the throne. At the ſame time, it muſt be confeſſed, that he was endowed with many great and amiable qualities, which would have rendered him one of the greateſt monarchs that ever wore the diadem of England, had he not waded to the throne through the blood of his ſovereign. His prudence, his vigilance, and his foreſight, were admirable; his command of temper and preſence of mind remarkable; his courage, both military and political, free from fault. In a word, it was the flame of ambition that rendered Henry a tyrant, and the commiſſion of one crime made way for that of another.

This monarch was twice married. By his firſt wife Mary de Bohun, daughter and co-heir of the earl of Hereford, he had four ſons, Henry his ſucceſſor on the throne, Thomas duke of Clarence, John duke of Bedford, and Humphry duke of Glouceſter; and two daughters, Blanche and Phillippa; the former was married to the duke of Bavaria, and the latter to the king of Denmark. His ſecond wife Jane, whom he married after he was king, and who was daughter to the king of Navarre, and widow to the duke of Britany, brought him no iſſue.

The remarkable occurrences that happened in this king's reign were as follow:

In the third year of his reign, about the beginning of March, appeared a very terrible blazing ſtar, ſending forth its fiery ſtreams at firſt towards the north-eaſt, and at length towards the north, where it ſeemed to fix, which was afterwards thought to portend the bloody wars between the Scots and Engliſh, and the ſeveral executions done upon the malcontents under the government.

In the ninth year of his reign, a little before Chriſtmas, began a froſt of that violence and long continuance, that the like was ſcarce ever heard of in England. It laſted fifteen weeks, and, being accompanied with abundance of ſnow, was ſo deſtructive, to the birds eſpecially, that almoſt all the ſmaller ones died with cold and hunger.

In the tenth year of his reign, there was a play acted at Skinner's-well, near Clerkenwell, London, repreſenting the chief matters of the world from the creation; it laſted eight days, and moſt part of the nobility and gentry of England were preſent at it. From thence they went to royal juſts in Smithfield, between the marſhal of Hainault, and certain Hanovers, challengers, and the earl of Somerſet, and an equal number of Engliſhmen, defendants. The victory was on the Engliſhmen's ſide; for the earl overcame, as did all the Engliſh, but one.

In the twelfth year of his reign, the Guildhall in the city of London, which was but a mean cottage before, was made a ſtately building by the mayor and aldermen, at the charge of the city. And the company of grocers laid the foundation of their hall, upon a piece of ground, which they purchaſed for three hundred and twenty marks, in Cunihope-lane, now called Grocer's-alley.

SECTION II.

HENRY V.

HENRY the Fifth was about twenty-five years of age when he acceded to the throne of England. His mind had been properly cultivated in learning by an education at the univerſity of Oxford; and thoſe ſeeds of erudition falling into a fertile ſoil, its luxuriancy had encouraged ſome weeds of immorality to ſhoot up in the harveſt of royal virtues. But the latter now growing to full maturity, had ſo effectually choaked the malignancy of the former, that he ſucceeded to royalty with every merit that could adorn it.

No ſooner had he aſſumed the reins of government, than he increaſed the good opinion the people already entertained of him by his judicious and prudent conduct. He called together his former aſſociates, and after exhorting them to imitate his example, and inhibiting them from appearing any more in his preſence if they continued their licentious conduct, he diſmiſſed them with liberal preſents. He publiſhed a general amneſty for all crimes already committed, except rape and murder. His new council was compoſed of the wiſeſt and moſt virtuous perſons in the kingdom: he made no diſtinction between thoſe who had adhered to Richard, * and thoſe who had joined his father; he was deſirous of extinguiſhing all parties. He ſhewed a noble reſolution of reſtoring purity to the courts of juſtice, by diſplacing all thoſe who had not filled their poſts with integrity. Gaſcoigne the chief juſtice, who had committed him when prince of Wales to priſon, and who, on that account, trembled to approach the royal preſence, was received with the utmoſt marks of eſteem; his ſtrict and impartial execution of the laws was applauded, and inſtead of reproaches, he was loaded with favours.

---

* As a proof of this he cauſed the corpſe of Richard II. to be removed from Langley-abbey, where it had been buried in an obſcure manner, to Weſtminſter, in which place it was re-interred near the remains of his queen, Anne of Luxembourg. He alſo ordered that tapers ſhould be burnt day and night by his tomb, a dirge to be ſung one day in the week, and the next morning a maſs of requiem; after which eleven ſhillings and eightpence ſhould be given to the poor. And, by way of attonement for his father's uſurpation, he founded three monaſteries near Shene, in Surry; where prayers were alſo read for the ſoul of Richard.

In ſhort, Henry uſed his utmoſt endeavours to win the hearts of his people. He treated the earl of Marche with ſo much attention and reſpect, that he forgot his right to the ſceptre of England, to which he had, by birth, an undoubted title. He reſtored the noble family of Piercy to their former honours and eſtates, and laboured ſincerely to bury all animoſities in the grave of oblivion.

In the mean time the parliament met at Weſtminſter, when ſeveral acts were paſſed for ſecuring the peace of the kingdom, the impartial adminiſtration of juſtice, and the freedom of parliament. But while they were thus providing for the civil, the clergy were induſtrious in deſtroying the religious liberty of the ſubject. Notwithſtanding all the ſeverities that had been exerciſed againſt the Lollards, yet that ſect were every day increaſing in the kingdom, and not only appeared extremely dangerous to the church, but even formidable to the civil power. Sir John Oldcaſtle, ſtiled, in right of his wife, lord Cobham, was conſidered as the head of the Lollards. He was a perſon of great parts, invincible courage, and eminently diſtinguiſhed for his experience in military affairs; virtues which had greatly recommended him to the favour of Henry. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was highly incenſed againſt the Lollards, was deſirous of indicting lord Cobham, perſuaded that the leader of the party was the moſt proper victim of eccleſiaſtical ſeverity. But Cobham was too great a favourite with the king for the archbiſhop to proceed without his leave. He therefore waited upon Henry, and requeſted permiſſion to proceed againſt Sir John Oldcaſtle. The king, who was no friend to eccleſiaſtical ſeverity, repreſented to the primate, that reaſon and perſuaſion were the beſt means of ſupporting truth, and correcting error; that every gentle method ſhould be uſed in order to bring back theſe deluded people to the boſom of the church; and that he himſelf would endeavour to reconcile Cobham to the catholic faith. Henry, however, found that all his arguments were in vain; Cobham, though greatly attached to him, refuſed to ſacrifice truths of the utmoſt importance to conciliate the favour of majeſty; and the king gave the primate leave to proceed againſt him to the utmoſt ſeverity of the laws. The violence of eccleſiaſtical authority was now exerted, and the primate, aſſiſted by his three ſuffragans, the biſhops of London, Wincheſter, and St. David's, condemned Cobham to the flames; but he made his eſcape from the Tower before the day arrived which was appointed for his execution.

A. D. 1414. Cobham was no ſooner at liberty than he formed a deſign of ſeeking revenge on his enemies. He aſſembled his partizans and began an open rebellion againſt the government: but the vigilance of Henry prevented the conſequences. Great numbers of the Lollards were ſeized, ſeveral of them executed, and the whole conſpiracy rendered totally abortive. Cobham himſelf eſcaped, nor was he brought to juſtice till four years after, when he was hanged as a traitor, and his body burnt on the gibbet, conformable to the ſentence pronounced againſt him as a heretic.

Henry had for ſome time intended to undertake a war againſt France, in order to recover the provinces that had been wreſted from his predeceſſors; and thinking this the moſt favourable opportunity, he determined to carry his deſign into execution. Charles VI. had been ſeized with a fit of frenzy, which rendered him incapable of exerciſing his authority; and though he recovered from this diſorder, he was ſo ſubject to relapſes, that his ſenſes were gradually but inſenſibly impaired; ſo that he was incapable of purſuing any ſettled plan of government. This misfortune gave a full career to the rage of parties. The duke of Orleans, the king's brother, and the duke of Burgundy, his couſin-german, after ſuſtaining the moſt violent quarrels, by which the country had been deluged with the blood of its inhabitants, agreed to enter into a ſtrict friendſhip, and ſwore at the altar to the ſincerity of their intentions. But notwithſtanding they had invoked heaven as a witneſs between them, very little regard was paid to the ſacredneſs of their promiſe; the duke of Orleans was ſoon after aſſaſſinated in the ſtreets of Paris by order of the duke of Burgundy, who had the inſolence to avow openly and defend the juſtice of the action, which he termed tyrannicide. The dreadful conſequences of ſo vile a tenet were ſoon diſplayed. A reconciliation between the two parties was now impoſſible; the whole kingdom in general, and the capital in particular, became a moſt dreadful ſcene of blood and violence.

A. D. 1415. Henry, in order to conceal his real intention againſt France, ſent over a ſplendid embaſſy to that court with the offer of a perpetual peace and alliance between the two crowns; but demanded in return the French king's daughter in marriage, with two millions of crowns for her portion; the payment of one million ſix hundred thouſand pounds, as the arrears of the late king John's ranſom: the immediate poſſeſſion, and full ſovereignty of Normandy, and the other provinces, which Philip Auguſtus had wreſted from the crown of England, together with the ſuperiority of Britany and Flanders.

It is evident, from the exorbitant nature of theſe demands, that Henry was fully ſenſible of the diſtreſſed condition of the French monarchy; and the terms offered by that court, though greatly inferior, ſufficiently ſhew their own conſciouſneſs of the ſame melancholy truth: they agreed to give him the princeſs in marriage, with a portion of eight hundred thouſand crowns; to inveſt him with the intire ſovereignty of Guienne, and to annex to that province the counties of Perigord, Bouvergne, Angoumois, and other territories.

Though the terms thus offered by the French were more than might have been expected, yet they were refuſed by Henry, who determined to erect his ſtandard in the fields of France. The ardour of the nation to follow their ſovereign exceeded his moſt ſanguine expectations, and freed him from any apprehenſions of his finnaces being inſufficient for the payment of his forces. Several of them raiſed a number of men at their own expence, and Henry ſoon found himſelf at the head of a very conſiderable army.

But while the neceſſary preparations were making for this expedition, Henry received advice of a deteſtable conſpiracy formed againſt his crown and life by thoſe whom he leaſt ſuſpected. The perſons who were to execute this horrid deſign, were Richard earl of Cambridge, younger brother to the duke of York; the lord Scroop, treaſurer of England, and Sir Thomas Gray, a knight of Northumberland. The earl of Cambridge was remarkably ambitious, Scroop was inſatiably covetous, though immenſly rich, and Gray was a diſcontented courtier. Theſe conſpirators were to place the earl of Marche on the throne, as ſoon as Henry was embarked for France with his army. But the earl, inſtead of joining in the project, diſcovered the whole to Henry, who inſtantly ordered the conſpirators to be arreſted, and tried by a ſpecial commiſſion directed to the duke of Clarence, as lord high ſteward, the earl mareſchal, and other judges. The priſoners, being all found guilty on the cleareſt evidence, received ſentence of death. The earl of HENRY V. naming the Battle of AGINCOURT.

Cambridge and Sir Thomas Gray were beheaded; but lord Scroop was hanged, drawn and quartered, his guilt being aggravated with the circumſtance of ingratitude to Henry, who had diſtinguiſhed him with many particular marks of favour and affection.

This conſpiracy being ended, Henry embarked his forces at Southampton, and after a ſhort paſſage landed at Caux in Normandy, with an army of 6,000 men at arms and 24,000 foot, moſt of whom were archers. His firſt views were directed to the caſtle of Harfleur, which he immediately beſieged. The place was commanded by the lord of Ercouteville, at the head of a numerous garriſon of veterans, who made a noble defence. But the artillery of the Engliſh forces made large breaches in the walls, and the governor agreed to ſurrender the place, if not relieved by a certain time. The conditions were accepted, and all hoſtilities ceaſed; but the governor delaying, under various pretences, to open the gates, agreeable to the articles of capitulation, Henry ordered a general attack; the place was taken by ſtorm, and all the garriſon put to the ſword, except a few gentlemen, whom the troops thought proper to ſpare, in order to profit by their ranſom.

The reduction of the ſtrong port of Harfleur alarmed the whole French monarchy; and a numerous army was immediately raiſed to check the progreſs of the invaders. Private animoſities were now laid aſide, and all parties joined in oppoſing an army whoſe progreſs threatened the deſtruction of the ſtate. The dauphin himſelf took the field in perſon, at the head of an army of fourteen thouſand men at arms, and was ſoon joined by the dukes of Berry, Orleans, Bourbon, and Brabant, the conſtable d'Albret, the counts of Nevers, Vendome, and Richemont, the flower of the French nobility, and above forty thouſand men, eager to ſignalize their loyalty to their king, and their valour againſt the invaders of their country.

Henry's troops were at this time in a very indifferent ſituation. They had ſuffered greatly during the ſiege of Harfleur, by ſickneſs; two thouſand common ſoldiers, beſides a great number of perſons of diſtinction, had been carried off by a bloody flux, and many had been obliged to return to England, in order to recover their health by the aſſiſtance of the air of their natural climate. The diſtreſs of his people afflicted the heart of Henry; his fleet had been diſperſed by ſtorms; proviſions began to grow ſcarce in his camp, and the only reſource in his preſent condition was to march his army by land to Calais, over a prodigious extent of land, in an enemy's country, and in the face of an army greatly ſuperior in numbers to his own.

Henry ſaw all the dangers of his ſituation; but was determined to perſevere. Accordingly he proceeded by ſlow and deliberate marches, that his own army might not be diſcouraged by the appearance of a precipitate flight, nor ſo frequently expoſed to the attacks of the light ſquadrons of the enemy. In this manner he continued his rout to the banks of the Somme, which he intended to paſs at the ford where Edward the third croſſed that ſtream, when reduced to a ſimilar ſituation by Philip de Valois. But he found the ford was now rendered impaſſable by a great number of ſharp ſtakes drove into the bed of the river, and the oppoſite bank ſtrongly guarded by numerous detachments of the enemy. He was therefore obliged to change his courſe, and was fortunate enough to ſeize by ſurprize a paſſage near St. Quintin, where his whole army paſſed with ſafety.

Henry, however, ſoon perceived that the paſſage of the Somme was not the only difficulty that oppoſed his intended march to Calais. He beheld, from the heights of Blangi, the whole French army, conſiſting of above an hundred thouſand men, drawn up on the plains of Agincourt, to oppoſe his paſſage. Henry's army was reduced to almoſt half the number that landed near Harfleur, and even theſe were diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, and debilitated by ſickneſs and continual duty. In this alarming ſituation, Henry offered to ſacrifice his conqueſt of Harfleur for a ſafe paſſage to Calais; but the French generals prided themſelves ſo much on their ſuperiority of numbers, that they rejected his propoſals with contempt.

As a battle appeared now inevitable, Henry employed every means that human prudence could ſuggeſt to inſpire the troops with courage for the approaching conteſt. He recalled to their remembrance the glorious actions of their predeceſſors in the fields of Creſſy and Poictiers, againſt an amazing ſuperiority of the enemy. The ſoldiers caught the heroic ſentiments of their leader: the advantage of numbers were no longer regarded; and they wiſhed only to be led againſt the French.

On the 25th of October, the day appointed for the battle, Henry, as ſoon as it was light, drew up his little army between two woods which guarded each flank; and in that poſition waited for the attack of the enemy.

The French army was now divided into three lines, the firſt of which, beſides a great number of other troops, was compoſed of eight thouſand gentletlemen, commanded by the conſtable d'Albert, the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the counts of Eu, Vendome and Richemont, the famous marſhal Bouiccaut, David Rambure, grand-maſter of the croſs-bow-men, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction. The ſecond line was led by the duke of Alencon, aſſiſted by the duke of Barre, the counts of Vaudemont, Nevers, Salines, and Grand Pré. The third body was under the command of the counts of Marle, Dampmartin, Fauquenberg, and the ſieur de Lannoy.

While the French officers were employed in drawing up their troops, Henry detached 400 lances to take poſt in a wood on the right; and alſo a party of 250 archers to lay in ambuſh on the left, in a low meadow covered with buſhes. The right wing of Henry's army was commanded by the duke of York, aſſiſted by the lords Beaumont, Willoughby, and Fanhope. The center was commanded by Henry in perſon, attended by his brother the duke of Glouceſter, the earl-marſhal, the earl of Oxford, and the young earl of Suffolk. The rear, which conſiſted wholly of archers, and ſuch as were armed with ſpears, halberts, and bills, was led by the earl of Dorſet. The chief ſtrength of the Engliſh army conſiſted of infantry; and Henry, fearing that the French horſe would break them by the fury of the firſt charge, ordered the archers to fix into the ground piles, or ſtakes, pointed at both ends with iron, and ſix or ſeven feet long, in their front, and alſo on their flanks, or intervals between the horſe and foot. Theſe formed a kind of temporary fortification, behind which the archers were not only ſecure themſelves, but had the opportunity of annoying the enemy as they advanced.

Thus, differently arranged, the two armies ſtood facing each other the greater part of the day; the Engliſh not caring to advance, leſt they ſhould loſe the advantage of the ground; nor the French, for fear of being more crowded together than they were already. At length Henry advanced at the head of his main diviſion, the two wings moving at the ſame time, till he came very near the village of Agincourt; when the French horſe moved forwards to attack the Engliſh archers. Upon which the latter halted, pitched their ſtakes, interweaving them together, and bending them a little towards the enemy. Guarded by this fence, they diſcharged a ſhower of arrows which nothing could reſiſt: the ranks were thinned, and the line thrown into great diſorder. The archers who lay in ambuſh among the buſhes of the meadow charged the French in flank, and made a dreadful ſlaughter. The Engliſh took advantage of the enemy's diſorder, fell upon them with their battle-axes, and cut them to pieces, almoſt without reſiſtance. The conſtable perceiving the diſtreſs of his advanced party, haſtened to their aſſiſtance, but under terrible diſadvantages; for the ſoil being wet and miry, both horſe and foot moved with the greateſt difficulty; and continuing ſtill to preſs more cloſely upon one another, preſented a defenceleſs front to the Engliſh, who ſoon threw the whole line into irretrievable diſorder: their buſineſs was rather that of executioners than ſoldiers. The field was now covered with the diſmounted, the ſlain, and the wounded; men and horſes were blended in one dreadful confuſion. The conſtable himſelf, together with the principal commanders of the firſt line, were left dead on the field of battle. The whole body was totally defeated, and the few that remained alive preſerved themſelves by a precipitate flight.

The ſecond line of the French, under the duke of Alencon, ſtood firm in an adjoining field, and were eager to engage, hoping by their valour to repair the diſgrace of their countrymen. Henry met them at the head of his center, and a dreadful conteſt enſued, eſpecially about the king's perſon. D'Alencon, in order to ſnatch, if poſſible, the victory from the enemy, commanded eighteen French knights of approved valor to watch attentively the motions of the Engliſh monarch, and uſe their utmoſt efforts either to kill, or take him priſoner. But the genius of Henry ſaved him from this imminent danger. Animated with the amazing ſucceſs of his archers, and deſirous of diſtinguiſhing himſelf by actions worthy of an Engliſh monarch, the king alighted from his horſe, and advanced, at the head of his diviſion, with a confidence which ſeemed to inſure the victory. He charged the enemy with ſuch fury as was almoſt irreſiſtible, and was met by D'Alencon with a ſpirit worthy of his rank. He received the attack with a firmneſs that deſerved a better fate. The French knights, who had never loſt ſight of Henry, cut themſelves a paſſage to the ſpot where he fought in perſon; and ruſhing upon him with the utmoſt violence, would, probably, have made themſelves maſters of his perſon, had not David Gam, a Welſh captain, and two other officers, perceiving the danger that threatened their ſovereign, flown to his aſſiſtance; and all the eighteen knights ſoon fell, breathleſs, on the field; but Gam, and his two gallant countrymen, were alſo mortally wounded. Henry, to ſhew his gratitude for their generous aſſiſtance, knighted them all as they lay on the field. Having paid this generous tribute of acknowledgment to merit and loyalty, Henry darted into the thickeſt part of the battle, to revenge the late attempt againſt his life; but his ardour and impetuoſity again involved him in the moſt imminent danger. His brother, the duke of Glouceſter, who had fought by his ſide, was ſtruck to the ground, and the enemy preſſed in crowds to avail themſelves of the incident. Henry was again ſurrounded by a hoſt of foes, but he was a ſtranger to fear: he covered the body of his brother with his ſhield, and defended him with his ſword. In this ſituation he received ſo violent a blow on his helmet with a battle-axe, that he fell on his knees, and would, poſſibly, have been ſeized by the enemy, had not the duke of York advanced to his aſſiſtance, at the head of a freſh body of troops. This intimidated the enemy; they fell back, and Henry and his brother had time to recover from their alarming ſituation. Another reinforcement immediately followed that led by the duke of York; and Henry again attacked the French with ſuch fury, that they were unable to ſupport the ſhock; they fell into diſorder, and a dreadful ſlaughter enſued.

The duke of Alencon, driven to deſpair at ſeeing the defeat of his diviſion, made one furious effort, determining either to retrieve the battle, or ſpare himſelf the mortification of ſurviving the diſgrace of his country. He put himſelf at the head of a choſen band of volunteers; and cutting his way to the ſpot where Henry fought in perſon, ruſhed upon the monarch, killed the duke of York by his ſide, and, with a furious ſtroke of his ſword, cleft the crown on Henry's helmet. The monarch returned the ſalutation with ſuch violence, that Alencon fell to the ground, and was immediately diſpatched by Henry's ſoldiers. The death of Alencon was attended with the total defeat of the line which he commanded.

The third line of the French were ſtill freſh and in good order: they were more numerous than the whole Engliſh army, and might have renewed the battle with ſome proſpect of ſucceſs, had they not been ſeized with a general panic. But the deſtruction of their countrymen had deprived them of all thoughts of reſiſtance, and they retired from the field of battle without having exchanged a ſingle blow with the Engliſh.

The firſt line had now rallied themſelves, and ſeemed to advance with a reſolution of making another effort for the palm of victory. At the ſame time, ſome gentlemen of Picardy having collected about ſix hundred peaſants, had fallen on the Engliſh baggage, and were deſtroying the unarmed followers of the camp, who fled before them. Henry, on ſeeing the enemy both in his front and rear, began to entertain apprehenſions leſt his priſoners ſhould alſo join in the attempt to tear the wreath of laurel from his brow; and therefore thought it neceſſary to iſſue general orders for putting them to death. As ſoon, however, as he perceived he had nothing to fear from the enemy, he immediately put a ſtop to the ſlaughter.

This conqueſt proved fatal to France, on account of the great number of princes and nobility either ſlain or taken priſoners. Among the former was the conſtable d'Albret, the dukes of Brabant, Barre, and Alencon, the count of Marle, and the archbiſhop of Sens. Among the priſoners, the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the counts of Eu, Vendome, and Richemont, and the marſhal de Boucicaut, were the moſt remarkable. Henry was maſter of fourteen thouſand priſoners. Ten thouſand men are ſaid to have been ſlain in this battle; and as the ſlaughter fell chiefly on the cavalry, it was computed that eight thouſand of them were gentlemen. The loſs of the Engliſh was very inconſiderable: the only perſons of note that fell were the duke of York and the earl of Suffolk.

As ſoon as the battle was over, Henry ordered a public thankſgiving to be held in the Engliſh army for ſo ſignal and unexpected a victory; and after that decent tribute of gratitude was performed, he ſent for Montjoy, a French herald, who had been diſpatched from the dauphin to obtain permiſſion to bury the dead, and aſked him to whom he thought the victory belonged; the herald replied, to the Engliſh. Henry then deſired to know the name of a caſtle to which he pointed with his hand; and being told it was called the Caſtle of Agincourt, "Let this action" ſaid the king, "be hereafter known by the appellation of The Battle of Agincourt."

Notwithſtanding the great advantages Henry had thus obtained over the French, yet he attempted not to profit any farther from his victory. He purſued his route, by eaſy marches to Calais, without meeting with any obſtruction in his way. Having ſtaid here about three weeks to recruit his troops, he embarked with them for England on the 16th of November, and, after an eaſy paſſage landed the ſame evening at Dover, from whence he ſet out the next day for London, where he was received by the people with every honour due to the glory and ſucceſs of his military atchievements.

A. D. 1417, The great diſtreſs occaſioned by the battle of Agincourt was ſo far from being ſufficient to put a period to the fury of factions in France, that they continued to rage with ſtill greater violence. All the principles of honour, and all the motives of intereſt, were ſacrificed at the altars of ambition and revenge. The duke of Burgundy redoubled his efforts to reinſtate himſelf in the poſſeſſion of the goverment. Iſabella of Bavaria, the wife of the unfortunate Charles VI. deteſtable in her character, and capable of the greateſt crimes, having been baniſhed to Tours, entered into a ſtrict alliance with him againſt the dauphin, who was attached to the oppoſite party. The duke of Burgundy now entered France at the head of an army, reduced ſeveral ſtrong places, releaſed the queen from her confinement, and made himſelf maſter of the king's perſon. Paris was a ſecond time deluged with blood; and nothing but an invaſion from England was wanting to complete the ruin of that divided kingdom.

Nor was this additional ſcourge long delayed; for, on the firſt of Auguſt in the following year, Henry landed at Beville in Normandy, at the head of an army of 28,000 men. Falaiſe, Cherbourg, Evreux and Caen, ſubmitted to him, and he inveſted the city of Rouen; but the place being defended by a numerous garriſon, Henry was obliged to turn the ſiege into a blockade.

A. D. 1419. Several negotiations for a peace were carried on between Henry and the leaders of the French factions, but without ſucceſs. The garriſon of Rouen was now reduced to extremity by famine, and deſired to capitulate. Henry very readily liſtened to their propoſals; and it was agreed, that on paying a ſtipulated contribution, the city ſhould be preſerved from plunder.

The ſurrender of Rouen was followed by that of all the towns and fortreſſes in Upper Normandy. But a ſudden reconciliation taking place between the dauphin and the Burgundian faction, greatly contributed to diminiſh Henry's expectations of ſucceſs. This reconciliation was, however, blaſted, even in the bud. The duke and the dauphin having agreed to an interview on the bridge of Montereau, the former was there aſſaſſinated by ſome noblemen in the train of the latter. They had ſeized this opportunity of revenging the aſſaſſination of the duke of Orleans. The moſt dreadful conſequences followed this deſperate act. The dauphin was accuſed of the crime, becauſe it was perpetrated in his preſence, and by his moſt intimate friends. The new duke of Burgundy and the queen threatened the prince with deſtruction, and conſpired the ruin of the kingdom. Every ſentiment of honour, of patriotiſm, and even of perſonal intereſt, gave way to the tranſports of revenge.

During theſe tranſactions, Henry had made himſelf maſter of Pontoiſe and Giſors, advanced to the gates of Paris, and obliged the court to remove to Troye. His enemies, inſtead of combining againſt him, abandoned to him the kingdom.

A. D. 1420. The queen and the duke of Burgundy now made propoſals to Henry for a general peace; and the terms being agreed on, the latter, accompanied by his two brothers, the dukes of Clarence and Glouceſter, repaired to Troye, where he was met by the duke of Burgundy. The imbecility into which Charles had fallen, made him incapable of ſeeing any thing, but through the eyes of thoſe who attended him; and even they ſaw every thing through the medium of their paſſions. The treaty, being already concerted among the party, was immediately drawn, ſigned, and ratified. Henry's will ſeemed to be the only law that governed the negotiation; his advantages alone were conſidered.

The principal articles of this famous treaty were: That Henry ſhould eſpouſe the princeſs Catherine: That Charles, during his life, ſhould enjoy the title and dignity of king of France: That Henry ſhould be declared and acknowledged heir of the monarchy, and be entruſted with the preſent adminiſtration of the government: That the crown of France ſhould deſcend to his heirs: That France and England ſhould be for ever united under one king; but ſhould ſtill retain their ſeveral uſages, cuſtoms, and privileges: That all the princes, peers, vaſſals, and communities of France, ſhould ſwear, both that they would adhere to the future ſucceſſion of Henry, and alſo pay him preſent obedience as regent: That Henry ſhould unite his arms to thoſe of Charles and the duke of Burgundy, in order to ſubdue the adherents of the pretended dauphin; and that thoſe princes ſhould make neither peace nor truce with him, but by common conſent and agreement.

The above treaty was alſo ratified by the parliament of Paris, who ſwore obedience to Henry, and he immediately aſſumed the reins of goverment as regent of the kingdom; a few days after which Henry's marriage was performed with the princeſs Catherine, the greateſt fortune and the fineſt woman of her age. Henry was attended on this occaſion by forty Engliſh princes and noblemen, and the royal bride and queen of France were uſhered in by the duke of Burgundy and forty of the principal nobility of France. The peace was again ſworn to by both parties, and the agreement between Henry and the duke of Burgundy was mutually renewed. The duke promiſed to obey Henry as regent of France, and heir of the crown, while Henry engaged to give up into his hands all who had any concern in the murder of his father. In ſhort, no formality, either on the part of France or England, was omitted, to give this treaty all the ſtrength, permanency and ſolemnity it was capable of receiving.

In the mean time the dauphin behaved with ſurprizing ſpirit and intrepidity. He had diſpatched the count of Vendome to ſolicit aſſiſtance from the Scots, and thoſe people, wiſely conſidering that if Henry became abſolute maſter of France, Scotland would certainly be the next victim to his ambition, readily liſtened to his requeſt, and immediately ſent him a ſupply of 7000 men, under the command of the earl of Buchan. Aſſiſted by theſe forces, the dauphin made himſelf maſter of Pont de l'Eſprit and Niſmes in Languedoc; and placed ſtrong garriſons in Campeigne, Meaux, Montargis, Montereau and Malun.

The great progreſs of the dauphin alarmed Henry, who immediately reſolved on taking the field to oppoſe him. He accordingly marched againſt Sens, which ſubmitted, after a very faint oppoſition. Montereau opened its gates at the firſt ſummons, and ſeveral ſmall towns followed the example. But the reduction of Melun was attended with more difficulty. Great part of that city was encompaſſed with the river Seine, and the whole defended by a ſtrong wall, flanked with bulwarks and towers. De Barbaſon, one of the beſt officers in France, commanded the garriſon, and made a noble defence. The place was inveſted on the twelfth of July, and did not ſurrender till the eighteenth of November, when famine forced the garriſon to ſubmit; but not without capitulating for their lives; it being agreed that none of the garriſon or inhabitants ſhould be put to death, except ſuch as had been concerned in the murder of the duke of Burgundy. Barbaſon himſelf was ſuſpected of being one of the aſſaſſins, and the duke of Burgundy inſiſted on his execution; but by the interceſſion of Henry his puniſhment was changed into impriſonment for life.

A. D. 1421. The complicated exigencies of affairs requiring greater ſupplies than the French ſtates were able to grant, Henry found it neceſſary to paſs over into England in order to procure a ſubſidy from the parliament. They granted his requeſt, but the ſupply was far from being equal to his wants; it was therefore fortunate for him that he had other reſources, beſides pecuniary ſupplies from his native ſubjects. The provinces he had already conquered maintained his troops; and the hopes of farther advantages allured to his ſtandard all men of ambitious ſpirits in England, ſo that in a ſhort time he raiſed a new army of 24000 archers and 4000 horſemen.

While Henry was in England, the dauphin, aſſiſted by the Scots, under the command of the earl of Buchan, defeated the duke of Clarence at Baugé in Anjou. The duke was ſlain in the battle, and the earls of Somerſet, Huntingdon and Suffolk were taken priſoners. Upwards of 1100 men fell in the action. The earl of Buchan, as a reward for his conduct and courage, was honoured with the office of conſtable of France.

When Henry was informed of theſe circumſtances, he was greatly alarmed, and immediately went over to Calais with his new-raiſed army. The dauphin, knowing it would be madneſs for him to meet the Engliſh monarch in the open field, retired beyond the Loire, and determined to act wholly on the defenſive. In the mean time Henry recovered moſt of the places he had loſt, and made himſelf maſter of Dreux, Tilliers, Nogent, Gallorders, and ſeveral other caſtles.

The garriſon of Meaux had for ſome time greatly haraſſed the inhabitants of Paris, at whoſe particular requeſt Henry inveſted the place, which was ſtrongly fortified, and defended by a numerous garriſon, commanded by one Vaurus, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf both by his courage and cruelty againſt the Engliſh. After a ſiege of ſeven months, the garriſon, being reduced to the utmoſt extremity, deſired to capitulate; their requeſt was granted, and it was agreed that all the inhabitants and ſoldiers ſhould have their lives preſerved: but that all the Engliſh, Welſh, Iriſh, and Scotch, who carried arms in the place, ſhould be entirely at the king's mercy, together with the baſtard of Vaurus, and three other officers of the garriſon. Theſe terms were agreed to, and all the Engliſh, Scotch, and Iriſh, found among the garriſon, together with all thoſe who had been concerned in the murder of the duke of Burgundy, were immediately put to death. The governor Vaurus, underwent an exemplary fate; the bravery of that officer could be exceeded by nothing but his cruelty; he uſed to hang, without any diſtinction of age or quality, all the Engliſh and Burgundians that fell into his hands: Henry, highly incenſed at ſuch a barbarous and ſhocking practice, cauſed him to be hanged on the ſame tree, which he had made the inſtrument of his inhuman executions.

A. D. 1422. The reduction of Meaux was followed by that of Campeigne, Gamaches and St. Valery; and Henry found himſelf maſter of all France on this ſide the Loire, except Anjou and Maine, and the caſtles of Guiſe and Crotoy in Picardy. To add to his ſatiſfaction, ſoon after the ſurrender of Meaux, he received advice that his queen was delivered at Windſor of a ſon, who was called by his father's name, and whoſe birth was celebrated with equal joy both in London and Paris.

But the moment was faſt approaching, in which Henry, who ſeemed now to have almoſt attained the ſummit of human grandeur, was to find his courſe ſtopped ſhort by the hand of nature, and all his mighty projects made to bow before an univerſal conqueror. He was ſuddenly ſeized with a fiſtula, which the ſurgeons at that time knew not how to cure; and it evidently appeared that his diſeaſe was mortal.

Henry, being apprized of his dangerous ſituation, ſent for his brother the duke of Exeter, the earl of Warwick, and the Engliſh nobility who happened to be near him, and delivered to them with great tranquillity his laſt inſtructions, which were to the following effect. He began with obſerving, that though his life had been ſhort, it had been replete with glory, and employed in promoting the happineſs of his people; that though his pretenſions to the crown of France had proved the deſtruction of many thouſands, yet theſe calamities ought not to be imputed to him, but to thoſe whoſe obſtinacy and injuſtice had forced him to have recourſe to arms, by refuſing to accept of a reaſonable peace: that he ſhould have beheld the approach of death without concern, had not his laſt moments been ſomewhat embittered by the reflection, that he had not been able to finiſh a war he had ſo happily begun; but hoped they would continue toward his infant ſon the ſame fidelity and attachment which they had profeſſed during his life, and which had been cemented by ſo many mutual good offices. He added, as his laſt advice, that if they found themſelves unable to place his ſon on the throne of France, they would never at leaſt make peace with that kingdom, unleſs the duchy of Normandy was for ever annexed to the crown of England; and earneſtly requeſted that they would aſſiduouſly cultivate the friendſhip of the duke of Burgundy, and never give liberty to the French princes taken at the battle of Agincourt, till his ſon was of age, and able to hold the reins of government. He left the regency of France to his eldeſt brother the duke of Bedford; that of England to his younger brother the duke of Glouceſter, and the care of his ſon's perſon to the earl of Warwick.

The noblemen promiſed faithfully to obey his dying commands: upon which Henry declared that he had now done with the things of this world; applied himſelf to his devotions; and ordered his chaplain to read the ſeven penitential pſalms. When the prieſt came to that paſſage in the 55th pſalm, "Build thou the walls of Jeruſalem," he interrupted him, and ſolemnly declared, that he fully intended, after reſtoring peace to France, to undertake a cruſade againſt the infidels, in order to wreſt from them the city of Jeruſalem. After making this declaration, he ordered the prieſt to proceed, and expired about the time the ſervice was finiſhed, on the 31ſt of Auguſt, in thirty-fourth year of his age, and tenth of his reign.

The royal corpſe was brought with great pomp to London, and interred in Weſtminſter-abbey, near the tomb of Edward the Confeſſor. A monument of grey marble was erected for him by his queen, and on it was placed a royal image, of ſilver gilt, which remained there till about the latter end of the reign of Henry VIII. The only part now left of this image is the trunk, which is of ſolid oak.

Henry V. excelled all his cotemporaries in perſonal courage and military prowеſs: he was hardy, patient, laborious, and more capable of enduring the extremes of cold, hunger and fatigue, than any ſoldier in his army. He was in his manners affable, polite, generous and magnificent: he had an excellent underſtading with a clear head and ſound judgement; and had admirable talents both for the cabinet and the field. But the glare of his ſucceſſes, or the luſtre of his great qualities, will not be found ſufficient ent to conceal the defects in his character. He had ertainly no juſt pretenſions to the crown of France, n the purſuit of which he ſacrificed ſo many thouſand ives: and in order to remove the guilt of all this bloodſhed from his own door, he laid it at that of a eople, whom he had ſo unjuſtly invaded, and ſo ruelly oppreſſed. Truth obliges us to confeſs, that Henry gave ample teſtimony of his not being able to diſtinguiſh between the art of war and the trade of death, nor know how to join the feeling with the manly heart: and in the hour of his exit he was a ſtriking example how eaſily conſcience is brought over o eſpouſe the cauſe of any ruling paſſion; for, as we annot ſuſpect him of any diſſimulation at ſuch a uncture, we muſt ſuppoſe that he died in full conviction of having acted according to the dictates of equity; though impartial poſterity will place him among the number of thoſe warriors, whoſe ambition has ſpread ruin and devaſtation through the earth, and who ſacrifice the character of humanity to acquire that of the hero.

Henry married the princeſs Catherine, daughter of Charles VI. king of France, by whom he had only ne child, who ſucceded him on the throne. Catherine, ſoon after his death, married Sir Owen Tudor, Welſh gentleman, ſaid to have deſcended from the ntient princes of that country: ſhe bore him two ſons, Edmund and Jaſper, the firſt of whom was created earl of Richmond, and the ſecond earl of Pembroke. The family of Tudor, which was firſt raiſed to diſtinction by this alliance, afterwards aſcended the throne of England.

The following are the moſt remarkable occurrences that happened during the reign of Henry V.

On Candlemas day, in the third year of his reign, ſeven dolphins were ſeen in the river Thames, four of which were taken and preſented to the king.

The firſt commiſſion of array, which occurs in the Engliſh hiſtory, was iſſued in the courſe of this reign. The military part of the feudal ſyſtem was now entirely aboliſhed, and could no longer ſerve for the defence or ſecurity of the kingdom. For this reaſon, when Henry went to France in 1415, he empowered certain commiſſioners to take a review of all the freemen in each county able to bear arms, to form them into companies, and to keep them in conſtant readineſs to oppoſe any attempts that might be made by the enemy.

It was alſo this king that firſt inſtituted the office of Garter, king at Arms, and made ſeveral regulations relative to that order. He likewiſe appointed a new herald, by the title of Agincourt King at Arms.

SECTION III.

HENRY VI.

(The third and laſt King of the Line of Lancaſter.)

HENRY VI. at the time of his father's death, was only nine months old; and notwithſtanding is ſucceſſion to the throne was manifeſtly diſputable, et, from the great reputation his father acquired, nd the affections of the people to his memory, he as acknowledged king without the ſhadow of oppotion.

The parliament, which met ſoon after the death of he king, made ſeveral regulations for the good order nd government of the nation: but at the ſame time hey took ſuch meaſures as evinced that they were not nſenſible of their own authority. They paid little egard to the verbal will of their late monarch; for nſtead of appointing the earl of Warwick the guardian of his ſon's perſon, they entruſted the care of im to the biſhop of Wincheſter. They changed e name of regent into that of protector, from a erſuaſion that the latter implied leſs authority than e former. They appointed the duke of Bedford, ho was at this time in France, to that office, but ermitted the duke of Glouceſter to diſcharge the uties of it during his abſence. Nor did they think prudent to truſt this power wholly in the hands of ther; for they appointed a council, without whoſe dvice and concurrence no meaſures of importance ould be determined.

The French monarch, Charles VI. lived but two onths after the death of Henry. He was ſucceeded his ſon, who was immediately proclaimed and owned king at Poictiers by the title of Charles VII. hough he was at this time only twenty years of age, t he poſſeſſed great penetration, addreſs and couge: his manners were mild and engaging; and hen he aſſumed the ſovereign power, it was performed with ſuch an air of modeſty, that the people re convinced he was leſs ſenſible of his own dignity, than of their diſtreſſed circumſtances. In ſhort, he appeared likely to gain over to his cauſe a great number of partiſans, and to recover that affection from the French which had been loſt during the reign of his father.

On the other hand the duke of Bedford purſued every meaſure that had the leaſt tendency towards ſtrengthening and ſupporting the intereſt of his royal nephew. Young Henry was proclaimed king of France at Paris; the arms of both nations were impreſſed on all ſeals and devices; and the whole French nobility, who adhered to the Engliſh or Burgundian party, ſwore allegiance to the new government.

A. D. 1423. While the duke of Bedford was thus taking every neceſſary precaution to ſerve the intereſt of the king his nephew, Charles was no leſs intent to his. Though he was reduced to a low ebb of fortune, yet he was ſtill maſter of ſeveral capital places; and his power was the more reſpectable from his officers and miniſters being men of great ability and integrity.

The duke of Bedford, finding Charles's intereſt increaſe, and fearful of the conſequences, ſent over to England for a reinforcement of troops, which were accordingly ſent him by the duke of Glouceſter. He alſo took care to ſtrengthen his alliance with the dukes of Burgundy and Britany; with the former of whom he added private, to political intereſt, by marrying one of his ſiſters.

The young French monarch was determined to uſe his utmoſt efforts in regaining his natural rights; and the firſt conqueſts he made were the towns of Ferte-Milon, and Meulon on the Seine, both of which he took by ſurprize.

As this laſt place lay in the neighbourhood of Paris, Bedford looked upon the reduction of it as an inſult offered to his arms, and therefore reſolved to retake it at all events. Accordingly he formed the ſiege of it, accompanied by the earls of Saliſbury and Suffolk, the lords Scales and Poynings, Sir John Faſtolf, and others of his beſt officers. The garriſon for ſome time oppoſed the beſiegers, but finding themſelves too weak, and being diſappointed of receiving a reinforcement from Charles, as was expected, they delivered up the place; the ſurrender of which was followed by that of the fortreſſes of Marcouſſi, Montleri, la Ferté, Milan, and ſeveral others of leſs note.

Among other meaſures concerted by the miniſtry of England for ſtrenghening the intereſt of Henry in France, it was determined to releaſe James king of Scotland, who was ſtill a priſoner in London. Previous to the execution of this matter, however, they ſent advice of their intentions to the duke of Bedford, who highly approved of it, imagining that much might be expected from James's friendſhip when laid under this obligation for his crown and liberty. Accordingly conferences were opened at the city of York in the beginning of September, when the commiſſioners of both nations ſigned a truce for ſeven years, by which James engaged to recall his troops as ſoon as poſſible from the French ſervice. Thus was the Scotch monarch, after a captivity of ſeventeen years, reſtored to his crown and kingdom.

A. D. 1424. Whilſt the king of Scotland's liberty was negotiating in England, the war was continued in France with various ſucceſs. At one time fortune was favourable to the French, and at another to the Engliſh; places were taken and retaken ſucceſſively, without any remarkable advantage. Charles, however, rather gained the advantage, and his ſtrength was increaſed by the aſſiſtance he received from the duke of Milan, who ſent him a reinforcement of a thouſand men at arms and five hundred lances: but his chief reliance was upon the Scottiſh auxiliaries, whom he called guardians, and of whom he had now no leſs than 15,000 in his ſervice. The earl of Buchan was already created conſtable of France, and Charles now conferred the title of earl of Evreaux on General Stuart, and that of duke of Terouranne on the earl of Douglas, who was eſteemed one of the greateſt generals of Europe.

In the month of June this year the duke of Bedford received advice that one of Charles's partiſans had reduced Ivri on the frontiers of Picardy. As this was a place of very conſiderable importance, Bedford determined, if poſſible to regain it, and accordingly marched at the head of his army, and inveſted the place. The governor, perceiving that it would be impoſſible to defend the town for any length of time, agreed to capitulate, if not relieved by a certain day. This propoſal was accepted, and no army appearing within the limited time, the place was delivered up to the beſiegers.

Charles, however, had not neglected the neceſſary means of endeavouring to ſuccour a place of ſo much importance. He had diſpatched the earl of Buchan, aſſiſted by the earl of Douglas and ſeveral French noblemen, at the head of a detachment of 20,000 men, being the flower of his whole army, to relieve Ivri; but before they reached the neighbourhood of that place, the term had been for ſome days expired, and the town was in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh.

The earl of Buchan, finding it impoſſible to retake the place, led his army to Vernueil, which the inhabitants delivered up to him in ſpite of the garriſon. The duke of Bedford, anxious to make the beſt uſe of his time, immediately followed him at the head of 15,000 men; and on his arrival near the camp of the enemy, under the walls of Vernueil, he took poſſeſſion of an advantageous ſpot of ground, flanked by a hill, on which he poſted a body of two thouſand archers, and furniſhed all his infantry with ſharp ſtakes, like thoſe uſed with ſo much ſucceſs at the battle of Agincourt, to check the fury of the French cavalry. The earl of Douglas having ſurveyed the poſition of the Engliſh camp, declared that, in his opinion, the French army ſhould ſtand upon the defence, and not begin the battle, as the enemy had choſen their own ground, where they could not be attacked without great diſadvantage. This prudent advice, which was ſeconded by the conſtable, and every officer of experience in the army, appeared to Aymer, viſcount of Narbonne, a headſtrong, imprudent man, as the effect of timidity; nor did he fail to upbraid the commanders, in expreſs terms, with puſillanimity, and of diſhonouring, by their meanneſs, the arms of France. No anſwer was, however, made to his invective, which ſo highly exaſperated him, that, ſnatching up one of the ſtandards of the diviſion, he exclaimed, "Let all who love their ſovereign follow me;" and ruſhing immediately out of the line, he advanced to the charge with the moſt irregular impetuoſity. Douglas and the conſtable ſeeing the confuſion that now prevailed in their army, and finding their authority deſpiſed, determined to periſh like ſoldiers in the inevitable deſtruction which they knew muſt be the conſequence of this headſtrong raſhneſs.

The duke of Bedford had given orders for all his cavalry to diſmount, and to place their horſes in the rear of the army, forming round them a kind of barricade with the carriages of the army. The attack, though made in the utmoſt diſorder, was ſo furious, that a body of the French horſe on the right wing broke the oppoſite wing of the Engliſh, and advanced to the barricade which ſurrounded their horſes, and behind which a body of archers were placed. Theſe received them with ſuch a dreadful ſhower of arrows, as obliged them to fall back. At the ſame time the party, who were poſted on the hill, ſo galled thoſe who were marching up in another line, that they fled with great precipitation. This gave the body of reſerve an opportunity of forming themſelves, and marching to the ſupport of the main body where the fight had continued for three hours with great obſtinacy, without any perceiveable advantage; but this ſeaſonable reinforcement turned the ſcale of victory in favour of the Engliſh. The French horſe were driven back upon their foot by the arrows of the Engliſh, and a dreadful ſlaughter enſued. Douglas and the conſtable perceiving the total rout of their army inevitable, and determined not to ſurvive the diſgrace, ruſhed into the thickeſt part of the battle, and fell among a heap of foes. Beſides theſe two great generals, the headſtrong Narbonne, the ſon of the earl of Douglas, and the counts Aumale, Ventadour, and de Tonnerre, the lords Grandville, Manni, Gamaches, and Guitri, with many other perſons of diſtinction, periſhed in the action. The duke of Alencon, the marſhal de la Fayette, the lords of Goucour and Mortemar, were taken priſoners. About four thouſand French, and ſixteen hundred of the Engliſh, were ſlain on the field of battle.

The day after this victory Vernueil ſurrendered to the conquerors; and there being no longer any arm to oppoſe the Engliſh in the field, they made themſelves maſters of the ſtrong fortreſſes of Rambouill Vitry en Patrois, la Ferre Bernard, and ſeveral oth places in the neighbourhood.

But, while the affairs of the Engliſh were ſo proſperous, that it ſeemed beyond the power of hum courage to check them; and while thoſe of Charl were ſo depreſſed, that it ſeemed above the reach human policy to ſupport them, fortune, or rath

Providen

Providence, threw an incident in the way which gave the latter ſome reſpite. Jaqueline, counteſs of Hainault, animated by a violent antipathy to her huſband, the duke of Brabant, couſin-german to the duke of Burgundy, determined to diſſolve her marriage, where nothing but the ceremony had probably as yet intervened. She was a princeſs of a maſculine ſpirit, and uncommon underſtanding; and her huſband of a ſickly conſtitution, and weak intellects. She, however, knew her huſband's family would exert all their power to prevent the pope from diſſolving the marriage; and, therefore, in order to effect her purpoſe with more facility, ſhe made her eſcape to England, and put herſelf under the protection of the duke of Glouceſter, who being enamoured of her perſon and fortune, ventured to marry her without waiting for the papal diſpenſation.

Glouceſter was endowed with many noble qualities, but at the ſame time of an impetuous temper, and very paſſionate. He conſidered not the conſequences of an action he was determined to perform. Soon after his marriage, he repaired into the Low Countries, to take poſſeſſion of his wife's dominions. The duke of Burgundy exclaimed loudly againſt this conduct; and conſidering himſelf as inſulted by it, marched in perſon to the aſſiſtance of the duke of Brabant. A ſharp war was now kindled in the Low Countries. The labours of the duke of Bedford to reſtrain the impetuous temper of his brother were in vain; nor was he able to ſoften the reſentment of the duke of Burgundy. He now found it would be uſeleſs to puſh the conſequences of his victory at Vernueil, and therefore took a journey to England, where the departure of his brother had excited troubles in the adminiſtration.

This ceſſation of hoſtilities gave Charles leiſure to recover from his defeat. He laboured aſſiduouſly to gain the friendſhip of the princes of the blood, whoſe revolt had almoſt occaſioned the total ruin of the monarchy. The duke of Burgundy was diſguſted with the Engliſh, but he had not yet overcome his hatred to Charles; the murder of his father ſtill filled his breaſt with reſentment. The duke of Britany had received no ſuch injury, and therefore liſtened to the propoſals made by Charles for an accommodation; and the count of Richemont accepted of the dignity of conſtable. That great general, who was an excellent ſubject, but a bad courtier, had been diſgraced for the violence he exerciſed againſt the miniſters and favourites of Charles; but he ſoon regained, by his ſervices, the favour and friendſhip of his ſovereign.

A. D. 1426. The duke of Bedford, irritated at the defection of the duke of Britany, declared war in form againſt the Britons. The earl of Warwick immediately took the field; and laying ſiege to Pont Orſon, carried the town by aſſault. He afterwards took and fortified Beauvron, where he fixed his head quarters, and thence extended his ravages over the adjacent country, to the very gates of Rennes.

The conſtable Richemont exerted all his power to raiſe a ſufficient number of troops to put a ſtop to theſe incurſions, and was fortunate enough to ſucceed. He ſoon found himſelf at the head of twenty thouſand men, and marched immediately againſt the enemy. Warwick, whoſe whole corps did not amount to more than eight thouſand, ſhut himſelf up in Beauvron. The conſtable immediately inveſted the town, and propoſed to reduce it by famine. But Giac, prime miniſter to Charles, and who hated the conſtable, neglected to ſend him the neceſſary ſupplies of men and money, ſo that Richemont deſpaired of being able to effect his purpoſe; but, exaſperated to find himſelf baffled in his firſt attempt, he raſhly reſolved to make a general aſſault. The garriſon behaved with the utmoſt intrepidity; the beſiegers were every where beaten off; and Warwick, perceiving a great diſorder in the ranks of the enemy, ſallied out, and falling upon their rear, put them to flight with great ſlaughter.

This conqueſt, added to the diſſentions which prevailed in Charles's councils, encouraged the earl of Warwick to undertake the ſiege of Montargis, as a place of the utmoſt importance for facilitating Bedford's intention of carrying on the war beyond the Loire. He therefore inveſted the town, and ſoon reduced the garriſon to the laſt exremity. The baſtard of Orleans, afterwards the famous count de Dunois, reſolved to march to the relief of Montargis. Accordingly, he advanced at the head of no more than ſixteen hundred men, and attacked the Engliſh camp with ſo much fury, that the earl of Warwick, who knew nothing of his approach, was obliged to raiſe the ſiege.

A. D. 1427. In the beginning of this year the duke of Bedford, having ſettled his affairs in England, returned to France; and after forming a numerous army on the frontiers of Britany, fell ſo unexpectedly into that province, that nothing could reſiſt his progreſs. All the attempts of the duke of Britany were in vain; ſo that after ſeeing the greater part of his territories waſted with fire and ſword, he deſired an interview with Bedford; and a treaty was ſigned between them, by which the duke of Britany not only returned to his former engagements with the Engliſh, but alſo ſigned the treaty of Troye, acknowledging the duke of Bedford regent of France, and engaging to do homage for his duchy of Britany to the king of England.

A. D. 1428. Soon after the duke had accompliſhed this treaty, the earl of Saliſbury arrived with a ſtrong reinforcement from England, and the earl of Warwick paſſed over to that kingdom in order to take upon himſelf the education of the young king. On receiving this reinforcement, the regent reſolved on an undertaking, which if ſucceſsful, promiſed fair to open the way for the conqueſt of France. This was the ſiege of Orleans, a ſtrong city ſituated between the provinces commanded by Henry, and thoſe poſſeſſed by Charles, and opened an eaſy entrance to either.

The conduct of this ſiege was committed to the earl of Saliſbury, one of the moſt courageous and experienced generals of the age. He marched from Paris about the latter end of July, at the head of an army of 16,000 men, aſſiſted by the earl of Suffolk, the lord Talbot, Sir John Faſtolf, and other excellent officers. He immediately advanced through the country of Beauſſe, and made himſelf maſter of all the towns that lay in his route to Orleans.

As the proceedings of the Engliſh ſufficiently indicated their intentions of beſieging Orleans, every neceſſary precaution was taken for its defence. This important city was commanded by the count de Gaucourt, an officer of great courage and experience, and inviolably attached to the family of Orleans. Many other officers of diſtinction threw themſelves into the place. The troops that formed the garriſon were all veterans, and long familiar with danger. The citizens themſelves had acquired the military turn, ſo common in that age, and were therefore extremely well qualified to aſſiſt the regulars in the defence of the place. Many new fortifications were raiſed, the old ones repaired, and the greater part of the buildings in the ſuburbs pulled down, that they might not be uſed by the Engliſh in carrying on the ſiege.

The firſt attack of the Engliſh was againſt a bulwark erected to cover the caſtle of Tourelles, which defended the head of the bridge over the Loire. The artillery ſoon demoliſhed the parapets, and made a breach ſufficiently large for ſtorming it. The French, however, ſenſible of the importance of the place, defended it with ſuch courage that the Engliſh were obliged to retreat, leaving two hundred and fifty men dead in the breach. But this repulſe ſerved only to increaſe the ardour of the beſiegers; they continued battering the bulwark with ſuch fury, that it was ſoon abandoned by the French, and the Engliſh took poſſeſſion of it without any farther oppoſition. Forts were now erected both above and below the bridge, for battering the city. But ſtill the place was inveſted only on one ſide; that towards the Beauſſe was entirely open; and the baſtard of Orleans found means to throw himſelf into the city at the head of eight hundred men. It was eaſily perceived, that while the city could be ſupplied with troops and proviſions, it would be impoſſible to reduce it. The earl of Saliſbury, therefore, ordered ſixty ſmall forts or redoubts to be built at proper diſtances round the city; but while he was pointing out the proper ſpots where they ſhould be erected, a ſtone diſcharged from a cannon in the place put a period to his life. The death of this great man was an irreparable loſs to the Engliſh, and greatly damped the alacrity of the ſoldiers in the progreſs of the ſiege.

The command of the Engliſh army now devolved on the earl of Suffolk, who, aſſiſted by the famous Talbot, one of the greateſt captains of that age, puſhed the ſiege with unremitting vigour. Sallies were frequently made by the garriſon, and the moſt aſtoniſhing acts of valour were performed both by the beſiegers and the beſieged.

A. D. 1429. After more than three months had been ſpent in continual ſallies and engagements, the duke of Bedford ordered a convoy to ſet out from Paris with ſalt-fiſh, herrings, and other proviſions of a ſimilar kind, for the uſe of the beſiegers during the Lent. This convoy was eſcorted by a guard of ſeventeen hundred men, under the command of Sir John Faſtolf, an officer of approved valour and great experience. Charles, who had advanced to Chinon, a town in Touraine, about twenty leagues diſtant from Orleans, receiving intelligence of the march of this convoy, ſent the count de Clermont, at the head of three thouſand men, to attack the Engliſh in their route. The count came up with the convoy at Rouvrai St. Denis on the twelfth of February. Faſtolf, apprized of his approach, and knowing himſelf too weak to ſuſtain the impetuous ſhock of the French in the open field, drew up his men behind a barricado of his waggons, and in this poſition received the firſt ſhock of the French, which was made with their uſual fury; but they were not able to force the temporary fortification. At the ſame time they met with ſo warm a reception, that they were thrown into confuſion. Faſtolf perceiving his advantage, ſallied from his barricado, and routed the enemy with prodigious ſlaughter. In this action, generally called The Battle of the Herrings, one hundred and twenty French noblemen and perſons of diſtinction loſt their lives, beſides a great number of common ſoldiers. The count de Dunois, having received notice of the count of Clermont's march, found means to eſcape from Orleans, and advanced to ſupport him at the head of a body of veterans; but he arrived too late. He, however, ſecured his retreat; and the convoy reached the Engliſh camp, without meeting with any farther interruption.

When the French court were informed of this defeat they were greatly alarmed; and an offer was immediately made that Orleans ſhould be ſequeſtered into the hands of the duke of Burgundy. But Bedford rejected the propoſal with indignation; and obſerved, "That he was not in an humour to beat the buſhes while others ran away with the game." This ſarcaſm ſo diſguſted the duke of Burgundy, that he recalled all his troops from the ſervice of the Engliſh.

But notwithſtanding this defection, the place was every day more cloſely inveſted by the enemy. The utmoſt ſcarcity prevailed in the city; and Charles, deſpairing of ſucceſs, formed the inglorious reſolution of retiring into Dauphine. But he was prevented from carrying this deſign into execution by the remonſtrances of his queen, who inſpired his mind with ſuch different ſentiments, that he determined to conquer or periſh. At this dangerous criſis, when the reſtoration of his affairs ſeemed almoſt impoſſible, he unexpectedly received aſſiſtance from the daughter of a peaſant, who laid the foundation of one of the moſt remarkable revolutions recorded in hiſtory.

The name of this heroine was Joan d'Arc, afterwards much better known by the name of the Maid of Orleans. She was born at the village of Dom. Remi, near Vaucouleurs, on the borders of the Lorraine. At this time ſhe was about twenty years of age, of an irreproachable character, and had not hitherto been remarked for any ſingularity. She, indeed, poſſeſſed a genius ſuperior to moſt in her claſs of life, and had been wholly employed in country buſineſs. A continual recital of the calamities of France had made ſo great an impreſſion on her imagination, that loſing ſight of every other object, and abandoning herſelf to the tranſports of enthuſiaſm, ſhe fancied that ſhe heard heavenly voices, and doubted not but ſhe was called upon by the Deity to undertake the defence of the kingdom. She communicated her viſions to the governor of Vaucouleurs, who at firſt treated her with neglect; but her frequent returns prevailed upon him to ſend her to the king. She ſupported before the court the character of an inſpired perſon with an aſtoniſhing candour and firmneſs. An aſſembly of divines, and the parliament of Poictiers, who examined her on the ſubject of her miſſion, pronounced that there was ſomething ſupernatural in her. It was an object of policy to make her caſe be conſidered as miraculous; but in an age devoted to ſuperſtition, admiration and wonder, it was hardly neceſſary to employ art to effect this purpoſe. Her enthuſiaſm, therefore, joined to the extraordinary qualities ſhe poſſeſſed, could not fail of making lively impreſſions on the vulgar. She promiſed to deliver Orleans, and conduct Charles to Rheims, that he might be crowned in that city; and at the ſame time wrote a letter to the duke of Bedford, commanding him, in the name of God, to raiſe the ſiege, and evacuate France.

Every method was taken to publiſh the predictions of the Maid of Orleans, and which were believed with the moſt implicit faith. She had demanded of the king, as the inſtrument of her future victories, a particular ſword which was preſerved in the church of St. Catherine de Fierbois, and which, though ſhe had never ſeen, it was ſaid ſhe deſcribed with ſo many particular circumſtances, as plainly proved her ſupernatural knowledge. The Engliſh affected to ſpeak of her with deriſion; but were ſtruck with the opinion which every where prevailed of her heavenly miſſion. The French troops gave credit to all her predictions, and ſo prepoſſeſſed themſelves with an aſſurance of victory, that they were ready to attempt the moſt daring actions.

Every thing being prepared, it was determined to try the force of this extraordinary engine on the enemy. She was accordingly armed cap-a-pie, and mounted on a fine horſe richly capariſoned. The ſword of St. Catherine was ſent for, and delivered to her with great formality. It was reſolved to ſend this inſpired leader with a large convoy of proviſions and ammunition to the beſieged, who were by this time reduced to the laſt extremity. Joan accordingly marched at the head of twelve thouſand choſen men deſtined to eſcort the convoy, with a conſecrated banner in her hand. She was aſſiſted by the lords of Gaucourt, Ray, and St. Severe, the admiral Crevant, and other excellent officers. The garriſon of Orleans were informed of the deſign, and a great number of boats were prepared to carry the convoy over the Loire. As ſoon as the maid appeared on the ſide of Sologne, the count de Dunois made a vigorous ſally on the Engliſh on the ſide of Beaſſe, to prevent their ſending troops to the other ſide of the river, while the boats were loading with the proviſions and ammunition deſtined to the town. The Engliſh on that ſide were too weak to encounter ſo ſtrong an eſcorte; and their inaction being conſidered by the French as the effect of terror imprinted on their minds by heaven, to facilitate the enterprize of the Maid of Orleans, they fell upon them with ſuch enthuſiaſtic fury, that they were defeated, after a long reſiſtance, and the convoy paſſed into Orleans. A natural event ſerved alſo to increaſe the ſuperſtition of the French. During the time of the action, there happened a violent ſtorm of thunder, lightening, and hail. This it may eaſily be ſuppoſed, was conſidered as the voice of heaven declaring in their favour. Had the attempt miſcarried, it would, in all probability, have been interpreted in an oppoſite ſenſe.

Joan was received into Orleans as a tutelar angel, and the whole ſucceſs attributed to her: her preſence diſpelled every thought of danger. The garriſon believed themſelves invincible under her ſacred influence, and the frequent and ſucceſsful ſallies which they made, completed the conſternation of the enemy. The Engliſh were obliged to raiſe the ſiege and retire, after having ſtood it out for upwards of ſeven months.

This ſucceſs animated the deſpairing Charles, who now ſuffered his army to take the field. At the ſame time the Engliſh, by a ſtrange miſtake, after raiſing the ſiege of Orleans, inſtead of keeping their forces in a body to act powerfully againſt the enemy, diſtributed great part of them into places near the Loire, which they had ſubdued when they firſt paſſed that river. Being thus ſeparated, the French met with little reſiſtance in the places they attempted. The Maid of Orleans ſtill headed their troops; and whereever ſhe appeared, the Engliſh were ſtruck with a panic, while the French believed themſelves ſupported by an inviſible hand. Gargeau, a ſmall fortreſs, into which the earl of Suffolk had been ſo imprudent as to throw himſelf, with four hundred men only, was obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion, and the earl himſelf was taken priſoner. Meulan ſuffered the ſame fate, with many other towns and caſtles garriſoned by the Engliſh.

After the captivity of the earl of Suffolk, the command of the Engliſh army was given to lord Talbot, who found that his whole force did not exceed 6,000 men. He therefore endeavoured to avoid an engagement with the enemy, who were at leaſt double that number. But being overtaken at Patay, a battle became inevitable; and the event was what might be expected from a handful of men oppreſſed by the power of ſuperſtitious prepoſſeſſion. They were totally defeated: above two thouſand fell in the action, and about two hundred were taken priſoners; among whom were the lords Talbot, Scales, and Hungerford, Sir Thomas Rempſton, and ſeveral other very conſiderable officers.

The Maid of Orleans had now performed one part of her promiſe, the relief of that city; but the other and more difficult taſk, remained ſtill to be executed, the crowning of Charles at Rheims. Before this could be done, it was neceſſary to paſs over a large track of country occupied by the Engliſh; an enterprize that was raſh, and, perhaps, impracticable in any other conjuncture than the preſent. Charles, who had hitherto never expoſed his perſon, allowed himſelf to be carried away by the torrent of his ſucceſs, and the inſtigation of the Maid of Orleans. This interval of enthuſiaſm ſecured his victories. Without proviſions, without reſources, he marched at the head of twelve thouſand men, through the midſt of his enemies. Troye and Chalons opened their gates at his approach. The inhabitants of Rheims drove out the Engliſh garriſon, and ſent him the keys of their city, which he entered in triumph. The ceremony of his coronation was immediately performed in preſence of the Maid of Orleans, who attended with her conſecrated banner in her hand. Charles now appeared more venerable in the eyes of his ſubjects. Numbers immediately joined him; they returned from their prepoſſeſſions and errors, and conceived the utmoſt averſion to the ſhameful yoke of ſlavery they had ſo long endured.

The Maid of Orleans conſidering her commiſſion as accompliſhed, was ſolicitous to return to the place of her nativity, affirming that ſhe had now accompliſhed the deſign of her miſſion; but her influence was ſo great over the troops, that the count de Dunois prevailed on her to continue in the army till the Engliſh ſhould be intirely driven out of the country.

The duke of Bedford, during this reverſe of fortune, acted with the moſt conſummate prudence. He retained Paris in ſubjection by his vigilance and ſeverity. He alſo renewed his alliance with the duke of Burgundy; and being joined by five thouſand men, which the biſhop of Wincheſter was conducting on a cruſade againſt the Huſſites, he was once more in a condition of taking the field againſt the French, and checking their rapid ſucceſs.

When Bedford had advanced as far as Montereau, on the Yonne, he ſent a herald to Charles, offering to give him battle in any indifferent place he ſhould name, in order to put a final period to the war by a general engagement. But Charles, who had learned wiſdom in the ſchool of adverſity, refuſed to hazard his crown on the uncertain event of a battle. Bedford, therefore, returned into the Iſle of France in order, by his preſence, to prevent the towns from revolting, and to preſerve the intereſt of the French nobility, who having ſerved as volunteers at their own expence, were now heartily tired of this tedious campaign.

A. D. 1430. The Engliſh parliament having determined to ſend young Henry into France, in order to his being crowned at Paris, he embarked at Dover with a ſplendid retinue, and landed at Calais on the nineteenth of May. But the army of Charles being then in the neighbourhood of Paris, it was thought prudent to carry the young king to Rouen, till the enemy was removed farther from the capital: and in order to effect that deſign, Bedford laboured aſſiduouſly to induce the duke of Burgundy to act with more vigour than he had done ſince he recalled his troops from the ſiege of Orleans. Accordingly he ceded to him all the places the Engliſh poſſeſſed in Champagne and Brie; and the duke immediately entered France at the head of a powerful army. He reduced Troye and Soiſſons; and being joined by the earls of Suffolk and Arundel, he inveſted Compeigne. The garriſon was commanded by Flavi, a brave and experienced officer, and ſo well provided as to be able to make a long and vigorous reſiſtance.

On the firſt news of this enterprize, the Maid of Orleans, and Xaintrailles, a celebrated general, threw themſelves into the place, which gave freſh ſpirits to the garriſon. The next day Joan, at the head of a conſiderable party, made ſo deſperate a ſally upon the quarters of John of Luxemburg, the Burgundian general, that he was driven from his poſt. The fury of that enthuſiaſtic leader carried her too far. Her retreat was cut off; and, after making the moſt deſperate reſiſtance, ſhe was taken priſoner by the baſtard of Vendome, who immediately delivered her up to the Burgundian general.

The captivity of the Maid of Orleans was thought equal to a deciſive victory. Te Deum was publicly ſung at Paris, and Bedford obtained from the duke of Burgundy the cuſtody of that extraordinary woman. The garriſon of Compeigne, however, continued to make a noble defence, and a large detachment arriving from Charles's army, the Engliſh were obliged to abandon the ſiege.

While theſe things were tranſacting, young Henry continued at Rouen; but it was now determined to perform the ceremony of his coronation. He accordingly repaired to Paris, attended by the dukes of Bedford and Burgundy, and a ſplendid train of the nobility of both nations. Sunday, the ſeventeenth of December, was appointed for the ceremony, which was accordingly performed, with great magnificence, in the church of Notre Dame; where the cardinal of Wincheſter placed the crown on the head of Henry, and the nobility ſwore allegiance to him.

A. D. 1431. Notwithſtanding the conduct of the Maid of Orleans had been irreproachable, and ſhe was certainly entitled to be treated as a priſoner of war, yet it was determined to try her as a ſorcereſs and impoſtor. Religion was to be intereſted in this act of oppreſſion. The biſhop of Beauvais, in whoſe dioceſe Joan was taken priſoner, demanded that ſhe ſhould be tried before an eccleſiaſtical court, affirming her guilty of hereſy and magic. The univerſity of Paris (a body appointed for the inſtruction of mankind) weakly ſupported the abſurd requeſt of the prelate; and ſeveral clergymen of rank, among whom was the cardinal of Wincheſter, were ſelected to paſs ſentence upon her. She appeared before the court in her military apparel, but loaded with irons. During four months they haraſſed her with captious queſtions, which ſhe anſwered with wonderful art and intrepidity; ſhe was not intimidated though before a tribunal of eccleſiaſtics, whoſe perſons ſhe had been always taught to revere. She boldly avowed the deſigns ſhe had formed againſt the Engliſh; ſhe told them, with an air of confidence, that it would not be long before they were driven out of France. Being interrogated about her pretended revelations, and whether ſhe would ſubmit to the judgment of the church with regard to their being real? ſhe only anſwered, "That ſhe was certain they came from heaven, to whoſe judgment ſhe would leave the deciſion; determined not to give them up to any other authority, even though the church ſhould declare them illuſions." When aſked, Why ſhe aſſiſted with a conſecrated banner in her hand, at the coronation of Charles, "It is but juſt," ſaid ſhe, "that the perſon who had ſhared in the danger of the enterprize, ſhould alſo partake of the glory." She, however, ſoon perceived ſhe had gone too far, in refuſing to ſubmit to the deciſion of the church; ſhe appealed to the pope; declared herſelf willing to recant; and acknowledged the illuſion of thoſe revelations which the church had rejected. In conſequence of this recantation, ſhe was ſentenced to perpetual impriſonment, and to be fed on bread and water only during the remainder of her life.

Though this ſentence was certainly very ſevere, yet it was not ſufficient to ſatisfy the vengeance of Joan's enemies. Enough had indeed been done to convince both the French and the Engliſh, that the opinion of divine influence, which had ſo much encouraged the one and daunted the other, was wholly without foundation. Had they ſtopped here, their proceedings might have been vindicated upon political reaſons; but her death was determined. Suſpecting that the female dreſs, which ſhe had ſince her ſentence conſented to wear, was not agreeable to her, they purpoſely placed in her apartment a ſuit of men's apparel, and watched the effect of that temptation. The ſtratagem ſucceeded. Joan, at the ſight of a dreſs in which ſhe had acquired ſo much honour, and which ſhe once believed ſhe wore by the appointment of heaven, revived all her former enthuſiaſtic notions: ſhe ventured in her ſolitude to clothe herſelf again in the forbidden garment. Her inſidious enemies caught her in that ſituation: her fault was interpreted to be nothing leſs than a relapſe into hereſy: no recantation would now ſuffice, and no pardon could now be granted her. She was delivered over to the civil magiſtrate, on pretence of hereſy and magic, who immediately ſentenced her to death, and ſhe was burnt alive in a ſlow fire, in the market-place of Rouen.— Such was the end of the famous Maid of Orleans, whoſe actions had ſtruck the Engliſh with terror, and had ſaved her country from impending deſtruction.

A. D. 1432. Young Henry had, ſoon after his coronation at Paris, retired to Rouen, where he ſtill continued; but thinking it moſt adviſeable to return to England, he accordingly embarked, and arrived ſafe at Dover about the middle of February; from whence he proceeded to London, and was received by his Engliſh ſubjects with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy.

A. D. 1433. The Engliſh had flattered themſelves that by the death of the Maid of Orleans, they ſhould be able to recover the advantages they had loſt through her means: but they were ſtill unfortunate; and their affairs grew every day worſe and worſe. In this alarming criſis an event happened which gave a fatal blow to their future hopes and expectations. The dutcheſs of Bedford, ſiſter to the duke of Burgundy, paid the debt of nature, and was buried in the church of the Celeſtines at Paris. This unfortunate event diſſolved the connection that had hitherto ſubſiſted between the two dukes; and the marriage of Bedford, about four months after her death, with Jaqueline of Luxemburg, occaſioned a breach between them that was never after repaired.

A. D. 1434. Philip, duke of Burgundy, now ſhewed himſelf no leſs inveterate againſt Bedford than he had hitherto appeared in friendſhip with him. He had for ſome time ſeen his error, and began to repent of the wounds he had given to his country, and of the injury he had done to himſelf, by placing its crown upon the head of a foreigner. Time, reflection, and the public calamities, made an impreſſion upon his heart, which was naturally diſpoſed to generoſity, and weakened that ardent deſire of revenge, which had armed him againſt his ſovereign. Charles diſavowed the aſſaſſination of the duke's father; offered all the ſatisfaction and atonement that could be deſired of him, and baniſhed Tannegui du Chatel, the murderer of that prince, from his court. This proof of his deſire to remove every difficulty which might oppoſe a reconciliation had the deſired effect: a congreſs was appointed at Arras, under the mediation of the pope and the council of Baſle. The French offered to cede Normandy and Guienne to the Engliſh, but on condition of doing homage to Charles, conformable to the antient cuſtom. This offer was rejected with diſdain, and the Engliſh plenipotentiaries departed immediately from the congreſs. Nothing now remained but to diſcuſs the pretenſions of Charles and Philip; and this was ſoon performed, becauſe the vaſſal was in a capacity of giving law to his ſovereign. It was ſtipulated that Philip ſhould receive reparations and acknowledgements for the murder of his father; that Charles ſhould cede to him all the towns of Picardy ſituated between the Somme and the Low Countries, tries, and ſeveral other territories, which, as well as thoſe in poſſeſſion of Philip, ſhould be held, during his life, without doing any homage, or ſwearing any fealty to the preſent king. At the ſame time Charles releaſed his ſubjects from all obligations to allegiance if he ever infringed this treaty. So diſhonourable were the conditions, by which France purchaſed the friendſhip of the duke of Burgundy.

A. D. 1436. In the beginning of this year, the duke of Bedford paid the debt of nature at Rouen. He was juſtly eſteemed one of the greateſt perſons of the age; and it is difficult to ſay whether he ſhone moſt in the field or the cabinet, whether he was a greater general or politician, and whether he was moſt eſteemed for his valour, his equity, or his moderation.

The death of the duke of Bedford greatly encreaſed the misfortunes of the Engliſh in France, and gave Charles every advantage he could wiſh for extending his conqueſts; and ſuch parties were formed in the Engliſh council, that it was ſeven months before the commiſſion of the duke of York, who was appointed regent of France, paſſed the ſeals. The French monarch wiſely improved every moment, and made a rapid progreſs in eſtabliſhing his authority, which he had nearly effected when the duke of York arrived. The capital had been ſome time reduced, ſo that the territories of the Engliſh now chiefly conſiſted of Guienne and Normandy.

A. D. 1437. This year the duke of Burgundy attempted to reduce Calais with an army of fifty thouſand men, and made himſelf maſter of ſeveral ſmall caſtles in the neighbourhood of that city. The Flemings, who were then much more famous for manufacture than war, vainly imagined that the appearance of their numerous army would be ſufficient to intimidate the garriſon, and the gates would be opened at their approach. They were deceived. The garriſon, inſtead of being intimidated, dreadfully haraſſed their camp, with ſucceſsful ſallies. In the mean time the duke of Glouceſter, at the head of fifteen thouſand men, landed at Calais, and ſent a herald to the duke of Burgundy, offering him battle. Philip accepted his challenge: but his Flemings had ſo ſeverely felt the effects of the valour of the Engliſh, that they could not be prevailed upon to meet them in the open field; they quitted their camp, and made a precipitate retreat. Philip, fearing that the garriſon of Calais might take advantage of this confuſion in his army, drew up his regular troops to ſecure his retreat, and retired in good order to Gravelines, leaving behind him all his baggage and artillery.

The duke of Glouceſter, determining to revenge the inſult of the duke of Burgundy, led his army into Artois, and after laying the whole country waſte with fire and ſword, returned to Calais loaded with plunder. Nor was this all the loſs the duke of Burgundy ſuſtained; he was hardly returned to his own dominions before he had the mortification to ſee the maritime parts of his poſſeſſions in Flanders, ravaged by an Engliſh fleet; while he himſelf was in the utmoſt danger of loſing his life in a ſedition at Bruges.

A. D. 1438. During the courſe of this and the two following years, the hoſtilities in France were carried on by both parties in a very languid manner. Deſtitute of reſources, of induſtry and of commerce, the two nations were drained by the expences of war; and their troops were obliged to ſubſiſt by plundering and oppreſſing the country both of friends and enemies. Terms of peace were often propoſed, and as often rejected: both inſiſted on ſuch as could not be granted. At the ſame time both the Engliſh and French courts were filled with factions. The duke of Glouceſter and the cardinal of Wincheſter, continually oppoſed each other, and the intereſt of the nation was ſacrificed to their perpetual enmities. The dauphin of France headed a faction againſt his father. He was of a reſtleſs and ambitious diſpoſition, and found means to bring over to his intereſt the dukes of Alencon and Bourbon, with the counts of Vendome and Dunois. Charles perceived his danger, and was very deſirous of procuring the releaſe of the duke of Orleans, who had continued a priſoner in England ever ſince the battle of Agincourt, as the only perſon whoſe merit and rank could balance the credit of the dauphin's party. After a tedious negotiation, which was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the duke of Glouceſter, it was determined to ſet him at liberty on his paying a ranſom of thirty-ſix thouſand pounds of our preſent money, an immenſe ſum in thoſe days, and nearly equal to two thirds of all the extraordinary ſupplies granted by the parliament to ſupport the war, during an interval of ſeven years. The duke of Burgundy diſplayed a noble inſtance of generoſity on this occaſion; he renounced his antient reſentments, and paid the ranſom of a prince who had been long his enemy.

A. D. 1441. The great enmity that ſubſiſted between the duke of Glouceſter and the cardinal of Wincheſter occaſioned diviſions in the Engliſh council, and was productive of moſt unhappy conſequences. Nothing leſs than the deſtruction of the former could ſatisfy the malice and ambition of the latter. Wincheſter, however, was unable to attack Glouceſter in perſon, and therefore formed the moſt inhuman plot, infamous by its agents, and deteſtable by its motives. He cauſed his ducheſs to be accuſed of witchcraft; and it was pretended that a waxen image of the king was found in her poſſeſſion, which ſhe and her aſſociates, Sir Roger Bolingbroke, a prieſt, and one Margaret Jordan, of Eye, melted before a ſlow fire, with an intention of making Henry's force and vigour waſte away by the like inſenſible degrees. The accuſation was well calculated to affect the weak and credulous mind of the king, and to gain belief in an ignorant age. The ducheſs was accordingly brought to trial with her confederates. The nature of the crime, ſo oppoſite to all common ſenſe, ſeemed ſufficient to exempt the witneſſes from obſerving common ſenſe in their evidence. But this was of no conſequence in a court, where it was determined to find the priſoner guilty. The ducheſs was condemned to do public penance and ſuffer perpetual impriſonment in Cheſter caſtle. Theſe violent proceedings, however, produced not the intended effect. Glouceſter, who was loyal to a degree of madneſs, bore his wrongs with the utmoſt reſignation, and the diſgrace of his wife, inſtead of incurring him the contempt of the people, tended only the more to inflame their reſentment towards his enemies.

A. D. 1444. Both France and England were now equally weary of a tedious and expenſive war, which had ſo long raged without interruption. The princes and grandees of France groaned under the fatigues and loſſes they had ſuſtained, and the kingdom was ſo depopulated, that it could no longer furniſh men for the ſervice. The dukes of Orleans and Burgundy were continually ſoliciting the king to attend to terms of accommodation, and the French nation in general anxiouſly wiſhed for the final concluſion of a calamitous war.

The Engliſh were no leſs deſirous of peace than the French; and the earl of Suffolk was commiſſioned to treat with them on that head. Conferences were accordingly opened, but the parties diſagreeing concerning the terms, the ſole reſult was a truce for two years.

The earl of Suffolk, having executed this part of his commiſſion, proceeded to finiſh another point of no leſs importance. At the inſtigation of Wincheſter and his party he propoſed a match between the king his maſter and Margaret of Anjou, daughter of Reguier the nominal king of Sicily; a lady endowed with all the qualifications that could render her an agreeable conſort for a prince of Henry's character.

Though this propoſal was equally agreeable to France, Charles managed the treaty ſo artfully, that Suffolk, inſtead of demanding a dower with Margaret, promiſed, in the name of his maſter, that the province of Maine, then in the hands of the Engliſh, ſhould be ceded to her uncle, Charles of Anjou.

The duke of Glouceſter was no ſooner informed of theſe proceedings, than he exerted his utmoſt efforts in order to defeat the intended match, but in ſpite of all his oppoſition the contract was ratified in London: Suffolk was dignified with the title of Marquis, and even received the thanks of the parliament for concluding the treaty of marriage.

A. D. 1445. The nuptials were ſolemnized at Tours, in preſence of Charles and all his court, with great magnificence. On the 18th of April Margaret arrived in England, and was re-married in the priory of Southwark, from whence ſhe proceeded to London, and on the 13th of May was crowned at Weſtminſter.

Margaret had been but a ſhort time in England before ſhe ſufficiently indicated her intentions of being miſtreſs of her huſband's conduct as well as his affections. The oppoſition made by the duke of Glouceſter to her marriage had filled her mind with envy, and induced her to enter into a cloſe correſpondence with the cardinal and the marquis of Suffolk, who, ſtrengthened by her friendſhip, and animated by their common hatred againſt the duke of Glouceſter, reſolved to effect the ruin of that patriotic nobleman. He was accordingly ſtripped of all his preferments, and even entirely removed from the council board. But this unjuſtifiable method of proceeding raiſed ſuch commotions in the nation, that the authors of this diſgrace thought it abſolutely neceſſary for their own ſafety, to colour over their baſe proceedings with a ſhew of juſtice.

Accordingly, in the begining of the following year, 1446, they declared their intentions of impeaching the duke before the parliament; but he was too great a favourite with the citizens of London, for them to attempt the execution of their baſe deſigns in the capital. The members were ſummoned to meet at St. Edmunſbury, and the duke cited to appear. Conſcious of his own innocence, the duke determined to attend, and accordingly was preſent at the opening of the parliament on the tenth of February. But the very next day he was arreſted, and put under a ſtrong guard. The people were highly exaſperated at this method of proceeding, but, perſuaded that the duke, on his trial, would ſufficiently exculpate himſelf from every charge that could be exhibited againſt him, no tumult was excited in his favour.

But Glouceſter's enemies did not intend to bring him to a fair and open trial. The lords who were to ſit as his judges took no pains to conceal their ſentiments with regard to his innocence; they even threw out ſeveral intimations of their being determined to do ſtrict juſtice upon his accuſers, provided they were unable to prove the charge againſt him. This ſufficiently intimidated the faction, and the duke was ſoon after found dead in his bed. It was, indeed, pretended, that his death was natural; and his body was accordingly expoſed to public view, without exhibiting any marks of external injury; but no one doubted his having fallen a ſacrifice to the vengeance of his enemies.

Thus fell, by the treacherous hand of malice, Humphrey of Woodſtock, duke of Glouceſter, the moſt learned perſon of his age. He founded at Oxford one of the firſt public libraries in England, and was a generous patron to men of ſcience, and able artiſts of every profeſſion. His hearſe was watered by the tears of the people. His enemies ſaw the grief of the people with terror, and thought it abſolutely neceſſary to give ſome colour to their proceedings. Several of the duke's domeſtics were accordingly tried, and received ſentence of death; but they were no ſooner ſuſpended, than they were cut down, and received their pardon.

A. D. 1447. The perfidious cardinal of Wincheſter did not, however, long triumph over the fall of Glouceſter. He died about ſix weeks after him, in all the horrors of a guilty conſcience. Happy would he now have thought himſelf, had he applied his mind more aſſiduouſly to provide for his paſſage into eternity, and not have embrued his hands in the blood of the innocent. By the death of the cardinal, the queen and her favourite, Suffolk, were deprived of the great ſupport they derived from his experience, his birth, his riches, and his order; and left expoſed to all the effects of the unpopular meaſures they afterwards purſued. The miniſter did not, however, immediately feel the reſentment of an injured people. He, for ſome time, enjoyed his power; and the next ſeſſions of parliament he was created duke of Suffolk.

A. D. 1448. While theſe domeſtic troubles were raging in England, the French king employed his time in proſecuting ſuch meaſures as might be moſt conducive to the happineſs of his people, and the welfare of his kingdom. That nation was now in a condition to act with vigour in recovering thoſe dominions which were ſtill in the hands of the Engliſh; and an accident ſoon happened which gave Charles an opportunity of re-commencing hoſtilities.

The duke of Glouceſter's death ſeemed to offer a fair opportunity for ceding the province of Maine to Charles of Anjou, purſuant to the marriage contract. But the Engliſh miniſtry ſtill endeavoured to poſtpone the ceſſion, as they well knew it muſt be attended with a popular clamour, which might probably ſhake their authority. At length, however, orders were ſent to Sir Francis Surienne, governor of Mans, the capital of the country, to deliver that city into the hands of Charles of Anjou. Surienne, who was a native of Arragon, and had ſerved the Engliſh above twenty years, diſputed the authenticity of the order, and abſolutely refuſed to deliver up the place. The count de Dunois was therefore ſent, at the head of a numerous body of troops, and a large train of artillery, to reduce it by force. Surienne made a noble defence, but was at laſt obliged to capitulate; by which the garriſon, conſiſting of two thouſand five hundred men, were ſuffered to march out, with all their effects. They retired into Normandy; but being refuſed admittance into any of the fortified towns, and falling into great diſtreſs, Surienne led his troops into Britany, ſurprized the town of Fougeres, repaired the fortifications of Pont Orſon and Beuvron, and procured ſubſiſtence by extending his depredations over the whole province.

On advice of this breach of the truce, in which Britany had been included, the French monarch demanded ſatisfaction from the duke of Somerſet, governor of Normandy. Somerſet replied, that he was greatly concerned for theſe indefenſible actions; but that the whole had been executed without his privity and conſent, nor had he any authority over the troops that had committed the ravages of which he complained. Application was now made to the court of England, who diſavowed the inſult, and redreſs was promiſed for the injuries received. But the court of France, deſirous of rendering an accommodation impracticable, eſtimated the damages at no leſs than one million ſix hundred thouſand crowns.

A. D. 1449. The truce expiring in the month of June, Charles determined to avail himſelf of his preſent ſuperiority over the Engliſh. He therefore declared war againſt Henry, and his conqueſts were ſo rapid that he ſoon annexed Normandy to his dominions. The brave Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, indeed, ſupported his reputation and glory to the laſt. But the province was invaded in four different places, and he had only a handful of forces under his command; ſo that nothing could be expected from that gallant officer, eſpecially as the greater part of the garriſons conſiſted of Normans, who opened their gates to the enemy almoſt at the firſt ſummons. The province of Guienne ſuffered the ſame fate; and after having for three centuries formed a part of the dominions of the crown of England, was now re-united to thoſe of France.

The loſs of Normandy and Guienne, however, were but trifling misfortunes to thoſe which threatened the Engliſh. The ſword of civil war was ready to be drawn, in order to drench the fields with the blood of their owners. The duke of York, firſt prince of the blood, was deſcended, by his mother, from the houſe of Mortimer, which enjoyed an inconteſtible title to the crown of England, after the demiſe of Richard II. when the rights of ſovereignty were uſurped by the houſe of Lancaſter. His perſonal merit was great, and he had contracted ſeveral powerful alliances. He had married the daughter of Nevil, earl of Weſtmorland, whoſe family was more important than any other in the kingdom. The earl of Warwick was one of that family, a nobleman extremely popular, and ſo amazingly rich, that 30,000 perſons were conſtantly ſupplied at his tables in his different manors and caſtles. His hoſpitality and munificence rendered his authority over his numerous partiſans almoſt abſolute. The duke of York, who had commanded with great applauſe in France, had lately been deprived of his commiſſion, without any reaſon being aſſigned for ſo imprudent an exertion of power. On his return to England, ſome dark hints, with regard to the pretenſions of his family to the crown, were dropped by his partiſans, and had the deſired effect. His virtues and the great ſervice he had performed for his country, obtained him the univerſal reſpect of the people.

The increaſing popularity of the duke of York greatly alarmed the queen and Suffolk; and a commotion having lately happened in Ireland, it was thought proper to inveſt him with the title of lord-lieutenant, and ſend him into that iſland, as the only perſon capable of reſtoring tranquillity. York well knew the true reaſon for his being ſent out of the kingdom, but made no difficulty of accepting the commiſſion. His mild and gentle behaviour ſoon produced the deſired effect; and he not only appeaſed the inſurgents without bloodſhed, but even attached to his intereſt the people of that kingdom.

A. D. 1450. Complaints and invectives now prevailed throughout the kingdom againſt the duke of Suffolk. The people, ever ſince the death of Glouceſter, had deſerted him as an aſſaſſin of that patriotic nobleman. He was hated by the great as prime miniſter, and the declared favourite of the queen; and as the poverty of the crown obliged him to have recourſe to arbitrary meaſures, it was impoſſible for him to eſcape the machinations and reſentment of ſo formidable a faction.

The popular clamours aroſe to an amazing height; and Adam Moleyns, biſhop of Chicheſter, was murdered in a tumult excited by a patriotic leader of the multitude. In the agonies of death, the biſhop charged Suffolk with being a traitor to his country.

This charge increaſed the public diſcontent, and the Houſe of Commons determined to impeach him. Accordingly they accuſed the duke of high-treaſon. They aſcribed to him the loſs of the Engliſh dominions on the continent; and even inſiſted, that he had entered into a deſign to dethrone the king. The violence of faction had, however, carried the Commons too far; their accuſation could not bear examination; it was ſupported by no evidence. A new charge of miſdemeanors was therefore drawn up againſt him, chiefly regarding the perverſions of authority, and, in all probability, founded entirely upon facts. Henry was now alarmed for his miniſter. He perceived that the Commons were determined to carry on the proſecution with the utmoſt vigour, and feared the upper houſe would declare him guilty. He therefore ſent for all the lords ſpiritual and temporal, to his apartment, produced Suffolk before them, and aſked him what he could ſay in his own defence. He denied the charge, but ſubmitted himſelf to the pleaſure of the king, who baniſhed him the realm for five years, during which he was prohibited from reſiding in France, or any other country belonging to the French dominions.

The lords, however, were far from being ſatisfied with this ſentence. They returned, in a very ill humour, to their houſe, and entered a ſtrong proteſt againſt theſe proceedings. They declared, “That the ſentence pronounced on the duke of Suffolk was not the reſult of their advice, but purely the king's own act, which ſhould not at all infringe their privileges; and that if Suffolk had inſiſted on his right, and not ſubmitted voluntarily to the king's pleaſure, he was intitled to a trial by his peers.”

Suffolk, ſo far from repining at his ſentence, rather conſidered it as the only expedient that could ſave him from the fury of the people, and therefore prepared, with great alacrity, for his departure; flattering himſelf, that as he ſtill enjoyed the queen's favour and confidence, he ſhould be recalled. But his enemies were determined that his life ſhould pay the forfeit of his crimes. They accordingly employed a captain of a ſhip to cruiſe off Dover, and intercept him in his paſſage to the continent. The captain, who had imbibed the common prejudices, performed his duty with great exactneſs. The duke was ſeized near Dover, his head ſtruck off on the ſide of a long-boat, and his body thrown into the ſea. The latter was afterwards taken up and interred in the collegiate church of Wingfield in Suffolk.

The duke of Somerſet ſucceeded the late miniſter in all his power and credit with the queen; and as he was the perſon who commanded on the continent when the French provinces were loſt, the public, who always judge by the event, ſoon made him the object of their animoſity and hatred. Somerſet was now in the ſame dangerous ſituation experienced by Suffolk; and the parliament was no ſooner broke up, than various commotions were excited in different parts of the kingdom. They were, indeed, ſoon quelled; but they ſufficiently indicated the diſpoſition of the people, and proved a prelude to an inſurrection of a more alarming nature, and which, for ſome time, threatened the nation with very dangerous conſequences.

It had been ſtrongly reported that the court intended ſending an army to lay waſte the whole county of Kent, in revenge for the duke of Suffolk's murder committed by one of that county; in conſequence of which the inhabitants (who were ſtrong advocates for the duke of York) were in ſuch an univerſal ferment, that every thing ſeemed ripe for a revolt.

At this time there dwelt, or rather ſkulked about, in thoſe parts, a deſperate fellow called John, or (more commonly) Jack Cade, a native of Ireland, who having been outlawed for a rape and murder committed in Suſſex, had taken ſanctuary, and was forced to abjure the kingdom. He, however, ſoon after returned into Kent, and obſerving the diſcontents of the people, determined to turn them to his own advantage. He took upon himſelf the name of John Mortimer, pretending that he was the ſon of Sir John Mortimer, who had been beheaded in the beginning of the preſent reign, and conſequently a near relation of Richard duke of York, the perſon from whom the people hoped for redreſs of all their grievances. The very mention of that popular name was ſufficient to procure him multitudes of followers, and Cade ſoon found himſelf at the head of twenty thouſand men. The arch rebel perceiving that vaſt numbers daily flocked to his ſtandard, advanced to Blackheath, giving out that he was going to reform the government, and eaſe the people of that load of taxes, by which they had been ſo long oppreſſed.

As ſoon as the court received intelligence of this inſurrection, they ſent a meſſage to the inſurgents, demanding the reaſon for their appearance in arms. Cade replied, that they had no deſign to offer the leaſt violence to the perſon of the king; they only deſired to preſent a petition to the parliament, that the miniſters who oppreſſed the people might be removed from the royal preſence. At the ſame time, he delivered to the deputies two papers, enumerating the grievances of the nation. Among other particulars, they prayed that the duke of Somerſet might be puniſhed, as the principal author of the loſs of Normandy; that the king's counſel might be filled with the princes of the blood, and other prudent and judicious perſons; and not with vicious and profligate men of bad principles and corrupt morals, from whom the people could neither expect happineſs or tranquillity.

Theſe remonſtrances were, however, ſo far from producing the intended effect, that the miniſtry, thinking themſelves highly inſulted, determined to have recourſe to violent methods for quelling the rebellion. An army of fifteen thouſand diſciplined forces under the command of Sir Humphrey Stafford, was ſent againſt the inſurgents. Cade artfully affected to be terrified at the general's approach, and retired with the main body of the rebels to Sevenoak, but left a ſtrong detachment in ambuſcade to intercept Stafford in his march. The royal army followed without obſerving the neceſſary cautions, and were ſo furiouſly attacked by Cade's concealed forces, that great numbers of them were cut to pieces, and the reſt ſought their ſafety in a precipitate flight, leaving their commander lifeleſs on the field.

Cade, animated by this ſucceſs, returned to Blackheath, and again ſent a remonſtrance to the king and council, demanding, "That the dukes of York, Exeter, Buckingham, and Norfolk, ſhould be recalled to court; that the murderers of the duke of Glouceſter, together with all thoſe who had contributed to the loſs of the Engliſh territories on the continent ſhould be brought to condign puniſhment."

The government, alarmed at the late defeat of their forces, and knowing that the ſecret friends of the duke of York were on the point of declaring themſelves, reſolved, if poſſible, to purchaſe their ſafety by ſacrificing ſome individuals to the fury of the populace. The lords Say and Cromer, who had rendered themſelves very popular, were committed to the Tower; and the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the duke of Buckingham were ſent to treat with the inſurgents.

Cade received them with the utmoſt complaiſance, but told them he was abſolutely determined not to lay down his arms till the king came in perſon and granted their requeſts. The effect of this conference was reported to the council; and the king, perſuaded he had every thing to fear from the fury of the inſurgents, ſet out with his whole court for Kenelworth-caſtle.

In the mean time Cade marched to London, the citizens of which, alarmed at the ſucceſs of the rebels, immediately opened their gates, and Cade entered in triumph, at the head of his forces. He had even the inſolence to ſtrike his ſword againſt London-ſtone, crying out, "Now is Mortimer lord of London." He however, maintained, for ſome time, great order and diſcipline among his followers. He always led them out at the approach of night into the fields, where they continued till the morning, when they again returned into the city. But being reſolved, in order to gratify their malevolence againſt Say and Cromer, to put thoſe miniſters to death, he could no longer reſtrain their riotous diſpoſitions. They plundered the houſes of the more opulent citizens, and committed ſo many diſorders, that the inhabitants perceived there was a neceſſity for joining the regular troops, in order to prevent the deſtruction with which they were threatened. Accordingly, when Cade marched out of the city in the evening, they ſeized the gates, and put the detachments that guarded them to death.

In the morning, when Cade and his followers returned, they found the gate of the bridge ſhut and barricadoed againſt them. They attempted, however, to force a paſſage. A battle enſued, and the conteſt continued till night, without either party gaining any remarkable advantage. The rebels were greatly diſpirited at not being able to open themſelves a paſſage into the city; and the miniſtry took advantage of their timidity. They drew up a general pardon for the inſurgents, provided they would lay down their arms; and another for Cade in particular, on condition of his abandoning his rebellious projects. Theſe pardons were iſſued under the great ſeal, and prudently publiſhed during the night in the camp of the inſurgents. The effect was aſtoniſhing. The morning no ſooner appeared than Cade found himſelf deſerted by the greater part of his followers, and retreated to Rocheſter, where the reſt diſperſed, notwithſtanding all his remonſtrances and artful ſpeeches, by which he endeavoured to perſuade them, that the pardon they had received was of no effect, as it had not received the ſanction of the parliament. Perceiving that all his arts were exerted in vain, he fled into the woods of Suſſex, with a few of his friends who were determined to ſhare his fate. A price was now ſet upon his head by the government, and he was ſlain by one Iden, a gentleman of Suſſex, who ſent his head to London; and for which he was rewarded with the government of Rocheſter caſtle.

A. D. 1451. The duke of York was ſtrongly ſuſpected of having excited this inſurrection, in order to make a trial of the ſentiments of the people. He was ſtill in Ireland, where his ſucceſs had entitled him to the public eſteem and confidence; but he now haſtened to return to England, perſuaded that his perſonal ſecurity depended upon the vigour of his meaſures. Though Cade's enterprize had failed, the duke received ſeveral advantages from that inſurrection. The numbers who eſpouſed their cauſe evidently demonſtrated that the people were ripe for joining in any attempt againſt the miniſtry, and that the houſe of Marche was ſtill remembered with regard.

A ſhort time after the duke landed in England, he wrote a very ſubmiſſive letter to the king, in which he pointed out the grievances of the nation, and offered his beſt ſervices to reform the abuſes that had crept into the government. The miniſtry perceived the duke's real intention; but their preſent ſituation obliged them to act cautiouſly; and it was reſolved to return a civil anſwer. Accordingly the king, in a letter to the duke, told him, "That he had for ſome time been ſenſible of the neceſſity of reforming ing the government, and intended to nominate a council for that purpoſe, and for conſtituting the duke of York as their preſident." It was imagined by the miniſtry that this remarkable condeſcenſion of the king would deprive the duke of York of all pretenſions for taking up arms; but in this they were miſtaken; the offers were declared unſatisfactory by the duke's friends, and it was determined to proceed in their ſcheme early in the enſuing ſpring.

Accordingly, in the month of March, 1452, the duke of York, who had been ſome time in Wales, having joined his friends, entered England at the head of a very formidable army. No acts of hoſtility, however, were committed; they marched peaceably forward, and publiſhed a manifeſto, declaring that their ſole intent was to promote the good of the nation; to releaſe the oppreſſed ſubject from a burden he was unable to bear; and to bring a corrupt adminiſtration to juſtice.

Theſe plauſible reaſons produced the deſired effect. The people, who groaned under enormous taxes, gladly joined the duke's ſtandard; he ſoon ſaw himſelf at the head of ten thouſand men, and directed his march towards London, expecting to have met with no oppoſition from the royal army: but he was miſtaken; the queen and Somerſet had exerted all their power to raiſe a number of forces ſufficient to meet the duke in the open field, and their attempts were ſucceſsful. The king marched from London againſt him; but before the two armies met, York being informed of his danger changed his route, and, by forced marches, reached the capital, before Henry knew that he intended to evade a battle. But the duke ſoon perceived that he had placed too much confidence in the promiſes of the Londoners; for inſtead of receiving him with open arms, they ſhut their gates againſt him.

As ſoon as Henry received intelligence that the duke had paſſed him, he returned with the utmoſt expedition towards the capital; while the duke of York croſſed the Thames at Kingſton, and being joined by Thomas Courtney, earl of Devon, and the lord Cobham, he encamped on Bremheath near Dartford. The king followed him cloſe, and, marching over London-bridge, encamped on Black-heath. The duke of Somerſet, who attended the king on this occaſion, and ſeems to have been an able politician, adviſed Henry to cruſh this rebellion in its bud, and not wait till it had gathered ſtrength, and become formidable. He obſerved, that this was the time to attack the inſurgents, who might be defeated with eaſe, and the nation freed from all future attempts of this kind, as the great ſuperiority of the royal army almoſt inſured a victory. But Henry was ſo impolitic as to neglect this prudent counſel. He liſtened to the advice of ſome timorous, perhaps treacherous noblemen, and had recourſe to negotiation. This counſel was indeed better adapted to the pacific genius of Henry, and to that averſion he always entertained to ſpilling the blood of his ſubjects. Certain prelates and noblemen were ſent to know the reaſons for the duke's appearing in arms, and upon what terms he was willing to reſtore the tranquillity of the kingdom.

The duke, with the greateſt appearance of reſpect and moderation, told the meſſengers, that the proſperity of his country was his ſole intention; that he deſired nothing more than to reform the government, by bringing to juſtice the duke of Somerſet, and others of the counſel, who had trampled on the laws of the kingdom, and oppreſſed the people. He added that he was willing to diſband his forces, and throw himſelf at Henry's feet, if the perſons he had mentioned were ſeized, and brought to anſwer the charge he was ready to exhibit againſt them in parliament.

Henry made no difficulty of complying; Somerſet was put under arreſt, and the duke of York, by this condeſcenſion, deprived of all excuſes for keeping up a body of forces. He ſaw his error, but determined to keep his word. Accordingly he diſmiſſed his army, and repaired to court without arms, and without a paſſport. When he came into the royal preſence, he openly avowed the cauſe of his taking up arms, and inſiſted that the duke of Somerſet ſhould be immediately brought to trial; when, to his great aſtoniſhment, that miniſter came from a private cloſet in the preſence-chamber, and bitterly reviled him for his treaſonable practices.

The enraged Somerſet inſiſted on putting the duke of York to death immediately; but the more diſpaſſionate members of the council, fearful of carrying matters to ſuch extremities, would not conſent to any violence being offered to his perſon. Any attempt of that kind would, indeed, in all probability, have been attended with very diſagreeable conſequences to the government. The duke was accordingly diſmiſſed, after making a formal ſubmiſſion to the king, and acknowledging, upon oath, his title to the crown of England.

In the beginning of the year 1453, deputies arrived from Gaſcony, offering to renounce the dominion of France, and return to their former allegiance under Henry. In conſequence of this the earl of Shrewſbury was immediately diſpatched to the continent with a body of 8000 men, in order to aſſiſt the Gaſcons in throwing off the French yoke. He was admitted into Bourdeaux without oppoſition, and ſoon reduced Fronſac, Caſtillon, and ſome other places. But after he had made a conſiderable progreſs in ſubduing the province, he was attacked by a ſuperior force, and himſelf, together with his gallant ſon the lord l'Iſle, were ſlain in the action. The towns which Shrewſbury had reduced were inſtantly recovered by the French arms; Bourdeaux was again obliged to ſubmit to its former maſter, and all hopes of re-annexing Gaſcony to the crown of England were for ever extinguiſhed.

The bad ſucceſs of this enterprize, together with the birth of a ſon to Henry, which happened on the 23d of October, ſerved, once more, to kindle the flame of civil diſcord, and increaſe the activity and zeal of the partiſans of the houſe of York. But it was thought neceſſary to conceal their intentions under the maſk of ſubmiſſion, as the candour of his late conduct in diſbanding his forces, and the oath he had taken to the king, had lulled the court into a perfect ſecurity.

The king had for ſome time been afflicted with a dangerous diſeaſe, which had occaſioned the meeting of parliament to be poſtponed ſeveral times. The friends of the duke of York were determined not to loſe ſo favourable an opportunity of procuring that nobleman his ſeat in the council, from which he had been unjuſtly excluded. They accordingly inſinuated to the queen and Somerſet, that when the preſent diſpoſitions of the people were conſidered, there was little reaſon to expect that the parliament would be very ready to comply with their deſires; on the contrary, it was ſufficiently apparent, that, conformable to the wiſhes of the nation, that aſſembly would appoint a new miniſtry. They added, that the only ſure method of preventing that misfortune would be to admit into the council, the duke of York, the earls of Warwick and Saliſbury, and ſome other popular noblemen, in order to convince the public that they had no intention of making their own wills the ſole rule of government. This advice appeared plauſible to the queen and her favourite, who ſo dreaded the effects of a parliamentary cenſure, that they readily embraced the propoſal, and theſe noblemen took their ſeats at the council-board before the time appointed for the parliament to aſſemble.

A. D. 1454. No ſooner had the Yorkiſts gained admittance into the council, than their credit ſuperceded that of their adverſaries. The proceedings of government were changed; they renewed the proſecution againſt Somerſet, and even ventured to meet him in the queen's preſence, and to ſend him priſoner to the Tower.

The council was now entirely governed by the duke of York, and the king ſtill continuing in a ſtate incapable of holding the reins of government, it was thought neceſſary to appoint the duke of York lieutenant of the kingdom; with powers to hold the enſuing ſeſſion of parliament in the king's name; and ſoon after the title of lieutenant was changed into that of Protector.

York, however, enjoyed this plenitude of power but a ſhort time. The king recovered from his indiſpoſition, and the duke's commiſſion was ſuperſeded. Somerſet was releaſed from his confinement, reſtored to his former power in the adminiſtration, and, in conjunction with the queen, directed all the affairs of government.

The duke of York had now every thing to fear, and after concerting meaſures proper to be purſued in this alarming conjuncture, retired into Wales in order to raiſe a body of forces. He well knew that the proceedings of the council in releaſing Somerſet, without bringing him before the parliament, would be conſidered as a ſufficient reaſon for renewing his pretences to reform the government. He was not deceived. The popular clamour againſt the miniſter was ſoon as loud as before; and the people flocked from all parts to his ſtandard, ſo that he ſoon found himſelf at the head of a very conſiderable army.

York, now thinking himſelf ſufficiently powerful to reſiſt any force the king could bring into the field againſt him, marched directly to London, hoping to ſurprize Henry in the capital. But he was deceived in his expectations. The king, at his approach, marched out to meet the inſurgents, though his army conſiſted of no more than two thouſand men. Richard, without advancing any pretenſions to the crown, demanded only a reformation of government. This requeſt was denied, and a battle was fought at St. Alban's between the two parties, in which the Yorkiſts were victorious. The duke of Somerſet, the earls of Northumberland and Stafford, the lord Clifford, with many knights and gentlemen of eminence, and above 800 common ſoldiers were killed on the ſpot. The king himſelf fell into the hands of the duke of York, who treated him with the greateſt reſpect and tenderneſs.

A. D. 1455. The parliament, which met ſoon after the battle of St. Alban's, granted to the Yorkiſts a general indemnity, and reſtored the protectorſhip to the duke; but at the ſame time they renewed their oaths of fealty to Henry. The queen did not behold the ſucceſs of the duke of York with idle reſignation. Henry Beaufort, duke of Somerſet, the ſon of him who fell at St. Alban's, glowed with impatience to revenge the death of his father. Humphrey Stafford, duke of Buckingham, was equally enflamed in a deſire of vengeance for the loſs of his ſon, who periſhed in the ſame conteſt; and all the princes and nobles, allied or attached to the houſe of Lancaſter, determined to exert their utmoſt endeavours to pluck the duke of York from the ſeat of power.

Richard, regardleſs of this oppoſition, lived in ſuch apparent ſecurity as aſtoniſhed his enemies. Perſuaded that an attempt to wreſt the ſceptre from a family who had held it near ſixty years, would be attended with the utmoſt difficulty, and, perhaps, prove abortive, after deluging the kingdom with the blood of its inhabitants; he reſolved to wait for ſome favourable opportunity for aſſerting his rights, and ſeizing the crown to which he had an indiſputable title. His great care was to acquire the love of the people, without which he knew all his efforts muſt be ineffectual. Deſirous of convincing them that his conduct was not influenced by paſſion or intereſt, he paid the utmoſt attention to the affairs of the royal family: he eſtabliſhed the houſhold of the prince of Wales, and ſettled on him a decent maintenance; and, at the ſame time, left the king and queen at liberty to act as they thought proper. He was perſuaded it was not in their power to diveſt him of the dignity of protector, becauſe his patent could not be revoked without the conſent of parliament. But the queen was of too active and enterprizing a ſpirit to be diverted from her purpoſe by ſuch obſtacles.

A. D. 1456. The king having recovered his health, the enemies of the duke, with the queen at their head, reſolved to ſeize this opportunity to deprive him of his protectorſhip. The parliament met on the 12th of February, when Henry came to the houſe, and declared from the throne, that, as he was now in a condition to reſume the reins of government, he did not think the kingdom had any farther occaſion for a protector; he therefore deſired the parliament would diſcharge the duke of York from that office. No oppoſition was made to the king's declaration: he was declared to be reinſtated in his ſovereign authority; and Richard's patent was revoked.

A. D. 1457. Had Margaret been ſatisfied with this ſucceſs, ſhe might, perhaps, have enjoyed her authority for ſome time without diſturbance; but, elated with this favourable turn of fortune, ſhe reſolved to ſecure her future tranquillity by arreſting the perſons of York, Saliſbury and Warwick. To effect this dangerous undertaking with more ſecurity, the court removed to Coventry; and letters, under the privy-ſeal, were diſpatched to thoſe three noblemen, commanding them to attend the king on affairs of importance. They made no ſcruple to obey the order; but when they were within a few miles of Coventry, they received intelligence from their friends, that deſigns were formed againſt their liberties and lives. They immediately ſeparated themſelves. Richard withdrew to his caſtle of Wigmore, in Herefordſhire; Saliſbury to Middleham, in Yorkſhire; and Warwick to his government of Calais, which had been conferred on him after the battle of St. Alban's.

This treacherous attempt deſtroyed all remains of confidence; and an unuſual degree of animoſity took place between the partiſans of the houſes of York and Lancaſter. But ſtill the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and other perſons of peaceable diſpoſitions, hoped it was not yet too late to interpoſe their good offices for bringing about a reconciliation between the two parties, and prevent the dreadful conſequences of a civil war, which otherwiſe appeared inevitable. For ſome time, all offers were rejected; but at laſt their labours ſeemed to promiſe a happy termination of theſe alarming diſſentions; and it was agreed that the principal leaders of both parties ſhould meet at London, in order, if poſſible, to effect a permanent reconciliation.

A. D. 1458. The parties on each ſides aſſembled about the middle of January; but their appearance rather reſembled the meeting of two numerous armies, than that of the chief nobility of the ſame kingdom. The earl of Saliſbury came with a body of 500 men; and the duke of York with 400, both of whom took up their quarters near each other for mutual ſecurity. The ſame precaution was obſerved by the chiefs of the other party; and the mayor of London, at the head of five thouſand men, patrolled the ſtreets, to keep the peace between them. At length an apparent reconciliation was effected; but the terms upon which it was founded took not away the ground of difference. This agreement was, however, notified to the public by a ſolemn a ſolemn proceſſion to St. Paul's cathedral, where the duke of York led queen Margaret, and a chief of one party walked hand in hand with a chief of the oppoſite; exhibiting every appearance of a cordial reconciliation and undiſguiſed confidence. But, unfortunately for the peace of the nation, there was very little ſincerity on either ſide. Inſtead of labouring ſincerely in the great ends of union; inſtead of taking their places at the council-board, to which they were now entitled, the confederated lords ſuddenly retired to the places where their intereſt was moſt conſiderable; the duke of York to the borders of Wales; the earl of Saliſbury to the north; and the earl of Warwick to his government of Calais.

A. D. 1459. When parties are exaſperated againſt each other, the ſmalleſt accident, without any formed deſign, is ſufficient to blow the ſmothered embers into a flame; and had the intentions of the leaders been ever ſo amicable, they would have found it very difficult to reſtrain the animoſity of their followers. This was too ſoon evinced. The earl of Warwick having returned to London to juſtify his conduct with regard to ſome ſhips he had taken in the channel, a fray happened between one of his ſervants and a domeſtic belonging to the queen; in which the latter, who was the aggreſſor, was deſperately wounded. The companions of each party took ſhare in the quarrel; the ſtreets of London were filled with blood and confuſion; the attorney-general was killed in the commotion, and the earl himſelf narrowly eſcaped.

Both parties now openly made preparations for deciding the conteſt by the ſword. Armies were raiſed in different parts of the kingdom; and it was expected, that when the reſpective forces of each party were joined, the diſpute would be determined by a general engagement. The earl of Saliſbury, having raiſed a number of troops, was marching to join the duke of York; but was overtaken on Bloreheath, on the borders of Staffordſhire, by lord Audley, at the head of a much ſuperior body of forces. The river Stow, a ſmall ſtream, but of conſiderable depth, ran between the two armies, and its banks were lined with lord Audley's troops. Saliſbury well knew that his forces were not able to engage thoſe of the enemy in the open field, and had recourſe to ſtratagem. He ordered a detachment of his beſt archers to advance briſkly to the banks of the river, and pour a ſhower of arrows upon the royaliſts; which being effected, he ſounded a retreat, and his forces retired with the appearance of precipitate confuſion. This produced the deſired effect. The royaliſts were deceived; and thinking the Yorkiſts were flying before them, began to paſs the ſtream with great precipitation; but when part of the royal army had paſſed the brook, Saliſbury ſuddenly turned upon them; and partly by ſurpriſe, and partly by the diviſion of the enemy's forces, totally routed them. The reſt of the army being ſeized with a panic, fled in the utmoſt diſorder, and Saliſbury obtained a complete victory. Lord Audley himſelf, and ſeveral of his principal officers, fell in the action.

The duke of York, encouraged by this ſucceſs, joined the earl of Saliſbury at Ludlow, and openly declared his pretenſions to the crown. He was ſoon after joined by the earl of Warwick, who had brought with him a conſiderable body of veterans from Calais; ſo that York was now in a very formidable ſituation.

The queen and all the nobility in the intereſt of the houſe of Lancaſter, were ſenſibly convinced of the neceſſity of exerting their whole power to prevent the Yorkiſts from wreſting the ſceptre from Henry's hand; and an army, ſuperior in numbers to that of the inſurgents, was ſoon ready to take the field. The Yorkiſts were encamped near Ludlow; and the royaliſts advanced immediately to Worceſter, where they halted. Henry, in order to prevent the effuſion of human blood, ſent Richard Beauchamp, biſhop of Saliſbury, with an offer of pardon to the rebels, if they would lay down their arms. But his propoſals were refuſed, and both parties prepared to decide their quarrel by the ſword.

On the evening, however, preceding the intended engagement, a circumſtance happened, which greatly prejudiced the duke of York's intereſt. The Calais veterans, who had hitherto imagined they were going to reſcue the king from the hands of a wicked miniſtry, perceived their miſtake. They found that the conteſt was to wreſt the ſceptre from the hand of Henry, whom they conſidered as their lawful ſovereign, and therefore deſerted to the royal army. This defection ſo intimidated the Yorkiſts, that they ſeparated the next day, without making the leaſt diſpoſition for a battle. The duke of York fled to Ireland; and the earls of Marche, Saliſbury, and Warwick, into Devonſhire, where Sir John Denham provided them with ſhips, which carried them over to Calais.

The parliament meeting ſoon after at Coventry, an act of attainder was paſſed againſt the duke of York, the earls of Saliſbury and Warwick, and their principal adherents; who were all declared traitors, their eſtates forfeited, and their heirs diſinherited.

A. D. 1460, All hopes of accomodation were now at an end, and little elſe was to be expected than war and deſolation. The earl of Warwick, who was greatly beloved both by the ſoldiers and ſeamen, was very ſucceſsful in his cruiſes; and having received invitations from his partiſans, he landed in Kent, with the earls of Saliſbury and Marche, at the head of fifteen hundred men. He was ſoon joined by the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the Lord Cobham, and marched directly to London, amidſt the acclamations of the people. The city gates were immediately thrown open; and his troops continually increaſing, he ſoon found himſelf in a condition of facing the royal army, which haſtened from Coventry to attack him. The two armies met at Northampton, and a furious battle enſued. For ſome time the victory continued doubtful; but the lord Grey of Ruthin, who commanded the van-guard of the royal forces, deſerting to the enemy in the heat of the engagement, the whole army was filled with conſternation, and Warwick obtained a complete victory. The duke of Buckingham, the earl of Shrewſbury, the lords Egremont and Beaumont, Sir William Lucy, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, were among the ſlain. Henry himſelf, that empty ſhadow of a king, was again taken priſoner, but uſed with great tenderneſs and reſpect, the innocence and ſimplicity of his manners having procured him the higheſt regard of the people.

The king was conducted to London; and ſoon after his arrival a parliament was ſummoned to meet at Weſtminſter the beginning of October. The duke of York arrived from Ireland three days after the opening of the ſeſſion. He repaired immediately to the Houſe of Lords, and advanced towards the throne; but was ſtopped by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who aſked him if he had yet paid his reſpects to the king? York was confounded at this queſtion, and for ſome time continued ſilent; but at laſt replied, That he knew of no perſon to whom he owed that title. This ſudden declaration alarmed the aſſembly; and Richard, ſtanding near the throne, complained to the houſe of the various calamities his family had ſuffered ſince the depoſition of Richard II. enumerated the cruelties by which the houſe of Lancaſter had paved their way to the ſeat of power; inſiſted on the miſeries which had attended the government of Henry, and exhorted them to do juſtice to the lineal ſucceſſor.

This regard to law and liberty was very unuſual in times of violence and licentious tumult. The aſſembly were ſtruck with ſo uncommon a precedent, and examined, with the utmoſt calmneſs and tranquillity, the duke's pretenſions. At laſt they pronounced a deciſion, calculated, as far as poſſible, to pleaſe both parties. They declared, that the duke's title was indefeaſible; but as Henry had now enjoyed the crown thirty-eight years without any oppoſition being made to his title, they determined that he ſhould continue to poſſeſs both the title and dignity during his life; but that the adminiſtration of the government ſhould, in the mean time, remain with Richard, who ſhould be acknowledged the true and lawful heir of the monarchy, and ſucceed to the crown immediately on the deceaſe of Henry: that every one ſhould ſwear to maintain his ſucceſſion: that it ſhould be high treaſon to attempt his life; and that all former acts for ſettling the ſucceſſion of the crown, during the two laſt reigns, ſhould be null and void.

The whole legiſlative body aſſented to this act; and the accommodation was celebrated by a ſolemn proceſſion to St. Paul's, at which Henry and both houſes of parliament aſſiſted. The king himſelf appeared not to be the leaſt affected with this ſudden revolution in his affairs. Satisfied with the preſent tranquillity he was permitted to enjoy, he devoted his time to exerciſes of devotion, and committed entirely the care of the adminiſtration to thoſe who acted under the ſanction of his name and authority.

The ſentiments of queen Margaret, however, were very different to thoſe of the king. She was a woman whom no dangers could intimidate, and who was capable of the utmoſt efforts of heroiſm. She had taken refuge in Scotland with the dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, and was now exerting all her talents to bring the northern counties of England over to her intereſt. The duke of York was ſoon appriſed of the impending ſtorm, and trembled for the conſequences. A ſummons was ſent her to repair immediately to London, in order to put a ſtop to her enterprizes, or of procuring a pretence of baniſhing her from the kingdom. No regard was paid to the mandate; but advice was ſoon received that ſhe was advancing towards the capital at the head of twenty thouſand men. Richard had only five thouſand, but marched at the head of this little army to ſtop the progreſs of the queen; while his ſon, the earl of Marche, repaired to the borders of Wales, in order to raiſe a more conſiderable body of forces, and join his father.

The queen determined not to loſe the opportunity of attacking Richard before his army was increaſed by the additional forces of his ſon. She therefore quickened her march; and the duke of York conſcious of his being unable to meet, in the open field, an army ſo ſuperior in numbers, threw himſelf into Sandal caſtle, in the neighbourhood of Wakefield. Margaret advanced to the gates of the fortreſs, and uſed every method in her power to provoke the duke to a battle. For ſome time all her arts were vain; but at laſt ſhe effected by ſtratagem what could not be done by any other method. She marched, at the head of the main body of her army, towards the capital, leaving only a ſmall detachment in the neighbourhood of the caſtle. But during the night, ſhe ſeparated her army into two diviſions, and placed them in ambuſh on the ſides of Wakefield-green. On the queen's departure, York drew out his forces, and determined to give the enemy battle; but he had hardly drawn them up in proper order, before he was attacked, both in flank and rear, by the two bodies placed in ambuſh for that purpoſe. He now perceived his error, but it was too late to retrieve it, and he reſolved to ſell his life as dear as poſſible. His courage was changed into deſpair. He attacked the enemy with the utmoſt fury; and his followers catching the enthuſiaſtic valour of their leader, purſued his track of ſlaughter in a firm, compacted body. The conteſt did not laſt above half an hour, but that ſhort interval of time was crowded with deſtruction. Above two thouſand eight hundred of the duke's army were cut in pieces, and he himſelf fell in the action. His ſon, the duke of Rutland, a youth of ſeventeen, whoſe exterior figure, as well as other accompliſhments, are repreſented by hiſtorians as extremely amiable, was murdered in cold blood by lord Clifford. The earl of Saliſbury was wounded and taken priſoner, and immediately beheaded, with ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, by martial law, at Pomfret. The body of the duke of York being found among the ſlain, his head was cut off by lord Clifford, and ſent to Margaret, who cauſed it to be fixed on the walls of York, encircled with a paper crown, in deriſion of his pretenſions to the throne.

Thus periſhed, in the fiftieth year of his age, Richard Plantaganet, duke of York, a prince endowed with many great and amiable qualities, and who ſurely merited a better fate. He loſt his life by adhering to principles which render him an object of our eſteem. Had he followed the ferocious practice of the times, and founded his throne on the blood of his enemies, he might, in all probability, have enjoyed the Engliſh ſceptre, notwithſtanding all the efforts of the houſe of Lancaſter. He left behind him three ſons, Edward, George, and Richard; and three daughters, Anne, Elizabeth, and Margaret.

A. D. 1461. But the triumph of Margaret's bloody ſucceſs was of no long continuance. After the above defeat ſhe ſeparated her army into two diviſions; ſending one of them, under the command of Jaſper Tudor, earl of Pembroke, againſt Edward, now duke of York, who was raiſing forces on the borders of Wales; while ſhe herſelf marched with the other diviſion towards the capital, where the earl of Warwick was left to command the Yorkiſts. As ſoon as Edward had finiſhed his levies, he began his march towards London, in order to join the earl of Warwick, and retaliate on Margaret the cruelty his friends had ſuffered. He was met by the earl of Pembroke at Mortimer's Croſs, in Herefordſhire, where a battle enſued; but Pembroke's army being far inferior to that of Edward, they were ſoon routed, and above four thouſand men fell in the action. He himſelf eſcaped by flight; but his father, Sir Edward Tudor, was taken priſoner, and, with ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, put to death.

In the mean time, the queen, with her ſon the prince of Wales, the dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, and ſeveral other of the nobility and gentry well affected to her cauſe, were on their march towards London, at the head of a very conſiderable army. The earl of Warwick, appriſed of her approach, advanced as far as St. Alban's to meet her; and a battle enſued upon Barnard-heath. For ſome time, the Yorkiſts had the advantage; but lord Lovelace, who commanded a conſiderable diviſion of the army, treacherouſly withdrawing from the combat, victory declared for Margaret. About two thouſand five hundred Yorkiſts were ſlain in the conteſt, and the perſon of the king himſelf fell again into the hands of his own party. Lord Bonneville and Sir Thomas Kiriel, to whoſe care the king had been entruſted, continued with him after the defeat of the army, relying on the royal promiſe of protection. But Margaret, regardleſs of her huſband's promiſe, ordered them both to be beheaded.

pital, and was ſoon after joined by the earl of Warwick, at the head of the remainder of his forces. Margaret, who thought it imprudent to remain in the neighbourhood of London, retired into the north, where ſhe hoped to encreaſe her army to ſo formidable a number as would enſure ſucceſs againſt all oppoſition. Edward, therefore, continued his march, and was received by the citizens as their guardian angel. He was, indeed, formed to attract the love of the people. His external figure was beautiful beyond deſcription; his conſtitution active and hardy; his judgement quick and penetrating; and his abilities as a ſoldier ſurpaſſed by none of his age. More reſolute than his father, and more certain of the attachment of the people, whom he had entirely gained over by his popular manners, he determined to aſſume the title and dignity of king; perſuaded that all the miſfortunes of his family were owing to their timidity in not ſupporting their claim to the crown with the neceſſary firmneſs and intrepidity.

But Edward well knew that before this could be done with any propriety, it was neceſſary to procure a national acknowledgement of his title to the crown, or at leaſt ſomething that might be conſidered as ſuch. Time would not permit the aſſembly of a parliament, which might alſo be attended with other inconveniences; a leſs regular method therefore was choſen. The army was ordered to aſſemble in the fields near Clerkenwell, whither an infinite crowd of people reſorted. In the midſt of this multitude, an harangue was pronounced, diſplaying the title of Edward, and inveighing againſt the uſurpation and tyranny of the Lancaſter family. After which, the people were aſked, whether they were ſtill deſirous that Henry of Lancaſter ſhould continue to hold the ſceptre of England? The whole multitude exclaimed againſt the propoſal. It was then demanded, whether they would accept of Edward, duke of York, for their king? The anſwer was a loud and general exclamation of applauſe. The experiment having thus far happily ſucceeded, a great council was called at Baynard's-caſtle, where the popular election was confirmed, and the new king was proclaimed on the fifth of March, in the ſtreets of London and Weſtminſter, by the name of Edward IV.

Thus ended the reign of Henry VI. which had laſted upwards of thirty-eight years, without his having intermeddled in all that time with the adminiſtration of public affairs. He was in the fortieth year of his age, when he was diſpoſſeſſed of a crown, which he had worn almoſt from his birth. He ſtill lived, however, to be the ſport of fortune, as will appear in the courſe of the following reign, where we ſhall again ſee him veſted with the regal power.

Henry VI. was poſſeſſed of many virtues: he was compaſſionate, devout and religious; but theſe qualities fitted him rather for a cloiſter than a throne. His intellects were weak and narrow, and his temper unſteady and irreſolute; ſo that he was eaſily drawn into every cruel or oppreſſive meaſure that the paſſion of his wife, or the views of his miniſters ſuggeſted: and yet ſo free was he from cruelty in his diſpoſition, that he could not, without extreme reluctance, conſent to the puniſhment of thoſe malefactors who were ſacrificed to the public ſafety, and would ſuffer the groſſeſt inſult offered to his own perſon without the leaſt mark of reſentment. He was ſo inoffenſive in the whole of his conduct, that the biſhop, who had been his confeſſor for ten years, avowed, that in all that time he had not committed any crime deſerving of penance. It is little, therefore, to be wondered at that a prince of ſuch a diſpoſition ſhould be unable to govern a ferocious people. Had the times been leſs violent, and the laws more reſpected, he might probably have ſwayed the Engliſh ſcepter with applauſe. His virtues, indeed, rendered his perſon reſpectable; but they were not ſufficient to ſupport him againſt the powerful attacks of inſatiable ambition.

Henry had iſſue, by his queen Margaret of Anjou, only one ſon, Edward, prince of Wales, who, at the time of his father's depoſition, was but in the eighth year of his age.

The remarkable occurrences that happened during this king's reign were as follow:

In the fifth year of his reign, on the 30th of September, a dreadful earthquake happened between two and three o'clock in the morning, which was attended with dreadful claps of thunder and flaſhes of lightning.

In his thirteenth year, a violent froſt began on the 24th of November, which continued till the 10th of February following. This froſt was ſo very ſevere that the Thames was frozen over as far down as Graveſend; by which means all goods brought thither in ſhips were conveyed to London by carriages.

In his ſixteenth year, on the 25th of November, there happened a moſt violent hurricane of wind, which blew off the leads of the Grey Friars church, and almoſt beat down the ſide of the ſtreet called the Old Exchange.

In his ſeventeenth year there was ſo great a dearth, that in ſome parts of the nation the diſtreſſes of the people were ſuch that they made bread of fern-roots and ivy-berries.

In the courſe of this reign Queen Margaret began Queen's College, Cambridge, which was afterwards completed by Edward IV. Archbiſhop Kemp erected the divinity ſchool in Oxford as it now ſtands, together with St. Paul's Croſs. William Eſtfield, mayor of London, built at his own charge the water-conduit in Fleet-ſtreet; and John Wells, while he filled the ſame poſt, laid the conduit, commonly called the Standard in Cheap. In the year 1446, Sir Simon Eyre, mayor of London, built Leadenhall, and allotted it as a common granery for the city. And in 1453 Sir John Norman, while he enjoyed the ſame office, went by water to Weſtminſter, to take his oath: he was the firſt mayor that ever went in that manner, all his predeceſſors having rode on horſeback.—Harriſon's Survey of London.

The moſt remarkable learned men that flouriſhed from the acceſſion of Henry IV. to the depoſition of Henry VI. were as follow:

John Seguard was a very fine latin poet, and poſſeſſed a variety of polite learning. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf about the year 1414. His great patron was Richard Courtney, the martial biſhop of Norwich.

Richard Snettiſham acquired ſuch great reputation at Oxford, that, though not more than twenty-five years of age, he was elected chancellor of that univerſity. He was reckoned one of the beſt diſputants of the age, and was indefatigable in his endeavours to expound the holy ſcriptures in the public ſchools.

William Lyndwood was one of the greateſt canoniſts this nation ever produced, and a moſt conſummate ſtateſman. He was keeper of the privy ſeal to Henry V. and employed by him in many important negotiations, particularly to the courts of Spain and Portugal. He was ſent by Henry VI. to the council of Baſil; and in the year 1434 he was made biſhop of St. David's, but died in 1446. His great work, and indeed the only one of the kind we have compoſed by an Engliſhman, is his "Provinciale ſeu Conſtitutiones Angliæ;" in which the provincial decrees of forty archbiſhops are digeſted into order, with large and learned commentaries.

The principal hiſtorian that graced this period was Sir John Froiſſart, who wrote a general hiſtory of France, Spain, &c. but chiefly of England. He was a Frenchman born, but was brought up from his youth in the court of Edward III. and familiarly converſant in that of Richard II. He wrote in his own tongue, which was then the court language of England. An edition of his works in Engliſh was publiſhed by Sir John Bourchier, at the command of Henry VIII.

SECTION I.

EDWARD IV.

EDWARD IV. was not quite twenty years of age when he mounted the throne of England. The beauty of his perſon greatly tended to enhance his intereſt with the people. In his diſpoſition he was intrepid and prudent, and in conſtitution active and hardy; but the ſeverity of his temper rendered him impregnable to the tender feelings of compaſſion.

The very commencement of his reign was attended with a circumſtance, which evinced an arbitrary turn of mind, and ſhewed what the nation might expect in future. One Walker, a grocer in the city, whoſe ſhop was known by the ſign of the Crown, having told his ſon in a jocular manner, that he would make him "heir to the crown," the expreſſion was conſtrued as a ſarcaſm on Edward's title; and the particulars being related to the king, he ordered the innocent, but unfortunate man, to be beheaded in Smithfield, which was accordingly done on the eighth day after his elevation to the throne.

Though Edward had aſſumed the title and authority of king, yet he was far from being eſtabliſhed in the quiet and undiſturbed poſſeſſion of the crown. The three laſt reigns had given the family of Lancaſter many opportunities of obliging ſome of the firſt nobility in the kingdom: the perſon of Henry was beloved, while, with more than female genius, his queen Margaret availed herſelf of every favourable circumſtance, and rouſed the people to remember the glories of the two laſt Henrys, and the unſullied virtues of the preſent. Could the affairs of the houſe of Lancaſter have been retrieved, her ſpirit and conduct would have done it. In beauty ſhe exceeded her own ſex; in courage ſhe equalled the braveſt of the other; but her greateſt excellence conſiſted in being always a ſtranger to deſpair. Defeat after defeat ſerved only to renew her endeavours to make a freſh attempt; and her conduct was as prudent as her ſpirit was manly. The lords of her party were all firmly attached to her intereſt; the principal of them were deſcended from the houſe of Lancaſter, and the others were ſuch as acted either through principle, gratitude, or intereſt.

Edward now found he had a powerful adverſary to encounter in the perſon of Margaret, who exerted all her abilities to recruit her army, and engage the uſurper of her huſband's throne. She had already rendered herſelf exceeding popular in the northern counties, and ſoon found herſelf at the head of 60,000 diſciplined forces.

In the mean time the people, divided in their affections, took oppoſite ſymbols of party: the friends of the houſe of Lancaſter choſe the red roſe as their mark of diſtinction; and thoſe of the houſe of York were denominated from the white. Hence the civil wars that followed were known throughout Europe by the name of the Quarrel between the two Roſes.

Margaret had now marched with her army into Yorkſhire, at which Edward was ſo alarmed, that he immediately ſet out, at the head of 40,000 veteran ſoldiers, to check her progreſs. He was accompanied by the earl of Warwick, and continued his march with the utmoſt expedition till he reached Pontefract in Yorkſhire. From hence they diſpatched a body of troops under the command of lord Fitzwalter to ſecure the paſſage of Ferry-bridge over the river Aire, which lay between them and the enemy. Fitzwalter accordingly took poſt at the place aſſigned him, which was on the north ſide of the river. This ſurprizal of Ferry-bridge diſconcerted the queen's army, which was commanded by the duke of Somerſet, the earl of Northumberland, and the lord Clifford, all of them famous for their military abilities, and unſhaken friends to the Lancaſter family. Theſe generals immediately determined, if poſſible, to recover the advantageous ſpot poſſeſſed by the enemy. Accordingly, the lord Clifford marched, during the night at the head of a party, and attacked Fitzwalter's detachment ſo unexpectedly, that they recovered the paſs, after putting moſt of the party that defended it to the ſword; and Fitzwalter himſelf was ſlain in the action.

This defeat might have proved fatal to Edward, had it not been for the courage and preſence of mind of the earl of Warwick. He was ſenſible that a battle was now inevitable; he knew the diſproportion of numbers; and that Edward had nothing to depend upon but the fidelity and reſolution of his troops. He rode up to the king to acquaint him of his dangerous ſituation, and then diſmounting, in ſight of the whole army, he drew his ſword, and ſtabbed his horſe; after which, kiſſing the hilt of the weapon, he ſwore that he would ſhare the fate of the meaneſt ſoldier, and either conquer or periſh. At the ſame time, a proclamation was iſſued, by which every perſon who pleaſed was at full liberty to retire; but the whole army declared they would gain the victory, or fall with their leaders.

Animated by this reſolution, lord Fauconbridge undertook to recover the paſs in poſſeſſion of lord Clifford. Accordingly he paſſed the Aire at Cailleford, three miles above the place; and marched with ſuch ſecrecy and expedition, that Clifford was ſurpriſed, his detachment routed, and he himſelf found among the ſlain.

The next day (March 24, 1461) Edward led his troops againſt the enemy; and the two armies met at a place a place called Touton, where a bloody battle enſued. While the Yorkiſts were advancing to the charge, there happened a heavy fall of ſnow, which being driven by a briſk wind in the faces of the Lancaſtrians, prevented them from knowing, with any degree of exactneſs, the diſtance of the enemy. Lord Fauconbridge, who led the van of Edward's army, improved this advantage. He ordered his men to advance as near as poſſible; and after diſcharging a flight of arrows on the enemy, to retire with the utmoſt expedition to their former poſt. This ſtratagem produced the deſired effect. The Lancaſtrians perceiving, by the force of the arrows, that the enemy was very near, emptied their quivers by repeated diſcharges, without producing any great effect; and then advanced, ſword in hand, to decide the dreadful conteſt. The Yorkiſts, who had kept their arrows, poured in ſo dreadful a diſcharge, that the advanced line fell back on the main body. The earl of Northumberland perceiving the diſadvantage of his forces, preſſed forward, and the battle ſoon became very obſtinate and bloody. The dreadful conteſt continued ten hours with unremitting fury, and without any perceivable advantage on either ſide. The field was covered with dead, and the groans of the wounded augmented the horrors of the battle; but, at the cloſe of he day the Lancaſtrians began to give ground, and retreat in good order towards Tadcaſter bridge.

The Yorkiſts, animated with the appearance of the victory, redoubled their efforts, and attacked the enemy with ſo much fury, that they were unable to ſupport the charge. Their ranks, which they had hitherto maintained with ſurpriſing firmneſs, were broken, and a precipitate flight enſued. Edward had ſſued orders to give no quarter, ſo that the carnage was ſhocking to humanity. Above thirty-ſix thouſand perſons periſhed that day by the ſwords of their countrymen. Among theſe were the earl of Weſtmoreland, and his brother Sir John Nevil, the earl of Northumberland and the lords Dacres and Welles, and Sir Andrew Trollop. The earl of Devonſhire, who had lately eſpouſed the cauſe of Henry, was taken priſoner, and ſoon after beheaded at York. Henry, his queen, and the young prince, eſcaped into Scotland; but the inteſtine diviſions which then prevailed n that kingdom prevented their receiving any effecual aſſiſtance.

Edward, having taken all neceſſary meaſures for preventing farther inſurrections in the northern parts of England, returned to London, and was crowned at Weſtminſter on the 29th of June. After this he ſummoned a parliament, which met at Weſtminſter on the fourth of November. No oppoſition was made to Edward's title to the crown; hey even declared that he was properly poſeſſed of the throne from the moment he aſſumed e government, tendered to him by the acclamations f the people. They reverſed ſeveral acts paſſed in e late reigns, particularly the attainders of the earls f Cambridge, Saliſbury, and Glouceſter, and that of rd Lumley. They alſo paſſed an act of forfeiture d attainder againſt Henry, queen Margaret, their fant ſon prince Edward, and their principal parſans.

A. D. 1462. This year commenced with a ſcene proſcription and bloodſhed, the fatal effects of alous ſovereignty. Edward, not contented with e dreadful ſacrifice that had been already made to ſafety, thought it neceſſary that others, though they d never appeared in arms againſt him, ſhould feel e weight of his power. John de Vere, earl of xford, a nobleman venerable for his years, and vaable for his virtues, together with his ſon Aubrey Vere, were tried by martial law, for a pretended rreſpondence with Margaret, and beheaded on Tower-hill. Sir Thomas Tudenham, Sir William Tyrrel, Sir Baldwin Fulford, and John Montgomery ſuffered the ſame fate; and Edward diſtributed their eſtates among his own adherents.

During theſe tranſactions, Margaret was ſoliciting the court of France for aſſiſtance to replace Henry in the ſeat of power. Lewis XI. who had lately ſucceded his father, was ſufficiently inclined to feed the flames of civil diſcord among ſuch dangerous neighbours, by aſſiſtance to the weaker party: but having formed the project of humbling his own nobility, he was not in a capacity of furniſhing Margaret with a ſufficient number of troops to effect the intended purpoſe. He, however, ſent a ſmall body of forces, under the command of Varenne, ſeneſchal of Normandy, who landed in Northumberland, and made himſelf maſter of Alnwick-caſtle.

As little could be expected from this handful of men, Margaret went over to France, in order to ſolicit, in perſon, a more powerful aſſiſtance. She even offered to deliver up Calais, on condition of receiving an army ſufficient to drive Edward from the throne. The duke of Britany ſupplied her with 12000 crowns, and Lewis with 2000 men at arms.

With this reinforcement Margaret landed at Bamburgh in Yorkſhire, and found means to take poſſeſſion of that caſtle; but on receiving advice that Edward was advancing againſt her, at the head of a numerous army, ſhe retired into Scotland. Edward ſoon reduced the caſtles of Bamburgh and Alnwick; and finding no enemy in the field to oppoſe him, he returned to London.

A. D. 1463. While Margaret was in Scotland, ſhe exerted herſelf with ſuch ſucceſs, that ſhe raiſed a numerous army, who followed her ſtandard chiefly for the ſake of plunder. She entered Northumberland about the latter end of April, and for ſome time was extremely fortunate. She ſurpriſed the caſtle of Bamburgh; and being joined by the duke of Somerſet and Sir Ralph Piercy, with their followers, ſhe took a conſiderable number of places in that part of the country.

The firſt check ſhe met with was from Montague, who routed a detachment of her forces on Hedgley Moor, where Sir Ralph Piercy, their leader, was ſlain. Elated with this ſucceſs, Montague determined to give battle to Margaret's army, without ſtaying for the reinforcements he expected from Edward, who was marching to the northward at the head of a powerful army. Montague accordingly advanced againſt the queen's forces, encamped on a plain near Hexham. He made a furious attack during the night, and was received with equal intrepidity. But after ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts, he forced the trenches, and put the Lancaſtrians to flight. The duke of Somerſet, the lords Hungerford, Roſe, and Moleyns, Sir Thomas Huſſey, Sir Thomas Wentforth, and Sir John Findcarn, were taken priſoners, and their heads ſtruck off by martial law.

Henry being well mounted, made his eſcape, and fled into Lancaſhire, where he continued concealed for ſome time; but was at length diſcovered, and committed priſoner to the Tower.

Margaret, with her infant ſon, fled into an adjacent foreſt, where the ſplendor of her attire ſoon betrayed her into the hands of robbers, who ſtripped her of her rings and jewls. Fortunately for her the richneſs of the booty occaſioned a quarrel among them; and while they were thus engaged, Margaret and her ſon made their eſcape into the thickeſt part of the foreſt, where they wandered for ſome time, ſpent with hunger and fatigue, and oppreſſed with terror and affliction. In this wretched condition the queen perceived another robber approaching with a naked ſword in his hand. There was now no poſſibility of effecting an eſcape, and ſhe trembled for the life of her ſon. But happily recollecting, that he might poſſibly be one of thoſe perſons, who had been unfortunately proſcribed for adhering to the intereſt of her huſband, ſhe approached the robber with an air of majeſtic confidence, and preſenting to him the young prince, called out, “ Here my friend, I commit to your care the ſafety of the king's ſon.” Struck with awe at the name of his prince, and penetrated with compaſſion at beholding perſons of the higheſt rank reduced to ſuch melancholy diſtreſs, the robber, who was not wholly loſt to humanity and virtue, vowed to devote himſelf to her ſafety and protection. He accordingly conducted her out of the foreſt to a village by the ſea-ſide, whence ſhe ſoon after eſcaped to the continent.

The captivity of Henry, the baniſhment of queen Margaret, and the extirpation of the moſt conſiderable Lancaſtrians, removed all farther fears of oppoſition, and Edward now found himſelf in quiet poſſeſſion of the throne. He therefore applied himſelf to acquire a general popularity. He lived with his ſubjects in the moſt familiar manner. He attended leſs to the cares of royalty, than to the diſſipation of amuſements and the allurements of paſſion. He became the general patron among the men, and the general lover among the ladies. Even foreign princes courted his alliance; and ſeveral matches worthy of him were propoſed, particularly Margaret, daughter to the king of Scotland; Iſabella, ſiſter to Henry IV. of Caſtile; and Bona, daughter of the duke of Savoy, and ſiſter to the queen of France. The laſt was choſen, and the earl of Warwick was ſent to demand that princeſs in marriage.

But while the earl was labouring to promote at once the glory of his maſter and the advantage of his country, an event happened which rendered his negotiation abortive. Edward being at a hunting match at Wychwood-foreſt, took the opportunity of paying a viſit to the ducheſs of Bedford, who then reſided at Grafton-manor, near Stony Stratford. The ducheſs, ſoon after her huſband's death, had married Sir Richard Woodville, a private gentleman, to whom ſhe bore ſeveral children, particularly Elizabeth, remarkable at once for the grace and beauty of her perſon, and her mental accompliſhments. This amiable lady had married Sir John Gray, of Groby, by whom ſhe had ſeveral children; but her huſband having embraced the Lancaſtrian party, and falling in the diſpute between the two Houſes, his eſtate was forfeited to the crown, and his widow had retired to her father's ſeat, where ſhe lived in the greateſt privacy.

The preſence of the king was thought a favourable opportunity for the beautiful widow to obtain ſome grace from the young monarch, who was ſo greatly celebrated for his condeſcenſion and gallantry, eſpecially to thoſe of her ſex. She accordingly threw herſelf at the king's feet, and, with a flood of tears, implored his pity on her diſtreſſed family. The ſight of ſo much beauty in affliction ſtrongly affected the amorous Edward; love ſtole inſenſibly into his heart, under the appearance of compaſſion, and her ſorrow, ſo becoming a woman of virtue, ſoon rendered his eſteem and regard equal to his affection. He raiſed her from the ground with aſſurances of favour; he found his paſſion increaſe every moment, by the converſation of the amiable object, and he was ſoon reduced in his turn to the poſture and ſtile of a ſupplicant at the feet of Elizabeth. But the lady, averſe to diſhonourable love, obſtinately refuſed to gratify his paſſion, and nobly anſwered, “ That “ as ſhe was too good to be the concubine, and “ too mean to be the wife of a king, ſhe would “ ſtill continue in her humble ſtation.” Such modeſty, ſuch generous indifference, increaſed at once his paſſion and veneration for the amiable object. Fame, glory, and empire, ſunk before his love, and his only deſire now was to enjoy, on any terms, the object of his affection. He married this beloved widow privately at Grafton, and endeavoured to keep the tranſaction ſecret from the nation.

In the mean time the earl of Warwick had laboured ſo aſſiduouſly in conducting his negotiation, that nothing remained but the ratification of the treaty, and the bringing over the princeſs to England; but when he heard of Edward's clandeſtine marriage, (which was not long before it tranſpired) he conſidered it as the higheſt inſult that could have been offered to his honor, and inſtantly breaking off the negotiation, he returned to England, glowing with rage and indignation.

A. D. 1465. The king's marriage being now publickly declared, the queen received the compliments of all the nobility; and on the 26th of May was crowned at Weſtminſter, by the archbiſhop of Canterbury.

The indiſcreet Edward endeavoured not to regain the friendſhip of Warwick, to whom he was indebted for his crown: on the contrary, he took methods which tended directly to widen the breach between them. He laviſhed a profuſion of honours and eſtates on the family of his queen. Her father was created earl of Rivers, and made high conſtable of England. Her brother, John Woodville, was married to the daughter and heireſs of lord Scales, to whoſe honors and eſtates he ſucceeded; and all her friends and relations were raiſed and enobled by the royal favour.

This partiality excited an uncommon degree of jealouſy among the nobility, eſpecially as Edward had obtained from parliament a general reſumption of all the grants which had been made ſince his acceſſion to the throne. Warwick ſaw the diſcontents of the people with a ſecret ſatisfaction, and hoping to be in a condition to make Edward feel the weight of his reſentment, he retired from court, and repaired to his caſtle at Warwick.

A. D. 1466. Edward knew the cauſe of Warwick's ſequeſtering himſelf from the affairs of government, and took the moſt prudent methods for rendering any attempt, that might be made by that ambitious nobleman, abortive. He concluded a treaty of alliance with Phillip, duke of Burgundy, a deſcendant of the houſe of Lancaſter, but who made no ſcruple of ſacrificing to his political ambition the intereſt of that unfortunate and oppreſſed family. The duke of Britany alſo entered into an alliance with him, and the king of Scotland prolonged the truce for forty years. He was equally ſucceſsful in obtaining ſupplies from his parliament; they granted him ſubſidies with a liberality unknown in any former reign. The Commons alſo paſſed a bill of attainder againſt the ſmall remains of the Lancaſtrian party; and by theſe forfeited eſtates the king was enabled to gratify his friends; but his favours were chiefly beſtowed on the queen's family. That princeſs now procured her ſiſter Catherine to be married to the young duke of Buckingham, a minor, and a ward of the crown. William Herbert having eſpouſed Mary, another of her ſiſters, was created lord Dunſter, and afterwards earl of Huntingdon: and Anne, a third ſiſter, married a ſon and heir of Grey, lord Ruthyn, who was now honoured with the title of earl of Kent.

A. D. 1468. The earl of Warwick and his friends ſaw this profuſion of favours laviſhed on the Woodville family with ſecret indignation; and were joined by a multitude of diſcontented nobles; among whom was the duke of Clarence, Edward's elder brother. Warwick, however, ſtill preſerved the external mark marks of ſubmiſſion to Edward but redoubled his attention to increaſe his popularity. His houſe was always open, his tables always ſpread for every one who choſe to partake of his hoſpitality; and hence he became a greater favourite with the people than ever.

The duke of Clarence, already diſguſted with the meaſures of the court, now contracted an intimate connection with Warwick by marrying his eldeſt daughter Iſabella, with whom he obtained a conſiderable ſettlement; after which the earl retired to his government of Calais.

A. D. 1469. The ſpirit of faction now threatened the kingdom with all the horrors of civil diſcord. Various inſurrections happened in different parts, but by whom they were incited was not known. The firſt of theſe, which began in the north, was headed by one Rober tHillyard, generally called Robin of Ryddeſdale; but the inſurgents were ſoon routed, and their leader executed. The malecontents were, however, rather animated than diſcouraged by the ill ſucceſs of their firſt attempt. They again aſſembled in more formidable numbers; and were joined by lord Fitz Hugh, and Henry Neville, ſon to the lord Latimer. But as both theſe noblemen were totally ignorant of military affairs, the command was given to Sir John Conyers, an officer of great reputation and experience. Their firſt intention was to make themſelves maſters of the city of York; but being diſappointed in procuring a ſufficient train of artillery, they reſolved to direct their march towards the capital; and openly declared, "That they were marching to deliver their lawful ſovereign, king Henry, from his confinement, and re-place him on the throne of his anceſtors."

Edward, alarmed at the progreſs of the rebels, and the continual augmentation of their numbers, iſſued orders to the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, and the earl of Rivers, to aſſemble an army in Norfolk, and the adjacent counties. He alſo wrote to his friend the earl of Pembroke, commanding him to aſſemble the Welſh, and croſs the country immediately, in order to intercept the march of the rebels from the north.

The earl ſo exerted himſelf in the diſcharge of theſe orders, that he ſoon found himſelf at the head of ten thouſand men, and marched with great expedition againſt the inſurgents, who were then in the neighbourhood of Northampton. In his route he was joined by the earl of Devonſhire, at the head of a conſiderable body of archers. As ſoon as the two armies came in ſight of each other, Pembroke deached all his cavalry, under the command of his rother, Sir Richard Herbert, with orders to oberve the poſition of the enemy, and if he thought practicable to attack their rear. Sir Richard exeuted his orders; but perceived that ſuch wiſe preautions had been taken by the leader of the inſurents, that an attack muſt be attended with the utoſt diſadvantage. The fiery ſpirit of the Welſh ould not, however, be reſtrained by prudential reans: they fell upon the rear of the enemy, and ere repulſed with conſiderable ſlaughter.

In the mean time, the earl of Warwick arrived om Calais; and the rebels, flattering themſelves ith being powerfully aſſiſted by that popular noblean, changed their route. Inſtead of purſuing e road to London, they directed their march toards Warwick-caſtle. Pembroke, impatient of venge, followed the rebels with ſuch expedition, at he came up with them near Banbury, and the o armies encamped near each other. During the ght, a trivial difference about quarters ariſing beeen the earls of Pembroke and Devonſhire, the ter retired with his archers, and left Pembroke alone to encounter the rebels. This deſertion filled the inſurgents with hopes of obtaining a complete victory; and Sir Henry Neville, one of their leaders, having charged the royaliſts at too great a diſtance from the main body, was ſurrounded, and taken priſoner. This misfortune checked the ardour of the rebels, and they returned to their camp. But Pembroke having, without any form of trial, put the noble priſoner to death, they were exaſperated to a degree bordering on madneſs. They attacked the Welſh army with a fury that was irreſiſtible, put them to the ſword without mercy; and, having taken Pembroke and his brother priſoners, cauſed them both to be immediately beheaded.

The rebels, elated with their ſucceſs, detached a party to Grafton-manor who ſeized the earl of Rivers and his ſon John, and ſtruck off their heads in the market-place at Northampton. But here their diſorders ended. Satisfied with having deſtroyed the moſt obnoxious of Edward's miniſters, they diſperſed, and returned quietly to their reſpective habitations.

The king, perſuaded that the ſucceſs of the rebels was owing to the deſertion of the earl of Devonſhire, ordered that nobleman to be beheaded, which ſentence was executed at Bridgewater on the 17th of Auguſt.

A. D. 1470. In the beginning of this year another rebellion broke out in Lincolnſhire, where the inſurgents were headed by Sir Robert Welles, ſon to the lord of that name. The army of the rebels amounted to 30,000 men; but lord Welles was ſo far from favouring this rebellion of his ſon, that he fled to the ſanctuary of Weſtminſter, in order to ſecure his perſon againſt the anger or ſuſpicion of the king. Edward marched at the head of his army againſt the rebels, and ſent a preſſing meſſage with aſſurances of ſafety to lord Welles, requeſting he would attend him in his expedition. Not ſuſpecting that the king would forfeit his word ſo ſolemnly given, the nobleman obeyed the ſummons, and joined the royal army. During their march, the king prevailed upon lord Welles to write a preſſing letter to his ſon, perſuading him to abandon the party of the rebels, and return to his duty. The ſon, naturally imagining his father to be under confinement when this letter was wrote, and thinking that his engagements of honor ought not to be broken, by filial compliance, refuſed to aſſent: upon which Edward, with a cruelty which nothing but the barbarous proceedings in a civil war can account for, put the father to death for the diſobedience of his ſon.

The report of this inhuman proceeding effected, even in thoſe barbarous times, a general horror, and inſpired Sir Robert Welles with fury for revenge. He immediately engaged the royal army, but the conteſt was unequal. The firſt charge of the rebels was, however, ſo furious that fifteen hundred of Edward's army were cut to pieces, but the former being undiſciplined they were ſoon broken, and driven from the field of battle, with the loſs of ten thouſand men killed upon the ſpot. Their general, Sir Robert, was taken while fighting obſtinately at the head of about ſeventy gentlemen of note, and ſoon after beheaded at Stamford.

Theſe inſurrections were only preludes to thoſe of a more ſerious nature. The duke of Clarence and the earl of Warwick (who were more firmly attached to each other from the former having married the eldeſt daughter of the latter) now engaged in open rebellion; but the meaſures they took were ſo ill concerted, that they were obliged to apply to the court of France for protection. Lewis XI. one of the moſt politic princes of his age, now undertook to reconcile Warwick with queen Margaret, who then reſided at her father's court. Perhaps no two perſons ever entertained a greater animoſity againſt each other than Warwick and Margaret. His father had been executed by the orders of the queen. He himſelf had twice reduced Henry to captivity, and baniſhed Margaret, and put her moſt zealous friends and partizans to death. He had been the ſcourge of the houſe of Lancaſter. But all theſe difficulties Lewis found means to remove. They were both highly exaſperated againſt Edward, and their common intereſt formed an union between them. It was determined to re-eſtabliſh Henry on the throne. At the ſame time, it was agreed, that Warwick and the duke of Clarence ſhould direct the adminiſtration of the government during the minority of young Edward, Henry's ſon; that prince Edward ſhould marry the lady Anne, ſecond daughter of that nobleman; and that in caſe of failure of male iſſue in the prince, the crown ſhould deſcend to the duke of Clarence.

Edward received authentic intelligence of this extraordinary treaty from the duke of Burgundy, who had fitted out a large fleet to intercept Warwick in his paſſage; but he availed himſelf not of the diſcovery. He was even ſo confident of rendering the attempt abortive, that he declared, the duke might have ſaved himſelf the trouble of guarding the ſeas, as he wiſhed for nothing more than to ſee Warwick in England. It was not long before that nobleman appeared. He landed at Dartmouth about the middle of September, and immediately declared for king Henry. The name of Warwick, ſo dear to the Engliſh, his immenſe credit and the turbulent diſpoſition of the Engliſh, drew to his ſtandard, in a few days, an army of ſixty thouſand men.

This unexpected defection of the Engliſh greatly alarmed Edward. He ſaw his folly when it was too late to prevent the conſequences. He was then with his army in the north, and employed in quelling an inſurrection raiſed in Yorkſhire by the lord Fitz Hugh, who had married one of the ſiſters of the earl of Warwick. But on receiving advice of the ſucceſs of that popular nobleman, he immediately altered his route, and directed his march towards London with the greateſt expedition.

Warwick, being determined, if poſſible, to engage Edward before he reached the capital, advanced acroſs the country, and came up with the royal army in the neighbourhood of Nottingham. The marquis of Montague, the brother of Warwick, had raiſed an army of ſix thouſand men, and was folloing Edward, in order, as it was imagined, to reinforce the royal army. But the king had no ſooner halted, on account of the approach of Warwick, than the marquis fell upon the rear of the royal army, during the night, with the utmoſt fury, and the air reſounded with the cry of "God ſave king Henry!" The king, alarmed at the noiſe, ſtarted from his bed, and was ſoon convinced that it was the cry of war, generally uſed by the Lancaſtrian party. Lord Haſtings haſtened into his apartment, and informed him of his danger; urging him to make his eſcape from an army where he appeared to have ſo many concealed enemies, and ſo few zealouſly attached to his ſervice. He had hardly time to get on horſeback before the enemy attacked his quarters. A few minutes would have determined the fate of Edward. He fled with the utmoſt precipitation, attended with a ſmall retinue, to Lynn in Norfolk, where he fortunately found ſome Dutch ſhips ready for ſea, and ſailed immediately. But his danger did not terminate with his embarkation. A fleet of ſhips belonging to the Eaſterlings, or Hans-towns, who were then at war both with France and England, were hovering on the Norfolk coaſt, and gave chace to the king's veſſels; and it was with the utmoſt difficulty that they eſcaped into the port of Alcmaer, in Holland.

No ſooner was the king fled, than the earl of Warwick proceeded with all expedition to London, delivered Henry VI. from the Tower, replaced him on the throne, and proclaimed him king with the utmoſt ſolemnity. The moſt conſiderable partiſans of the York family either ſought protection beyond the ſeas, or took ſhelter in ſanctuaries where the eccleſiaſtical privileges afforded them ſhelter from the inſults of their enemies. It is computed, that in London alone, no leſs than two thouſand perſons ſaved themſelves in this manner; and among the reſt Edward's queen, who went privately by water from the Tower to Weſtminſter-abbey, in order to avoid the violence of the citizens, who now appeared as extravagantly zealous for Henry as ever they had been for Edward. The earl of Worceſter, conſtable of England, fell into the hands of the Lancaſtrians, and was ſoon afterwards beheaded.

A parliament was now ſummoned, in the name of Warwick, to meet at Weſtminſter; and as that aſſembly could pretend to no liberty amidſt ſuch enraged factions, their proceedings were entirely directed by the ruling party. The treaty with Margaret was here fully ratified. Henry was acknowledged king; but as his incapacity for government was univerſally acknowledged, the regency was intruſted to Warwick and Clarence, till prince Edward reached the age of majority; and in default of that prince's iſſue, Clarence was to ſucceed to the crown. Edward was declared a traitor to his country, and an uſurper of the throne. Even the paternal eſtate of the York family was allowed to be forfeited. All his friends were attainted; particularly the duke of Glouceſter, his younger brother. The attainders of the dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, the earls of Pembroke, Oxford, Richmond, and Ormond, were reverſed; and all who had ſuffered for adhering to Henry were reſtored to their honors and eſtates.

The conjunctive regents now aſſumed the government in Henry's name, and diſpoſed of all poſts both civil and military. The judges, ſheriffs, and coroners, were changed in every part of the kingdom. The archbiſhop of York, brother to the earl of Warwick, was appointed chancellor, and the duke of Clarence lord lieutenant of Ireland. At the ſame time, the paternal eſtate of the York family was ſettled upon him. The marquis of Montague was reſtored to his favourite poſt of warden of the eaſt marches of Scotland, and a long truce was concluded with France.

When Edward landed at Alcmaer he was kindly received by De Bruges, governor of Holland, under the duke of Burgundy. But that prince was greatly perplexed with regard to the meaſures moſt proper for him to purſue in this unexpected revolution. He was fearful of plunging himſelf into a war with England, by giving the unfortunate exile an aſylum in his dominions; and he was already attacked by Lewis XI. who had made himſelf maſter of Amiens and St. Quintin. He therefore ſent his ſecretary, Philip de Comines, to Calais to ſee what Vauclere the governor would do in this ſudden change of affairs, and to take meaſures for preventing a rupture with England. He found the governor, the garriſon, and all the inhabitants of the town, dreſſed in Warwick's livery, which they had aſſumed on the firſt news of that nobleman's ſucceſs, and was aſſured that the earl was ſending over four thouſand men to begin hoſtilities in the duke's dominions, who, as the protector of Edward, had been declared the enemy of England.

Philip, though alarmed at this intimation, told the governor that his maſter's treaty, which was made with the kingdom as well as the king of England, was ſtill in force: and that the duke of Burgundy conceived himſelf bound to obſerve the articles, the change of the king's name from Edward to Henry making no difference. Theſe arguments would, however, have had little weight with the Engliſh government, had they not been ſupported by the merchants of London and Calais, who had then great influence on the affairs of the nation, and who were afraid of loſing the principal part of their commerce with the duke of Burgundy. At their inſtances therefore the earl of Warwick put a ſtop to all hoſtilities, and it was agreed that the treaty ſhould continue in force; and the duke, on his part, promiſed to give no aſſiſtance to Edward.

This covenant, however, was very ill obſerved; for though the duke refuſed to ſupply him openly, he equipped four large veſſels in the name of ſome private merchants, and cauſed fourteen ſhips to be ſecretly hired of the Eaſterlings. This ſmall ſquadron, together with a conſiderable ſum of money, he delivered to Edward, who immediately ſailed for England, with a ſmall retinue and a body of two thouſand men.

A. D. 1471. Edward, after a ſhort paſſage, attempted to land on the coaſt of Eſſex, but found it impracticable from the diſaffection of the inhabitants. He therefore ſteered to the northward, intending to land at Cromer in Norfolk, but being informed by Sir Robert Chamberlain and Sir Gilbert Debenham, whom he ſent on ſhore to learn the ſentiments of the people, that the inhabitants were not willing to receive him, he again put to ſea; and a ſtorm ariſing ſoon after, he was obliged to land at Ravenſpur in Yorkſhire.

Edward was ſoon convinced that the policy of the earl of Warwick with regard to changing the magiſtrates was very detrimental to his intereſt, and that it would be neceſſary for him to have recourſe to art and diſſimulation to effect his purpoſe. He pretended, and even took an oath, that he came not to challenge the crown, but to recover his paternal eſtates, which had been unjuſtly taken from him by the parliament. This political diſſimulation produced the deſired effect upon the minds of the people. Compaſſion ſupplied the place of affection: numbers, deceived by his humble pretenſions, flocked to his ſtandard, and the nobility were very willing to receive him as a fellow-ſubject, though not as a king. He marched directly for the capital of the county where he landed, and found the inhabitants univerſally diſpoſed to aſſiſt him in recovering the eſtates he enjoyed from his anceſtors, though not in the recovery of the crown. It was, therefore, thought neceſſary to give them every ſatisfaction in his power with regard to his pretenſions; and he ſcrupled not to take a ſolemn oath in the cathedral, never to renew his claim to the crown of England.

But Edward was far from deſigning to keep this oath longer than it tended to promote his intereſt and anſwer his future expectations. His army was now conſiderably increaſed, and he determined to march towards the capital, where he flattered himſelf he had many powerful friends. Warwick had aſſembled an army in the neighbourhood of Leiceſter, and advanced to give him battle; but Edward by following another road paſſed him unmoleſted, and preſented himſelf before the gates of London. The citizens readily admitted him, and he once more triumphantly entered the capital, while Henry, who had not found means to eſcape, nor perhaps ſo much as thought of it, was again conducted to his confinement in the Tower, from whence he had been taken only ſeven months before, to remount the throne. Such are the ſtrange viciſſitudes of fortune!

Edward was now in a condition to oppoſe his enemies, and being informed that the earl of Warwick was marching to give him battle, he advanced to meet him, and the two armies came in ſight of each other in the neighbourhood of Barnet. Margaret was every day expected with a conſiderable reinforcement of foreign troops, and all her friends held themſelves in readineſs to join her ſtandard. But Warwick, who was determined either to gain the whole honour of the victory or periſh in the attempt, waited not for Margaret's arrival. The night before the engagement, the duke of Clarence, who had ſecretly entered into engagements with his brother, deſerted to him, and carried with him twelve thouſand men.

This defection of Clarence greatly affected the ſpirits of Warwick's ſoldiers; and had the earl not been ſo near the enemy he would, in all probability, have declined a battle, and waited the arrival of Margaret; but he was now ſeveral days march from a place of ſafety, and to have attempted a retreat in the face of an army ſuperior in numbers to his own, would have been certain ruin; nor would his intrepid ſoul, a ſtranger to fear, ſuffer him to turn his back upon the enemy. Edward and Clarence offered him terms of peace; but theſe he rejected with diſdain, and told them, "that he would rather be conſiſtent with himſelf than follow the example of a perfidious duke; and that he was determined either to gain the victory or loſe his life."

Early the next morning (which was Eaſter-day the 14th of April) both armies were drawn out in order of battle. Edward's van-guard was commanded by the duke of Glouceſter; the main body by himſelf; and the rear by lord Haſtings. The right wing of Warwick's army was commanded by the marquis of Montague and the earl of Oxford; the left by Warwick himſelf; and in the center was a large body of archers commanded by the duke of Somerſet.

The engagement began between four and five o'clock in the morning, when the troops of Warwick, though inferior in number to thoſe of Edward, charged the enemy with ſuch impetuoſity, that the earl of Oxford's diviſion broke the main body of Edward's army; but purſuing the fugitives with too ſanguine an eagerneſs, left the main body defenceleſs. Edward perceived the miſtake, and attacked the weakened part of Warwick's diviſion at the head of a body of reſerve. Oxford ſoon ſaw his error, and wheeled about to recover his former ſtation; but unfortunately his men, who wore ſtars for their badges, returning from the purſuit and paſſing near the duke of Exeter's diviſion, the latter miſtook their ſtars for ſuns, the badge which diſtinguiſhed Edward's ſoldiers, and charged them ſo furiouſly, that they drove them off the field before the miſtake was diſcovered. This gave the forces of Edward's routed wing an opportunity of rallying. The battle was now no longer equal; the late unfortunate accident had occaſioned a ſuſpicion of treachery. They, however, defended themſelves with the utmoſt bravery, and, in all probability, would have put a final period to Edward's reign, could the unfortunate accident have been retrieved. But that was impoſſible. Warwick in vain exerted all his efforts to ſupport his forces, now borne down by the weight of numbers. He perceived the battle was irretrievably loſt, and diſdaining life when victory was gone, he ruſhed into the middle of Edward's ranks, and fell covered with wounds. His brother, the marquis of Montague, followed his example, and periſhed by his ſide. Their deaths compleated the route of their army; and as Edward had iſſued orders to give no quarter, a dreadful carnage enſued. About two thouſand fell on the ſide of the conquerors, and three thouſand on that of the vanquiſhed. The earl of Oxford and the duke of Somerſet fled into Wales to the earl of Pembroke, who was levying troops there for Warwick. The duke of Exeter was wounded, ſtripped, and left for dead on the field, where he lay till the evening, when, coming to himſelf, he made ſhift to crawl to the houſe of one Rutland, where he continued till his wounds were cured; but he was afterwards ſeized and committed to the Tower.

As ſoon as the battle was over, Edward poſted to London, and entering St. Paul's cathedral at evening ſervice, he there offered his own and his enemies ſtandards; and, to prevent any doubt of the death of the earl of Warwick and his brother, he cauſed their naked bodies to be expoſed to public view for three days together in the cathedral; after which they were carried to Biſham in Berkſhire, and interred in the priory founded by their anceſtors.

Edward imagined, that by the death of the earl of Warwick he had eſtabliſhed his throne on a ſolid foundation; but he ſoon received freſh proofs that the war was far from being ended. On the very day after the fatal battle of Barnet queen Margaret, with her ſon the prince of Wales, landed at Weymouth in Dorſetſhire, attended by the counteſs of Warwick, the prior of St. John of Jeruſalem, the lord Wenlock, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, at the head of a conſiderable body of French troops. The queen had hardly time to repoſe herſelf after the fatigue of a very tempeſtuous paſſage, before ſhe received the fatal intelligence of the defeat and death of Warwick, and the captivity of her huſband. The ſoul of Margaret, hitherto a ſtranger to fear, could not ſupport the ſhock. Her courage and magnanimity gave way to grief and deſpair. She retired to the abbey of Beaulieu in Hampſhire, and regiſtered herſelf, her ſon, and her followers, as perſons claiming ſanctuary in that religious retirement. But her ſpirits were ſoon raiſed from the abyſs of terror into which the weight of her misfortunes had plunged them, by the appearance of the duke of Somerſet, the earl of Devonſhire, the viſcount Beaumont, Sir Thomas Fulford, Sir John Forteſcue, Sir Thomas Seymour, and many other perſons of diſtinction, who, on the firſt news of her landing, immediately repaired to her with their vaſſals and dependents, who all offered to ſtand by her with their lives and fortunes.

Encouraged by this ſhew of affection, Margaret determined to make one final attempt for the recovery of her throne. She left her ſanctuary, and putting herſelf at the head of her foreign forces, began her march through the counties of Devon and Somerſet, where her army was every day conſiderably increaſed by the continual acquiſition of new partiſans. On the twenty-ninth of April the queen reached Tewkeſbury in Glouceſterſhire, where ſhe propoſed to halt and refreſh her wearied troops after their long and fatiguing march; and then proceed to the borders of Wales in order to join the earl of Pembroke, who had raiſed a conſiderable body of archers. But the activity of Edward prevented this junction. He no ſooner received advice of the queen's landing, than he ſet out at the head of his army to give the Lancaſtrians battle, before their whole ſtrength was conſolidated: and after a very painful and fatiguing march, encamped, on the third of May, within three miles of the enemy.

Aſtoniſhed at the approach of Edward's army, a council was immediately held in the queen's camp, where it was reſolved to paſs the Severn, in order to join Pembroke's forces; but the city of Glouceſter refuſing to open her gates, it was conſidered as impracticable to croſs the river in their preſent ſituation without expoſing their rear to inevitable ruin. It was therefore determined, to intrench the army in a part adjacent to the town of Tewkeſbury, where the troops would be flanked on both ſides with hollow ways, ditches, hedges, and broken ground, and the rear defended by the town and abbey; while a ſtrong entrenchment was to be thrown up in the front of the army. Could this reſolution have been completely executed, the queen's camp would have been impregnable; but the activity of Edward prevented them from effecting their deſign; he determined to attack them the next day, before their fortifications could be completed.

The Lancaſtrians, however, were ſo expeditious, that Edward owed his ſucceſs to ſtratagem. Early in the morning he drew up his army in two lines, the firſt of which was commanded by his brother the duke of Glouceſter, while he himſelf, aſſiſted by the duke of Clarence and lord Haſtings, led the other. The Lancaſtrian army was formed into three lines; the firſt was commanded by the duke of Somerſet and his brother lord Beaufort; the ſecond by the prince of Wales, aſſiſted by lord Wenlock; and the third by the earl of Devonſhire. The duke of Glouceſter began the attack with the utmoſt fury; but Somerſet's diviſion, who guarded the front of the entrenchment, received them with ſuch intrepidity, that they were repulſed with conſiderable ſlaughter; and had Somerſet been as remarkable for prudence as he was for valour, Edward, in all probability, would have been obliged to abandon the attempt. But Glouceſter, purſuant to the orders he had received from his brother, perceiving the intrenchments were not to be forced, pretended to retire in confuſion. The ſtratagem ſucceeded; Somerſet, whoſe diſpoſition was naturally impetuous, led his diviſion through the defiles of the intrenchment, leaving orders for the ſecond and third lines to ſupport him, and attacked the Yorkiſts in the open field with the utmoſt fury. A dreadful conteſt enſued, and continued without any perceptible advantage on either ſide, till a detachment of two hundred horſe from Edward's army attacked the Lancaſtrians in flank, and threw them into diſorder. Somerſet was now obliged to fall back through the defiles to his former ſtation, which he ſhould not have quitted; but was followed ſo cloſely by Glouceſter's diviſion, that the greater part of his troops were cut to pieces. Amazed at not being ſupported, he caſt his eyes around the camp, and perceived lord Wenlock ſtanding cooly at the head of his diviſion. Somerſet conſtrued this into an act of treachery, and riding up to him with the utmoſt fury, clove the head of that nobleman with his battle-axe.

By this time the duke of Glouceſter had followed the enemy ſo cloſe that his whole diviſion was actually within their entrenchments, and he was ſoon followed by Edward, at the head of the ſecond line. Confuſion now reigned in every part of the queen's camp. The whole army betook themſelves to a precipitate flight after a faint reſiſtance, and Edward gained one of the moſt complete victories recorded in hiſtory; ſcarce a perſon of any note in the queen's army eſcaping either death or captivity. Among the ſlain were the earl of Devonſhire, lord Beaufort, Sir John Delves, Sir Edward Hambden, Sir Edward Whitingham, and Sir John Luckner. The duke of Somerſet, the grand prior of St. John, and about twenty gentlemen of rank and fortune, took ſanctuary in the abbey-church. But Edward paid no regard to eccleſiaſtical privileges: he ſent a detachment of his forces, who dragged them from their aſylum, and put them immediately to death, according to the barbarous policy of that relentleſs monarch. Margaret of Anjou and her ſon had alſo taken ſanctuary in another religious ſtructure, and were dragged from thence by Edward's ſoldiers. The queen was ſent to the Tower, where ſhe continued four years in cloſe confinement, when ſhe was releaſed by Lewis XI. who generouſly paid fifty thouſand crowns for her ranſom. She retired to France, where ſhe paſſed the remainder of her days in in privacy and retirement; after having aſtoniſhed the world by a courage and reſolution, which would have done more honour to her ſex, had ſhe alſo been endowed with its ſoftneſs and other amiable qualities.

But a more melancholy fate attended the young prince her ſon. He was brought into the preſence of Edward, who aſked him in an inſulting manner, "How he dared to invade his dominions?" The noble youth, forgetting his preſent ſituation, replied, with an unſeaſonable vivacity, "That he came to recover his father's crown, and to claim his juſt inheritance." Stung with this intrepid anſwer, the ungenerous Edward, inſenſible to pity, ſtruck the young prince on the face with his gauntlet; and the dukes of Clarence and Glouceſter, lord Haſtings, and Sir Thomas Gray, conſidering the blow as a ſignal for farther violence, hurried the prince into the next apartment, and immediately put a period to his exiſtence by plunging their daggers into his breaſt.

The earl of Pembroke, convinced that the fatal battle of Tewkeſbury had put a final period to the hopes of the Lancaſtrian family, fled into Britany, carrying with him his nephew, the young earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII. The only partiſan that now remained was the baſtard of Fauconbridge, who took the advantage of Edward's abſence to attempt the recovery of the capital. He had been honoured with a vice-admiral's commiſſion by the earl of Warwick, and appointed to guard the channel; but having been ſtripped of his employment on the death of that nobleman, he withdrew with the ſhips under his command, and for ſome time ſubſiſted by piracy. The landing of Margaret induced him to aſſiſt that princeſs in recovering the Engliſh ſceptre; and being joined by three hundred men from the garriſon of Calais, he landed with his forces at Sandwich, and was admitted into Canterbury by the magiſtrates. Great numbers flocked to his ſtandard; and he marched immediately for London, at the head of ſeventeen thouſand men. He entered Southwark without oppoſition; and had not the news of Edward's victory at Tewkeſbury arrived in the critical moment, he had been maſter of the capital. But the citizens, encouraged by the hopes of effectual aſſiſtance from their victorious monarch, ſhut their gates againſt the inſurgents. They made, however, a deſperate attempt to carry the bridge by ſtorm; but being repulſed with great ſlaughter, they deſerted their leader, who was ſoon after taken priſoner, and immediately executed. And thus an end was put to the laſt enterprize of the Lancaſtrian party for recovering the crown of England.

All the legitimate male iſſue of that houſe now be-ame extinct in the perſon of the hapleſs Henry VI. ho, on the 20th of June, died ſuddenly in his priſon f the Tower. That unfortunate prince, whoſe in-ocence and melancholy imbecillity might have de-nded him from the attempts of violence, fell a victim the misfortune of being born to a crown. It is retended, and was generally believed, that the duke Glouceſter killed him with his own hand. But the niverſal odium under which that prince's memory de-rvedly labours, inclined perhaps the nation to ggravate his crimes without ſufficient authority. It however, certain, that Henry's death was very dden; and though he had long laboured under an ſtate of health, this circumſtance, joined to the ge-ral manners of the age, gave a very natural ground ſuſpicion; which was rather increaſed than dimi-hed by expoſing the body to public view. That ecaution ſerved only to recal many ſimilar circum-nces in the Engliſh hiſtory, and to furniſh compa-ons no ways favourable to Edward and his friends. s remains were depoſited in the abbey of Chertſey, m whence they were afterwards removed by Richard III. and interred in a more pompous manner at Windſor.

A. D. 1472. Edward had now no competitor for the throne, nor any enemy to fear. A parliament was ſummoned, which met in the beginning of the year, and this aſſembly, like others of the like kind during the civil wars, ratified all the acts of the victor, recognized his title, and again attainted the whole Lancaſtrian party. But proſperity was of more pernicious conſequence to Edward than adverſity. He had ſufficient firmneſs to ſupport all the evils of the latter, but he could not reſiſt the allurements of the former. He devoted himſelf to amuſements, and was far more attentive to fill his coffers than to remove the complaints and grievances of his ſubjects. His familiar manner, and pleaſing addreſs, rendered him, however, extremely popular, notwithſtanding the cruelties he had exerciſed on his enemies. The melancholy ideas of deſtruction were abſorbed in the gay ſcenes of pleaſure and diſſipation.

A. D. 1474. Edward, however, was at length rouſed from the couch of voluptuouſneſs; the deſire of foreign conqueſts now engaged his attention, and he ſeemed anxious to diſtinguiſh himſelf in obtaining the like honours which had ſo nobly emblazoned the reigns of his predeceſſors. A treaty of alliance was concluded with Charles duke of Burgundy; by which it was ſtipulated, that Edward ſhould croſs the ſeas with an army of 10,000 men; and that Charles ſhould join him with all his forces, in order to invade the territories of Lewis: that Edward ſhould challenge the crown of France; and that the ſword of war ſhould not be ſheathed till he had obtained the provinces of Guienne and Normandy: That Champaigne, and ſeveral other territories, ſhould be procured for the duke; and that all his dominions ſhould be freed from the burden of homage to the crown of France. It was added, that neither party ſhould make peace without the conſent of the other. The Engliſh parliament, always ready to aſſiſt their ſovereign in any attempt to humble France, granted him a large ſubſidy; and every precaution was taken to render the ſucceſs of this expedition as brilliant as thoſe that attended the attempts of his predeceſſors.

In the ſpring of the following year, 1475, Edward, attended by the principal nobility of England, landed at Calais, at the head of thirty thouſand archers, and prepared to carry his conqueſts into the very heart of France. But the ſanguine hopes of the Engliſh were greatly leſſened, when the duke of Burgundy joined them with only his common equipages. That prince, tranſported by the violence of his temper, had led his army to the frontiers of Germany, where they were employed againſt the duke of Lorrain, and other princes of the empire.

Edward was greatly diſguſted at this breach of the treaty, and determined to take every advantage that offered for promoting his own intereſt. Lewis IX, was a prince who diſdained all military glory, and dreading the events of war, he made very advantageous offers to Edward; and a treaty was concluded at Pecquigni, near Amiens; by which it was ſtipulated, "That Lewis ſhould pay ſeventy-five thouſand crowns, to indemnify Edward for the expences of the expedition; that he ſhould alſo pay him annually the ſum of fifty thouſand crowns during their joint lives; that the dauphin of France ſhould marry Elizabeth, Edward's daughter, and ſettle on her ſixty thouſand livres a year as her jointure; and that neither party ſhould encourage civil wars in the other's dominions, but, on the contrary, aſſiſt in ſuppreſſing the inſurrections of their ſubjects." The two monarchs had afterwards an interview on the bridge of Pecquigni; where mutual profeſſions of friendſhip paſſed between them; and matters being thus peaceably adjuſted, Edward politely took his leave, and returned to England.

A. D. 1476. The diſbanding of Edward's army after his return from France had filled the whole kingdom with robbers; ſo that no perſon could travel without the utmoſt danger of loſing his life or effects. To remedy this grievance, the king, early in the ſpring of this year, made a circuit with his judges through the kingdom, and exerted himſelf with ſuch vigour and impartiality in the diſtribution of juſtice, that he reſtored the public peace, and freed the roads from thoſe gangs of banditti, by whom they were ſo lately infeſted.

But Edward knew that theſe proceedings, however popular and neceſſary, would not be ſufficient to procure him any ſubſidies from the parliament. The leading men of the nation were too highly offended by the miſcarriage of the late expedition, from which they had formed ſuch ſanguine expectations, to think of granting any farther ſupplies. Recourſe was therefore had by Edward to other methods for accumulating treaſure. He engaged in commerce, which he carried on with great advantage, as a private merchant. He ſold the profits of vacant biſhoprics. He demanded fines for the reſtitution of temporalities. He ranſacked old records to find defective titles, and obliged the proprietors to pay large ſums for their confirmation; and he impoſed exorbitant taxes upon the clergy. By theſe methods he amaſſed large ſums, the vice of avarice growing ſtronger as his wealth increaſed and his age advanced. The time not employed in theſe matters he chiefly paſſed in female converſation and amuſements; and his court, from the example of its head, became a ſcene of lewdneſs and diſſipation.*

A. D. 1477. Though the duke of Clarence had ſo greatly contributed to the reſtoration of Edward, by his deſertion from Warwick, yet he could never regain the friendſhip of his brother; the levity and violence of his temper rendering him always ſuſpected. Richard, duke of Glouceſter, a cloſe, reſerved, and deliberate prince, was ſtill a greater enemy to Clarence than the king. Glouceſter had already formed the bloody deſign of ſeizing the crown on the death of Edward, whoſe health was daily declining by his exceſſive debauchery. He therefore became an enemy to Clarence from principle, becauſe he ſtood before him in the order of ſucceſſion. A combination between ſuch potent adverſaries could not fail of deſtroying Clarence; and it was determined to begin by attacking his friends, not doubting but his paſſion would betray him into meaſures which would give them a ſufficient advantage over him. The king hunting one day in the park of Burdet, of Arrow, in Warwickſhire, killed a white buck, which was a great favourite of its owner; and Burdet, tranſported with rage, wiſhed the horns of the deer in the belly of the perſon who had adviſed Edward to commit that inſult upon him. This pardonable expreſſion of reſentment was conſidered as a capital crime in a friend to the duke of Clarence, and he was publickly beheaded at Tyburn for this pretended offence.

The next that fell a ſacrifice to their reſentment againſt Clarence, was John Stacy, an eccleſiaſtic; who being better acquainted with mathematics and aſtronomy than moſt men of that age, was conſidered by the vulgar as a magician, and his friendſhip with Clarence rendered him obnoxious to the court. He was tried for that imaginary crime, and being convicted, was cruelly put to death for his learning.

A. D. 1478. Theſe inſtances of cruelty and injuſtice, which Clarence could not help perceiving were pointed at him, excited in his breaſt a thorough deteſtation for the authors. But inſtead of endeavouring to render their malice abortive by ſilence and reſerve, he loudly remonſtrated againſt the iniquity of his perſecutors, and defended, with unſhaken firmneſs, the innocence of his friends. This anſwered the purpoſes of his enemies, who now thought they had a ſufficient opportunity of convicting him. Accordingly he was arreſted, and committed to the Tower; ſoon after which a parliament was ſummoned, when the king appeared perſonally as his brother's accuſer, and pleaded the cauſe againſt him. The liberty of judgment was taken from the court by this ſtrange method of proceeding; ſo that, though only ſome raſh expreſſions were alledged againſt him, he was condemned to ſuffer death.

The king, after the condemnation of his brother, could not be prevailed upon to grant him any other favour than the choice of his death, and he was privately ſuffocated in a butt of Malmſey in the Tower. This was certainly a very whimſical choice, but it evidently appears to have been ſuch as the unfortunate prince thought proper to make. He left two children by the eldeſt daughter of the earl of Warwick: a ſon created an earl by his grandfather's title, and a daughter, afterwards counteſs of Saliſbury.

The death of the duke of Clarence excited ſuch a clamour among the populace, that the miniſtry uſed all their endeavours to conceal the manner of his execution, and gave out that he died ſuddenly of grief and vexation; and as a proof that no violence had been offered to his perſon, his body was expoſed in the cathedral of St. Paul; but this trick was ſo ſtale, that it ſerved only to confirm the ſuſpicions of the people, who, without ſcruple, loudly exclaimed againſt the cruelty of the adminiſtration.

A. D. 1481. Edward now dedicated his thoughts wholly to ſenſual gratifications: he ſlumbered on the couch of indolence, and his mind was abſorbed in the whirlpool of diſſipation. The French monarch beheld his ſupine conduct with a ſecret pleaſure, and was determined to violate a contract he had made with Edward, relative to the marriage of his ſon. By the treaty of Pecquigni he had promiſed that the dauphin ſhould marry the princeſs Elizabeth, but he had for ſome time altered his mind, and now concluded a treaty of marriage between his ſon and the daughter of Maximilian of Auſtria, an infant only two years of age.

Edward, aſtoniſhed and incenſed at this unpardonable affront, awoke from his lethargy, and vowed to take ample vengeance on Lewis for his perfidy; but that politic monarch, whoſe prudence was equal to his falſhood, foreſaw the gathering ſtorm, and had taken meaſures to break its force. He ſent away ambaſſadors to James III. of Scotland, offering him great advanteges if he would break his truce with Edward, and carry his arms into the northern parts of England.

James,

* Edward dedicated the principal part of his leiſure hours to the company of his favourite miſtreſs Jane Shore, who was the wife of a London ſhopkeeper, and to whoſe charms he was now become a mere ſlave. By all the accounts we have of this lady, it appears that ſhe had as many excuſes for frailty as ever fell to any woman's ſhare. Her charms had captivated the moſt beautiful monarch in the world; her mind was formed for magnificence, as her heart was for virtue: both could not be gratified, and virtue ſunk in the unequal ſtruggle; yet with ſo much modeſty did ſhe employ the aſcendancy ſhe had got over Edward, that even the pride of his queen was not offended at their intimacy. She indulged Edward in pleaſure, and he, in return, indulged her power.

EDWARD V.

James, who was a very weak prince, and lived on bad terms with his own nobility, imprudently liſtened to the artful ſuggeſtions of Lewis, and levied an army to execute a deſign to which he was far from being equal; but when his forces arrived on the borders of England, the barons conſpiring againſt his favourites, put them to death without the form of a trial; and his whole army immediately diſperſed. Soon after, the duke of Glouceſter entered Scotland at the head of the Engliſh forces, made himſelf maſter of Berwick, and forced James to accept of a peace, by which that important fortreſs was ceded to the Engliſh.

A. D. 1483. The war with Scotland being thus terminated, Edward determined to revenge himſelf of the inſults he had received from the French monarch; but while he was making preparations for this purpoſe, he was ſeized with a bodily complaint which put an end to his life on the 9th of April, in the forty-ſecond year of his age and the twenty-third of his reign. Some writers are of opinion that he was carried off by a ſevere fit of a quartan ague; but it is moſt probable that his intemperance and incontinency had broke his conſtitution, and that an ill habit of body, contracted by exceſſes, terminated his life without any particular viſible diſtemper.

Thus died died Edward IV. after a reign contaminated with as much guilt, from perjury and murder, as centered in that of any prince who ever ſwayed the ſcepter of England. Proſperity did not baniſh ſuſpicion in Edward, nor did adverſity cure preſumption: his ſuſpicion was always followed by ſtreams of the nobleſt blood in England, and his preſumption depopulated his country. Had the ſcenes of Edward's ſlaughter cloſed in thoſe of his victories, had he not in his cooler moments ſtained upon ſcaffolds the laurels he had gathered in the field, he might juſtly have claimed a place among the greateſt heroes of his country. We muſt not, however, impute to him the blood that was ſpilt in his battles: he had to deal with an enemy equally intrepid, haughty, vindictive, and bloody as himſelf. He had juſtice on his ſide while he had guilt upon his conſcience: he wore a ſmile upon his face, while he meditated perjury in his heart. He had vaſt courege, but no true greatneſs; he had many engaging qualities, but not one virtue. When ſurrounded with danger, he was ſunk in ſenſuality; and he purchaſed eaſe at the expence of glory. The ſucceſs of his arms was owing to his activity; the diſgrace of his reign, to his indolence. There are few inſtances in hiſtory of kings, who, like Edward, could fly from the brothel to the battle, and who could at once drop the terrors of an inhuman tyrant, to aſſume the graces of a tender lover, or ſlide from ſtate to familiarity. It was peculiar to Edward to throw the diadem gracefully from his brows; it was his alone to reſign the luſtre of majeſty, leſt it might dazzle the eyes of his people. It was owing to this pernicious appearance of humanity that Edward's crimes, inſtead of ſinking him into deteſtation, were overlooked with indifference.

Beſides five daughters, this monarch left two ſons, Edward prince of Wales, his ſucceſſor, then in his thirteenth year, and Richard duke of York, in his ſeventh.

The following are the moſt remarkable occurrences that happened during the reign of Edward IV.

In his ſeventh year, the people had an extravagant way of adorning their feet. They wore the peaks or pikes of their ſhoes ſo long, that they incumbered them in their walking, and were forced to tye them up to their knees; the fine gentlemen did it with chains of ſilver, or ſilver gilt, and others with ſilk laces. This ridiculous faſhion had been in vogue ever ſince the year 1382; but now it was prohibited, on the forfeiture of twenty ſhillings, and the pain of curſing by the clergy.

In the eleventh year of his reign, 1471, William Caxton, a mercer of London, and a lover of letters, and author of the chronicle called Fractus temporum, brought the art of printing into England, and practiſed it firſt in Weſtminſter-abbey.

In his ſeventeenth year, there was ſo dreadful a plague, that hiſtorians relate more people were deſtroyed by it, than by fifteen years war before.

In his nineteenth, Robert Byfield, one of the ſheriffs of London, was fined fifty pounds by the court of aldermen, for affronting the lord mayor; which, it ſeems, was only by kneeling too near him at prayers in St. Paul's church.

In the following year, two notorious thieves were preſſed to death for robbing St. Martin's-le-Grand church in London, and others of the gang were hanged and burnt.

SECTION II.

EDWARD V.

The ſecond King of England of the Line of York.

EDWARD IV. had no ſooner paid the debt of nature, than his ſon was proclaimed king of England, by the name of Edward V. though that young prince, juſt turned of twelve years of age, never obtained the crown, nor performed one act of ſovereignty: ſo that the interval between the death of his father and uſurpation of his uncle Richard, may properly be termed an inter-regnum, during which that ambitious tyrant concerted and executed the unjuſt and deteſtable means of wreſting the crown from his innocent and hapleſs nephew.

Edward V. at the time of his father's death, reſided at Ludlow-caſtle in Shropſhire, where he had been ſome time placed under the care of his uncle the earl of Rivers. Unhappily for the young prince, two irreconcileable parties now divided the court, namely, that of the queen and her relations, (particularly the earl Rivers her brother, and the marquis of Dorſet, her ſon by a former huſband) and that of the antient nobility, who envied the diſtinguiſhed exaltation and unlimited credit of the Woodville family. At the head of the latter party were the duke of Buckingham, lord Haſtings the chamberlain, and the lords Howard and Stanley.

The late king had ſeen with regret the dreadful conſequences that might reſult from theſe alarming diviſions during the minority of his ſon, and endeavoured to reconcile the contending parties. He ſent for them as he lay on his death-bed, conjured them to lay aſide their animoſities, and labour to promote peace and unanimity in the kingdom during the tender years of his ſon; and prevailed on them to embrace each other with all the marks of a cordial reconciliation.

But Edward's eyes were no ſooner cloſed by death, than all their former animoſities revived; they followed their ſeparate intereſts, and each endeavoured to gain the duke of Glouceſter, who had been appointed by his brother regent of the kingdom, over to their party. Glouceſter, who was at once both cruel and ambitious, and capable of the moſt inhuman crimes, concealed his dark purpoſes under the maſk of profound diſſimulation and policy; and he affected the greateſt zeal for the ſervice of the queen, that he might acquire a full influence over her conduct.

The earl Rivers had been entruſted by the deceaſed monarch with the care and education of his ſon; and the queen was now deſirous that he ſhould levy a body of troops to conduct his young ſovereign to London, in order to his being crowned with the uſual ſolemnities. Glouceſter perſuaded the queen that an armed force on this occaſion might be dangerous, and was not at all neceſſary. An order was therefore ſent to Rivers to bring the young king to London, with no greater retinue than was neceſſary to ſupport his ſtate and dignity.

In the mean time the duke of Glouceſter ſet out from York, attended by a numerous train of the northern gentry. On his reaching Northampton he was joined by the duke of Buckingham, who was alſo attended with a ſplendid retinue; and hearing that the king was every hour expected on that road, he reſolved to wait his arrival, under pretence of attending on his perſon and conducting him to London.

The earl Rivers, apprehenſive that the town of Northampton could not poſſibly afford entertainment for ſo great a number of followers, ſent his pupil forward by another road, to Stoney-Stratford, and went himſelf to Northampton, in order to apologize for this meaſure, and pay his reſpects to the duke of Glouceſter. He was received with the greateſt appearance of ſincere friendſhip; he paſſed the evening in an amicable manner with Glouceſter and Buckingham, and proceeded with them the next day to join the king; but as he was entering Stoney-Stratford, he was arreſted by order of the duke of Glouceſter. Sir Richard Gray, one of the queen's ſons, was, at the ſame time, put under a guard, together with Sir Thomas Vaughan, who poſſeſſed a conſiderable poſt in the king's houſhold; and all the priſoners were immediately conducted to Pontefract-caſtle.

Glouceſter approached the prince with the greateſt demonſtration of reſpect, and endeavoured to ſatisfy him with regard to the violence committed on his uncle and brother: but Edward, cloſely attached to thoſe near relations, by whom he had been tenderly educated, was not ſufficiently ſkilled in the art of diſſimulation to conceal his diſpleaſure at ſo atrocious an act, directly repugnant to all the precepts of juſtice and humanity.

No ſooner did theſe tyrannical proceedings reach the ears of the queen, than ſhe foreſaw that Glouceſter's violence would not ſtop here, and that her own ruin at leaſt, if not that of her whole family, was finally determined. She therefore retired about midnight to the ſanctuary of Weſtminſter, with the duke of York, the marquis of Dorſet, and the reſt of her family, reſolving there to await the returns of better fortune.

Lord Haſtings was at this time in London; and though he hated the queen and her relations, he ſtill revered the memory of his late maſter, and was unalterably devoted to the king and his brother. He was well acquainted with the deſign of ſeizing Rivers, and pleaſed that the ſcheme had taken effect; but he was confident that nothing more was intended than to ſuppreſs the queen's party. He entertained not the leaſt ſuſpicion of Glouceſter's real deſign. He accordingly wrote to the archbiſhop of York, then lord chancellor of England, deſiring him not to be alarmed at what had happened, as every thing would tend to promote the peace and happineſs of the kingdom.

The archbiſhop, alarmed at this information, haſtened, before day-break, to the ſanctuary, where he found the queen and her children in all the bitterneſs of affliction, bewailing their miſery, and curſing the authors of their misfortunes. The prelate acquainted her with the confirmation he had received; and aſſured her, that if the lords ſhould ſo far deviate from the principles of humanity or juſtice as to put the king to death, he would immediately crown the duke of York, who was ſtill ſafe even beyond their power: and, as an earneſt of his affection for his deceaſed maſter's family, left in her cuſtody the great ſeal of England.

In the mean time the duke of Glouceſter arrived with the young monarch, who was met at ſome diſtance from the city by the lord-mayor, the magiſtracy, and a body of five hundred citizens, who conducted him to the capital amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people. The expreſſions of the duke of Glouceſter's loyalty was ſo great, that they even became ridiculous; but they were excuſed as the overflowings of his zeal. He rode bareheaded before his nephew, bowing on each ſide to the people, and almoſt continually exclaiming, "Behold your king! Behold your ſovereign." Edward was conducted to the biſhop of London's palace, that being thought the moſt proper place of reſidence for him previous to his coronation. And on the ſame day a council was ſummoned to ſettle the adminiſtration, when Glouceſter was declared protector of the realm.

Though the young king was now in Glouceſter's power, yet the ends of his ambition could not poſſibly be anſwered while the duke of York was in a place of ſafety. He therefore propoſed to take him by force from the ſanctuary; and repreſented to the privy-council both the indignity put upon the government by the queen's ill-grounded apprehenſions, and the neceſſity of the young prince's appearing at the enſuing coronation of his brother. It was farther alledged, that eccleſiaſtical privileges were originally calculated to give protection to unhappy men, perſecuted for their debts or crimes; and were entirely uſeleſs to a perſon, who, by reaſon of his tender age, could lie under the burden of neither, and who, for the ſame reaſon, was utterly incapable of claiming ſecurity from any ſanctuary. But the two archbiſhops, cardinal Bourchier the primate, and Rotheram, archbiſhop of York, proteſting againſt the ſacrilege of this meaſure, it was agreed, that they ſhould firſt endeavour to bring the queen to compliance by perſuaſion, before any violence ſhould be employed againſt her.

The two prelates were immediately deſired to undertake the negotiation with the queen, and being both of them perſons of integrity, and not in the leaſt ſuſpecting the duke's intentions, they employed every argument, accompanied with zealous intreaties, exhortations and aſſurances, to bring her over to the ſame opinion. She continued long obſtinate, and inſiſted, that the duke of York, by living in the ſanctuary, was not only ſecure himſelf, but alſo gave ſecurity to the king, whoſe life no perſon would dare attempt, while his ſucceſſor and avenger remained in ſafety. But finding that no one ſupported her in her ſentiments, and that force, in caſe of refuſal, was threatened by the council, ſhe at laſt complied, and produced her ſon to the two prelates. She was here, on a ſudden, ſtruck with a kind of preſage of his future fate; ſhe tenderly embraced him; ſhe bedewed him with her tears; and, bidding him an eternal adieu, delivered him, with many expreſſions of regret and reluctance, into their cuſtody.

The prelates inſtantly carried the royal youth to his uncle, then waiting for the event of the conference in the Star-chamber, who received him with diſſembled affection, ſaying, "Now welcome, my lord, even with all my heart." Then taking the child in his arms, he conducted him to the king his brother; and they were both of them, the next day, removed to the Tower. This ſtep did not occaſion the leaſt ſuſpicion in the people, as it was the conſtant practice for the kings of England to paſs ſome time there before their coronation, from whence they always went in cavalcade to Weſtminſter to go through that ceremony.

Though the treacherous and ambitious Glouceſter had thus far ſucceeded in his baſe deſigns, yet there were many other obſtacles ſtill in the way. The numerous iſſue of Edward, and the two children of Clarence, had preferable titles to him. But no reſtraints were ſufficient to interrupt his violence; his fierce and ſavage nature was not ſtartled at any crimes: every thing gave way to his unbounded ambition. The death of the earl of Rivers, and the other priſoners confined in Pontefract-caſtle, was firſt determined; and the Protector found no difficulty in obtaining the conſent of his party to that ſanguinary meaſure; but fearing that a trial might fill the people with apprehenſions, eſpecially as the crimes that could be alledged againſt them were far from being capital, it was reſolved to diſpatch them without any legal proceſs; and orders were accordingly ſent to Sir Richard Ratcliffe, a proper inſtrument in the hands of ſo tyrannic a maſter, to take off the heads of theſe noble priſoners; which orders were punctually executed.

The Protector now thought it was high time to procure ſome of the nobility to embark in the baſe deſign he had formed of ſeizing the crown, as his intention could not long be concealed from the public. He firſt applied to the duke of Buckingham, by making him large offers of private advantages. Buckingham readily embraced the propoſals, and promiſed to ſupport him in all his enterprizes. Glouceſter was alſo deſirous of gaining over the lord Haſtings; but finding him impregnable in his allegiance and fidelity to the children of Edward, he determined to ruin the man whom he deſpaired of engaging to concur in his uſurpations.

On the very day that Rivers and the other noblemen were executed at Pontefract-caſtle, Glouceſter ſummoned a council to meet in the Tower. The lord Haſtings, not in the leaſt ſuſpecting that any deſign was formed againſt his life, repaired to the council, where he met the Protector, whoſe behaviour was remarkably affable. After a ſhort ſtay Richard retired from the board, deſiring the lords to continue their deliberations during his abſence. He ſoon after returned with an angry and enflamed countenance, biting his lips, and exhibiting all the marks of the moſt violent indignation. As ſoon as he was ſeated, he addreſſed himſelf thus to the council: "My lords," ſaid he, "what puniſhment do thoſe deſerve who have plotted againſt my life?" Haſtings replied, that they deſerved the puniſhment of traitors. "Theſe traitors," replied the Protector, "are the ſorcerers my brother's wife, and Jane Shore his miſtreſs, with others their aſſociates. See to what a condition they have reduced me by their incantations and witchcraft!" On uttering theſe words, he uncovered his arm, which was ſhrivelled and decayed. The members of the council, who well knew that his arm had always been in that condition, were confounded, and looked upon each other with aſtoniſhment. After a conſiderable pauſe, Haſtings anſwered, "Certainly, my lord, if they are guilty of theſe crimes, they deſerve the ſevereſt puniſhment." "And do you reply to me," ſaid the Protector, "with your ifs and your ands? You are the chief abettor of that witch Shore, my brother's miſtreſs: you are yourſelf a traitor; and I ſwear by St. Paul, that I will not dine before your head be brought me!" At this inſtant he ſtruck the table violently with his hand; when a number of armed men ruſhed into the council-chamber, and ſeized the members. Haſtings was led immediately to the green before the chapel of the Tower, where, after confeſſion to a prieſt, who happened accidentally to be on the ſpot, he was beheaded on a log of timber lying on the green. The archbiſhop of York, the biſhop of Ely, and lord Stanley, who aſſiſted at the council, were ſent to different apartments in the Tower, nor was any perſon ſuffered to viſit them.

Glouceſter, fearful that theſe proceedings would excite a tumult in the city, (the inhabitants of which were ſtaunch friends to Haſtings) immediately cauſed a proclamation, well penned and fairly written, to be read to the populace, enumerating the crimes of Haſtings, and apologizing for the precipitate manner of the execution, from the ſuddenneſs of the diſcovery. This proclamation was iſſued within two hours after the above tranſactions; from whence the people conceived the pretended plot to have no exiſtence, and that the ſcheme had been contrived, and the proclamation prepared and engroſſed, ſome time before they were put in practice.

Glouceſter, however, in order to ſmother the ſuſpicions of the people, determined to act with the greateſt conſiſtence in his proceedings. He therefore ordered Jane Shore to be apprehended, and tried before the council for ſorcery and witchcraft; but no proofs appearing againſt her, notwithſtanding the ignorance and abſurdity of the age, ſhe was acquitted of the charge. The Protector, however, was determined ſhe ſhould not eſcape his vengeance. He cauſed her to be indicted in the ſpiritual court for lewdneſs and adultery; and ſhe did penance in a white ſheet at St. Paul's before all the people. She, however, ſurvived her misfortunes, and was alive in the reign of Henry VIII. when Sir Thomas Moore knew her. But though ſhe had greatly recommended herſelf, during the late reign, by acts of beneficence and humanity; though ſhe had removed the ſtings of poverty from the breaſts of the indigent, and applied the balm of comfort to the wounds of affliction, ſhe found no friends in adverſity; and ſhe ſpent the evening of her life in miſery and want.*

No diſturbance having yet ariſen from the baſe proceedings of Glouceſter, he became more and more confident; and determined to perſevere in the effectual

* As a matter of great curioſity, it may not be improper to ay before our readers an original letter written by this lady to Edward IV. a ſhort time before his death; which letter not only ews the taſte of writing in thoſe times, but alſo evinces the uſpicions ſhe entertained of Glouceſter, and the conſequences that would ariſe after the death of her royal protector. It was as follow:

"May it pleaſe my king and maſter,
